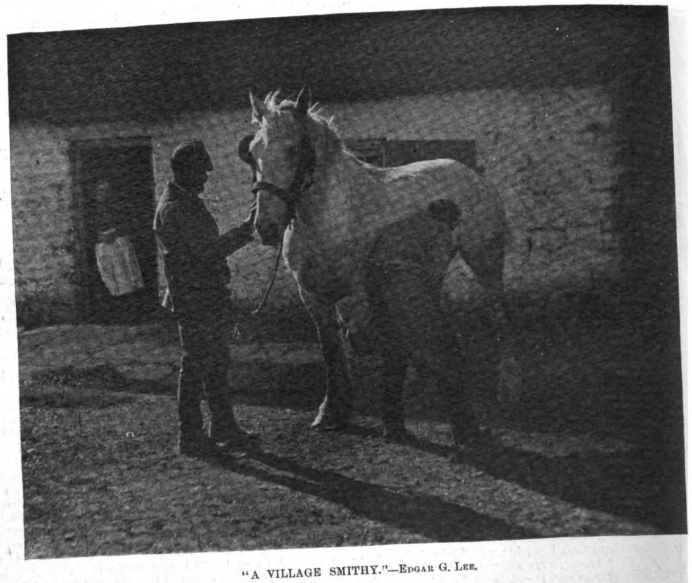
The first thing that impresses the visitor is the wide range of possibilities to which photography lends itself when guided by skill and artistic feeling. One hundred workers are represented, and yet there is little, if any, repetition of effects. The latter, too, show distinct evidence of being suggested by the personal temperament of the photographer. There was a time when he seemed to strive only to make his print as unlike a photograph as possible, and to emulate the effects of water-color, etching, mezzotint, and so on. The results were very surprising, and called forth such exclamations as "Who would suppose that to be a photograph?" It was a species of legerdemain, tricky, and, by repetition, tiresome. And it was a false issue; for while the picture gained a little by emulating some other medium with which it could not wholly compete, it lost a great deal more in abandoning the essential qualities of a photograph—its accuracy of vision, the exquisite minuteness of detail, in which nothing else can rival it. The present exhibition is not without evidences that this mistaken purpose still influences some people; but, on the whole, it is refreshingly free from such small and inadequate motives. The majority of the exhibitors clearly realize that photography has not only artistic possibilities, but an existence and charm independent of other branches of art. Consequently its development must be sought along the lines of photography by emphasizing to the utmost its own inherent qualities, and not by imitating the effects peculiar to other and entirely different arts. One sees this in both the portraiture and the landscapes. The pioneer amateur used to consider far more some Rembrandtesque or other pictorial effect in his portrait than the procuring of a faithful likeness. The latter was left to the photographer of commerce. The amateur was striving for what he fancied to be some higher quality. But the highest quality of any art is its direct relation to human life; and photography, with its all-seeing eye and accurate method of registering impressions, possesses this quality in a very peculiar degree. It is capable of providing a substitute for painted portraits within the reach of all; of being a development of art distinctively appropriate to these democratic times. Herein is surely scope enough for the most ambitious worker. To make a portrait a beautiful picture without losing the value of a faithful likeness is a real contribution both to art and to human happiness. One of the most interesting features of the present exhibition is the number of examples which prove that this has been the end in view.

One may cite "the portrait of Mrs. H." included among the illustrations on another page, by Mr. Clarence H. White, of Newark, Ohio. It has all the appearance of being a characteristic portrait, and its treatment as a picture sets one comparing it with a recent picture by Mr. Sargent. There is very considerable art in the management of the white dress. The freshness and breeziness of the costume are preserved, without any glare, and the shadows are soft. A harmonious unity is felt all through the picture. Amongst a batch of very clever examples by Miss Mathilde Weil, of Philadelphia, are a beautiful study of a young girl with roses in her hair, entitled "Rosa Rosarum," and the laughing face of a little child. The latter is a perfect representation of child beauty, and in its round frame affords a rich spot of decoration. A most remarkable collection of ten exhibits bears the name of Mrs. Gertrude Käsebier, of New York. They are distinguished by a marked and exceedingly captivating individuality. "The Study," shown among the accompanying illustrations, will give some idea of the force and distinctiveness of her style. But other of her exhibits prove that she does not lose these qualities when she devotes herself to portraiture. She shows pictures of a lady and gentleman which produce an astonishing conviction that they represent the sitters at their best, and have pictorial qualities that set you thinking of some of Mr. Whistler's work. She also exhibits a "Mother and Child" which deserves the highest praise. A very fascinating picture of a "Child with Doll" is shown by Mrs. Thomas Eakins. The sturdily modelled fat little face, very Dutch in character, is bending over the wooden features of her doll, and the light catches both in that strong and masterly way that is seen in the portraits of Franz Hals. Mr. Clayton S. Harris sends a portrait of a woman—simply a face illuminated by lamp or fire light. The luminous and lambent effect of the light is wonderfully depicted. Four examples are contributed by Miss Frances B. Johnston, very charming, as all her work is, but not as distinguished and individual as many of the other exhibits. An "Indian Study," by Mr. Joseph T. Keiley, of New York, included among the illustrations elsewhere, is remarkable for its representation of the texture of the flesh and for the suggestion of color; and "Lena," by Mr. Allen D. Cook, of Philadelphia, is a beautiful bit of strong and sensitive portraiture.

Among the landscapes are three pictures by Mr. William A. Fraser, of New York, which, to a layman at any rate, have a surprising interest. They represent night scenes in New York city—two of a snowy street, apparently Fifth Avenue, and the third of Columbus Circle on a wet night. The last received the Royal Society's medal before alluded to, so that it is fair to assume that the picture has exceptional interest. The humidity of the atmosphere, the drippiness of the whole scene, is marvellously rendered, while the pin points and streaks of light from the lamps, the looming monument and blur of buildings beyond, combine to make a composition that is mysterious and fascinating. "Lines in Pleasant Places," by Mr. John G. Bullock, of Philadelphia, is one of the frank recognitions of what photography can do in depicting nature. There is no attempt to slur the definiteness of detail so as to produce some fancied artistic effect. All the delightful tracery of foliage, plants, and flowers is faithfully preserved, and yet does not detract from the homogeneous character of the ensemble. The darks and lights are well distributed and the various planes of the picture truthfully rendered. But these qualities are not peculiar to this exhibit. It is a gratifying sign that they characterize the majority of the out-door scenes. Mr. S. Hudson Chapman, of Philadelphia, shows a "Sunday on the Beach at Capri," with fishing-boats drawn up on a reach of sand, flanked by quaint stone houses and a stretch of rocky coast. The sun is burning down on the scene, and the details make a mosaic of dark and light. Among the illustrations will be found "Keepers of the Crest," by Mr. J. Page Croft, of Birmingham, England. The subject has been most excellently chosen; the quiet evening light is truthfully rendered, and the rock-pines not only form an effective silhouette, but express their own bulk and solidity. Miss Mary Devens, of Cambridge, Massachusetts, shows four pieces of much power, produced, apparently, by the gum bichromate process, in which the intensity of the development is regulated by the operator, who lays on the solution with a brush. It is a process demanding much artistic feeling and technical skill, and obtains a result, in Miss Devens's case, that is extraordinarily rich and velvety. However, it is almost invidious to single out names. A complete list of the pictures that one saw with pleasure and would like to see again is impossible. The average of the landscapes is fully up to that of the portraits, and is distinguished by quite as much artistic feeling and individuality of expression.



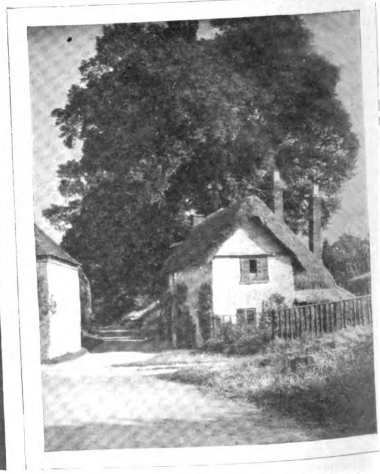
That class of picture which comes in between these two—the subject picture—is more unequal in its standard. A few are strikingly interesting, some indifferently so, and a few—the most ambitious—objectionable. The success or failure would appear to be the result of how they were originated. The best seem to have come almost by accident. A possibility was latent. It has been developed. This is particularly apparent in a remarkable picture by Mr. F. H. Day, of Boston, whose exhibit of eight examples has been assigned the place of honor in the gallery. The one alluded to is called "Ebony and Ivory," which represents the nude figure of a Nubian holding an ivory statuette. The figure looms as a dark mass against a darker background, and the one spot of light is the statuette. The imagination is at once captivated by the sentiment suggested. Just as spontaneous in its apparent origin is "A Farmer's Daughter," by Mr. Archibald Cochrane, of Scotland. The girl is standing in a field of rye, a strong and simple figure, with the flap of her sun-bonnet blown across her cheek. The charm of the picture is brought out by the way in which it has been printed. Which, however, the photographer has deliberately set about making a subject picture, he invites our scepticism from the start. The result bears no more resemblance to a composition which grows out of a painter's reflection and study than machine-made wood-carving does to the work which expresses the individuality of some one man's feeling and execution. It is a sham presentment. The limit of mistake is reached by two exhibits, one of seven heads crowned with thorns, purporting to represent the "Seven Last Words" from the Cross, and the other, a dead Christ with the Magdalen bathing his feet with her tears. In the latter case a wound has been painted on the side of the model. Surely claptrap and misapprehension of the province and mission of art can go no further!

Charles H. Caffin.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PORTRAIT OF MRS. H.—Clarence H. White.

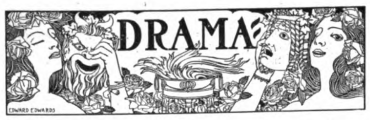
"A VILLAGE SMITHY."—Edgar G. Lee.



"KEEPERS OF THE CREST."—J. Page Croft.

PORTRAIT (INDIAN GIRL).—Joseph T. Keiley.

A STUDY.—Gertrude Käsebier.



"A BIT OF OLD ENGLAND."—Charles L. Mitchell.

SOME OF THE EXHIBITS AT THIS YEAR'S PHOTOGRAPHIC SALON, PHILADELPHIA.—[See Page 1087.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SARAH COWELL-LE MOYNE AND FRANK WORTHING,
As the Duchess de Coutras and the Duke de Coutras, in Henri Lavedan's Comedy, "Catherine," as performed at the Garrick Theatre, New York.

THERE is a season in the drama for the many and a season for the few. The season for the many began with the annual ebullition of comic opera. I had thought the season for the few was to begin with "Cyrano," but, thanks to a small matter of a nose or so, to the scandalous proceedings of our leading theatrical manager, and to Mr. Mansfield's sense of popular taste, "Cyrano" now belongs to the many. And, thanks to a screed on that wretched nose, there is space for only a paragraph or so on the opening of the season for the few. I can at least give them the place of distinction.

Annie Russell and others in "Catherine."

Annie Russell has come back from her succès d'estime in London, and is bringing out "Catherine" at the Garrick, the play with which Henri Lavedan is supposed to have bidden for Meilhac's vacant seat in the Academy. In one night the spell of that gloriously impossible Cyrano is broken, and those who care for art that embodies with simple truth the living human soul are worshipping without reserve. The play is an old story in new setting. King Cophetua is the Duke de Coutras; the beggar-maid is Catherine Vallon, his sister's music-teacher; and it all has to do with the problem of caste—the generous motives that make the Duke marry, for her beauty, sincerity, and courage, a young woman of humble position in the world; and the fatal power of tradition and convention that all but wreck the marriage. On the whole, it is a pretty enough play—at once sentimental in the modern French manner of sentiment, and discoursive in the Ibsen vein; but if, as is reported, it was consciously aimed at the conventionally proper tastes of the Academy, then M. Lavedan's consciousness of what is seemly, is truly Gallic. The catastrophe comes from the fact that the Duke's cousin (Elsie de Wolfe) wooes him from the path of marital virtue in broad daylight and an evening gown, and would triumph if it were not for the sudden appearance of Catherine. But though, as usual, Miss Russell is unfortunate in her choice of a play, her audience is, as usual, most fortunate in Miss Russell! A first-nighter beside me remarked that there are only two women on the stage in America who, in any true sense of the word, are actresses. The other shall be as you wish, but the one is Miss Russell. Her masque—the technical word must be my excuse for bluntness—is not in itself beautiful, but it is all the more serviceable as a masque for that. It is sensitive in every fibre, and within her range of expression is apparently under absolute control. In the lift of one point of an eyebrow, or in the smile of a corner of the mouth, there is more of deftness and accuracy of expression than are to be found in the entire cast of many a play on Broadway; and when occasion requires, every muscle plays its part in creating a sum total of effect. At times the effect is simple and strong—the joy of love or the pain, hopeless sadness or a burst of mirth and of amusement, enthusiasm for the beauty or despair for the sordidness of life. At other times a dozen emotions seem to blend into one another. When the Duke, who quite plainly is in love with her, makes excuses to detain her—his sister's music-teacher—it is worth a journey to the Garrick merely to see at one glance the deep joy and the disquiet in her eyes, the latent smile in one corner of a very pensive mouth. And when she is finally prevailed upon to be seated, there is nothing funnier in the play than the amused gaucherie, the happy consciousness, with which her hands fold themselves in her lap. At that movement of ten fingers the audience of the first night rustled with enjoyment and understanding. In the one passage the whole of Catherine's character was adumbrated. It seemed a very modern character—full of a sweet sense of the possibilities of life, and of patient amusement at its futilities, the pinch of pain that is almost a smile, with an undertone of world sadness. I felt sure that it quite belonged to the last quarter of our century, until I remembered the half-smile of Lionardo. Anything that is so poignantly true must be eternal!

Others in the play are only less notable than Miss Russell. They are Frank Worthing, Joseph Holland, W. J. Le Moyne, Sarah Cowell-Le Moyne, Elsie de Wolfe, Ethel Barrymore. Their qualities would make a list of the virtues and excellences of impersonation; but nothing is so sad as a category of virtues and excellences! After all is said, they remain to be seen. Yet Mrs. Le Moyne deserves a word, if only as a tribute. As the mother of the Duke she wisely and sweetly abets him in his love for Catherine; and then, when he proves unequal to his high resolution, she wisely and firmly prompts the best there is in his nature. There is as much breadth and substance in her part as in Catherine's; and the presentation of the play is so admirably regulated and proportioned that, in spite of the prominence given Miss Russell in the play-bill, Mrs. Le Moyne achieves a large, if not equal, share in the success of the whole.

Though the play is assured of a moderate success, it can scarcely have more than an ordinary run. It is not well built, and has no real quality of its own beyond a skilful eclecticism. And then the audience. When the Duke's mother proposes her son's marriage with Catherine, the translator makes Catherine's father say, "This is so sudden!" And the wisdom of the translator is shown by the fact that everybody laughs. And in another passage, when the Duke finds that his mother rejoices in his choice, speaking well of Catherine, the Duke says, "Go on!" This the audience take for slang, and laughs almost as joyously as if some one had said damn. It scarcely seems likely that such an audience will care for the best that Mr. Charles Frohman's company has for them. It remains for us who regard ourselves as the few to flock to see Miss Russell in all our multitudes.

The threatened fad has come; as this department foreboded a month ago, Cyrano's nose has fallen heir to the fame of Trilby's toes. Our misfortune is mitigated, however, by the fact that the nose has raised a question in the æsthetics of the drama that was lacking in the case of the toes. It is reported from Paris that a sculptor, who was engaged to make a statue of Coquelin as Cyrano, refused to produce le nez terrible, and that Coquelin refused to have a statue without it. Mr. Mansfield apparently sides with the sculptor, for he has ingeniously constructed a cartilage that is literally true to the epithets Cyrano applies to it, and at the same time, as is shown in our illustration of three weeks ago, vanishes when seen from straight in front. By turning his full face to the audience, Mr. Mansfield can be as good-looking and as affecting as he likes. Yet even this vanishing nose displeases some of the critics. Mr. William Winter asserts that it is a mistake to make a romantic hero ugly, and that no art of the actor can ever redeem the nose. And now some one signing himself "Actor-Manager," who sets forth so clearly Mr. Mansfield's views, that we have not a moment of doubt that he is Mr. Mansfield, writes a letter to the New York Sun, arguing that the nose should be made to vanish altogether, and plainly states as a reason that he is afraid people will laugh at it. He even hints that in unpolished precincts the nose may become a mark for bad eggs and cabbages from the gallery. Like the Parisian sculptor, he is at odds with the author and the "creator" of the rôle, and is bent on dodging the nose. As for the sculptor, he possibly knew his business. The resources of sculpture—rigid lines and colorless form—are so meagre that probably no sculptor could copy Coquelin's nose without ruining all hope of the dignity of port and the humanity of soul that are quite as essential to the character. But drama is more free than sculpture: no line is rigid, and every form has also all the colors of life. The actor has motion of body, too, and finally the supreme advantage of speech. By using all the resources of the drama with creative sympathy, M. Coquelin has been able to make a sum total of effect in which, at the moments of white heat, the bulbous nose—le nez terrible—is an insignificant detail. If Mr. Mansfield feels obliged to sink the nose by artifice, it is because, as has already been pointed out, he lacks the creative force, the expansiveness of temperament, that the play requires. If he possessed these, he would find, as Mr. Coquelin has found, that the touch of grotesque the nose lends is a positive aid in his serious and imaginative effects.

Again that Nose of Cyrano's.

The Æsthetics of Toes and Noses.

The use of the grotesque to re-enforce the beautiful is admirably illustrated in the art of the two periods in which the genius of our Northern races has been most spontaneous and powerful. On the face of the north transept of the Cathedral of Paris is a Virgin that is no less austere and gracious than a figure from the Pheidian pediment. On the north tower of the same cathedral is a

THE DEMON OF PARIS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ıtic centre, do not wholly account for it. gement, as a great business, is not a determinative. The generosity of men in one place or another, who love music and put their bank-accounts at its service, the men, who guarantee an orchestra's season, , or a star course, are not the great factors. e less artificial leaven and life. No; whatf discouragement come now and then where —and New York is not at all beyond giving s—seems musically apathetic, misguided, or all, we may each November feel surer of ical taste in advanced activity. There is ness to pay for its nourishment in comlly standing far removed from our town and ıer. Aid of one kind or another may be reforeign soloist, too, for better or worse, is rom New York. But in more than one in-

MR. MORIZ ROSENTHAL,
Pianist.

, "provincial" public has something better in aterial than New York yet possesses, and centres t with a sincerity and a democratic ardor worth ng.

glance at a few instances, merely those that lie o hand. New England has passed its annual of music festivals lately, Worcester, Bangor, land included particularly; and such cities as er, Springfield, New Haven, Hartford, Portland, ıce, and numerous others have announcements w how a more even current of musical life p on throbbing through them. Boston and far Chicago do not nowadays require much ıing demonstration. Both those cities are full ound of a sense of the value of their superfine it orchestras, respectively directed by two of ntry. the most admirable educational guides now Mr. Gericke and Mr. Thomas.

from these special and local concert interests, the managers in either place are building up a strong for an interminable line of concerts and operas ıit. And Chicago has perhaps the finest opera-house vorld for its weeks of imported opera. Cincinnati, a triennial festival has been a most potent influ- l about the region, has in its endowed College of a great conservatory worthy of many a European l city. It is at present under the direction of Mr. van der Stucken, who, in spite of his Flemish name, is an American—a gifted composer and a conductor of the first competency, earnestness of purpose, and enterprise. The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, also under him, gives twenty concerts of the first class, with soloists of equal note and authority. Besides these orchestral concerts, Cincinnati has chamber-music afternoons and evenings by the dozen, and a great flood of like matters comes from outside managements. Milwaukee, though this year its symphony concerts have not been yet assured, shows musical vitality enough to support an extended group of concerts from the great stars that will be wandering westward. In dozens of these remoter cities the German singing clubs have been a pioneer and precious factor in edifying music's cause. They still are such factors, with many concerts. The Pittsburg Orchestra, a detail of the great Carnegie Institute, begins its fourth season this week. Mr. Victor Herbert is now its leader: a composer of distinction among musicians identified with our country, and a conductor long before the public in other connections. Twenty concerts will be given in the beautiful hall erected by Mr. Carnegie, and the Pittsburg programmes leave nothing to be desired in dignity. Mr. Herbert has an able body of musicians, including a good concert-master in Mr. Luigi Kunits, from Vienna. Buffalo—another city that has had an excellent orchestral record of a local kind, until some adverse currents came of late—is anxious to reorganize its capable symphony band on a sound basis. Meantime the Twentieth Century Club of the city guarantees a set of concerts by the best visiting artists attainable, and two or three of the larger orchestras on tours from New York and elsewhere will occupy the Buffalo field. Cleveland is in some traits perhaps the most musical city in its vicinity. Having given up last week to a music festival directed by Mr. Paur, it will be visited between now and May by a large proportion of the notable musical attractions of the year. Indianapolis is a community nowadays firmly musical. It is laboring to place its own symphony orchestra on such a basis as will insure regular symphonic-concert work in the city—independent of the visiting organizations, Western or Eastern—and to accomplish that blessed matter, to retain the same men who have given strength to the local band hitherto. The women of Indianapolis are the engineers of this project—as are the women in so many other centres. San Francisco is expeding its orchestral work of local origin and all the highest-priced travelling stars. St. Paul, prompted by its wealthy Commercial Club, is organizing a series of symphony-concerts, managed by Mr. Feldhauser, to come from the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra that is to be on tour here presently. Philadelphia, once a city whose important music was a reflection of New York's sound waves, now has Mr. Damrosch and Mr. Ellis as operatic guardians and symphony-concert guides, besides the visits of the ubiquitous Boston Symphony Orchestra and the new "Orchestra of New York," which makes its début October 29 under Mr. Paur. Baltimore possesses a stable and large musical leverage in the great Peabody Institute, the costly gift of George Peabody in 1868. A new day of usefulness and note has come to this conservatory with the election to its control of Mr. Harold Randolph, a Richmond musician of experience and ability. He is widely known for his enthusiasms towards building up independent musical life in a community. The Institute has just been thoroughly reorganized, and will be a firmer power southward. The Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Ross Jungnickel, also has announced its arrangements. The large Oratorio Society choir is directed by Mr. Joseph Pache, and Mr. Randolph is working for another choral society for fine polyphonic music.

Women as Managers of Music.

One of the most striking traits in the present bright aspect of musical enterprises about our wide country is the influence of the women managers, the women clubs, the guarantees by women that bring expensive orchestras and artists and opera troupes to one or another town. In many cities the women really work up the whole season. The woman manager, especially, has developed a fine new industry for her sex. She fills it most ably, in notable instances, often with most complex pecuniary cares and endless niceties. Such women as Miss Anna Millar, Miss Mildred Webber, both of Chicago, and Mrs. Edward G. Love, of this city, attest the adaptiveness of women to the business of musical purveyance.

I am not overlooking the uncertainties that enter into such local musical life—the questions of money to pay the

MR. VICTOR HERBERT,
Conductor of the Pittsburg Orchestra.

MR. HAROLD RANDOLPH,
Director of the Peabody Institute, Baltimore.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

fiddler, the charge that many a town conscientiously makes against itself as "not a musical city," because such or such a good work went wrong, or another one lacked subscribers. Nor do I overlook the fact that our most intelligent public think too much of star-artists with foreign labels. Again, only our chief cities, outside of New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and—most interestingly and honorably—New Orleans, seem able to do aught towards establishing their own opera. But New York is not safe in bragging of what it does for opera. Until we can hear the best operas in the vernacular by as great artists as are now singing it in foreign tongues, humility becomes us. For that very reason the Metropolitan's great exotic seasons must not shut our ears to the fact that two blocks away an English-singing company, the Castle Square one, is carrying on an operatic lesson and a public effect meaning even more than all that Mr. Grau superintends. Opera, too, is not at all indispensable to a city's musical life. It is a detail of variable value.

Our own musical movement has fairly begun since last week. Mr. Rosenthal appears in two recitals, playing with that virtuosity to which we are now accustomed—restored to his perfect health after a year's absence. The opening performance of the new symphonic band, "The New York Orchestra," organized by Mr. Carl Löwenstein and directed by Mr. Emil Paur, is announced for this (Saturday) evening—a date making record of its work impracticable in this issue of HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Mr. Rosenthal: Mr. Paur.

E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

KANG YU WEI,
The modern Sage of China.

THE CHINESE BORGIA AND THE MODERN SAGE.

THE Emperor of China, Kuang Hsu, was deposed September 22. In him lay the present hope of the renovation of the Celestial Empire. Though only twenty-seven years of age he was the patron of the radical reformers. This is the cause of his downfall, and with him goes Kang Yu Wei, his chief adviser. On September 24 Kang reached Shanghai from the north on the British steamer Chungking, and was transferred to the British gunboat Esk, then lying in the Yang-tse River. On the 27th he sailed for Hong-kong in the British steamer Ballaarat, which was convoyed by the British man-of-war Bonaventure. A price having been set on his head the Chinese governor of Shanghai tried to have the Chungking boarded and searched, but was prevented by the British Consul-General at Shanghai.

The Emperor and the "Modern Sage" having gone down, up have come the Empress Dowager and Li Hung Chang. Kang Yu Wei is a Chinaman, and the Emperor, who is a Manchu, made him the chief adviser of the new régime which was sweeping Manchus from office. The Manchu clan leaders seem to have combined to overthrow both the Emperor and his new advisers. Down have gone definite reform measures in government administration, army reorganization, and the institution of Western education throughout the empire. A recent decree of the late Emperor required the establishing of something like two hundred government colleges. Up have come knavery, moth-eaten "custom," and attendant evils. The Emperor assumed the reins of government nine years ago, but within the past few months has made public his reform policy with what seems like ill-considered haste. The reorganization of affairs at Peking alone has thrown 5000 drones out of office.

I have had interviews, yesterday and to-day, with two Chinamen and an American, who may be said to understand the undercurrent of affairs. One of the Chinamen belongs to the family that has furnished a minister to Britain, and other prominent officials. These three men are singularly agreed on the following:

1. That the Empress Dowager is a second Lucretia Borgia. It is asserted that she had previously killed (or had killed) two emperors—Hsien Feng and Tung Chih. Since September 22 she has ordered the murder (decapitation without trial) of from fifteen to twenty of the leading reform advisers of the late Emperor, and only changed the action, so as to afford a mock trial, after the British fleet had been massed near Tien-tsin.

2. There is uniform belief that no dependence can be placed on the reports sent out from the Palace as to whether the Emperor is alive or dead. If he is announced as alive he may be dead, or vice versa. There is a peculiar custom in China of a man being politically dead but physically alive. Many people in China remember when a brother-in-law of Li Hung-Chang, who had fallen into disfavor, was announced dead. An official funeral was held, a pauper being put in the coffin, the said brother-in-law being privileged to witness his own demise!

If the Emperor is announced as alive and sitting in state with the Empress Dowager, it may be only a ruse to allay popular ferment. The Palace knows deeper secrets than how to "fix up" an effigy.

3. The Emperor was gaining in favor partially from the fact that Kang Yu Wei, a Chinaman, was advising these reforms rather than a Manchu. He gained favor with Chinamen, but lost it with the ruling house. And I not infrequently hear the assertion among Chinamen that if the Emperor is not restored, they wish England would take over China. There seem to be numerous Chinamen who believe this to be the only way of escape for the nation. Neither is this opinion limited to Central China. A foreigner in Shan-Si (a northern province) writes that there are inquiries among the Chinese literati as to how much must be paid for the British B.A. degree! They wish to be ready for government preferment. In the same province the chief subject of inquiry is said to be "what would be the best course to pursue to win the approval of the rulers of that country which may annex Shan-Si?" Missionaries from far-off Sze-Chuen province tell me that on the waterways the people asked eagerly when the foreigners were coming to rule them.

There are predictions also of more revolts. Meanwhile the rebellion in South China seems to be growing. It was announced in July that it had been about pacified, and that "about a thousand of the ringleaders have been beheaded." A rebellion with a thousand ringleaders must have been quite an affair, and it is believed to have been growing during the past months. Meanwhile, if Kang Yu Wei is not murdered, watch for developments. He is at Hong-kong, where he can be easily and safely reached by his friends, but not by his enemies.

ROBERT E. LEWIS.

SHANGHAI, September 30, 1898.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa.—[Adv.]

NO OTHER SO GOOD.

THE social life of the present century creates conditions of motherhood which many times prevent the natural supply of food for infants. No so-called infant food equals the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk.—[Adv.]

APPETITE gone? The truant will soon return when ABBOTT'S—The ORIGINAL ANGOSTURA BITTERS—are sent to seek it. Take only the genuine—"ABBOTT'S."—[Adv.]

DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS, the South American appetizer, cures dyspepsia.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pears'

Pretty boxes and odors are used to sell such soaps as no one would touch if he saw them undisguised. Beware of a soap that depends on something outside of it.

Pears', the finest soap in the world is scented or not, as you wish; and the money is in the merchandise, not in the box.

All sorts of stores sell it, especially druggists; all sorts of people are using it.

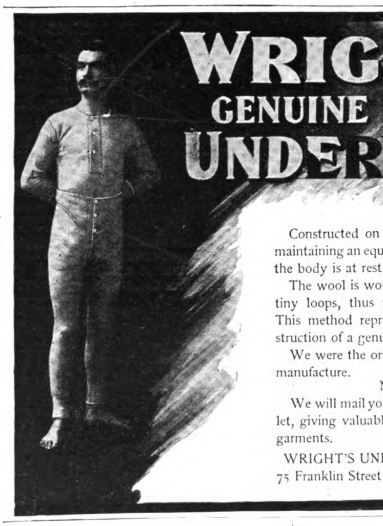
THE REGAL SHOE

The finest patent leather comes from Germany. Cornelius Heyl, Worms, Germany produces invariably the best of the best. We use his patent leather exclusively in "Regal King Patent Calf" Shoes.

This patent calf has a more brilliant and lasting lustre, a richer color and a more superior finish than any other patent calf made.....

ARGYLE

Made of patent calf on one of our latest custom flat lasts with medium wide toe and slight extension sole. A correct shoe for dress occasions. Also of black King Calf and Imported Enamel with double soles.



$3.50 PER PAIR. DELIVERED PREPAID TO ANY ADDRESS IN U.S., $3.75

SEND POSTAL FOR NEW FALL CATALOGUE H AND BOOK "THE CARE OF SHOES."

L. C. BLISS & CO.
MAIL ORDER DEPARTMENT
109 Summer St., Boston, Mass.

STORES—
BOSTON BALTIMORE DETROIT UTICA, N.Y.
PROVIDENCE WASHINGTON CHICAGO BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEW YORK ATLANTA ST. LOUIS CINCINNATI
BROOKLYN PITTSBURG DENVER WALLA WALLA,
PHILADELPHIA CLEVELAND ALBANY, N.Y. WASH.

FACTORY—WHITMAN, MASS.

WRIGHT'S GENUINE HEALTH UNDERWEAR

Constructed on the hygienic principle of maintaining an equable temperature, whether the body is at rest or during exercise.

The wool is woven to the outer fabric in tiny loops, thus providing inter-air-space. This method represents the scientific construction of a genuine health garment.

We were the originators of this process of manufacture.

NOTICE

We will mail you free our illustrated booklet, giving valuable information on undergarments.

WRIGHT'S UNDERWEAR COMPANY
75 Franklin Street New York City

W. & J. Sloane

RUGS.
ORIENTAL AND DOMESTIC

Largest assortment in America. Send size required, predominating color of decorations, and we will make selections subject to your approval.

Broadway & 19th St.

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,
BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

THE CELEBRATED
SOHMER
Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.

Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade.
Our name spells—
S—O—H—M—E—R
New York Warerooms
SOHMER BUILDING
Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The CRUSADERS in their attack on the strongholds of Infidelism were the advance guards of Modern Civilization.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S
EXTRACT OF BEEF

A product of Modern Civilization, is one of the far reaching peaceful developements of the 19th Century. It fortifies the system against disease, and renders untold service in the modern kitchen.
AT ALL GROCERS AND DRUGGISTS.
Note the signature of Justus von Liebig in blue on every jar.

The Best is the Cheapest

Rae's Olive Oil is both the best and cheapest, quality considered.

The Chemical Analysis of S. Rae & Co.'s Finest Sublime Lucca Oil, made Sept. 15th, 1896, by the Ledoux Chemical Laboratory, declares it to be "unadulterated by admixture with any other oil or other substance. It is free from rancidity and all other undesirable qualities, and it is of Superior Quality and Flavor."

S. RAE & CO., Leghorn, Italy.
Established 1836.

No. 4711 ESSENCE OF
Rhine Violets
No. 4711

The highest degree of refinement.—Wonderfully delicate and lasting.—Absolutely true odor of the living flower.—Be sure to get the "No. 4711."

Sole U. S. Agents
MÜLHENS & KROPFF
NEW YORK

WHITE LABEL SOUPS

An Exquisite blending of flavor with strength. The best that money and experience can produce. At Grocers. 20 varieties ready for use without dilution. 5 varieties concentrated. Our Booklet explains, free.
ARMOUR PACKING CO.
DEPARTMENT H
KANSAS CITY, U.S.A.

A NEW POCO.
The Folding Gem.

The neatest, smallest, most carefully built of all the low-priced cameras. A marvel of compactness weighing one pound and only an inch and a-half thick, closed. Automatically locks itself at proper focusing distance. Closes by touching a spring.

TAKES A PICTURE 4 X 5
As perfect at edges as at centre.

COMPLETE, $7.00.
ROCHESTER CAMERA CO.
43 ELIZABETH ST., ROCHESTER, N. Y.

CHICKEN
NOVEL MEXICAN DELICACY.
Minced chicken, highly seasoned with Mexican spices, and wrapped in corn husks. Unique, delightful. At grocers, or ½ pound can mailed for 15 c in stamps. Booklet sent on request.
TAMALE
ARMOUR PACKING CO.
DEPARTMENT H
KANSAS CITY, MO. U.S.A.

ED. PINAUD'S EAU DE QUININE
THE BEST HAIR TONIC
THE BEST DANDRUFF CURE
IF YOU TAKE TIME BY THE FORELOCK YOU'LL NEVER BE BALD
FOR SALE EVERYWHERE

TO AUTHORS: Manuscripts purchased outright or handled under special agreement, in all branches of literature. Short and long stories published serially in newspapers and magazines, or in book form under International Copyright in the U.S. and Great Britain. Examination promptly made.
F. TENNYSON NEELY
Publisher,
114 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

SELF MADE MEN WHO BECAME GREAT LAWYERS. Study Law at Home

MANY a man has made a mistake in thinking that he could be a successful lawyer. No man, however, ever made a mistake in studying law, because no study has so great a tendency to broaden the mind, elevate and cultivate thought, sharpen the reason as the study of law. A young man versed in the law has a better chance for success in any direction in which he may turn his talents. A man is a better preacher, a better teacher, a better statesman, a better workman in any department of physical or mental activity for having studied the law. The law is a great stepping-stone to preferment. A law school is the best place in which to study law. It is not the only place. The men whose portraits appear in this advertisement, and countless others, have made great successes without law school instruction. They became great lawyers not because they never attended the law school, but despite the fact that they did not. The opportunities open to these men for study were inferior in number and in character to those open to any young man nowadays.

The correspondence system of study which claims to be second only to study in a resident school and infinitely better than study in an office or alone, comes near bringing the law school to the home of the student. Certainly what young men have done, young men can do again under more favorable conditions.

We want you to write us for our handsome catalogue of particulars with reference to the corresponding system of the study of the law, and our book of testimonials from hundreds of students, many of whom have become successful practicing lawyers in every State in the Union and in some foreign countries.

These are furnished free of charge. They will interest you and may lead to something of great advantage to you.

Address: THE SPRAGUE CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL OF LAW,
No. 331 Telephone Building, DETROIT, MICH.

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak.

Holidays are Kodak Days

The long evenings of Christmas-tide are made doubly delightful by taking flash-light pictures of one's friends.

Picture taking by daylight or flash-light is easy with a Kodak.

Kodaks $5.00 to $[illegible].00.

Catalogues free of dealers or by mail.
EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

Esterbrook's Pens Triumphant.
IN SIGNING THE PEACE PROTOCOL

Secretary Day used our

No. 048 Falcon

And Ambassador Cambon our

No. 313 Probate

We manufacture 150 other styles, Ask your Stationer for them.
The Esterbrook Steel Pen Co.,
Works, Camden, N. J. 26 John St., New York.

Winter Excursion Tickets on the Pennsylvania Railroad.

On November 1 the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will place on sale at its principal ticket offices excursion tickets to all prominent Winter resorts in New Jersey, Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, and Cuba. The tickets will be sold at the usual low rates, with the usual liberal return limits.

The magnificent facilities of the Pennsylvania Railroad, with its many connections, make this the favorite line for Winter travel.

An illustrated book, descriptive of Winter resorts, and giving routes of travel and rates for tickets, will be furnished free after November 1 on application to ticket agents.

The Improved
BOSTON GARTER
Is the recognized
STANDARD for MEN'S WEAR.
Keeps the Stocking Free from Wrinkles
DOES NOT BIND
THE Velvet Grip CUSHION BUTTON CLASP
Lies flat to the leg. Does not tear the stocking, and will not unfasten accidentally.
SOLD EVERYWHERE
Sample Pair by Mail { Silk. 50c. / Cotton, 25c.
GEORGE FROST CO.
BOSTON, MASS.

THE "ONEITA"
PAT. APL 25TH 1893.
Elastic-Ribbed UNION SUITS
are complete undergarments, covering the entire body like an additional skin. Perfectly elastic, fitting like a glove, but softly and without pressure. No buttons down the front. Made for Men, Women, and Young People. Most convenient to put on or off, being entered at the top and drawn on like trousers. With no other kind of underwear can ladies obtain such perfect fit for dresses or wear comfortably so small a corset.
ONEITA KNITTING MILLS, Office: No. 1 Greene Sts. N. Y. Address Dept. 7.
Send for Illustrated Booklet.

THE HAIR 27th Ed., 25c. (or stamps). Why it Falls Off, Turns Grey, and the Remedy. By Prof. HARLEY PARKER. A. N. LONG & CO., 1013 Arch St., Phila., Pa. "Every one should read this little book."—Athenæum.

IF interested in ELECTRICITY send 2c. stamp for my Catalogue, finest out.
WM. MUELLER, Dept. I, 713-715 Burling St., Chicago.

How to Get Strong

And How to Stay So. By WILLIAM BLAIKIE. With Numerous Portraits. New and Enlarged Edition from New Plates. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 75.

Mr. Blaikie's object has not been so much to encourage the cultivation of great strength as to point out the vast advantages, physical, moral, and mental, which follow hard upon the institution or a systematic and rational practice of exercise.

NEW YORK HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers LONDON

Collar Button Insurance
GIVEN WITH EVERY
KREMENTZ
One-Piece Collar Button

You get a new one without charge in case of accident of any kind.

"The Story of a Collar Button" gives all particulars. Postal us for it.

All jewelers sell KREMENTZ Buttons
KREMENTZ & CO., 48 Chestnut Street, NEWARK, N. J.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AMATEUR SPORT

MR. CASPAR WHITNEY, who has just returned from his trip to the Hawaiian Islands, will resume next week the editorial direction of this department, as a regular feature of HARPER'S WEEKLY.

YALE FOOTBALL ELEVEN.

BY H. S. BROOKS, JR.

CAPTAIN CHAMBERLIN'S whistle sounded loud and clear over the Yale field, and if it had been Gabriel's trumpet it could not have had greater effect. All the chatter instantly ceased, and a hush seemed to spread over everything as the men silently and quickly took their seats on the benches running along the side-lines. The candidates were so numerous that they stretched nearly the entire length of the field. Without any waste of time, Captain Chamberlin and the head coach, arm in arm, started to pick out the university and college teams for the afternoon's practice. Somehow or other I had drifted to a seat beside one of the candidates for end, and, presto! I was a boy again, awaiting my fate. Every eye was fixed on the captain and coach as they started down the line, stopping in front of each man, looking him in the eye, and one could hear the low voice of the captain saying, "Hubbell, university, left end; Cutten, university, centre; Thomas, college, left end; Smith, college, centre." As he approached me I felt very much as I did at my first Sophomore german, when every girl that started in my direction with a favor made me feel conscious. As Captain Chamberlin passed me my heart sank; but there was a "balm of Gilead" for me that day in the awakening, but I am afraid there was a dreadfully disappointed and heart-broken boy beside me who had never been to sleep.

McBRIDE—"FULL-BACK."

Last year the daily practice saw a different "university" every day, for the material was not sifted out until the very last moment, but this year the team is pretty nearly chosen. There is some competition at the ends and back of the line, but even these few positions are about decided.

There is a radical change in New Haven in the coaching of the team. Last year Butterworth acted in the capacity of head coach, and took entire charge, of course working in perfect harmony with the captain. This year there is no head coach; not for the reason that a suitable man cannot be obtained, but because there is a feeling in the university that the control of all athletic teams should be in the hands of the undergraduates. As the captain is the undergraduates' direct representative, the entire policy of the Yale football team this year is in his hands. I do not think that the university at large has come to any definite conclusion, but the method outlined above is to be tried this year, just as the other method was tried last year, and Yale will not suffer from the thrashing out of this matter, for the undergraduates and graduates are working in entire harmony, and Chamberlin can get anything he wants.

Undoubtedly Cutten, "the theolog," will play centre, but will in no sense be able to fill Cadwallader's shoes. He is [illegible] away the best man in college for the position, and it looks now as though the coaches would [illegible]d it into some sort of respectable [illegible]ound him out into some shape. He will not be anything remarkable, although he is very willing, and tries hard to do his best. This in itself is a great deal in his favor, for if he "knew it all" he would be hopeless. Cutten has a bad knee and is very liable to get hurt, and this fact alone is causing his captain much uneasiness.

Brown will play left guard, as he did last year. He is a thoroughly reliable man, tall and strong, and well up to a guard's weight. He plays with his head and is very conscientious. He has stepped into Cadwallader's shoes, and kicks all the goals from touch-downs, and does it remarkably well, too. He is very deliberate about it, and rarely misses.

Marshall, substitute guard on last year's team, will fill the other guard's position. He has been soldiering all summer, and there was some fear that he would not be mustered out in time to get into condition, but he reported for practice a short time ago, and is doing good work. He is tall, like Brown, and is coming along fast in his knowledge of the game; and although he has much to learn, and is more or less crude just at present, he shows, nevertheless, such intelligence that he is not causing his coaches any great amount of worry.

Captain Chamberlin will, of course, play right tackle. He has paid little or no attention to his own game, as the entire responsibility of the coaching is on his shoulders. But his responsibilities, great as they are, will not prevent him from putting up a thoroughly satisfactory game; not that it would be reasonable to expect him to play as he did last year, for that was phenomenal, but he is made of sturdy stuff, and can be relied upon to do well.

The university has called on Allen, the captain of the crew, to play the other tackle. It was thought at first that he could be spared, as he did not want to play, and needed rest for his assiduous duties in the spring, but Durston's low stand compelled him to answer the university call, and he is now taking his banging and drudgery cheerfully, and will play a hard, intelligent game, and although his work will not be showy, it will be effective. Allen is what is called at New Haven a "university man," and let me say that this is a title well worth the winning.

Marshall. Captain Chamberlin.

Winter.

KICKING A GOAL.

Captain Chamberlin H. S. Graves. Walter Camp. Ex-Captain Murphy.

HATCHING A CONSPIRACY.

Hubbell and Coy, left and right ends respectively, are both new men, and give much promise for the future. They are about of a size, not too light, and get down the field on kicks in very good style, and what is more, are getting quicker and better every day. Both men tackle well—Coy the better of the two—and if they can keep up their improvement, no anxiety need be felt concerning the ends.

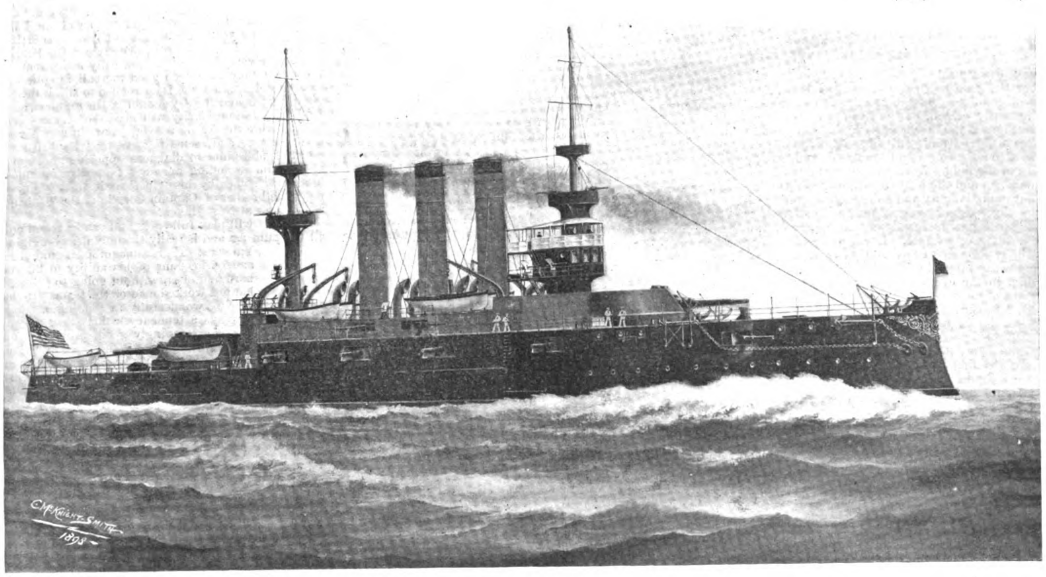
De Saulles, quarter-back, is in a class by himself. The work of this player is so well known that it is hardly necessary to comment on it. He is one bundle of nerves, and his play of running through the field with the ball caught from a punt is one of his own making and development, and cannot be too highly praised. If he could conquer his disposition to muff, it would add to his own reputation, and would give his team greater confidence. It might be stated here that his presence in a game means everything to his team. His dash is infectious, and the men appreciate that any moment he is liable to take a ball from the middle of the field to a point where a touch-down is within the limits of possibility.

De Saulles has been laid up since the Brown game, and will be kept off the field for a week or two, but the big games will find him in his accustomed position, as he needs very little work to get him into condition.

Half-backs are plentiful in New Haven this year, and what is more, they are an especially knowing lot. It is a great pity they are not a little heavier. The most promising ones are Dudley, who played one of the half-back positions last year, and Corwin, who was a substitute on the same team. Then there are Townsend, Benjamin, Marvin, and Wear. There is not a really heavy man among them, but they play such good football, in spite of their lack of weight, that one is compelled to admit their prowess. Corwin and Dudley should be the regulars, although I dare say the university will need the services of all its backs before the season is over. Corwin uses his head to good purpose, and seems to have the "football instinct" which enables him to diagnose opposing plays, and also assists him in finding openings that were not made for him. He comes by his "football instinct" honestly, as he is the brother of Captain Corwin of the '87 team, now a professor at New Haven.

McBride will play full-back, and can be relied on to do all the punting, and is really the only heavy-weight back Yale has. He is a magnificent ground-gainer, and on account of his ability to hit the line hard and often without going to pieces, is the hardest worked man on the team. He has improved wonderfully in punting, although he displays a tendency to kick low. Low kicking is exceedingly good, provided you can vary it with high kicking. If McBride does not get this facility he can depend upon having at least one of his kicks blocked in a big game. He does not seem to be able to control the distance of his punts, and repeatedly kicks over the line, which is, of course, terribly wearing on the ends, and offers no opportunity to the opposing team to muff the ball.

CUTTEN—"CENTRE."



Taking the team as a whole, I should say that it is about an average Yale team, with possibility of developing into something better. The rush-line is not noticeably strong, but it certainly is far from weak. Back of the line Yale is in good condition, with many men to choose from, all of about the same calibre. This team promises to develop into one of Yale's characteristic "all-together" football-teams, with De Saulles as the star of the combination. They are far from "all together" as yet. The backs fumble atrociously; the rush-line lines up very quickly; but the backs seem to hit the opposing line without any dash; and as for muffing punts—well, one is overcome with dread every time he sees the ball kicked into the air. They have not as yet learned to appreciate the kicking game; not that they do not know how to play it, but it is simply impossible for them to give up the ball on the first down for a kick. There is nothing remarkable in this condition of affairs, as it is always the case; the only wonder is that year after year the kicking game is not developed as the main issue, instead of as a side issue only to be used as a last resort. It is more scientific, it saves the players, and, everything else being equal, wins every time. Surely these should be recommendations enough!

Hudson, in the Indian game, could never have kicked a goal from the field if the Yale players had appreciated the possibilities of the kicking game. They knew all about Hudson's ability to drop a goal from the field, and had seen him that very day miss the bars for a goal only by a few feet, yet the deadly fascination of bucking the centre, instead of kicking the ball out of danger, was too much for them. A little head-work at times is very useful.

The Yale team of 1898 will be a good, hard-working, intelligent body of football-players, and whoever expects to give them a drubbing will most assuredly have to be in the "first flight."

"AMERICAN FOOTBALL."—BY WALTER CAMP.—NEW AND REVISED EDITION.—POST 8VO, CLOTH, $1 25.—HARPER & BROTHERS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE NEW "MAINE."—Drawn by C. McKnight Smith from the offical plans.

THE CLOSING IN.

No more of after-math the meadow yields,
The day dims out and leaves no after-glow.
The sky is vague and heavy and hangs low.
Night shuts in early when the end is near,
And at the casement lingering I hear
The sighing of the rain upon the fields.

Albert Bigelow Paine.

THE NEW BATTLE-SHIPS.

The contracts for the construction of the three new battle-ships, which were opened at the Navy Department in Washington in September, have been awarded to three different ship-building firms—the Cramps of Philadelphia, the Newport News Ship-building Company, and the Union Iron-Works of San Francisco. The ships are to be named the Maine, the Ohio, and the Missouri. The plans submitted by the successful bidders differed in some respects as to tonnage, speed, and coal capacity, and the Navy Department, after a careful consideration of them all, decided on the ones prepared by the Cramps, with a few minor alterations. The accepted plans call for a ship of approximately 12,150 tons, with a water-line length of 388 feet, beam 72 feet, and draught of 24 feet 6 inches, with full stores, supplies, and ammunition, and a guaranteed speed of 18 knots, at a cost of $2,885,000. In submitting these plans the Cramps have practically cut in two the plans of the Alabama, Wisconsin, and Illinois, adding 20 feet to their length. In this lengthening they have gained the additional space necessary for increased coal capacity, and a design capable of greater speed. The new ships are to have a steaming radius of about 6000 miles at ordinary speed.

In appearance the Maine, Ohio, and Missouri are identical with the Illinois, Wisconsin, and Alabama up to the top of the superstructure; above that the arrangement of the stacks and military-masts brings them in strong contrast with the latter ships. In gaining the increased speed, the necessity of larger heating surface and boiler-room necessitates the use of three smoke-stacks placed forward and aft along the centre line of the ship, to give the extra draught needed, while in the earlier ships the two stacks are placed side by side.

So far as the armament of the Maine, Ohio, and Missouri is concerned, these battle-ships will be practically identical with the Wisconsin, Alabama, and Illinois in their fighting outfit. They will carry four 13-inch breech-loading rifles, paired in elliptical turrets forward and aft; fourteen 6-inch rapid-fire guns in broadside batteries; twenty-four rapid-fire and machine-guns in the secondary battery, mounted at various points throughout the ship, as follows: On the forward bridge four, placed two on either side of the pilot-house; four on the after bridge; one on either side of the boat-deck amidships; two in each broadside aft on the lower or berth deck, one in each broadside forward on the gun-deck, and two in each of the fighting-tops, making twenty rapid-fire and machine guns on set mounts, with machine and Colt guns to the number of four. The submerged torpedo-tubes are so placed that any accident from a chance shot striking the torpedo when placed in the tube will be next to impossible. For armoring these ships the original 16½-inch Harveyized armor-plating will be superseded by 10-inch Krupp-ized plating, which admits of a broader and longer belt for the same weight of steel.

General R. Cerero.

Buenaventura Abarzuza.

W. Z. de Villaurrutia.

Members of the Spanish Peace Commission in Paris.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Pure, sparkling, and delicious. Used in enormous quantities by both army and navy. Thousands testify as to its efficacy.

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

"The sum of earthly bliss"
—MILTON, PARADISE LOST.

The limit of excellence in Pipe tobacco is reached and sustained by

Yale Mixture

A Gentleman's Smoke

Nothing better for Pipe smoking can be made! Costs more? Yes—a trifle—but the few cents' difference is more than made up by the enjoyment and satisfaction of its superior quality.

Buy Whiskey from the Distiller

Absolute Purity
Full Measure

$3.20

For Four Full Quarts
Express prepaid

For thirty years we have been distilling the best Whiskey that can be made and selling it direct to the consumer.

We have thousands of customers in every State in the Union and want more, therefore we are making the following

Proposition

We will send four full quart bottles of Hayner's Seven-Year-Old Double Copper Distilled Rye for $3.20, express prepaid, shipped in plain package, no marks to indicate contents. If not found satisfactory when received, return it at our expense and we will return your $3.20.

Such Whiskey cannot be purchased elsewhere for less than $5.00, and ours has Hayner's 30 years' reputation behind it. Our entire product goes direct to the consumers, who thus

AVOID ADULTERATION, MIDDLEMEN'S PROFITS.

If you want Pure Whiskey for medicinal purposes or otherwise, at the lowest price, order it from us.

References: Any Bank in Dayton, or any Commercial Agency.

HAYNER DISTILLING CO.,
107 to 203 West Fifth St., DAYTON, OHIO.

P. S.—Orders for Ariz., Col., Cal., Idaho, Mont., Nev., N. Mex., Ore., Utah, Wash., Wyo., must call for 20 qts. by fr't. prepaid.

The California Limited

Via Santa Fé Route, is the best and speediest train to California. Chicago to Los Angeles in 2¾ days, three times a week. Pullmans, dining-car, buffet smoking-car with barber-shop, and observation-car with spacious parlor for ladies and children, vestibuled and electric lighted.

Address General Passenger Office.

The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway,
CHICAGO.

7,000 Guns in Stock

WE SELL GUNS of every reputable American and foreign make, and give wholesale prices to everybody. We carry in stock

Fishing Tackle and Sporting Goods amounting to a quarter of a million dollars. We can please the fancy of millionaires, or meet the demands of the poorest sportsman and angler. Write for prices, or ask us to send you our Sporting Goods Catalogue. We load and sell over

1,000,000 Hand Loaded Shells a Year Ask us to send you our price card of hand and machine loaded shells. We have

The largest Gun Repair Shop in America We make guns, re-bore, re-stock, repair—in fact, alter a gun to suit the owner, and guarantee satisfaction. Write for prices.

MONTGOMERY WARD & CO.

Originators of the Catalogue Business
111 to 120 Michigan Ave, cor. Madison St., Chicago

MENTION THIS PUBLICATION WHEN WRITING

Blakemore Whiskey 7 years Old.

NOTHING BETTER MADE OR SOLD.

Matured in wood and bottled in bond under Governmental Supervision.

If your dealer hasn't it, send us TWELVE DOLLARS, and we will have sent to your address by express prepaid a sample case containing TWELVE BOTTLES.

Freiberg & Workum,
Cincinnati, O.

ADMIRAL SAMPSON

ADMIRAL SAMPSON is one of the contributors to THE CENTURY'S SPANISH WAR SERIES, which begins in the November CENTURY with the first part of Captain Sigsbee's personal narrative of the destruction of the "Maine." Lieut. Hobson will describe the most dramatic incident of the war,—his own feat of sinking the "Merrimac" in the harbor of Santiago. Lieut. Hobson's story will be printed in three numbers of THE CENTURY, beginning with December, the great Christmas issue. It will be a full and authoritative account of Lieut. Hobson's experiences,—the only one he will write on the subject.

THE DESTRUCTION OF ADMIRAL CERVERA'S FLEET, in THE CENTURY'S Spanish War Series, is to be described by the men in command. Rear-Admiral Sampson will tell of the operations of the fleet, Rear-Admiral Schley of the Flying Squadron, Commodore Philip of the work of the Texas, Captain Evans of the Iowa, Captain Taylor of the Indiana, Lieut.-Com. Wainwright of the Gloucester, and other prominent naval men will contribute. The New York Tribune says: "The latest enterprise of THE CENTURY throws into the shade nearly everything that has been done in the past."

THE DESTRUCTION OF CERVERA'S FLEET

THE November CENTURY not only begins the Spanish War Series, but contains first chapters in a new life of Alexander the Great, superbly illustrated; a new novel by Marion Crawford, an historical romance of the Second Crusade; and the first part of Paul Leicester Ford's papers on Franklin; also the first part of a story by Frank R. Stockton, and a complete story by Mark Twain. Do not miss the November CENTURY. Price 35 cents. It is necessary that subscriptions should be sent in early if subscribers wish to receive a copy of the first edition of the November CENTURY containing the richly decorated cover, by Grasset, the famous French poster-maker. The second edition of the magazine will have only a plain cover. All dealers take subscriptions ($4.00—begin with November), or remittance may be made to the publishers,

THE CENTURY CO.,
Union Square, New York.

YOU CAN READ IT ONLY IN

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE

See that Hole?

WHAT IS IT FOR?

To insert a pointed instrument and eject the pen from the holder. Prevents the ink from flowing back into the holder and soiling the fingers.

Samples on receipt of return postage. Ask for Vertical No. 37.

The perfection of pens, slightly stiff, smooth points, durable, and uniform.

SPENCERIAN PEN CO.
450 Broome St., New York, N. Y.

BRASS BAND

Instruments, Drums, Uniforms, Equipments for Bands and Drum Corps. Lowest prices ever quoted. Fine Catalog, 400 Illustrations, mailed free, includes Band Music & Instructions for amateur Bands.

LYON & HEALY, 17 Adams St., Chicago.

Stenographers

find pencil perfection in Dixon's Stenographer Pencils—made especially for shorthand writing. Just the size to prevent tiring the hand. Three degrees of hardness. Every desirable requisite in one and the same pencil strongly recommends

Dixon's AMERICAN GRAPHITE Pencils.

All grades—softest to hardest.

JOSEPH DIXON CRUCIBLE CO.,
Jersey City, N. J.

EDUCATION BY MAIL

Thousands have been helped to better pay & positions through our system of instruction

Buildings erected expressly for this purpose at a cost of $225,000

Courses of Steam, Electrical, Mechanical or Civil Engineering; Chemistry; Mining; Mechanical and Architectural Drawing; Surveying; Plumbing; Architecture; Metal Pattern Drafting; Prospecting; Bookkeeping; Shorthand; English Branches.

$2 A MONTH pays for a College Education at Home. 40,000 Students and Graduates.

Circular FREE. State subject you wish to study.

THE INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
Box 1159, Scranton, Pa., U. S. A.

Centre of Travel.

Travel between Chicago, Toledo, Cleveland, Buffalo, New York, Boston and intermediate cities centres in the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway, the great central connecting link between the east and west.

Particular note should be taken of the fact that in all the splendid cities reached by its through trains, passengers are landed at stations having a central location. This is of great importance to every traveler. Do not forget it when you have occasion to travel; it will save you time, money and trouble. "Book of Trains" sent free.

A. J. SMITH,
G. P. & T. A., Cleveland, O.

Those Fine English Tobaccos

Capstan
Bird's Eye
Westward Ho
Three Castles
Gold Flake, etc.

Put up by W. D. & H. O. WILLS of Bristol, England, and famous the world over for their superb flavor and exquisite aroma, can be obtained for you by your dealer. If he will not get them, write to us for price-list of the well-known brands,

J. W. SURBRUG, Sole Agent, 159 Fulton Street, NEW YORK.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"A COLD BOTTLE AND A HOT BIRD."

To insure the best results from exercise, rub well with a coarse towel while cooling, get under a warm shower, take a quick scrub with Ivory Soap, then some colder water and dry without more rubbing than necessary.

Ivory Soap, because of its purity, its quick action, its easy rinsing quality and the smooth, pleasant sensation it brings, is the soap most frequently preferred for the bath.

Copyright, 1897, by The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati.

Armour's Extract of Beef

"has that rich, beefy flavor."

For preparing soups, sauces, gravies, etc. "Culinary Wrinkles" gives many ways of using Extract. It's mailed free for the asking.

ARMOUR'S CONCENTRATED TABLETS of BEEF EXTRACT and VEGETABLES—condensed food—for home use or travelers—Sample Box containing sufficient for three meals, free, for a two cent stamp and your dealer's name.

Actual size of Tablet.

Address ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

FORTY-SIXTH SEASON.

F. BOOSS & BRO.

IMPORTERS AND MAKERS OF

FINE FURS

Elegant Designs in Seal, Persian, &c., Jackets

Novelties in Sable, Seal, Chinchilla, Ermine Persian, and Marten Capes

Rich and Dainty Creations in Neckwear. Specialties in Russian Sable. Having bought the entire stock and interest of our late partner, Mr. George Booss, lately deceased, and wanting to realize on the same, we offer it at less than manufacturing cost. A special department for Remodelling and Repairing.

F. BOOSS & BRO. 449 BROADWAY, Grand Street Station. - 26 MERCER STREET. Cable cars pass the door. Telephone, 388 Spring. Style book mailed on application.

Arnold Constable & Co.

Carpets.

Axminster Carpets, Wilton Carpets, Brussels Carpets.

The finest qualities manufactured.

Oriental Rugs.

A superb assortment of Antique Rugs. Modern Oriental Rugs in colorings and designs prepared especially for our Fall trade and to be found in no other house.

Broadway & 19th St.

NEW YORK.

Archarena Combination Boards with Net Pockets and Carrom Rings

(ELEGANT CHERRY FINISH)

No. 2 has CROKINOLE, TEN PINS, and CARROM GAMES, 10 in all, for $8.50, express paid east of Omaha. No. 1 board, 4 games, $2.50. If not at your dealer's write for rules to ARCHARENA CO. Manufacturers, Peoria, Ill.

1831 Sixty-Ninth Year. 1899

THE

Country Gentleman

The ONLY Agricultural NEWSpaper.

INDISPENSABLE TO

ALL COUNTRY RESIDENTS

WHO WISH TO

KEEP UP WITH THE TIMES.

Single Subscription, $2;
Two Subscriptions, $3.50;
Four Subscriptions, $6.

SPECIAL INDUCEMENTS TO RAISERS OF LARGER CLUBS.

Write for Particulars on this Point.

Free till Jan. 1 to New Subscribers for 1899.

It will be seen that the difference between the cost of the COUNTRY GENTLEMAN and that of other agricultural weeklies (none of which even attempts to cover the agricultural news of the day) may readily be reduced, by making up a small Club, to Less than a Cent a Week!

Does such a difference as that justify you in contenting yourself with some other paper instead of having the best?

SEND FOR SPECIMEN COPIES,

Which will be mailed Free, and compare them with any other rural weekly; it will not take long to see the difference. Address

LUTHER TUCKER & SON,
ALBANY, N. Y.

IF YOU'RE A PIPE SMOKER A TRIAL WILL CONVINCE THAT GOLDEN SCEPTRE IS PERFECTION

SEND 10cts FOR SAMPLE PACKAGE — PRICES 1lb 1.30, 1/4lb 40cts POSTAGE PAID. CATALOGUE FREE.

SURBRUG, 159 FULTON ST., N.Y. CITY.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,

BANKERS.

ESTABLISHED 1873.

2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.

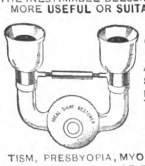
Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.

Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.

A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.

Correspondence solicited.

THIS AUTOGRAPH IS NEVER ON A POOR SHADE-ROLLER AND NEVER ABSENT FROM A GOOD ONE.



Stewart Hartshorn

GET THE GENUINE HARTSHORN

TRADE E & W MARK

EARL & WILSON'S LINEN COLLARS & CUFFS BEST IN THE WORLD.

THE INESTIMABLE BLESSING OF SIGHT. NOTHING MORE USEFUL OR SUITABLE FOR A PRESENT.

THE IDEAL SIGHT RESTORER

AVOID HEADACHE OR SURGICAL OPERATION. READ "ILLUSTRATED TREATISE ON THE EYE. IMPAIRED VISION, WEAK, WATERY, SORE OR INFLAMED EYES, ASTIGMATISM, PRESBYOPIA, MYOPIA, CATARACT, AND THE WORST DISORDERS OF THE EYE." MAILED FREE. THE IDEAL COMPANY, 239 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Personally-Conducted Tours via Pennsylvania Railroad.

SEASON OF 1898-9.

The Personally-Conducted Tourist System of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company is the most complete and elaborate system of pleasure travelling and sight-seeing yet devised. It is the consummation of the ultimate idea in railroad travel, the final evolution of unassailable perfection.

For the season of '98 and '99 it has arranged for the following tours:

California.—Tour will leave New York, Philadelphia, and Harrisburg February 9. Ninety days will be spent in California. The party will travel over the entire route by the "Golden Gate Special," the finest train that crosses the continent.

Florida.—Four tours to Jacksonville will leave New York and Philadelphia January 24, February 7 and 21, and March 7. The first three admit of a stay of two weeks in the "Flowery State." Tickets for the fourth tour will be good to return by regular trains until May 31, 1899.

Old Point Comfort, Richmond, and Washington.—Seven tours will leave New York and Philadelphia December 27, January 28, February 18, March 18, April 1, 15, and 29.

Old Point Comfort.—Seven tours will leave New York and Philadelphia December 27, January 28, February 25, March 18, April 1, 15, and 29.

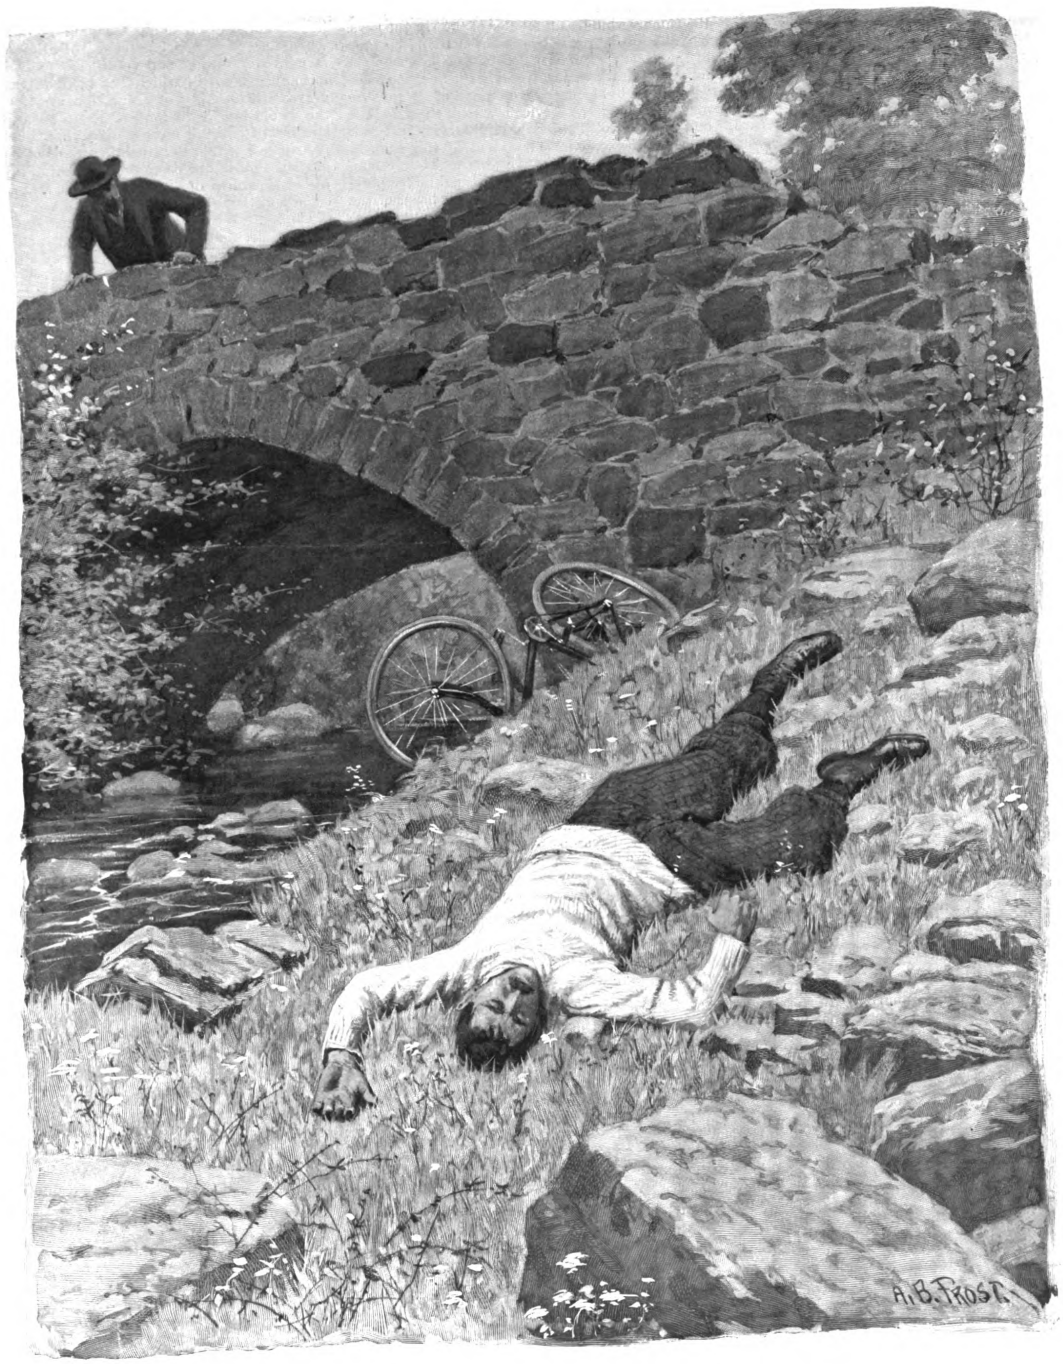
Washington.—Seven tours will leave New York and Philadelphia December 27, January 19, February 16, March 9 and 28, April 20, and May 11.

Detailed itineraries of the above tours, giving rates and full information, may be procured of Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 263 Fulton St., Brooklyn; 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Philadelphia.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE

thoroughly revised and classified, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten

Fastest Trains in the World—On the New York Central



Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—NO. 2186. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1898. TEN CENTS A COPY. FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All Rights Reserved.

THE END OF THE COAST.—DRAWN BY A. B. FROST.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, NOVEMBER 12, 1898

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy — $4 00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, and Mexico

Subscriptions may begin with any Number

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

London: 45 Albemarle Street, W.

Also for sale at Brentano's, 37 Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris

NICARAGUA, on the eve of passing, so far as general international relations are concerned, into the United States of Central America, has granted a new concession for an inter-oceanic canal to Mr. CRAGIN and Mr. EYRE. Mr. W. R. GRACE seems to be of the opinion that the canal will be built under the new concession, but President HITCHCOCK, of the Maritime Canal Company, thinks otherwise. The United States government, if it is committed to any corporation, is under obligations to the Maritime Canal Company; but we do not really think that the government is under any obligations whatever to any corporation, or that it ought to assume any obligations, especially in view of the fact that the Panama Canal is likely to be built, and that any Nicaragua Canal scheme is of very doubtful practicability.

IT is only justice to the Brooklyn to say that the report of the Official Board of Navigation Officers, presided over by Lieutenant-Commander WAINWRIGHT, shows that the Brooklyn was nearer to the Colon when the latter surrendered than we have stated. It appears from that report that she was 6800 yards distant, instead of 8900 yards. The whole question is involved in a curious muddle which we cannot unravel. The Brooklyn was certainly to seaward of the Oregon, although she was in advance; and it is known that the officers of the Oregon and the rest of the fleet wondered why Commodore SCHLEY remained so far outside. We are bound to take the Board's report, however, as to her relative position, and we regret that any injustice has been done to the ship or to her officers. So far as the latter are concerned, we are sure that they are as brave and gallant as those of any other ship in the fleet. As to Commodore SCHLEY, that is another question, which we have already discussed.

THE French are talking of raising the whole question of British occupation of Egypt as a cover under which they can retreat from Fashoda. We are inclined to think that the talk of the larger question is purely a mask to enable the government to get out of its untenable position without unduly exciting French popular opinion. There is some ground for the belief in France in a rumor prevailing in Paris, because it is said that Count MURAVIEFF has promised Russian assistance to compel the opening of the whole Egyptian question; but we do not believe that Russia will any more invite a quarrel on that subject with England than she will invite a quarrel with Germany over Alsace-Lorraine. The time has not yet come when Russia wants war. Neither has the time come when the civilized world desires the beneficent administration which England has given Egypt brought to an end. Under British rule Egypt is within the pale of civilization and commerce, and the world is interested in her remaining there.

THERE is much evidence in existence that the President has not been well informed as to the sentiment of the country touching the policy of imperialism by the shouting crowds which met him at the railroad stations on his Western trip. He must have a two-thirds majority of the Senate in favor of any treaty which he may make, and the signs are that there will be a great deal of opposition to the doctrine of expansion as the administration seems to propose to formulate it in the treaty. With the exception of Senators LODGE and FRYE, nearly if not quite all the New England delegation is opposed to expansion, and such extremists as TILLMAN agree with them. One of the strongest speeches that have been made against expansion was that of Senator HOAR at Worcester last Tuesday week, in which he made this truthful and pregnant utterance:

"And, in my opinion, we are to-day in a great danger—a greater danger than we have encountered since the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth. The danger is that we are to be transformed from a republic founded on the Declaration of Independence, guided by the counsels of WASHINGTON, into a vulgar, commonplace empire founded upon physical force."

IN view of the persistent rumors that the President intends to remove from the classified service a large number of positions that are now included in it, the Civil Service Reform League has written him a letter urging him to withhold his consent to the efforts that the politicians are making to discredit civil service reform. It is certain that any action by the President of the kind indicated by the rumors would, as the letter of the League says, be considered "alike by the friends and enemies of the merit system as a step backward, a step the more significant because it will be the first step backward taken by the executive branch of the government since the civil service law took effect." The establishment of the present civil service system is the finest legislative achievement of this country during the last twenty-five years. The system, as it stands to-day, has elevated public employment in this country, has saved the heads of the executive departments much of the annoyance they formerly endured from self-seeking politicians, has given the government a body of faithful, intelligent employees, who are not disturbed in their minds by the constant dread of dismissal, which weakened the energies of the employees under the old system. Moreover, it has saved the country annually, as is reported by the Civil Service Commission, more than three million dollars. Mr. MCKINLEY cannot remove a single office from the classified list without striking a blow at this admirable achievement, which is so popular that each party has been forced to recognize it for years as an established fact, no political organization except Tammany and that which supported BRYAN having had the temerity to assail it openly.

THE investigation of the army administration is going on, the commissioners travelling the circuit. They are conducting the examination of officers who have received favors from the administration, and they are neglecting a good many opportunities, apparently, to learn the truth. Their report is likely to find that affairs were conducted about as well as could be expected from the nature of the demand made upon the staff corps; but whatever the report may be, it will be of no importance. We refused to attack the commission in advance, but now we are forced to the conclusion that it is not diligently seeking the truth. The facts are, not only that we began the war before we were prepared for it, but that we went into Cuba like a mob, at a time when Northern soldiers should not have been sent there, and that the men were badly clothed and badly fed, owing to the incompetency of the staff-officers, most of whom were civilians appointed for political reasons. Now that the evil has been done, we learn from the sacrifice of so valuable a man as Colonel WARING that it will not do to send troops into Cuba at this season of the year. The warnings of previous experience, the facts that investigation and science have developed, the known conditions existing in Cuba, the terrible illness of the troops at Santiago, ninety per cent. of whom, at the time the round robin was sent, were unfit for duty, all seem to have been of no educational value to those having charge of our army. Colonel WARING'S death brings these people to their senses. He seems to have been sacrificed that the truth might be known. The only consolation that his friends can have for his untimely taking off is that the sacrifice is likely to have been not wholly in vain.

IMPERIALISM AND DEMOCRACY.

IT is at last the determination of the President to take the Philippines, and doubtless he would take Cuba also if the promise of the declaration of war had not been repeated in the protocol. The fate of the country is apparently sealed in this respect, but there is hope until the treaty of peace is ratified by the Senate, and therefore it is the duty of those who believe that by this strange departure the country will be harmed, and that democratic government, which, with all its faults, holds the hope of humanity, will be discredited, to follow the example of Bishop POTTER, and keep on blowing the trumpet and warning the people.

The discussion over the Philippines is one of the strangest results of the war. A year ago, as has been often said, most of the people of this country knew of the existence of the islands only through the news of outbreaks of their people against the rule of Spain. It is safe to say that no politician in this country would have dreamed of accepting them, and the international responsibilities that wait on sovereignty over them, as a gift. Now everything is changed. The dreams of empire are disturbing heated brains which in their calmer moments objected vigorously to the proposed treaty of annexation with Hawaii, and condemned Mr. CLEVELAND for involving us in the troubles of Samoa. But a war that has discovered the unworthiness of its cause, the wretched weakness of our army system, the ambition of politicians to be military leaders, and their grave incompetency; the war which covered the staff corps of the army with deserved ridicule, which resulted in the needless slaughter of brave officers and men of the line, which destroyed the confidence of all intelligent men in raw militia and volunteers, and the gross mismanagement of which has filled thousands of graves with victims of starvation and fever, and the whole land with mourning—this war, demonstrative of nothing more clearly than our unpreparedness for it, has excited the minds of hundreds of thousands of our people with glowing images of future greatness in distant seas, and, strangely inconsistent though it is, has launched us on a career of empire. We shall not join in the sneer at those who predict that we will rise to our new responsibilities, for we believe that if they are really thrust upon us we shall attain the capacity for the government of their peoples, because we must. The cost, however, will be enormous and unnecessary.

Democracy is capable of any effort of government, but it is very slow, because it is naturally and properly weak in executive power. Moreover, it is inevitable that the assumption of the power to rule over people must seriously affect the structure of our government, while it will set back the clock of progress many years. In taking these colonies we will discard the foundation principle of the republic, which was the very soul of our revolution against Great Britain. We will then hold that it is a self-evident proposition that all men are not created equal, and that governments do not necessarily derive "their just powers from the consent of the governed." The principles of the Declaration of Independence will be thrown aside. In a short time we shall hear men sneer at those who continue to believe in them, as we have heard sneers at those who continue to insist upon an intelligent construction of the Constitution. We shall come back to the principle in time, our colonies and colonists to the contrary notwithstanding, because it is the true principle, under which the government established here has showered more blessings upon humanity and upon the individual than any other government ever invented by man. Most of what we have that we call progress and enlightenment is due to our American and English democracy, and we shall not lose this by undertaking a despotic rule over unwilling peoples, of alien race, and inhabiting distant lands. But there will be a halt in our progress, and we of this generation and the generations that will come immediately after us must wait and toil for what will come to the far future and which should have come to us.

We shall lose much morally. We shall lose inevitably the fine and ennobling respect for man himself which is bred alone among those who live on equal terms, who stand together on the same level before the laws, who have equal voices in the making of the laws. The country is rich in illustrations of this truth. They may be found wherever the white man is the immediate neighbor of the Indian or the black man. We shall also suffer materially. Some Americans may enrich themselves by reason of the opportunities which our new possessions will offer to them, but that does not mean that the government will grow richer, or even that the majority will prosper. On the contrary, the new colonies must be a burden to the nation. The cost of the increased military and naval establishments alone that will be required to maintain them will reach at least $100,000,000 a year. We shall, in our turn, feel the burdens of militarism as the nations of continental Europe feel them, and we may rest assured that our groans will not be less loud than those which we hear from across the ocean, coming from the people who are now eagerly turning to socialism, the chief enemy of a true democracy, for relief from the burdens of bearing and paying for arms. We shall not only suffer in taxes, we shall probably suffer in commerce, for there is no likelihood that we shall abandon our protective system for a long

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

time to come, and as the Constitution requires that all taxes shall be levied uniformly and equally, the tariff system that protects New England must protect also the sugar and tobacco of our colonies. The result will be, of course, the promotion of commercial war. It is partly because of our mediæval trade policy that the commerce of Great Britain has flourished and become the greatest in the world, and it is partly because the failure of the DINGLEY bill as a revenue measure led Englishmen to fear that we would abandon the protective system, which aids them so materially, that many Englishmen have been urging us to take the Philippines and everything else in the way of territory that may come in our path. They confidently believe that with new colonies we shall extend the area and lengthen the life of our protective policy, and that British commerce will be the gainer thereby. At all events, an enormous increase of taxes and a new lease for the protective system are probably to be the immediate result of our colonial policy. The people must pay for the experiment in two ways: their taxes will be increased and their incomes will be diminished.

We ought eventually, also, to change the character of our government. We ought not to leave to Congress the power to declare war, or to the Senate the power to ratify treaties or to confirm appointments. We have abundant proof that Congress is not the proper body to deal with a delicate question between nations, and that its power to drive us into war by its insults of foreign nations should be taken away, while the power of the Senate over treaties makes negotiation with foreign governments almost fruitless. If we are to increase our international complications we should have a government which can transact international business secretly if necessary; at all events, intelligently, politely, and effectively. If our boundaries are to touch those of Europe at their sorest points, we ought to minimize the chances of causeless wars. We know now from General WOODFORD that all the proposed results of our war with Spain could have been obtained without war, and that diplomacy was about to win the victory for us, when Congress slanged the country into war. We ought to take away also the power of the Senate over appointments, especially if we are to become a military power, for we have seen how weak and ineffective the influence of the Senate has made the Executive, and how it has filled the army with ignorant and inexperienced youth, to the loss doubtless of many valuable lives. We ought to have a stronger Executive, a better administrative force, for we cannot safely intrust the power to govern colonies and the opportunity to incense foreign powers to heelers and strikers.

It will be a long time before the country will come to this, and in the mean time it will suffer by its unreadiness and the inherent weakness of a system upon which we will be forcing functions and duties which it was never intended that it should perform. But the greatest suffering will be at home and in our domestic politics. Our troubles here come from the rule of corrupt and ignorant men, who, to speak generally, are in politics for money-making. It seems to us to be the first duty of every friend of the country to exert himself to the utmost to inform the public mind and to awaken the public conscience, with a view of driving the present race of politicians out of power, so that vulgar commercialism shall no longer stain the escutcheon of the republic. But the first step towards the accomplishment of the object should be the restriction and decrease of opportunity. In taking on new colonies, however, we are increasing opportunity, and enlarging the field for the politics of cupidity and plunder. We are making predatory politics more attractive. This, as we have said, will hurt most at home, for it will make the fight against bosses and bandits harder and longer. Expansion, for the moment at least, will strengthen bad government.

Finally we shall be discrediting democratic government everywhere. We declared that our war was one of humanity, and we promised that it should not be turned into one of aggrandizement. Our enemies in Europe declared that we were not sincere, and now they will have occasion to believe that their charge was just, and that the word of a popular government is not to be trusted. These, in brief, are some of the evils that must come upon us if the Senate ratifies such a treaty of peace as our commissioners in Paris are trying to make. In return we shall get very little, not enough to pay for half the expense of defending our new possessions. The cost will be enormous and unnecessary; but it will not ruin us. The evils which we incur will not destroy the republic nor put an end to the democratic experiment. In the end we shall surmount our difficulties; and, in generations of the far-distant future, humanity may be the better for what apparently we are about to do to-day. Let us hope so, at all events. We firmly believe that government of the people, by the people, for the people is not to perish from the earth, even when its chosen champions seem to turn their backs upon it.

RITUALISM IN ENGLAND.

SINCE 1895, when the SALISBURY government came into office, the Church of England has had a more disturbing part in English politics than at any other time during this generation, and the attitude of the government towards the Church seems likely to bring it into as much trouble as anything else in its domestic policy. The clergy of the Church of England worked unusually hard for the Conservatives at the general election, and soon received their reward in the shape of the Education Act of 1897, which practically provides that Church schools shall be maintained entirely out of the public treasury, while the clergy are left in full and absolute control of their local management.

This was the most retrograde Parliamentary measure of this century, and it has afforded the Liberal party the best opportunity it is likely to have of assailing the domestic policy of the SALISBURY administration at the next general election. It was a concession to the Church which has aroused the non-conformists; which has helped the Liberals to detach themselves from the home-rule movement, because of the support given by the Nationalists to the Conservatives in their educational policy; and it has done more to unite English Liberals than anything else that has happened since the great split of 1886.

The government has incensed the non-conformists by its acts of commission. It has aroused the hostility of the Evangelicals in the Church of England, and given a stimulus to the anti-ritualistic agitation, by what the Evangelicals regard as its acts of omission. Those who are now engaged in the anti-ritualistic campaign have two grievances against the government. They resent its refusal to grant a royal commission to inquire into the appointment of High Church bishops, which has occurred so frequently in the course of the last twenty-five years, during which the Premiership has been held either by GLADSTONE or Lord SALISBURY. They also resent the refusal of the government to take any Parliamentary action to stay the ritualistic movement.

As to the facts concerning ritualism, they are not questioned. The movement is spreading all over the country, but especially in London and in the large cities, and for five years past it has been giving Evangelical Churchmen much concern. The clerical innovators become more daring as the movement spreads, so that it is an easy matter to compile lists of churches at which services are regularly celebrated which, it is charged, have not the sanction of the prayer-book and are contrary to acts of Parliament. A little while ago one of the London newspapers enumerated the churches in the metropolis at which ritualistic services are held, and described in detail the services at several of the more extreme churches to show how nearly they approached to those of the Roman Catholics. At many of the London churches the clergy now describe themselves as priests; they speak of the service in the church as mass; and some of them preach the doctrines of the real presence and eucharistic sacrifice. Vest-ments, altar lights, and incense are commonly used, and at some churches there are holy-water stoups. It is charged that at scores of the churches of the Establishment in different parts of England the prayer-book has ceased to be the guide to services and celebrations; that extra services are instituted, and that little heed is given to the Parliamentary enactments which are supposed to regulate the conduct of the clergy in their ecclesiastical offices.

The bishops have power to prevent all departures from the prayer-book and the law. But the Evangelical Churchmen complain that the bishops themselves are ritualists, and instead of checking the clergy, rather sympathize with the practices which the anti-ritualists regard as illegal and tending Romewards. Despairing of help from the bishops, the anti-ritualists last session turned to the Parliament. When a bill was going through the House of Commons, having for one of its objects the prevention of the induction of unworthy clergymen, they sought to add a clause which would have enabled parishioners to veto the appointment of extremists in ritual. The government, however, gave no support to the clause, and it was then that Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, the leader of the Liberal opposition, first began to champion the cause of the Evangelicals, and to associate himself actively with the present anti-ritualistic agitation. Some curious results have followed. The Evangelical Churchmen are now appealing to non-conformists for help, and non-conformists are receiving the thanks and congratulations of Orangemen, usually the extremists of church and state Tories. The Evangelicals claim that the government lost a seat at a by-election at Southport owing to its apathy towards the ritualistic movement; and generally the whole controversy, the persistency of the anti-ritualists on the one side and the aggression of the ritualists on the other, is forcing the Church of England into politics in an altogether unlooked-for manner.

FRANCE'S OPPORTUNITY.

M. BRISSON was turned out of office because he considered and announced that the demand for a revision of the DREYFUS trial could no longer be withstood. The expulsion of his ministry for that reason was of course disgraceful to France, but the circumstances greatly attenuate the disgrace. The power of the army in bullying public men has, it is true, again been exhibited. The Minister of War, who succeeded one minister guilty of what may be called oral forgery to bring about the conviction of a culprit, and another who read to the legislature a forged document in order to justify that conviction, showed himself worthy of these predecessors. He resigned to the Chamber by way of resenting the action of his colleagues, about which they declare that he had been consulted, and in which he had acquiesced. But the great thing is that in a Chamber packed against revision—for revision was the issue upon which it was elected—the anti-revisionists had a majority of some fifty only, while before HENRY'S forgery and "assisted suicide" the revisionists could muster but three votes altogether, while the placarding of the document which HENRY afterwards confessed to have forged was ordered by a unanimous vote. That the BRISSON ministry was dismissed in such a Chamber by so narrow a majority shows that truth and reason are making their way in France.

The question of revision has been taken out of politics by the decision of the Court of Cassation that DREYFUS was improperly condemned. What is left in politics is the question whether the chiefs of the army shall be permitted to override law and justice and fact and reason in the name of the honor of the army. Their contention has been that the honor of the army forbade a French government to admit that an honest mistake might have been made by a court martial. In order to prevent such an admission the chiefs of the army, it is now seen, have maintained and protected the honor of the army by perjury and subornation of perjury, forgery and subornation of forgery. They have succeeded in bullying every President and every minister who has been in office since the suspicion that DREYFUS was improperly convicted began to spread. Not a Minister of War, in particular, has held office since who has not been either an active accomplice in the work of perverting justice and stifling truth, or an inconceivably credulous dupe of the conspirators. Not a chief of the staff, scarcely a high officer of the staff, remains unsmirched. Generals in uniform have gone to court and, under pretence of giving testimony, have directed verdicts; while the judges, who should have rebuked them, have encouraged them in putting the army above the law. The one officer of the general staff who has shown a real sensitiveness to the honor of the French army, and has urged that it be saved by doing justice, is in prison on a purely malicious charge.

Such is the condition with which the DUPUY ministry finds itself confronted. The real task of that ministry is to assert and maintain the supremacy of the civil power. It has many advantages for such a task. It would be impossible to assemble a ministry of experienced French politicians who had not been more or less "mixed up" with the previous phases of the DREYFUS case. But not one of the new ministry can be said to have been actually smirched. President FAURE is perhaps more deeply implicated than any one of them, but he is not likely to resist a clear declaration of the public will. If the ministry can induce the legislature to take the ground that no Frenchman is above the law, and that perjury and forgery are the same crimes when committed by officers in defence of the honor of the army as by other persons from other motives, it will have deserved well of the republic. If it cannot make this showing, the republic will no longer exist, for it will have been supplanted by a military oligarchy.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE "BLACK HAND" IN PUERTO RICO.

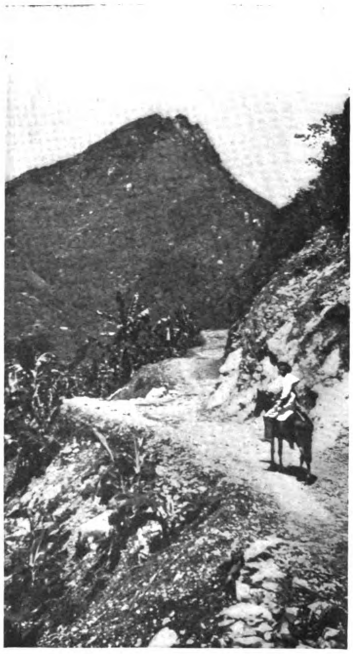
WHEN you have observed in the New York papers that a town in Puerto Rico has been burned by bandits, and, later, have seen the mail-coaches between San Juan and Ponce travelling for a large part of their journey under an armed guard, you will no doubt form your idea of the character of the country accordingly, and straightway wish to protest against the removal of troops from such a lawless and disorganized community. When you also hear rumors of a dreaded secret brotherhood, with the name and insignia of the "Black Hand," holding under a reign of terror the mountain towns of Adjuntas and

"THE WARNING OF THE BLACK HAND."

Utuado, you will perhaps consider the expediency of returning to its former owner territory so unrestful and unpacified.

This, it will be understood, is your conception of the situation as a result of your broad observation from the Hotel Inglaterra in San Juan and the Plaza Café in Ponce. Your experience with the shopkeepers, moreover, may tend to confirm your conviction that all Borinquens are lineal descendants of the buccaneers.

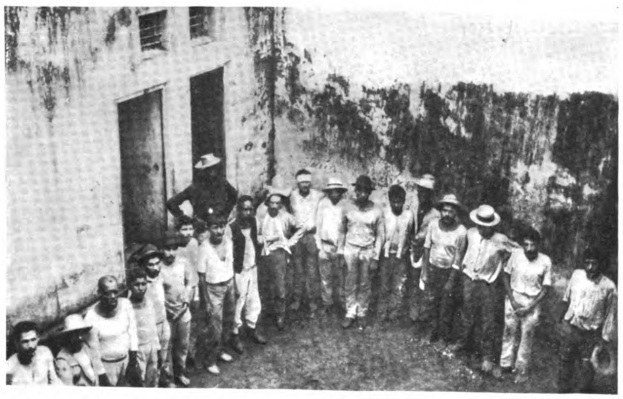
This deduction, however, will be modified when you come to know the Puertoriqueños of the mountains. They are not, you will find, bandits by profession and law-breakers by choice, but a docile and gentle folk, whose kindly ways make your ponderous army "Colt" seem as useful and appropriate for travel in their country as would be a dress waistcoat or a silk hat. The friendly "bueno' dia'," from the door of every cocoa-thatched hut, is not merely a greeting, but a frank expression of good-will. The hospitality of the native of the mountains is as exuberant as the foliage that surrounds his door. The ready offering of fragrant coffee and aguacates or bananas is as spontaneous as it is acceptable. Outside of Ponce or San Juan, where, by-the-way, the shopkeepers are largely Spanish by birth or sympathy, one finds the native not only honest and law-abiding, but peaceable to a degree that is surprising, when one considers the fiery sugar-cane rum which is their daily beverage.



A chance stranger is somewhat puzzled, having this knowledge of the kindly nature of the Borinquen, to see in the town of Adjuntas and the surrounding country a more sinister spirit, evidenced by the smoking ruins of plantation-houses and acres of coffee-bushes cut close to the ground; by cattle hamstrung and left to die by the way-side, and families fleeing with their household goods to places of safety. On an occasional door or store front appears a single black print of a human hand. If the native be questioned, he responds with a sidelong glance and finger on his lip.

"El mano negro," he whispers.

A photograph of the grim symbol is obtained only after much diplomatic negotiation with the owner of the house, who is not eager to appear in the light of one bearing evidence against the shadowy Presence. One learns that the dreaded token on the door is the precursor of a masked band coming by night to leave a record of its visit written with torch and machete. He hears of a woman and child hacked with knives and left for dead on the Lares Road; of a plantation owner, aged and infirm, beaten and tortured, his ears cut off, and, finally, in the presence of his son, hanged from a rafter in a house. He sees traces of pillage and arson. All these signs of violence, though dispiriting to the solitary traveller, need not change his estimate of the people formed in his first ride over the mountains. These crimes will later assume their proper place in the perspective of history. Some of them are a part of the outlawry that must needs attend the close of a war. In most cases, however, what he sees is merely a rude balancing of accounts. The items on one side have been accumulating for some four centuries, and it is not surprising that the lower class of Puertoriqueños should wish to make a few additional entries before the United States closes the ledger permanently.



It has been the business of the Sixth Massachusetts Regiment to suppress this persecution of the Spanish residents, and the task has been by no means an easy one. By the terms of the protocol only such territory could be occupied by the American forces as was de facto in their possession at the time hostilities ceased. The practical result of the agreement was that a hazy boundary-line was drawn between the Spanish and American outposts. This uncertainty left a strip of country some eight miles broad entirely without protection. It is in this district that most of the outrages have occurred. Although these have been committed to a large extent by irresponsible negroes and the lower class of natives, there has been some evidence of an organized effort to drive the Spanish sympathizers from the island. The secret society called—from its picturesque method of warning its victims—the "Black Hand" is a political organization known to have existed in the island before the beginning of the American war with Spain. It had its origin, as did the Mafia and Camorra of Sicily and Naples, in the necessity for the existence of individual action against the evils of oppressive foreign government. It is known that members of the prevailing political party belong to it, but it is of course difficult to ascertain whether it was actively identified with either side of the question of autonomy which came before the people at their last election. It is certain, however, that its energies are at present devoted to the business of making the island an unprofitable place of residence for the plantation-owners and small merchants who have been associated with Spanish misrule in the past. The plantations and stores that have been attacked in and about Utuado have all belonged to Spaniards, but one Puertoriqueño having so far requested protection. In the district around Isabella and Quebradillas there have been attacks made on both native and Spaniard, but it is supposed that these are not attributable to the "Black Hand," being beyond the mountainous region which appears to constitute its jurisdiction.

The country between Adjuntas and Utuado is admirably adapted to the purposes of brigandage. Beyond Adjuntas the roads are little more than mountain trails, and it is said that a man can start on foot from the latter town and arrive at Utuado before a well-mounted rider can make the same distance. This fact, together with the existence everywhere of dense tropical foliage reaching to the summits of the mountains, renders pursuit of the outlaws impracticable for American troops. Some twenty-seven details, each consisting of from two to ten men, have been sent out from Utuado to guard plantations and make arrests. Only two of these have had firing to do, in each of which cases the bandits were in the distance and offered no resistance. These details are sent out when requests are made of Colonel Rice for protection and horses are furnished to enable the men to reach the plantations threatened. The conditions prevailing have made it necessary to institute a system of "sweating," by which suspected members of the band are confined separately and examined as to their connection with the organization. Up to the 30th of September, thirty-three suspects have been confined in the carcel in Utuado, and a large number of native prisoners have been held for trial before the alcalde of the town since; so far as possible there has been no interference with the civil laws of the community. The American officers have found these preliminary examinations before the municipal judiciaries to be significantly lenient. It is thought probable that the influence of the "Black Hand" has filtered into the civil administration and courts of justice of the island, so that in many cases the alcalde, and even his common council, are members of the society.

ADJUNTAS—UTUADO ROAD—CONSTRUCTED BY GENERAL STONE FROM A SMALL MOUNTAIN TRAIL.

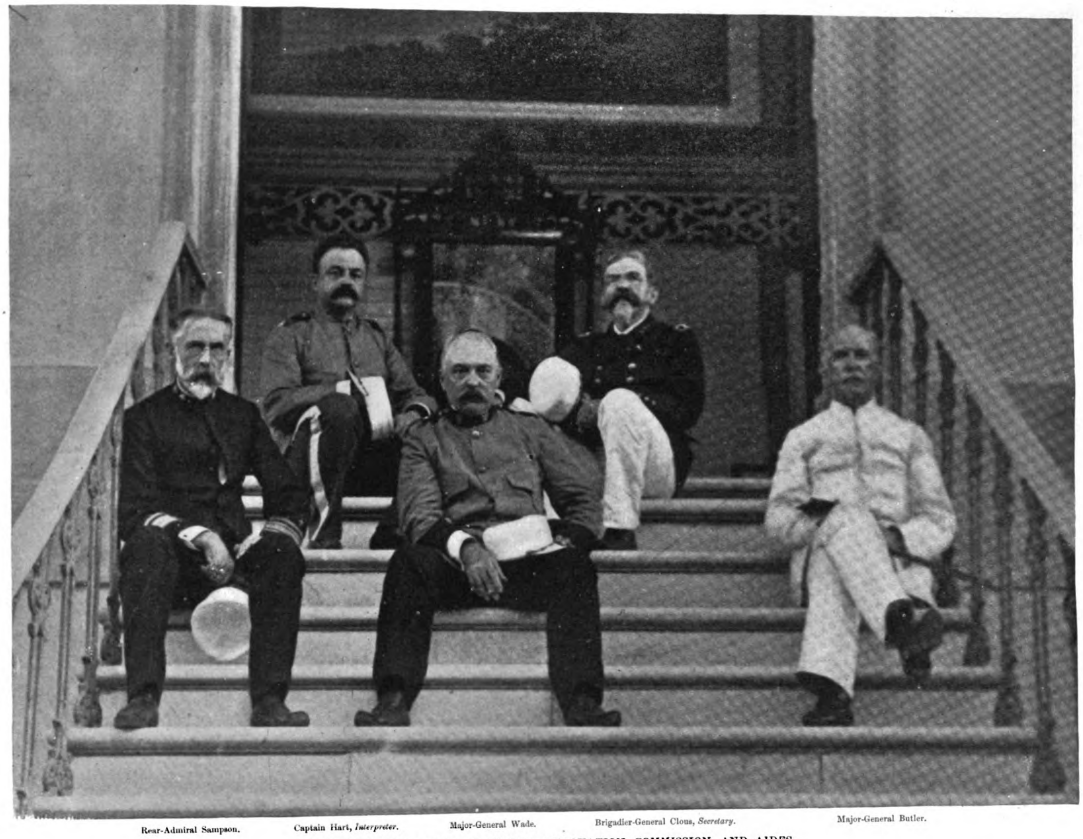
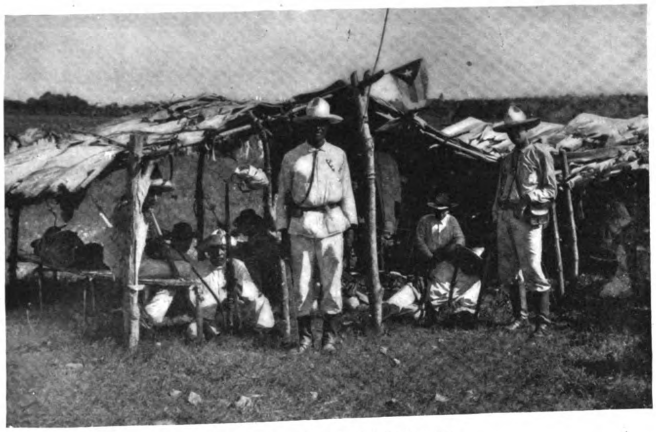
CAPTURED BANDITTI—UTUADO.



SIXTH MASSACHUSETTS AT SUNDAY SERVICE IN THE PLAZA, UTUADO.

In addition to the more violent methods of harassing the Spanish residents, a process of isolation or boycott is used against them, by which they are prevented from procuring a sufficient number of laborers to work their plantations. As the present month is the season for picking coffee, the dearth of plantation-workers is severely felt. How effective a native boycott is may be understood from the fact that a steam-laundry erected by the British consul in Arecibo is now a rusting pile of neglected machinery as a result of this form of organized opposition on the part of the natives. In some cases the persecution takes the form of blackmail, demanded by letters written under the seal of the "Black Hand."



When the town of Utuado was first occupied by our troops the order was issued, as usual, that all arms should be taken from the citizens of the town and from the inhabitants of the surrounding country wherever weapons were encountered. It was found necessary to modify this order, as the Spanish residents would be without the means of defending their lives and property from the attacks of the outlaws, momentarily

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Rear-Admiral Sampson. Captain Hart, Interpreter. Major-General Wade. Brigadier-General Clous, Secretary. Major-General Butler.

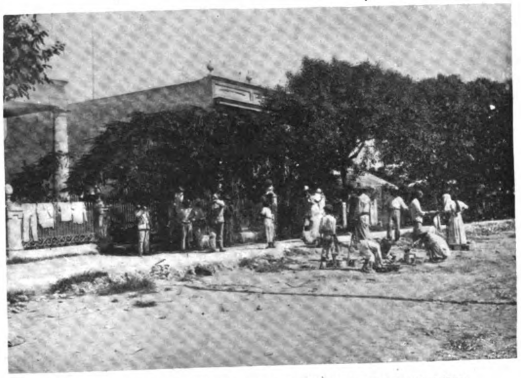
THE AMERICAN MEMBERS OF THE EVACUATION COMMISSION, AND AIDES.



A TYPICAL INSURGENT—GUANABACOA.

THE INSURGENT CAMP AT GUANABACOA.

THE CAPTAIN-GENERAL'S PALACE—RESIDENCE OF GENERAL BLANCO.

FEEDING THE POOR AT NOON—AN EVERY-DAY OCCURRENCE.

IN AND ABOUT HAVANA.—PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN ESPECIALLY FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148 expected. Arms were therefore allowed in the possession of those citizens whom the American officers had reason to believe were in need of protection. To those was also given the security which the presence of American soldiers always insures. The ability of a handful of Americans to care for two hundred or more outlaws has been frequently demonstrated. Notably so in the case of Private Edwards of the First Kentucky Regiment. He was assigned to the duty of guarding a plantation house alone, and proved himself amply capable of doing so. A party of some hundred armed men approached the house and were met in the road by the American, who, after an unnoticed challenge, settled the matter quietly and expeditiously, and without unnecessary waste of time or ammunition. When the "Black Hand" representatives withdrew, they left three of their number on the ground pierced with bullets, and one, with a bayonet-thrust in the neck received in a hand-to-hand encounter. There was no need thereafter for guards at that particular plantation. It is to be hoped that Private Edwards received his chevrons.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Since the withdrawal of the Spanish troops from the island, and the assumption by the American forces of the entire responsibility of maintaining order, it is reasonably to be expected that further acts of violence on the part of the "Black Hand" will not be attempted. Considering the fact that the country presents a combination of geographical and moral circumstances highly favorable to lawless pursuits, there has been, on the whole, a remarkable freedom from those conditions which are naturally to be expected at the close of a war. The "Black Hand," with a spirit behind it as bitter as any that existed in the South at the close of the war, has been guilty of no such record as had the Ku-Klux in Louisiana and Georgia. The symptoms of violence on the part of the members of this secret society are not to be taken as an indication of the Puertoriqueño's unfitness for a place in the American body politic. The better class appreciates the truth of the observation made by a local paper, that "outrage is a two-edged sword which may deprive us of our right to liberty....He is an enemy of Puerto Rico who to-day attempts to disturb the civilizing actions of the American people, appealing to violence and to illegalities, when all the doors are open to us to obtain our aspirations for liberty and justice."

JOHN HAMILTON THACHER.

ART IN PITTSBURG.

THE third annual exhibition at the Carnegie Art Galleries, Pittsburg, fully maintains the interest aroused by the previous ones. The reason is that the same principle has guided the management. They have once more secured an epitome of the best that is being accomplished in all the art centres of America and Europe. There is no other such annual exhibition anywhere, and consequently Pittsburg compels the serious attention of all intelligent art-lovers. Its characteristics are variety, excellence, and reasonableness of size. There are not more than two hundred and forty-four exhibits, so that each one can be comfortably and thoroughly studied, and it may be added that there are very few which will not repay the study. The impression produced upon the visitor is that it is distinctly the livest exhibition he has seen. The aims and methods of the painters are so varied that, instead of the exhausting sameness which characterizes so many exhibitions, this one is fertile in suggestions, fresh, spontaneous, and vital. The foolish cry was raised in previous years that the introduction of a foreign element was a slight upon American painters. If American art were in its infancy there might be some point in the assertion. The child would feel awed in the presence of the man. But in the same breath it is asserted that our native art has passed this stage, and can hold its own in the world. If so, why need it fear competition? As a matter of fact, it need not.

It is recognized everywhere as a real force to be reckoned with, and it makes the truth fully felt in the present exhibition, so that it may be hoped we have heard the last of an unworthy reflection upon the broad-minded policy of the Carnegie trustees. It should be borne in mind also that while the latter are incidentally and very materially encouraging American art by the prizes they offer and the pictures they buy, their first and foremost aim is to cultivate the taste and knowledge of their citizens and of the public outside who have the opportunity to visit the exhibition. This is the distinctive feature. The painter may here obtain glory—witness the growing esteem in which the gold medal conferred is being held in Europe as well as in this country. But the glorification of the painter is not the first thought. It is the enlightenment of the people by showing them the best that is being done everywhere, thereby broadening their knowledge, stimulating discernment, and preparing them to sanely and fully understand the work of their own men. An understanding public is as necessary to the spread of art as good painters, and an understanding of what is being done at home is likely to be broader and deeper when it grows out of an extended comparison of many men and many manners.

The coveted gold medal has been won this year by Dwight William Tryon's "Early Spring in New England," reproduced on another page. It is a large and important picture, executed with a mature knowledge of what painters call values—that is to say, the relative variations in the planes of the landscape produced by intervening layers of atmosphere. The effect is an absolutely faithful representation of nature, not in the sense of being photographically accurate, but in the just subordination of detail to general effect that shows up the impression which the scene would present to the eye. More than this, the picture is full of human feeling. It represents the scene as it would appeal to the imagination and heart of a sympathetic observer. It is creative in a true sense.

The human quality is hardly so apparent in the silver-medal picture of Childe Hassam, entitled "The Sea." This is rather an example mainly, if not quite entirely, of technique, of the exceeding skill with which warm light and shadows are depicted and a brilliant intricacy of beautiful color is obtained. It is unquestionably lovely and masterful, but it does not make a particularly personal appeal to the observer. Mr. Hassam works in the method of Monet, laying on his color unmixed in separate brush strokes, which at the requisite distance do their own blending. But in its vigor and almost brusque decision his style is distinctly his own. This picture cannot fail to raise the painter in the estimation of his fellows and the public.

The bronze medal has been awarded to Alexander Roche for "The Window-seat." He is a Scotchman, originally of Glasgow, and this picture, painted in soft grays and blues, browns and whites, has the strong personal expression, in this case pensive and earnest, that is the one characteristic which unites the very different units that make up what is erroneously called "the Glasgow school." The "honorable mentions" are "The Shepherd," by an English painter, E. A. Walton, and "Roses," by John F. Weir. The former is a strong presentment of a sturdy youth, with the speechless earnestness in his face that grows out of keeping solitary watch upon the mountains; while the latter represents the sentiment as well as the appearance of the flowers.

Only a brief mention can be made of some of the most notable of the other American pictures. In "The Golden Screen" Edmund C. Tarbell gives a bewitching and masterful rendering of a girl, in white dress and purple hat, sitting before a Japanese screen. By the skill with which he has introduced the light and made the shadows luminous with reflected tints he has produced an ensemble that is powerful and yet infinitely subtle and tender. Those who remember J. J. Shannon's "Miss Kitty," of last year, will find in his present picture, "The Stairs," something of the same graciousness of expression. A girl turns her head towards us as she steps up the stairs; her body is curved forward, one hand holds up her skirt. The tone of the picture is silvery gray. The characteristics are the grace, refinement, and piquancy of fresh young girlhood. Frank W. Benson sends one more of his altogether beautiful studies of children, this time in a wood. Frederick D. Freer also represents two children in a wood, calling his picture "Resting," to which he succeeds in giving a charming sense of noonday heat and calm. A "Dutch Bride" standing in a field of brilliant tulips comes from George Hitchcock, a very striking and, as you get used to it, convincing and beautiful picture; and Louis Paul Dessar sends three of his night scenes, one of which, "Sheepfold at Night," is especially distinguished for the effect of luminous gloom, and the impression which it conveys of tired nature sinking to rest. John S. Sargent is represented by a portrait of Mr. and Mrs. I. N. Phelps, seen last year, and by a new one of Mrs. Galbraith Wood, which shows the painter in one of his moods of almost brutal frankness. Of all the portraits, probably the finest, certainly the most persuasive, is one by Miss Cecilia Beaux. The sitter is a lady in the flower of her health and beauty; and the representation involves a breadth of execution and of sympathy with the subject that makes one hazard the opinion that it is the ripest work Miss Beaux has yet produced.

The trustees of the Carnegie Art Galleries have put themselves at the head of the art movement not only in America, but also in Europe. An exhibition so choice, varied, and at the same time summarizing so completely the art tendencies of to-day is without parallel anywhere.

CHARLES H. CAFFIN.

THE WEST INDIES.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

IS JAMAICA WORTH HAVING?

KINGSTON, JAMAICA, October 21, 1898.

IN the United States it is the present fashion to say, "We do not want Jamaica; we have enough on our hands already." But American sentiment is often based on material business considerations, and underlying this affectation of sufficient responsibilities is an idea that Jamaica is bankrupt. As a matter of fact, Jamaica is nothing of the kind, and in spite of frequent misfortunes, the finances of the island have shown a most remarkable buoyancy.

The explanation of the misconception as to its solvency is simple enough. A royal commission reported a year ago upon the British West Indies, and summaries of this important document were published in all the British and colonial newspapers, magazines, and reviews. All had their say about it; while in America the more striking and salient conclusions of the report were set forth in the press far and wide. Now the sum and substance of the whole report may be given in a single sentence. "There is," said the commissioners, addressing her Majesty, "every reason to believe that a very serious condition of things is rapidly approaching in your Majesty's West Indian possessions, and that the crisis will be reached in a very few years."

This grave statement went out to the world without any qualifying facts, and I myself was not aware, until I came to read their bulky report, that the commissioners specially and repeatedly excluded Jamaica from the danger which is said to be impending over the rest of the West Indies. As well they might. For the island is virtually inexhaustible in resources, and in the present year of "bankruptcy" is actually exporting more produce than it did fifteen years ago, when there was no such abnormal "depression" as Jamaica is to-day grumbling about. But then Jamaica has long ago made itself unpopular in Great Britain by grumbling. It is true it has been in some respects an unfortunate spot, and has had its opportunities for justifiable complaint, but by continually calling itself "distressful" it has succeeded in frightening away capital and getting itself called bankrupt.

But of all the British West Indian possessions, Jamaica (with the exception of Guiana, which has gold-mines) is the only one that is independent of sugar. This once beneficent giant is now looked upon in these colonies as a malevolent ogre, and when the royal commissioners speak of imminent catastrophe they mean the collapse of sugar cultivation under competition with Cuba, Puerto Rico, and Haiti in American occupation. But in this direction the black shadow of coming events does not darken the Jamaican prospect. Sugar has already, in recent years, dropped from being over 70 per cent. of her total export value to be about 20 per cent. But in the same period fruit has risen from nothing at all to be nearly 70 per cent. of the total! And Jamaica has the advantage over all the other colonies of numerous subsidiary industries—coffee, cocoa, pimento, ginger, among them—all of which are profitable to-day and capable of immense extension in the future, while in her logwood, fustic, and other woods she has assets of prodigious value. "On the whole," as the commissioners say, "there appears to us no ground for despondency as to the future of Jamaica, either in view of the possible failure of the sugar industry or on general considerations," and this opinion is practically supported by the fact that last year the island was able, without difficulty, to raise a loan in London at three per cent.

Is, then, Jamaica worth having? Even to Great Britain, with a fiscal policy hostile to her own colonies, and handicapped by the nearer markets of the United States, the island might easily be made well worth having, while if Jamaica should by any chance come under American control, there is no limit to the possibilities, for the island might then become one of the wonders of the world.

A hundred years ago Jamaica grew cotton, two millions of pounds a year; at the present day there is not a pound of cotton grown in the whole island! Then came sugar and rum, in 1880, to the value of a million sterling. Last year these two products were valued at £300,000! And now, cotton and sugar having failed, Jamaica makes good the great gap in her revenue by fruit. Twenty years ago there was not enough fruit exported to be worth a separate line in the official schedule of products. Last year it stood at half a million sterling! Here, then, are three facts which are convincing as to the buoyancy of Jamaican resources. And who, in the face of the astonishing range of alternative "agricultural" industries which the island can show, will say that if fruit were to go the way of cotton and sugar it would be at the end of its means of revenue?

"Blue Mountain" coffee holds its own against all comers in the markets of the world. Jamaica chocolate is of unbeatable excellence; in pimento (allspice) it has a monopoly; its ginger is world-famous; and nutmegs, cloves, and vanilla thrive in the island luxuriously; the local tobacco makes cigars good enough for the governor's smoking, for the club and the officers' mess; the tea is excellent, and the grapes delicious; of the value of the kola-nut coming into such prominence in the United States, and which flourishes here like a weed, I need say nothing; while cocoanut husks and the fibre-plants—bamboo, China-grass and Sisal-hemp—which are by-products of lands that will not bear the richer-feeding crops, may any day come into prominence. Nor need I say anything of the fruits of Jamaica, as the fact above stated, that the value of the exports under this one head amounted to £500,000 speaks sufficiently.

But to show how backward in enterprise Jamaica is, and as a hint to American and British capital, it is worth noting that here, in the very home of fruits and spices and delicatessen, we buy Canadian ketchups and Dundee marmalade. New York and London provide the jams and pickles and sauces that are in consumption, while Jamaica, out of the abundance of its own relishes and good things, sends nothing abroad in return. Turtle sells in the market here at twelve cents a pound; in England it costs two dollars and a half. But who ever heard of "Jamaica turtle"? The manufacture on the spot of table condiments and like luxuries, and their canning and bottling for export, hold out great possibilities to intelligent outsiders. Of late, very recently, it has struck the Jamaican mind as possible that making lime juice and marmalade at home, and exporting the made article instead of the perishable fruit itself, might be advantageous, but there is nothing being done on an appropriate scale, with proper machinery and of sufficient excellence. There is a great opening here.

Again, what has Jamaica ever done in the direction of food-stuffs for stock? Tens of thousands of pounds' worth of bananas are annually wasted, thrown away, which should make superb horse, cattle, and poultry meal. The yam, too, grows anywhere, a single root occasionally weighing fifty pounds, and if produced in quantities and sent to Europe as cattle food, it might surely compete profitably with similar products from India and from Australia. Here is another opening for the investment of capital and the development of agricultural industry.

Closely allied to agriculture is the raising of horses and stock. Now it is a very interesting fact that the island has for two centuries not only been breeding its own horses, but exporting them. Cromwell's soldiers, when they took possession of Jamaica, found horses wild, in droves—Barbs and Andalusians imported by the Spaniards and run wild. From that day to this thoroughbred sires and mares have been imported into Jamaica, and the consequence is that the island possesses a most remarkably hardy and useful breed of horses, seldom over fifteen hands, but "game" and gentle to a degree. The climate and feed suit horses perfectly. Mules, too, of great grit and apparently inexhaustible stamina are bred in the island, £30 ($150) being no unusual price for a single animal. Now the demand for draught-animals far exceeds the supply. But at present there is no establishment on the island that tries to meet the demand in anything like an effectual manner. Yet when we consider the prices paid for Jamaican horses—as race-horses they go all over the West Indies and the adjacent mainland—and the prices of labor and of food, it is curious that an industry which apparently can command large profits from the start, should not be in full swing on an appropriate scale.

For cattle Jamaica is notoriously suited, and no one who has ever visited the island has failed to be struck by the bulk and stature of the stock at work on the roads or at pasture in the paddocks. By crossing with East-Indian breeds there is now in general use a big-framed, hardy animal, the bullocks very enduring and willing at draught, and the cows giving as much as sixteen quarts of milk a day in the dairy farm. But there are not enough of them. A big cattle-ranch on the waste lands, at present yielding nothing and in the possession of government, would pay good interest on capital if run with American or Australian experience and enterprise.

Very briefly and only in one direction I have referred to several features which, with the proper hands and heads at work—and I would give the preference to American investors as likely to make the best of this remarkable island—might go a long way towards settling the question of the worth of Jamaica. That it is worth having even as it is, and to England, hardly admits of doubt, while if it were in the possession of the United States, Americans would soon discover that Jamaica is not by any means "bankrupt," and is (in spite of the responsibilities of Cuba and Puerto Rico) worth their having too.

PHIL. ROBINSON.

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

THIS BUSY WORLD

ACCORDING to the Vienna correspondent of the London Daily News, Mark Twain has announced his conversion by the Czar to a belief in the possibility of putting an end to war. The announcement was made in a speech before the Society of the Friends of Peace, in Vienna. Mr. Clemens spoke in English, and the despatch says, "The speech was not interpreted to the assembly, because the government representative doubted that all Mr. Clemens said would bear translation." That is a little vague. Were the translators doubtful of their ability to turn Mark's vernacular into German, or was it that our fellow-countryman was too frank in revealing his impressions? If he will send his speech home, readers will be found for it.

It would appear that the outbreak of the Pillager Indians was a successful effort. Indian-Commissioner Jones reports that they had two just grievances. The whites who are their neighbors cheat them out of their timber, and are enabled to do it more easily by the bad system which hitherto has governed the sale of this timber. The Commissioner hopes to have the system bettered. The other grievance is that Indians have been brought as witnesses before the United States court, two hundred miles from home, and have been turned loose, after testifying, without fees, or means of getting home. The Pillagers having brought their wrongs to public notice by their fight, are in a way to have them redressed, though it appears that they hardly intended to go as far as they did, and the fighting seems to have been due to misapprehension rather than to deliberate purpose. As usual, the mischief was made by rascally white civilians, and the sufferers have been the Indians, and the soldiers and officers of the United States army.

Lady Theodore Martin, better known as Helen Faucit, actress, made last week a dignified exit from the world's stage. She was in many particulars a notable member of her profession, being a successful performer not only on the stage but off it, and winning high renown and rewards in her profession without the sacrifice of her personal happiness. She was born as long ago as 1819, both her parents being actors of note. Her early teachers in her profession were Macready and William Farron. She began her stage career in 1834, made her first appearance in London in 1836, and from that time until her marriage, in 1851, to Theodore Martin, was a favorite actress throughout Great Britain. In 1837 she joined Macready's company, and became leading lady to that eminent actor, playing for fourteen years chiefly under his management, with credit, profit, and high distinction. After her marriage her dramatic appearances became more irregular, but she continued on the stage until 1876, and indeed made one or two public appearances after that. She had great beauty and great intelligence, and a personal character which helps one to understand why her greatest impersonations were Juliet, Beatrice, Constance, Imogen, Portia, and Rosalind—all Shakespearian women. Her book On Some of the Female Characters of Shakespeare is a work of note. It is doubtless Mr. Winter who, in the Tribune, speaks of her as "always adequate to all that is essentially noble in womanlike characters, so that she could greatly express a great and pure ideal."

Her later years were devoted to literature and society, and, as the wife of Sir Theodore Martin, poet, and biographer of the Prince Consort, she became a true ornament of the best society in England.

More thought than votes has been bestowed this fall on the doings of the Citizens' Union. It does not necessarily follow that because that party is a public nuisance it is not doing its business well. Its aim is political education. If it believes that more education may be diffused by beating a good candidate than by electing him, it will go in, hammer and tongs, to beat him. When Parnell entered Parliament, the Irish home-rule party, under the leadership of Butt, was merely deprecative. It accomplished nothing. Parnell's policy was to make the party the greatest nuisance possible to the British government, and to keep at it until something happened. Pursuing that policy he accomplished a great deal. The apparent belief of the Citizens' Union that there was more education to be got out of the election of Croker's man than out of the election of Roosevelt was not necessarily an unreasonable belief. Half a loaf is better than no bread, but the half-loaf diet gets tiresome after a while, and determined men may prefer to forego it and live on herbs for a time, if there seems to be a chance by so doing to win square meals in the end.

There is interesting reading in the interview with Rudyard Kipling reported by Sir Edward Russell, of the Liverpool Post, the gist of which was given in the Sun of October 31. Kipling is very chary about talking for publication, and it does not seem quite clear whether he knew in this case that his words would go into print, for Sir Edward does not mention his name in his report, and merely indicates by hints, inexact but conclusive, who it was that talked with him. They talked about Cecil Rhodes, for whom Kipling expressed the warmest sympathy and admiration. "The greatest of living men," he called him, and spoke of his personal indifference to money except as a useful tool in empire-building, of the simplicity of his life, his indifference to creature comforts, his accessibility, his swift transaction of business, and the nonsense of talk about inhumanity in him. Asked if Rhodes had in a public sense any morals, Kipling seems to have answered that Rhodes was making an empire. What concern had morals with such a labor? The best ideal is to spread civilization, and make an empire in doing it. To the suggestion that it was reassuring to think that the rules of religion had weight in public affairs as well as in private life, the response was that "religion has no influence on conduct." What was of consequence was that the Boers were in favor of everything benighted, and that Rhodes was in favor of everything progressive. The Boers Mr. Kipling declared to be "utterly detestable," cruel to the natives, neither civilized, nor picturesque in their uncivilization, nor righteous in their conduct. He discriminated between them and the Dutch, who are civilized, though slow. He held it to be preposterous to let the Boers have anything to do with politics anywhere where British interests were concerned.

It is a handy thing to have the convictions of one's courage, and in that particular Mr. Kipling, like our own Roosevelt, seems to be abundantly blessed. Some persons have been shocked by his poem about the hunter and the bear (published some weeks ago in Literature), in which he scoffs with sweeping derision at the Czar's peace projects, and advocates pounding Russia efficaciously on the head the first good chance. That poem is a product of the same state of mind as these later deliverances. The man believes in the good old rule, in Bismarck's way, in smiting the Philistines and harrying the Hittites, and in leaving excuses and justification to be worked out by the future historian at his leisure.

A line in the WEEKLY last week told of the death of Colonel George E. Waring, from yellow fever, on the morning of October 29, four days after his return from Cuba. When he reached New York on the Yucatan he was up and about, but complained of malaria. He went home to his apartment on Second Avenue, expecting to start next day for Washington. But on Wednesday he was not so well and kept his bed, and on Thursday it was ascertained that he had yellow fever. His recovery was expected, until Friday night, when his symptoms became alarming.

He has been mourned in a very unusual degree. Every one in New York, and tens of thousands of persons out of New York, knew him or knew about him, and felt that his death was a catastrophe in which they were personally concerned. Socially he was a delightful man and had a very large acquaintance, with whom he was exceedingly popular. So his death has brought grief to an unusual number of friends, and besides that has brought a regret which has a strong infusion of grief in it to thousands of men and women who knew him only by his works. He changed the whole appearance and atmosphere of New York, making it handsomer, healthier, and pleasanter. Parents were grateful to him as a man who had made their children's lives safer. He had worked as hard and as successfully, or more so, for the poor as for the rich. Every one in New York knew that we owed clean streets to Waring, and a very large proportion of those who knew it were grateful.

COLONEL GEORGE E. WARING, JR.
Born July 4, 1833. Died October 29, 1898.

His work as the organizer and administrative head of the Street-Cleaning Department under Mayor Strong is so famous that his other good works are in some danger of being overshadowed. It is worth remembering that he was chosen for that place on the strength of his high reputation as a sanitary engineer and as a man who could do difficult things. He was born in Poundridge, New York, in 1833, and was educated in Poughkeepsie, where he studied engineering, agriculture, and agricultural chemistry. When he was twenty-one he went lecturing on agriculture in Vermont and Maine, and attracted the attention of Horace Greeley, who made him manager of his experimental farm at Chappaqua. In 1857 he was appointed drainage engineer of Central Park, and while in that employment planted the two rows of elms on the Mall.

When the war broke out he went to it as Major of the Garibaldi Hussars. Later he helped to raise the Fourth Missouri Cavalry, and was made a Colonel, and served as a Colonel till the war ended. In 1867 he became manager of the Ogden farm near Newport, where he lived and studied and practised his profession for ten years. He became so well known as a master of drainage problems and as a sanitary engineer that in 1878, when yellow fever broke out in Memphis, he was called to that city to devise a system of drainage. He did his work so well, under a system of his own devising, that Memphis was changed from the unhealthiest of the Southern cities to a comparatively salubrious place. Many other cities in the South and elsewhere have since adopted his system, which provides for the separation of house-drainage from surface-drainage. After serving as a special agent of the tenth census, he became a member of the National Board of Health. He began his work as Street-Cleaning Commissioner in New York in January, 1895, and, after three years of splendid achievement, was turned out of office as a consequence of Croker's victory last year. On October 2 he was appointed head of the commission to select camp sites in Cuba, and to arrange for sanitary improvements there. He paid special attention to the problem of cleaning Havana, and there is some comfort in the news that his report on that important matter was practically finished, and that the conclusions which he reached are available for government use.

Colonel Waring was a very agreeable writer. Long ago he published some civil-war stories under the title of Whip and Spur, as well as other sketches, but of late years his writing, as well as all his work, has been in the line of his profession. His work, though of immense value to his fellow-countrymen, had not enriched him. He died in the service of the country, at the height of his reputation, but without having accumulated even such a fortune as would avail for the modest support of his widow. The proposal that comes from ex-Mayor Strong, that a fund should be raised in his memory for Mrs. Waring's benefit, is timely and suitable, and is likely to find prompt and cordial support from thousands of citizens who feel themselves to be Colonel Waring's debtors.

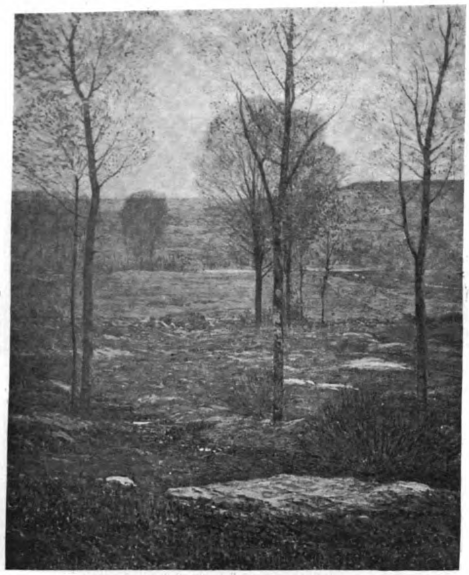
It is announced that the troubled state of European politics will compel the German Emperor to cut short his visit to Palestine. He has changed his plan so as to leave out his proposed visits to Jericho, Nazareth, and the Sea of Galilee, but his chief errand is already accomplished. On Saturday, October 29, he reached Jerusalem, entering the city through the Jaffa gate to the music of brass bands and the roar of Turkish guns. From the Tower of David he and the Empress proceeded on foot to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, where they were received by the Greek, Catholic, and Armenian clergy, who share the charge of that sacred place. The Patriarchs praised William for his piety, and later received his acknowledgments in the form of decorations. Undoubtedly he would gladly have decorated the Apostles also if he had arrived in time. Returning from the church the Emperor received a popular ovation, palm branches being strewn in his path, according to the immemorial custom of the country.

On Monday morning he raised the German flag on Mount Zion, on a piece of ground given to him by the Sultan, and notable as the traditional site of the former home of the Virgin. This land the Emperor placed in charge of the representatives of his Roman Catholic subjects, and telegraphed to the Pope his assurances to that effect.

On Tuesday came the consecration of the Church of the Redeemer, the special occasion of his journey. He walked to the church in the white uniform of the German Guards, the Empress with him, and both wearing many decorations. At the close of the splendid and impressive ceremonies of dedication he read an address acknowledging the obligations of the German people to the religion of Christ, and recording his desire for the promotion of peace on earth.

It is related that the Emperor is the first Christian who has been permitted to visit the tomb of David since 1187, that tomb being one of the most sacred shrines of the Mohammedans.

The status of the peace negotiations in Paris as the WEEKLY goes to press is that the American commissioners have announced that their government intends to take all the Philippines, and is willing to become responsible to Spain for a sum of money equal to the actual expenditures of Spain for the advantage of the islands and the good of the people who live in them. A large part of the Philippine debt of $40,000,000 was incurred for expenses in putting down rebellions, and all that our commissioners refuse to assume. The Spanish commissioners have communicated the American proposition to Madrid. The expectation is that the Spanish government will refuse to entertain it, and that a serious hitch in negotiations will result. It will be remembered that the question of the assumption of any part of the Cuban debt by our government is still unsettled, except so far as the firm attitude of our commissioners on that point may be considered as conclusive.

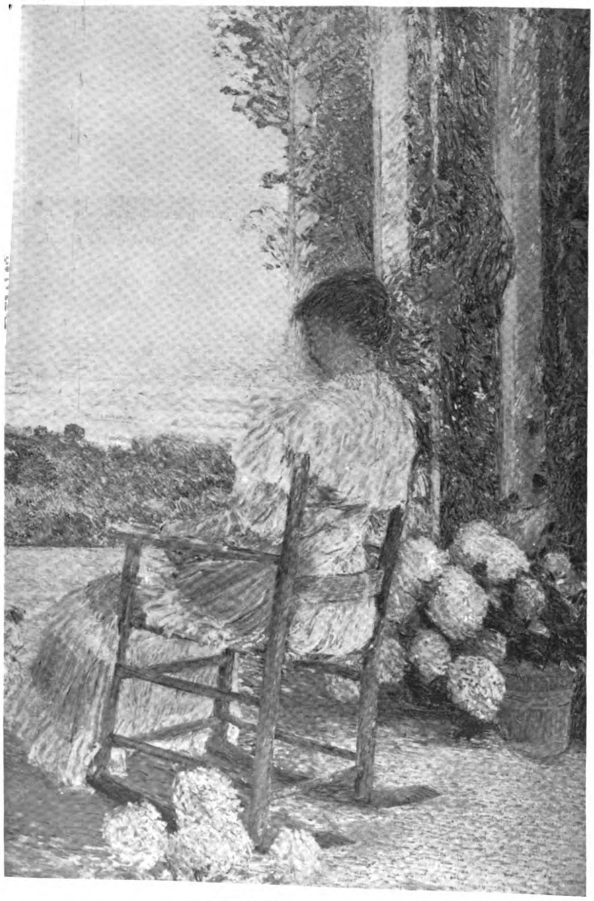


It is worth noting, as a comment on the position of our commissioners, that Mr. Mayo W. Hazeltine, an ardent annexationist, well known from his long association with the New York Sun, contributed to the October number of the North American Review an article in which, discussing the Philippine question, he held that the President, by agreeing to the terms of the protocol, abandoned our right to hold the Philippines as conquered territory, and "put the retention of all the islands by us out of the question, unless some consideration should be tendered which would be regarded in Madrid as quid pro quo." Mr. Hazeltine thought that a fair price for the Philippines would be the assumption of the whole Philippine debt and about one-fifth of the Cuban debt, or in all about one hundred million dollars. Our commissioners, under instructions from Washington, seem to intend to drive a very much harder bargain than that. The apparent sentiment of the administration that the Philippines are worth very little to us may find more sympathy in this country than the determination to get them cheap.

The British navy spent a good part of last week in rolling up its sleeves—first by way of impressing France with the expediency of moderating her claims to territory in Africa; next, to restrain the propensity of Russia to grab another port in the Far East. It seems that Russia, finding Great Britain busy with France over the Fashoda question, occupied, on October 15, the town of Niu-chwang, on the Liau-ho River, in the province of Liau-tung. On November 2 all the British war-ships at Wei-hai-wei cleared for action. No doubt something will come of all this activity; but no doubt, also, it will be something diplomatic, and not war.

The French Court of Cassation has granted the application for revision of the Dreyfus court martial, but has not as yet consented to the release of the prisoner pending the revision of his case. It is probable that the new inquiry will be secret. The court has authority to summon any witness in France, and to command, if it chooses, the presence of the accused. It could have turned the matter over to a second court martial, and that it did not do that is, so far as it goes, a gain for Dreyfus

E. S. MARTIN.

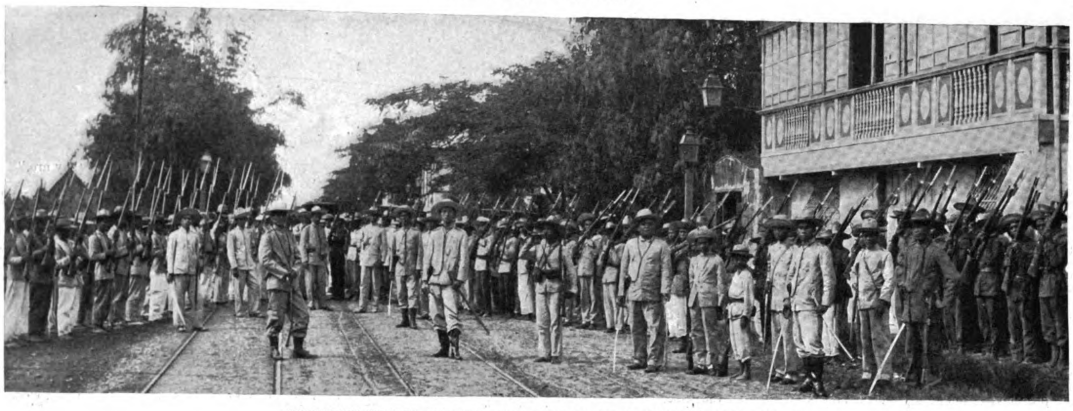


Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"EARLY SPRING IN NEW ENGLAND."—DWIGHT W. TRYON.
Awarded Medal of the First Class, carrying with it an Award of $1500.

"THE WINDOW-SEAT."—ALEXANDER ROCHE.
Awarded Medal of the Third Class, carrying with it an Award of $500.

"THE SEA."—CHILDE HASSAM.
Awarded Medal of the Second Class, carrying with it an Award of $1000.

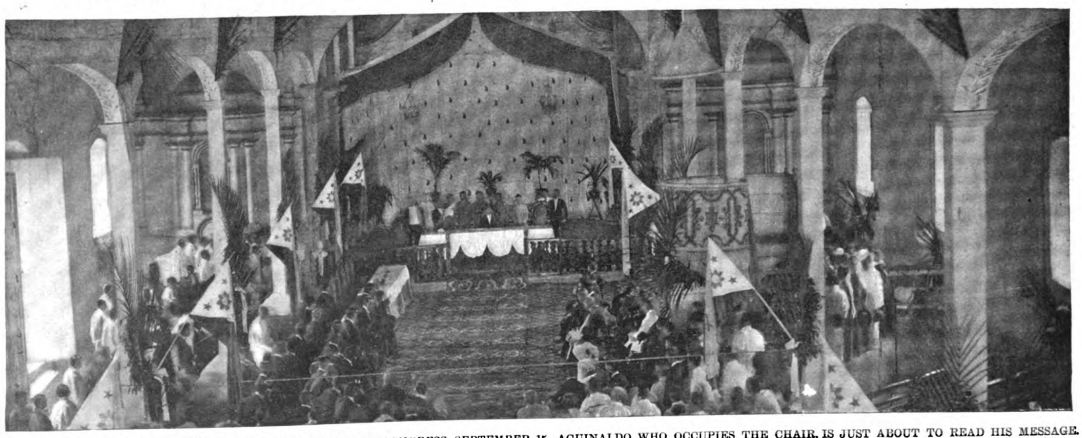


"THE SHEPHERD."—E. A. WALTON.
Awarded Honorable Mention.

PICTURES AWARDED HONORS AT THE THIRD ANNUAL EXHIBITION OF THE CARNEGIE INSTITUTE, PITTSBURG.

BY COURTESY OF THE INSTITUTE.—[SEE PAGE 1102.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



INSURGENT TROOPS AWAITING THE ARRIVAL OF AGUINALDO, SEPTEMBER 13

ARRIVAL OF AGUINALDO IN THE COURT-YARD OF THE CONVENT, SEPTEMBER 14.

CROWD IN THE COURT-YARD OF THE CONVENT LISTENING TO THE SPEECH OF GENERAL BUENCAMINO, ON THE ARRIVAL OF AGUINALDO.

OPENING OF THE FIRST SESSION OF THE FIRST FILIPINO CONGRESS, SEPTEMBER 15—AGUINALDO, WHO OCCUPIES THE CHAIR, IS JUST ABOUT TO READ HIS MESSAGE.

THE FILIPINO REPUBLIC—WITH AGUINALDO AT MALOLOS.

PHOTOGRAPHS FROM OSCAR KING DAVIS, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."—[SEE PAGE 1110.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE AWKWARD AGE.*

A Novel.

BY HENRY JAMES,

AUTHOR OF "DAISY MILLER," "AN INTERNATIONAL EPISODE," ETC.

XVI.

THE lower windows of the great white house, which stood high and square, opened to a wide flagged terrace, the parapet of which, an old balustrade of stone, was broken in the middle of its course by a flight of stone steps that descended to a wonderful garden. The terrace had the afternoon shade and fairly hung over the prospect that dropped away and circled it—the prospect, beyond the series of gardens, of scattered, splendid trees and green glades, a horizon mainly of woods. Nanda Brookenham, one day at the end of July, coming out to find the place unoccupied as yet by other visitors, stood there awhile with an air of happy possession. She moved from end to end of the terrace, pausing, gazing about her, taking in with a face that showed the pleasure of a brief independence the combination of delightful things—of old rooms, with old decorations that gleamed and gloomed through the high windows, of old gardens that squared themselves in the wide angles of old walls, of wood walks rustling in the afternoon breeze and stretching away to further reaches of solitude and summer. The scene had an expectant stillness that she was too charmed to desire to break; she watched it, listened to it, followed with her eyes the white butterflies among the flowers below her, then gave a start as the cry of a peacock came to her from some unseen alley. It set her, after a minute, into less difficult motion; she passed slowly down the steps, wandering further, looking back at the big bright house, but pleased again to see no one else appear. If the sun was still high enough she had a pink parasol. She went through the gardens one by one, skirting the high walls that were so like "collections" and thinking how, later on, the nectarines and plums would flush there. She exchanged a friendly greeting with a man at work, passed through an open door and, turning this way and that, finally found herself, in the park, at some distance from the house. It was a point she had had to take another rise to reach, a place marked by an old green bench for a larger sweep of the view, which, in the distance, where the woods stopped, showed, in the most English way in the world, the color-spot of an old red village and the tower of an old gray church. She had sunk down upon the bench almost with a sense of adventure, yet not too fluttered to wonder if it wouldn't have been happy to bring a book; the charm of which, precisely, would have been in feeling everything about her too beautiful to let her read.

The sense of adventure grew in her, presently becoming aware of a stir in the thicket below her, followed by the coming into sight, on a path that, mounting, passed near her seat, of a wanderer whom, had his particular, his exceptional identity not quickly appeared, it might have disappointed her a trifle to have to recognize as a friend. He saw her immediately, stopped, laughed, waved his hat, then bounded up the slope and, brushing his forehead with his handkerchief, confessing to being hot, was very gayly there before her. Her own ejaculation on first seeing him—"Why, Mr. Van!"—had had an ambiguous sharpness that was rather for herself than for her visitor. She made room for him on the bench, and in a moment he was cooling off and they were both explaining. The great thing was that he had walked from the station to stretch his legs, coming far round, for the lovely hour and the pleasure of it, by a way he had learnt on some previous occasion of being at Mertle.

"You've already staid here then?"—Nanda, who had arrived, but half an hour before, spoke as if she had lost the chance to give him a new impression.

"I've staid here—yes, but not with Mitchy; with some people or other—who, the deuce can they have been?—who had the place for a few months a year or two ago."

"Don't you even remember?"

Vanderbank wondered and laughed. "It will come to me. But it's a charming sign of London relations, isn't it?—that one can come down to people this way, and be awfully well 'alone for' and all that, and then go away and lose the whole thing, quite forget to whom one has been beholden. It's a queer life."

Nanda seemed for an instant to wish to say that one might deal the queerness, but she said something else instead. "I suppose a man like you doesn't quite feel that he is beholden: it's awfully good of him—it's doing a great deal for anybody—that he should come down at all; so that it would add immensely to his burden if anybody had to be remembered for it."

"I don't know what you mean by a man 'like me,'" Vanderbank returned. "I'm not any particular kind of a man." She had been looking at him, but she looked away, on this, and he continued good-humoredly explanatory. "If you mean that I go about such a lot, how do you know it but by the fact that you're everywhere now yourself?—so that, whatever I am, in short, you're just as bad."

"You admit then that you are everywhere. I may be just as bad," the girl went on, "but the point is that I'm not nearly so good. Girls are such hacks—they can't be anything else."

"And, pray, what are fellows who are in the beastly grind of fearfully busy offices? There isn't an old cab-horse in London that's kept at it, I assure you, as I am. Besides," the young man added, "if I'm out every night and off somewhere, like this, for Sunday, can't you understand, my dear child, the fundamental reason of it?"

Nanda, with her eyes on him again, studied an instant this mystery. "Am I to infer with delight that it's the sweet hope of meeting me? It isn't," she continued in a moment, "as if there were any necessity for your saying that. What's the use—?" But, impatiently, she stopped short.

He was eminently gay even if his companion was not. "Because we're such jolly old friends that we really needn't so much as speak at all? Yes, thank goodness—thank goodness." He had been looking around him, taking in the scene; he had dropped his hat on the ground and, completely at his ease, though still more wishing to show it, had crossed his legs and closely folded his arms. "What a tremendously jolly place! If I can't for the life of me recall who they were—the other people—I've the comfort of being sure their minds are an equal blank. Do they even remember the place they had? We had some fellows down, at—where was it, the big white house last November?—and there was one of them, out of the What-do-you-call-it?—you know—who might have been a decent enough chap if he had not presumed so on his gifts." Vanderbank paused a minute, but his companion said nothing, and he pursued: "It does show, doesn't it?—the fact that we do meet this way—the tremendous change that has taken place in your life in the last three months. I mean, if I'm everywhere, as you said just now, your being just the same."

"Yes—you see what you've done."

"How, what I've done?"

"You plunge into the woods for change, for solitude," the girl said, "and the first thing you do is to find me waylaying you in the depths of the forest. But I really couldn't—if you'll reflect upon it—know you were coming this way."

Vanderbank sat there with his position unchanged, but a constant little shake in the foot that hung down, as if everything—and what she now put before him not least—were much too pleasant to be reflected on. "May I smoke a cigarette?"

Nanda waited a little; her friend had taken out his silver case, which was of ample form, and as he extracted a cigarette she put forth her hand. "May I?"—she turned the case over with admiration.

Vanderbank hesitated. "Do you smoke with Mr. Longdon?"

"Immensely. But what has that to do with it?"

"Everything, everything." He spoke with a faint ring of impatience. "I want you to do with me exactly as you do with him."

"Ah, that's soon said!" the girl replied in a peculiar tone. "How do you mean, to 'do'?"

"Well then, to be. What shall I say?" Vanderbank pleasantly wondered while his foot kept up its motion. "To feel."

She continued to handle the cigarette-case, without, however, having profited by its contents. "I don't think that, as regards Mr. Longdon and me, you know quite so much as you suppose."

Vanderbank laughed and smoked. "I take for granted he tells me everything."

"Ah, but you scarcely take for granted I do!" She rubbed her cheek an instant with the polished silver, again, the next moment, turning over the case. "This is the kind of one I should like."

Her companion glanced down at it. "Why, it holds twenty."

"Well, I want one that holds twenty."

Vanderbank only threw out his smoke. "I want so to give you something," he said at last, "that in my relief at lighting on an object that will do, I will, if you don't look out, give you either that or a pipe."

"Do you mean this particular one?"

"I've had it for years—but even that one if you like it." She kept it—continued to finger it. "And by whom was it given you?"

At this he turned to her smiling. "You think I've forgotten that too?"

"Certainly you must have forgotten, to be willing to give it away again."

"But how do you know it was a present?"

"Such things always are—people don't buy them for themselves."

She had now relinquished the object, laying it upon the bench, and Vanderbank took it up. "Its origin is lost in the night of time—it has no history except that I've used it. But I assure you that I do want to give you something. I've never given you anything."

She was silent a little. "The exhibition you're making," she seriously sighed at last, "of your inconstancy and superficiality! The relics of you that I have treasured and that I supposed at the time to have meant something!"

"The 'relics'? Have you a lock of my hair?" Then as her meaning came to him: "Oh, little Christmas things? Have you really kept them?"

"Laid away in a drawer of their own—done up in pink paper."

"I know what you're coming to," Vanderbank said. "You've given me things, and you're trying to convict me of having lost the sweet sense of them. But you can't do it. Where my heart's concerned I'm a walking reliquary. Pink paper? I use gold paper—and the finest of all, the gold paper of the mind." He gave a flip with a finger-nail to his cigarette, and looked at its quickened fire; after which he pursued very familiarly, but with a kindness that of itself qualified the mere humor of the thing: "Don't talk, my dear child, as if you didn't really know me for the best friend you have in the world." As soon as he had spoken he pulled out his watch, so that if his words had led to something of a pause this movement offered a pretext for breaking it. Nanda asked the hour, and, on his replying "Five-fifteen," remarked that there would now be tea on the terrace, with every one gathered at it. "Then shall we go and join them?" her companion demanded.

He had made, however, no other motion, and when, after hesitating, she said "Yes, with pleasure," it was also without a change of position. "I like this," she incon-sequently added.

"So do I, awfully. Tea on the terrace," Vanderbank went on, "isn't 'in' it. But who's here?"

"Oh, every one. All your set."

"Mine? Have I still a set—with the universal vagabondism you accuse me of?"

"Well then Mitchy's own—whoever they are."

"And nobody of yours?"

"Oh yes," Nanda said, "all mine. He must at least have arrived by this time. My set's Mr. Longdon," she explained. "He's all of it now."

"Then where in the world am I?"

"Oh, you're an extra. There are always extras."

"A complete set and one over?" Vanderbank laughed. "Where then is Tishy?"

Charming and grave, the girl thought a moment. "She's in Paris, with her mother—on their way to Aix-les-Bains." Then, with impatience, she continued: "Do you know that's a great deal to say—what you said just now? I mean about your being the best friend I have."

"Of course I do, and that's exactly why I said it. You see I'm not in the least delicate or graceful or shy about it—I just come out with it and defy you to contradict me. Who, if I'm not the best, is a better one?"

"Well," Nanda replied, "I feel since I've known Mr. Longdon that I've almost the sort of friend who makes nobody else count."

"Then, at the end of three months, he has arrived at a value for you that I haven't reached in all these years?"

"Yes," she returned—"the value of my not being afraid of him."

Vanderbank, on the bench, shifted his position, turning more to her, with an arm over the back. "And you're afraid of me?"

"Horribly—hideously."

"Then our long, happy relations—"

"They're just what make my terror," she broke in, particularly abject. Happy relations don't matter. I always think of you with fear."

His elbow was on the back of the seat, and his hand supported his head. "How awfully curious—if it be true!"

She had been looking away to the sweet English distance, but at this she made a movement. "Oh, Mr. Van, I'm 'true'!"

As Mr. Van himself could not have expressed, at any subsequent time, to any interested friend, the particular effect upon him of the tone of these words, his chronicler takes advantage of the fact not to pretend to a greater intelligence—to limit himself, on the contrary, to the simple statement that they produced in Mr. Van's cheek a just discernible flush. "Fear of what?"

"I don't know. Fear is fear."

"Yes, yes—I see." He took out another cigarette and occupied a moment in lighting it. "Well, kindness is kindness too—that's all one can say."

He had smoked again awhile before she turned to him. "Have I wounded you by saying that?"

A certain effect of his flush was still in his smile. "It seems to me I should like you to wound me. I did what I wanted a moment ago," he continued with some precipitation: "I brought you out handsomely on the subject of Mr. Longdon. That was my idea—just to draw you."

"Well," said Nanda, looking away again, "he has come into my life."

"He couldn't have come into a place where it gives me more pleasure to see him."

"But he didn't like, the other day, when I used it to him, that expression," the girl returned. "He called it 'mannered modern slang,' and came back again to the extraordinary difference between my speech and my grandmother's."

"Of course," the young man understandingly assented. "But I rather like your speech. Hasn't he by this time, with you," he pursued, "crossed the gulf? He has with me."

"Ah, with you there was no gulf. He liked you from the first."

Vanderbank hesitated. "You mean I managed him so well?"

"I don't know how you managed him, but liking me has been for him a painful, gradual process. I think he does now," Nanda declared. "He accepts me at last as different—he's trying with me on that basis. He has ended by understanding that when he talks to me of Granny I can't even imagine her."

Vanderbank puffed away. "I can."

"That's what Mitchy says too. But you've both probably got her wrong."

"I don't know," said Vanderbank—"I've gone into it a good deal. But it's too late. We can't be Greeks if we would."

Even for this Nanda had no laugh, though she had a quick attention. "Do you call Granny a Greek?"

Her companion slowly rose. "Yes—to finish her off handsomely, to have done with her." He looked again at his watch. "Shall we go?—I want to see if my man and my things have turned up."

She kept her seat: there was something to revert to. "My fear of you isn't superficial. I mean it isn't immediate—not of you just as you stand," she explained. "It's of some dreadfully possible future you."

"Well," said the young man, smiling down at her, "don't forget that if there's to be such a monster, there'll also be a future you, proportionately developed, to deal with him."

Nanda, in the shade, had closed her parasol, and her eyes attached themselves to the small hole she had dug in the ground with its point. "We shall both have moved, you mean?"

"It's charming to think that we shall probably have moved together."

"Ah, if moving is changing," she returned, "there won't be much for me in that. I shall never change—I shall be always just the same. The same old-mannered, modern, slangy hack," she continued quite gravely. "Mr Longdon has made me feel that."

Vanderbank laughed aloud, and it was especially at her seriousness. "Well, upon my soul!"

"Yes," she pursued, "what I am I must remain.

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2180.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google haven't what's called a principle of growth." Making marks in the earth with her umbrella, she appeared to cipher it out. "I'm about as good as I can be—and about as bad. If Mr. Longdon can't make me different, nobody can."

Vanderbank could only speak in the tone of high amusement. "And he has given up the hope?"

"Yes—though not me quite, altogether. But the hope he originally had."

"He gives up quickly—in three months!"

"Oh, these three months," she answered, "have been a long time: the fullest, the most important, for what has happened in them, of my life." She still poked at the ground; then she added: "And all thanks to you."

"To me?"—Vanderbank couldn't fancy.

"Why, for what we were speaking of just now—my being now so in everything and squeezing up and down no matter whose staircase. Isn't it one crowded hour of glorious life?" she asked. "What preceded it was an age, no doubt—but an age without a name."

Vanderbank watched her a little in silence, then spoke quite beside the question. "It's astonishing how at moments you remind me of your mother!"

At this she got up. "Ah, there it is! It's what I shall never shake off. That, I imagine, is what Mr. Longdon feels."

Both on their feet now, as if ready for the others, they yet—and even a trifle awkwardly—lingered. It might in fact have appeared to a spectator that some climax had come, on the young man's part, to some state of irresolution as to the utterance of something. What were the words repeatedly on his lips, yet repeatedly not sounded? It would have struck our observer that they were probably not those his lips even now actually formed. "Doesn't he perhaps talk to you too much about yourself?"

Nanda gave him a dim smile, and he might indeed then have exclaimed on a certain resemblance, a resemblance of expression that had nothing to do with form. It would not have been diminished for him, moreover, by her successful suppression of every sign that she felt his inquiry as a little of a snub. The recall he had previously mentioned could, however, as she answered him, only have been brushed away by a supervening sense of his roughness. "It isn't so much that, probably, as my own way of going on." She spoke with a mildness that could scarce have been so full without being an effort. "Between his patience and my egotism anything is possible. It isn't his talking—it's his listening." She gave up the point at any rate as if from softness to her actual companion. "Wasn't it you who spoke to mamma about my sitting with her? That's what I mean by my debt to you. It's through you that I'm always there—through you and perhaps a little through Mitchy."

"Oh, through Mitchy—it must have been—more than through me." Vanderbank spoke with the manner of humoring her about a trifle. "Mitchy, delightful man, felt on the subject, I think, still more strongly."

They quitted their place together and at the end of a few steps became aware of the approach of one of the others, a figure but a few yards off, arriving from the quarter from which Nanda had come. "Ah, Mr. Longdon!"—she spoke with eagerness now.

Vanderbank instantly waved a hat. "Dear old boy!"

"Between you all, at any rate," she said more gayly, "you've brought me down."

Vanderbank made no answer till they met their friend, when, by way of greeting, he simply echoed her words. "Between us all, you'll be glad to know, we've brought her down."

Mr. Longdon looked from one of them to the other. "Where have you been together?"

Nanda was the first to respond. "Only talking—on a bench."

"Well, I want to talk on a bench!" The old man showed a spirit.

"With me, of course?"—Vanderbank met it with eagerness.

The girl said nothing, but Mr. Longdon sought her eyes. "No—with Nanda. You must mingle in the crowd."

"Ah," their companion laughed, "you two are the crowd!"

"Well—have your tea first."

Vanderbank, on this, giving it up with his laugh, offered to Mr. Longdon, before withdrawing, the hand-shake of greeting he had omitted—a demonstration really the warmer for the tone of the joke that went with it. "Intrigant!"

XVII.

Nanda praised to Mr. Longdon the charming spot she had quitted, with the effect that they presently took a fresh possession of it, finding the beauty of the view deepened as the afternoon grew old and the shadows long. They were of a comfortable agreement on these matters, by which, moreover, they were not long delayed, one of the pair at least being too conscious, for the hour, of still other phenomena than the natural and peaceful process that filled the air. "Well, you must tell me about these things," Mr. Longdon sociably said; he had joined his young friend with a budget of impressions, rapidly gathered at the house, as to which his appeal to her for a light or two may be taken as the measure of the confidence now ruling their relations. He had come to feel at last, he mentioned, that he could allow for most differences, but in such a situation as the present bewilderment could only come back. There were no differences in the world—so it had all ended for him—but those that marked at every turn the manners he had for three months been observing in good society. The general wide deviation of this body occupied his mind to the exclusion of almost everything else, and he had finally been brought to believe that even in his slow-paced prime he must have hung behind his contemporaries. He had not supposed at the moment—in the forties and the fifties—that he passed for old-fashioned, yet life couldn't have left him so far in the rear had the start between them been originally fair. This was the way that, more than once, he had put the matter to the girl; which gives a sufficient hint, it is hoped, of the range of some of their talk. It had always wound up indeed their talk, with some assumption of the growth of his actual understanding; but it was just these pauses in the fray that seemed to lead from time to time to a sharper clash. It was when he felt, in a word, as if he had exhausted surprises that he received his greatest shocks. There were no such strange tastes as some of those drawn from the bucket that had repeatedly, as he imagined, touched the bottom of the well. "Now this sudden invasion of somebody's—Heaven knows whose—house, and our dropping down on it like a swarm of locusts: I dare say it isn't civil to criticise it when one's going too, so almost culpably, with the stream; but what are people made of that they consent, just for money, to the violation of their homes?"

Nanda wondered; she cultivated the sense that he made her intensely reflect. "But haven't people in England always let their places?"

"If we're a nation of shopkeepers, you mean, it can't date, on the scale on which we show it, only from last week? No doubt, no doubt, and the more one thinks of it the more one seems to see that society—for we're in society, aren't we, and that's our horizon?—can never have been anything but increasingly vulgar. The point is that in the twilight of time—and I belong, you see, to the twilight—it had made out much less how vulgar it could be. It did its best, very probably, but there were too many superstitions it had to get rid of. It has been throwing them overboard one by one, so that now the ship sails uncommonly light. That's the way"—and the old man, with his eyes on the golden distance, ingeniously followed it out—"I come to feel so the lurching and pitching. If I weren't a pretty fair sailor—well, as it is, my dear," he interrupted himself with a laugh, "I show you often enough what grabs I make for support." He gave a faint gasp, half amusement, half anguish, then abruptly relieved himself by a question. "To whom, in point of fact, does the place belong?"

"I'm awfully ashamed, but I'm afraid I don't know. That just came up here," the girl went on, "for Mr. Van."

Mr. Longdon seemed to think an instant. "Oh, it came up, did it? And Mr. Van couldn't tell?"

"He has quite forgotten—though he has been here before. Of course it may have been with other people," she added in extenuation. "I mean it mayn't have been theirs then any more than it's Mitchy's."

"I see. They too had just bundled in."

Nanda completed the simple history. "To-day it's Mitchy who bundles, and I believe that, really, he bundled only yesterday. He turned in his people, and here we are."

"Here we are, here we are!" her friend more gravely echoed. "Well, it's splendid!"

As if at a note in his voice her eyes, while his own still strayed away, just fixed him. "Don't you think it's really rather exciting? Everything's ready, the feast all spread, and, with nothing to blunt our curiosity but the general knowledge that there will be people and things, we comfortably take our places." He answered nothing, though her picture apparently reached him. "There are people, there are things, and all in a plenty. Had every one, when you came away, turned up?" she asked as he was still silent.

"I dare say. There were some ladies and gentlemen on the terrace that I didn't know. But I looked only for you, and came this way on an indication of your mother's."

"And did she ask that if you should find me with Mr. Van with me you would make him come to her?"

Mr. Longdon replied to this with some delay, but without movement. "How could she have supposed he was here?"

"Since he had not yet been to the house? Oh, it has always been a wonder to me, the things that mamma supposes! I see she asked you," Nanda observed.

At this her old friend turned to her. "But it wasn't because of that I got rid of him."

Nanda hesitated. "No—you don't mind everything mamma says."

"I don't mind 'everything' anybody says: not even, my dear, when the person's you."

Again she waited an instant. "Not even when it's Mr. Van?"

Mr. Longdon candidly considered. "Oh, I take him up on all sorts of things."

"That shows then the importance they have for you. Is he like his grandmother?" the girl pursued. Then as her companion looked vague: "Wasn't it his grandmother too you knew?"

He had an extraordinary smile. "His mother." She exclaimed, coloring, on her mistake, and he added: "I'm not so bad as that. But you're none of you like them."

"Wasn't she pretty?" Nanda inquired.

"Very handsome. But it makes no difference. She herself, to-day, wouldn't know him."

She gave a small gasp. "His own mother wouldn't—?"

His head-shake just failed of sharpness. "No, nor he her. There's a link missing." Then as if, after all, she might take him too seriously, "Of course it's I," he more gently moralized, "who have lost the link in my sleep. I've slept half the century—I'm Rip Van Winkle." He went back, after a moment, to her question. "He's not, at any rate, like his mother."

Nanda turned it over. "Perhaps you wouldn't think so much of her now."

"Perhaps not. At all events my parting you from Mr. Vanderbank was my own idea."

"I wasn't thinking," Nanda said, "of your parting me. I was thinking of your parting yourself."

"I might have sent you to the house? Well," Mr. Longdon replied, "I find I take more and more the economical view of my pleasures. I run them less and less together—I get all I can out of each."

"So now you're getting all you can out of me?"

"All I can, my dear—all I can." He watched a little the flushed distance, then mildly broke out: "It is, as you said just now, exciting! But it makes me"—and he became abrupt again—"want you, as I've already told you, to come to my place. Not, however, that we may be still more mad together."

The girl, from the bench, shared his contemplation. "Do you call this madness?"

He hesitated. "You spoke of it yourself as excitement. You'll make, of course, one of your fine distinctions, but I take it, in my rough way, as a whirl. We're going round and round." In a minute he had folded his arms with the same closeness Vanderbank had used—in a minute he too was nervously shaking his foot. "Steady, steady; if we sit close we shall see it through. But come down to Suffolk for sanity."

"You do mean then that I may come alone?"

"I won't receive you, I assure you, on any other terms. I want to show you," he continued, "what life can give. Not, of course," he subjoined, "of this sort of thing."

"No—you've told me. Of peace."

"Of peace," said Mr. Longdon. "Oh, you don't know—you haven't the least idea. That's just why I want to show you."

Nanda looked as if already she saw it in the distance. "But will it be peace if I'm there? I mean for you," she added.

"It isn't a question of 'me.' Everybody's omelette is made of somebody's eggs. Besides, I think that when we're alone together—"

He had dropped for so long that she wondered. "Well, when we are—?"

"Why, it will be all right," he simply concluded. "Temples of peace, the ancients used to call them. We'll set up one, and I shall be at least doorkeeper. You will come down whenever you like."

She gave herself to him in her silence more than she could have done in words. "Have you arranged it with mamma?" she said, however, at last.

"I've arranged everything."

"She won't want to come?"

Her friend's laugh turned him to her. "Don't be nervous. There are things as to which your mother trusts me."

"But others as to which not."

Their eyes met for some time on this, and it ended in his saying: "Well, you must help me." Nanda, but without shrinking, looked away again, and Mr. Longdon, as if to consecrate their understanding by the air of ease, passed to another subject. "Mr. Mitchett's the most princely host."

"Isn't he too kind for anything? Do you know what he pretends?" Nanda went on. "He says, in the most extraordinary way, that he does it all for me."

"Takes this great place and fills it with servants and company—?"

"Yes, just so that I may come down for a Sunday or two. Of course he has only taken it for three or four weeks, but even for that time it's a handsome compliment. He doesn't care what he does. It's his way of amusing himself. He amuses himself at our expense," the girl continued.

"Well, I hope that makes up, my dear, for the rate at which we're doing so at his!"

"His amusement," said Nanda, "is to see us believe what he says."

Mr. Longdon thought a moment. "Really, my child, you're most acute."

"Oh, I haven't watched life for nothing! Mitchy doesn't care," she repeated.

Her companion seemed divided between a desire to draw and a certain fear to encourage her. "Doesn't care for what?"

She reflected an instant, in her seriousness, and it might have added to Mr. Longdon's impression of her depth. "Well, for himself. I mean for his money. For anything any one may think. For Lord Petherton, for instance, really at all. Lord Petherton thinks he has helped him—thinks, that is, that Mitchy thinks he has. But Mitchy's more amused at him than at anybody else. He takes every one in."

"Every one but you?"

"Oh, I like him."

"My poor child, you're of a profundity!" Mr. Longdon murmured.

He spoke almost uneasily, but she was not too much alarmed to continue lucid. "And he likes me, and I know just how much—and just how little. He's the most generous man in the world. It pleases him to feel that he's indifferent and splendid—there are so many things it makes up to him for." The old man listened with attention, and his young friend, conscious of it, proceeded as on ground of which she knew every inch. "He's the son, as you know, of a great bootmaker—'to all the Courts of Europe'—who left him a large fortune, which had been made, I believe, in the most extraordinary way, in building-speculations as well."

"Oh yes, I know. It's astonishing!" her companion sighed.

"That he should be of such extraction?"

"Well, everything. That you should be talking as you are—that you should have 'watched life,' as you say, to such purpose. That we should any of us be here—most of all that Mr. Mitchett himself should. That your grandmother's daughter should have brought her daughter—"

"To stay with a person"—Nanda took it up as, apparently out of delicacy, he fairly failed—"whose father used to take the measure, down on his knees on a little mat, as mamma says, of my grandfather's remarkably large foot? Yes, we none of us mind. Do you think we should?" Nanda asked.

Mr. Longdon turned it over. "I'll answer you by a question. Would you marry him?"

"Never." Then as if to show there was no weakness in her mildness, "Never, never, never," she repeated.

"And yet I dare say you know—?" But Mr. Longdon once more faltered; his scruple came uppermost. "You don't mind my speaking of it?"

"Of his thinking he wants to marry me? Not a bit. I positively enjoy telling you there's nothing in it."

"Not even for him?"

Nanda considered. "Not more than is made up to him by his having found out, through talk and things—which mightn't otherwise have occurred—that I do like him. I wouldn't have come down here if I hadn't."

"Not for any other reason?" Mr. Longdon gravely inquired.

"Not for your being here, do you mean?"

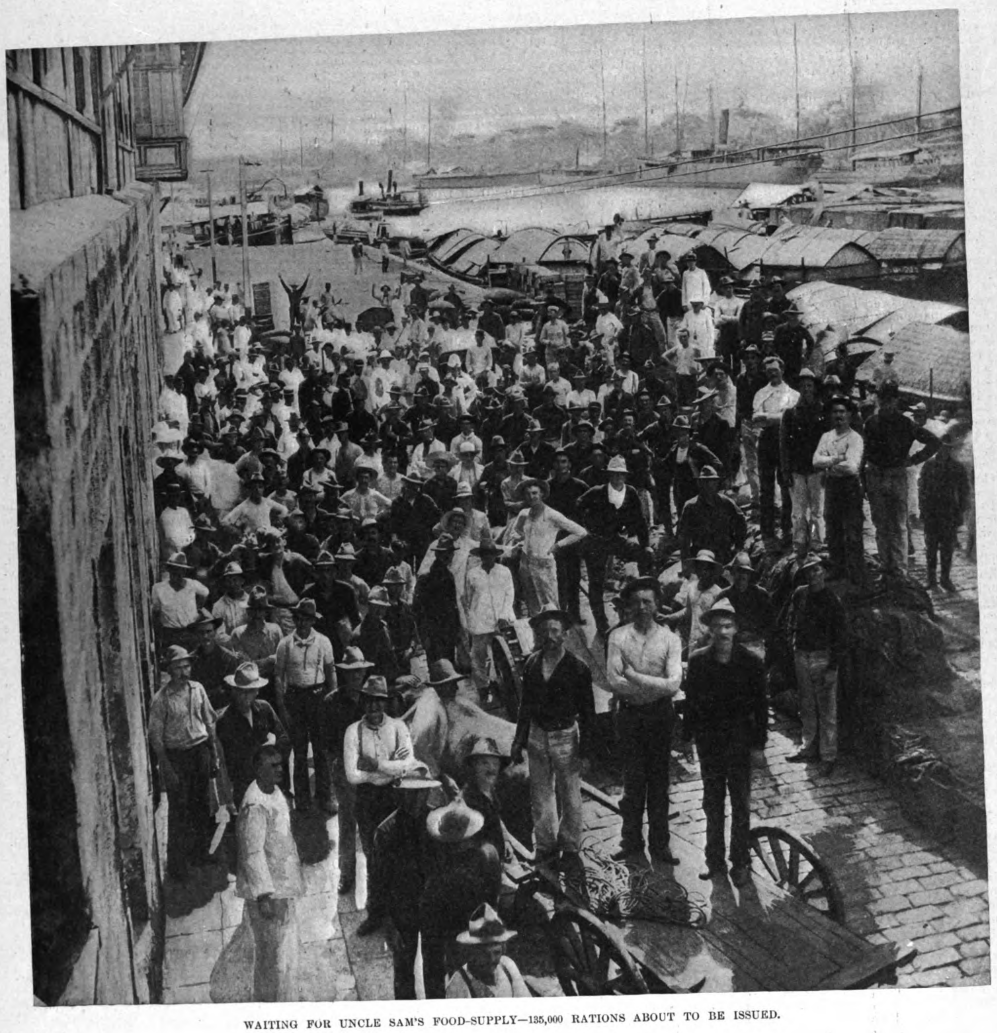
He hesitated. "Me and other persons."

She showed somehow that she wouldn't flinch. "You weren't asked till after he had made sure I'd come. We've become, you and I," she smiled, "one of the couples who are invited together."



These were couples, his speculative eye seemed to show, he didn't even yet know about, and if he mentally took them up a moment it was only, promptly, to drop them. "I don't think you put it quite strong enough, you know."

"That Mitchy is hard hit? He puts it so strong himself that it will surely do for both of us. I'm a part of what I just spoke of—his indifference and magnificence. It's

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PANORAMIC VIEW OF MA

WAITING FOR UNCLE SAM'S FOOD-SUPPLY—135,000 RATIONS ABOUT TO BE ISSUED.

INSURGENTS DRAWN U

GENERAL MacARTHUR AN CONSULTING WI

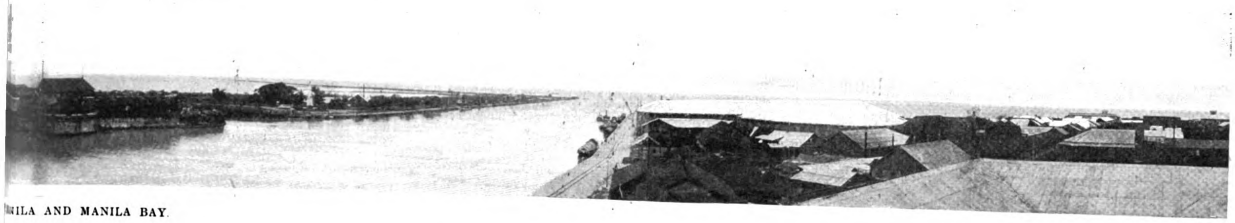
IN THE AMERICAN T

FIRST ADVANCE OF COMPANY I OF THE COLORADO REGIMENT THROUGH THE GRASS.

COLORADO BOYS KNEELING ON THE BEACH TO FIRE.



GUN WHICH DESTROY

WITH OUR TROOPS IN THE PHILIPPI

FROM PHOTOGRAPHS RECEIVED FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRE

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

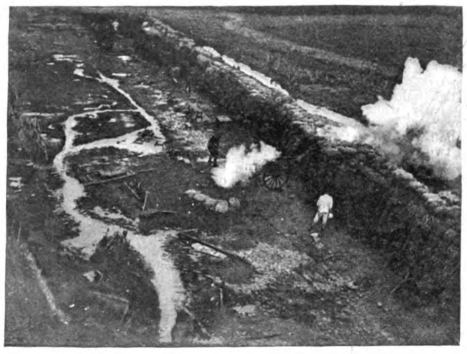
ILA AND MANILA BAY.

N COMPANY FORMATION.

ENERAL HALE IN CARRIAGES NSURGENT CHIEFS.

AGUINALDO AND SOME OF HIS CHIEF SUPPORTERS.

S—AWAITING THE WORD TO FIRE.



A REST BEHIND THE SPANISH TRENCHES.

WATER-BUFFALO DRAGGING THE GUNS OF THE UTAH BATTERY INTO POSITION.

H BLOCK-HOUSE NUMBER 14.

THE UTAH BATTERY AT WORK.

COLORADO TROOPS REPELLING SPANISH ATTACK FROM DESERTED SPANISH TRENCHES.

FORE AND AFTER THE FALL OF MANILA.

Messrs. John F. Bass and O. K. Davis.—[See Page 1110.]

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

as if he could only afford to do what's not vulgar. He might perfectly marry a Duke's daughter, but that would be vulgar—would be the absolute necessity and ideal of nine out of ten of the sons of shoemakers made ambitious by riches. Mitchy says 'No; I take my own line; I go in for a beggar-maid.' And it's only because I'm a beggar-maid that he wants me."

"But there are plenty of others," Mr. Longdon objected.

"Oh, I admit I'm the one he least dislikes. But if I had any money," Nanda went on, "or if I were really good-looking—for that to-day, the real thing, will do as well as being a Duke's daughter—he wouldn't come near me. And I think that ought to settle it. Besides, he must marry Aggie. She's a beggar-maid too—as well as an angel; so there's nothing against it."

Mr. Longdon stared, but even in his surprise seemed to take from the swiftness with which she made him move over the ground a certain agreeable glow. "Does 'Aggie' like him?"

"She likes every one. As I say, she's an angel—but a real, real, real one. The kindest man in the world is therefore the proper husband for her. If Mitchy wants to do something thoroughly nice," she declared with the same high competence, "he'll take her out of her situation, which is awful."

Mr. Longdon looked graver. "In what way awful?"

"Why, don't you know?" His eye was now cold enough to give her, in her chill, a flurried sense that she might displease him least by a graceful lightness. "The Duchess and Lord Petherton are like you and me."

"Is it a conundrum?" He was serious indeed.

"They're one of the couples who are invited together." But his face reflected so little success for her levity that it was in another tone she presently added: "Mitchy really oughtn't." Her friend, in silence, fixed his eyes on the ground; an attitude in which there was something to make her strike rather wild. "But, of course, kind as he is, he can scarcely be called particular. He has his ideas—he thinks nothing matters. He says it's the end of everything."

Mr. Longdon remained mute awhile, and when he at last raised his eyes it was without meeting Nanda's and with some dryness of manner. "The end of everything? One might easily receive that impression."

He again became mute, and there was a pause between them of some length, accepted by Nanda with an anxious stillness that it might have touched a spectator to observe. She sat there as if waiting for some further sign, only wanting not to displease her friend, yet unable to pretend, to play any part, and with something in her really that she couldn't take back now, something involved in her original assumption that there was to be a kind of intelligence in their relation. "I dare say," she said at last, "that I make allusions you don't like. But I keep forgetting."

He waited a moment longer, then turned to her with a look rendered a little strange by the way it happened to reach over his glasses. It was even austerer than before. "Keep forgetting what?"

She gave after an instant a faint, feeble smile which seemed to speak of helplessness, and which, when at rare moments it played in her face, was expressive from her positive lack of personal, superficial diffidence. "Well—I don't know." It was as if appearances became at times so complicated that—so far as helping others to understand was concerned—one could only give up.

"I hope you don't think I want you to be with me as you wouldn't be—as it were—with yourself. I hope you don't think I want you to be frank. If you were to try to appear to me anything—" He ended in simple sadness; that, for instance, would be so little what he should like.

"Anything different, you mean, from what I am? That's just what I've thought from the first. One's just what one is—isn't one? I don't mean so much," she went on, "in one's character or temper—for they have, haven't they? to be what's called 'properly controlled'—as in one's mind and what one sees and feels and the sort of thing one notices." Nanda paused an instant; then "There you are!" she simply but rather desperately brought out.

Mr. Longdon considered this with visible intensity. "What you suggest is that the things you speak of depend upon other people?"

"Well, every one isn't so beautiful as you" Nanda had met him with promptitude, yet no sooner had she spoken than she appeared again to encounter a difficulty. "But there it is—my just saying even that. Oh, how I always know—as I've told you before—whenever I'm different! I can't ask you to tell me the things Granny would have said, because that's simply arranging to keep myself back from you, and so being nasty and underhand, which you naturally don't want, nor I either. Nevertheless when I say the things she wouldn't, then I put before you too much—too much for your liking it—what I know and see and feel. If we're both partly the result of other people, her other people were so different." The girl's sensitive boldness kept it up, but there was something in her that pleaded for patience. "And yet if she had you, so I've got you too. It's the flattery of that, or the sound of it, I know, that must be so unlike her. Of course it's awfully like mother; yet it isn't as if you hadn't already let me see—is it?—that you don't really think me the same." Again she stopped a minute, as if to find her way with him: and again, for the time, he gave no sign. She struck out again, with her strange, cool limpidity: "Granny wasn't the kind of girl she couldn't be—and so neither am I."

Mr. Longdon had fallen while she talked into something that might have been taken for a conscious temporary submission to her; he had uncrossed his fidgety legs, and thrusting them out with the feet together, sat looking very hard before him, his chin sunk on his breast and his hands, clasped as they met, rapidly twirling their thumbs. So he remained for a time that might have given his young friend the sense of having made herself right with him so far as she had been wrong. He still had all her attention, just as previously she had had his, but while he now simply gazed and thought, she watched him with a discreet solicitude that would almost have represented him as a near relative whom she supposed unwell. At the end he looked round, and then, obeying some impulse that had gathered in her while they sat mute, she put out to him the tender hand she might have offered to a sick child. They had been talking about frankness, but she showed a frankness in this instance that made him perceptibly color. For that, in turn, however, he responded only the more completely, taking her hand and holding it, keeping it a long minute during which their eyes met and something seemed to clear up that had been too obscure to be dispelled by words. Finally he brought out as if, though it was what he had been thinking of, her gesture had most determined him: "I wish immensely you'd get married!"

His tone betrayed so special a meaning that the words had a sound of suddenness; yet there was always in Nanda's face that cold preparedness of the young person who has unlearned surprise through the habit, in company, of studiously not compromising her innocence by blinking at things said. "How can I?" she asked, but appearing rather to take up the proposal than to put it by.

"Can't you, can't you?" He spoke pressingly and kept her hand. She shook her head slowly, markedly; on which he continued: "You don't do justice to Mr. Mitchy." She said nothing, but her look was there, and it made him resume: "Impossible?"

"Impossible." At this, letting her go, Mr. Longdon got up; he pulled out his watch. "We must go back." She had risen with him, and they stood face to face in the faded light while he slipped the watch away. "Well, that doesn't make me wish it any less."

"It's lovely of you to wish it, but I shall be one of the people who don't. I shall be at the end," said Nanda, "one of those who haven't."

"No, my child," he returned gravely—"you shall never be anything so sad."

"Why not—if you've been?"

He looked at her a little, quietly; then, putting out his hand, passed her own into his arm. "Exactly because I have."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE FILIPINO REPUBLIC.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

PALACE OF MALACAÑAN, MANILA, September 16, 1898.

It is only four months and a half since Aguinaldo and a few chosen followers were brought by Admiral Dewey from Hong-kong and landed at Cavité. The insurrection, which had been suspended by the treaty at Biacnabató on December 14, 1897, when Aguinaldo agreed with the Spanish to cease hostilities on the payment of $600,000 and on the promise of certain reforms, was now encouraged into new life by the presence of the young leader, by the news that only one-third of the stipulated amount had been paid, and by the knowledge that none of the promised reforms had been executed. About 2500 rifles, a large amount of small-arms ammunition, several large ships' guns, one converted Krupp gun, and various smaller modern pieces, with a considerable amount of powder and projectiles, were handed over to Aguinaldo at Cavité, and he was able, without delay, to form the nucleus of an effective force, which increased, as the days passed, by constant accretion, until in a month he commanded nearly ten thousand men. Encouraged by the friendly attitude of Admiral Dewey, irritated by the faithless promises of the Spaniards, and harboring the implacable hatred of their oppression and the thirst for revenge characteristic of their race, the natives began the campaign with great vigor, and continued it with such persistence that in a few short weeks they had completely invested Manila, and had so harassed the enemy by their barbaric methods of fighting and their restless activity that the effectiveness of the Spanish troops was largely diminished and their spirit much broken. Admiral Dewey undoubtedly acted according to his best judgment in fanning into consuming flame the embers of the insurrection, which had been smouldering for months; but it is easier to start a fire than it is to control it, and subsequent events have proved that the insurgent factor in the problem of the Philippines has become, through this act, a most annoying and difficult one to deal with. Given its head, the insurrectionist party has taken the bit in its teeth, and now rushes on regardless of curb or rein, full of conscious pride in its own youthful strength, with little or no gratitude for the material aid which made its existence a possibility, believing, in its ignorance, that the civilized world is ready to acknowledge the revolutionary government, which has just been established, as a power to which may be intrusted the future of Micronesia. This conceit, which, like the spirit of revenge, is one of the dominant characteristics of every human being who has a taint of Malay blood in his veins, is somewhat modified in its influence by the counsels of a few experienced and educated Filipinos who have travelled abroad, who are somewhat familiar with the history of other revolutions, and who recognize the fact that the peace and prosperity of the archipelago can only be maintained through the assistance of some strong governing power from outside. The reasons are simple. The population is not homogeneous; language, customs, type, differ in the various provinces, and the local jealousies and antagonisms, cherished for centuries, can only be smothered by the controlling influence of foreigners who ignore all these differences, and whose judgment is not swayed by the petty or unworthy motives which undoubtedly direct the action of most of the leaders among the natives. Thus the insurrectionist party, while combining vigorously and, in a sense, loyally to eradicate every trace of Spanish domination in the islands, is not fully harmonious, but is divided into two camps, one professing full and complete faith in the ability of the natives to govern themselves, and declaring their resolve to submit to no foreign interference, and the other eager to welcome a foreign protectorate which will secure to the islands a good government, leaving to the future to decide whether the natives are capable of sufficient development to govern themselves without outside control.

It is little short of marvellous how rapidly the insurrection has gained ground in this short time, and how extensive and successful the operations of the army have been. Although they never could have taken Manila, even with the Spanish fleet destroyed and the port blockaded, except through the slow process of rigorous investment and by cutting off all supplies, still the insurgents managed in a very few weeks to besiege and capture numerous small Spanish positions in the provinces, and they completely overran the whole island of Luzon, together with seven adjacent islands, and at the present date hold possession of every foot of this territory except one Spanish post at Albay in the province of the same name. By gift, by purchase, by the desertion of the native volunteers, and by the capture of Spanish troops, they have acquired about 35,000 rifles of the Mauser and the Remington pattern, with plenty of ammunition for present use. With the money they have taken from the convents, and by the income which they derive from taxation of the natives, they have been able to feed their soldiers, to make notable additions to their armament in the shape of rifles and modern machine-guns, and are now working diligently to organize their army, to drill the troops, and to make a showing as a regularly constituted revolutionary government. So far as can be learned, they have not yet paid the men the six pesos ($3 in gold or $6 in Mexican money) promised them for their monthly wages. But the natives, as long as they are fairly well housed and fed, seem to be contented enough, and, judging from what they say, they live in the expectation of full remuneration for their services when the government is finally established. The support of the army thus far has been a comparatively easy matter; what it will be when the organization is complete and strict discipline prevails—if it ever reaches that point—is another question. The natives composing the forces around Manila were made up from volunteers from the town and its immediate vicinity. Almost every male above the age of sixteen years bore a rifle, and took his duty at the front in regular turn. Very often a man would be seen peddling fruit in our camp at Tambo in the morning, and in the afternoon would be observed on his way to the lines, rifle in hand, and perhaps accompanied by his wife and children, who strolled along, chatting as gayly as if they were on the way to a picnic. A continuous string of armed boys and men was always on the move, morning and evening, between the villages and the front, and they carried on the campaign in the most light-hearted and agreeable manner possible. They never showed themselves to the enemy, and many of them probably never saw a Spanish soldier during the siege. The country is a maze of bamboo hedges, rice-fields, and sugar-cane plantations, and the natives occupied every bunch of bamboos and every thicket, popping away into the landscape in the direction of the Spanish fire, usually keeping up an irregular and very annoying fusillade all night long. Where the lines came very close together, as they did at block-house No. 14, the strongest Spanish position, a few hundred yards east of Fort San Antonio Abad, on the sea-shore at Malate, and at block-house No. 1, north of Manila, the insurgent rifle-pits and barricades were completely masked by the dense growth in front, and the large guns they used at both these places were so badly served that they never succeeded in hitting the block-houses once, although they fired more than 200 shells at a range of not over 200 yards. Part of this bad practice was doubtless due to the masked position of these guns.

The food of the common natives is always of the simplest order; a little boiled rice, which they eat off a plantain leaf, and for a luxury a bit of fish or fowl, and perhaps some boiled egg-plant or hulled Indian corn, is all they expect or get. At the front they were accustomed to play with their rifles in the morning until about eleven o'clock, and then, as if by common consent, firing would cease on both sides, and the men would stroll a few hundred yards to the rear, where the women prepared the rice in large kettles, and every man had his share. The swamps are full of frogs and mud-fish, and the groves bear plenty of fruit, so hunger was cheaply and effectively satisfied. They carried no water-bottles, and, indeed, did not seem to suffer from thirst, as they were seldom seen to drink, except at the huts, where rain-water was kept in large earthen jars. No regular troops could move with the ease or the speed these native soldiers did whenever necessary to change their positions. They had no supply-trains, carried no tents, blankets, ponchos, or haversacks. A few carromatos, or native two-wheeled covered spring-carts, seemed to carry all the spare ammunition for each detachment, and this was all they seemed to care about. A campaign against troops like these is no easy task, as the Spanish found out, to their cost, and as any other foreign troops would soon discover if they attempted it.

Their facility of movement and their indifference to hardships which would be unendurable to other troops have made the conquest of Luzon a speedy and easy matter to the insurgents. It was in this conquest that the independent spirit of the different leaders has been shown, and it was only after the successes gained by other generals that Aguinaldo began to appreciate the fact that, while the commander-in-chief in name, he was, in the opinion of many of his generals, only a partner in the enterprise. For example, General Macabulus, a young man of about thirty years, has raised an army and has taken possession of three of the richest provinces in the northwest. Aguinaldo proposed, not long ago, to send Macabulus to another part of the island. Suspecting that he was to be freed from his command on account of his popularity in the north, he refused to go, saying his provinces would have to be conquered by Aguinaldo before he would leave them. A few days later he forwarded to Aguinaldo, as a guarantee of good faith in the cause of the insurrection, the sum of $35,000 in cash. This was since the young commander-in-chief moved his headquarters from Bacoor, in the province of Cavité, to Malolos, in the province of Bulacan, about twenty-five miles north of Manila, where the revolutionary government was formally organized yesterday. The action of Macabulus is not unique. Several other prominent leaders openly refuse to recognize the absolute authority of Aguinaldo, each of them refusing to submit to his dictatorship any further than is compatible with his own personal interests. Aguinaldo's power seems to be chiefly among the lowest class of natives, who have a superstitious veneration for him that is quite inexplicable. They believe that he bears a charmed life, and that no bullet or knife of the enemy can injure him. Not only do they wear on their chest in battle representations of religious symbols rudely drawn on cotton cloth, and carry in their mouths bits of parchment or paper with similar designs drawn in pencil in a magic circle (they call these charms ang-ting ang-ting), but they even carry Aguinaldo's name ang-ting ang-ting), but they even carry Aguinaldo's name as a fetich. There are many stories told among them of bullets glancing from his unprotected body and of his superhuman powers. This superstition concerning the young leader prevails, I am inclined to believe, only

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

among the Tagals, for when I was on an excursion recently, a hundred and twenty-five miles north of Manila, I found no one who would hear Aguinaldo's name without an expression of disgust, and everybody seemed to regard him as a fraud. The natives were Ilocans, and devoted to Macabulus.

For some time it had been common report that insurgents were going to have a formal assembly of the delegates to the revolutionary government at Malolos, and, so far as could be learned from those of the leaders who came to Manila, the date for the ceremony of opening the congress was fixed two or three times. At last I received definite information that it was to take place at Malolos on the 15th. Accordingly I accepted the invitation of Mr. H. L. Higgins, the manager of the Manila-Dagupan Railway, to accompany him with one of Aguinaldo's secretaries, and we left on a special train at seven o'clock in the morning, reaching Malolos in about an hour and a half. The town, which is chiefly noted for its large convent and churches, and also as the centre of the manufacture of nipa thatch, which is sent from this place by water all over the island, is a long straggling assemblage of huts and houses a mile or so from the railway, and, together with the adjoining large village of Barasoain, numbers perhaps thirty or forty thousand people. The long narrow road was very gay with natives, as we drove at a rattling pace in a country carromato, along with a score of others, almost as heavily loaded down with human freight as the corricoli in Naples. From the first humble nipa hut to the great square where the convent stands thousands of insurgent flags fluttered from every window and every post. Many of them were of home manufacture, with printed blue and red calico stripes; many of them were lacking the Malay sun and the three stars in the white triangle, but the general symbol of red, white, and blue was there all the same, and the proud occupants of the lowliest huts did their best with palm leaves and flowers to give a support of festive appearance to their cherished banner. On either side of the road, in true Filipino taste, was a line of bamboo posts with fringes whittled out at each joint, and swags of bamboo and rattan connecting the uprights so as to form a continuous border of rude but effective decoration. In front of these bamboo structures, which gave room for people to pass between them and the wattled fences, was a line of infantrymen, all armed and well dressed, mostly in captured Spanish uniforms. Every man had an insurgent tricolor cockade on his Spanish hat, and all but a very few of them were barefooted. The bridge over the river between Barasoain and Malolos was packed with people, and the hundreds of bancas laden with nipa thatch, which completely hid the water of the small stream, were swarming with white-clad natives, all eagerly watching the road. We passed on rapidly between the lines of soldiers and under a great bamboo triumphal arch into the convent yard, where a fine military band was playing under the shade of immense mango-trees. Just as we were alighting there appeared a party of twenty or more Spanish priests under a strong guard of insurgents, who paraded them off in triumph through the crowd. The priests were all dressed in black and carried black umbrellas, with which some of them managed to conceal their faces, for they apparently did not relish the performance. Those we could see were unshaven and unkempt, and not very charitable-looking individuals, but they were all fat and well fed enough, and gave the lie to the report that the insurgents are maltreating the Spanish priests they have captured. One of the officers at Malolos told me there were sixty priests at work on the roads not far away, but they were just as well off as any other prisoners.

We were soon informed that Aguinaldo would receive us, so we followed the secretary up the broad stairs of the convent, through a long wide corridor, always between lines of infantrymen, meeting on our way a score of generals and high officials, some of them in khaki uniforms, some of them in Spanish blue linen, and certain dignitaries in full evening dress. Ushered into a large salon, hideous with the usual Hispano-Filipino-painted decoration and glittering with mirrors, we were offered chairs, of which there was a large choice, from elaborately carved and gilded hideosities to the simple Viennese bent-wood cane-bottomed variety, and we sat for some time, while there was a continual coming and going, with great formality, through a door on the right. Our turn arriving, we were ushered into a small square antechamber where three bent-wood chairs were arranged in a formal row in front of two others. We were asked to make ourselves comfortable in the three chairs. A box of fresh Manila cigars of large size, ostentatiously wrapped in tin-foil, and with a specially large and highly ornamental band, was handed us to select from, and while we were lighting up, a small individual, in full evening black suit and flowing black tie, presented himself before us. Never having seen the gentleman before in civilian's dress, I did not for a moment recognize him, but was struck at once by the Chinese cast of his head and features. An instant later I saw, of course, it was Aguinaldo, and we all three sat down, after a hand-shake, and began our chat. Nothing worth recording was said; for the young man, who is not a very good Spanish scholar, and does not even when he wishes to talk, express himself in very choice Castilian, had evidently made up his mind not to commit himself to any statement which could be quoted later. After a half-hour's conversation he affably gave us permission to attend the congress, and we took our leave, much as if we were retiring from the presence of royalty. This because the others we saw went through a still more formal withdrawal, and we did not wish to offend the susceptibilities of the natives. At the interview Aguinaldo's manner was quite irreproachable, but his personality decidedly unimpressive. His mental characteristics, so far as they could be observed, are in no degree unusual. He has the keen cunning of the half-bred native, much of the astuteness of the Chinaman, and the personal vanity and light mental calibre of the Filipino. Altogether this interview, which was under rather exceptional conditions, it must be recorded, left me with the impression that the now famous leader, so far as concerns the real direction of affairs in the revolutionary government, is little more than a tool in the hands of active and more or less reliable advisers. Many of those about him that day had evidently more mental capacity, were certainly better educated than he is, and easily his superior in the external qualities, at least, which distinguish leaders amongst men. Nothing that he did on the occasion of the opening of the congress, and nothing he has since done, has caused me to modify this opinion; but it has rather become more firmly fixed, and the impression has become, indeed, more convincing.

At the large basilica of Barasoain we found a large number of the delegates already assembled, and the guards drawn up to receive the expected cortége of the President and his suite. The bald interior of the church was sparsely relieved by crossed palm leaves and wreaths fastened to the columns which divide the nave from the aisles, and on the great bare spaces between the windows. In the middle of the nave were two rows of bent-wood chairs; on either side and behind these, in the aisles, were seats and benches for spectators. To the left of the chancel a long table, draped with blue and red, was arranged for the secretaries, and opposite it were special seats for invited guests, and in the front one next to the chancel rail we were assigned our places. The chancel was hung with a great white drapery, rudely painted to represent ermine, and a broad border of red cloth with palm leaves and wreaths framed in this curtain. Crossed insurgent flags ornamented the pilasters on each side, and in the middle of the chancel, under the imitation ermine, was a long table draped with light blue and crimson, and behind this three large carved chairs. While we were waiting for the functionaries to arrive, we had an excellent opportunity of studying those who had come from all over the island to assist in the foundation of a republic—for this was their professed purpose. Every man was dressed in full black costume of more or less fashionable cut, according to his means or his tastes. Many of them wore full evening dress, some of them had silk hats of quaint shape and well-worn nap, others bowlers of the season of 1890, but all, to a man, were in black. It was a sweltering hot day, too, and they suffered for their adherence to the etiquette of the new Filipino government. But statesmen all do have to suffer in hot weather, if one may take as true the definition of the difference between a statesman and a politician which is that a statesman always wears a buttoned-up black frock-coat, and a politician a sack-coat or a cut-away, or any coat he likes. That difference came to my mind at once when I saw these statesmen fanning themselves vigorously with their hats, and just behind them the natives, politicians all of them, in cool, almost diaphanous, garments, with their shirts worn as the Russians and Chinese wear theirs. Such types as there were among these statesmen! Such queer-shaped heads, such a mixture of distinct racial characteristics in the features of many, such unmistakable lines of pure Indian breed in the profiles of others! All were dark-skinned and with strong-growing black hair; scarcely a sign of the frost of age showed on the head of any delegate. Few among them would have escaped notice in a crowd, for they were exceptionally alert, keen, and intelligent in appearance, and, as a mass, much superior to the native as one sees him in ordinary life. I will not be sure, however, that the dress was not a little responsible for the impression they made on me. Possibly they would not have looked so distinguished if they had worn their shirts à la Russe.

At last, to the sound of the national march, the delegates moved in a body to the door and then back again, divided, and then Aguinaldo, looking very undersized and very insignificant, came marching down, bearing an ivory stick with gold head and gold cord and tassels. A group of tall, fine-looking generals and one or two dignitaries in black accompanied him, and half surrounded him as they walked along. Mounting the chancel steps, Aguinaldo took the middle seat behind the table, the Acting Secretary of the Interior took the place on his right, and a general occupied the carved chair on his left. Without any formal calling to order, the secretary rose and read the list of delegates, and sat down again. Then Aguinaldo stood up, and after the feeble vivas had ceased, took a paper from his pocket, and in a low voice, without gesture and without emphasis, and in the hesitating manner of a schoolboy, read his message in the Tagalog language. Only once was he interrupted by vivas, and that was when he alluded to the three great free nations — England, France, and America — as worthy models for imitation. He next read a purported translation in Spanish with even more difficulty, and when he had finished there was quite a round of cheers, proposed and led by the veteran general Buencamino, for the President, the republic, the victorious army, and for the town of Malolos. Then Aguinaldo arose and declared the meeting adjourned until it should reassemble prepared to elect officers and to organize in the regular manner. The long-talked-of and ever-memorable function was over.

Aguinaldo's message has never, to my knowledge, been printed in Tagalog, but any one slightly familiar with that language could readily understand that his sentiments were more fully declared than those which were handed around as his message printed in the Spanish language, or at least differently expressed. General Merritt issued his proclamation in three languages. Many of the delegates at the congress were only moderately familiar with Spanish, and it is a common thing for the Filipino newspapers to print in both Tagalog and Spanish, but their reports of the congress contained the Spanish version only. I supposed at the time that I was the only foreign correspondent present, but later I discovered another, whom I did not distinguish at first as a foreigner. He was the correspondent of the Japanese papers, the Chingainhógio-shimpó, the Jijitshimpó, and the Toiwannichinichishinbun.

Since its opening, the congress has done little of importance to the outside world. The well-known and universally esteemed lawyer Cayetano Arellano has been at last brought into the councils and has been chosen Minister of Foreign Affairs. His influence has brought about a much better feeling towards the Americans, with whom a few days ago there was every prospect of an encounter. He is the leader of the party in favor of a protectorate, and under his salutary advice and wise arguments many of the leaders are modifying their views about full independence. Aguinaldo himself, although he is known to be one of the most earnest champions of the anti-protectorates, has come out with several verbose manifestoes, protesting that he loves and respects the Americans and considers them the friends of the Filipinos. But not one word has he or any of them yet said in public acknowledging the assistance given their cause by the action of Admiral Dewey or by the landing of the American army. They seem to be unable to recover from the disappointment of being balked in their plan of occupying Manila. Two weeks ago Aguinaldo was continuing to claim from the American authorities his share in the booty captured in Manila, and until General Otis wrote a decisive answer to all his claims on the 8th instant, and demanded that he should withdraw his troops from the suburbs before the 15th, he did not cease to reiterate his assumptions that he was the joint occupant of the town with the American commander.

The story of the evacuation of the suburbs by the insurgent troops on the 14th is already an old one, and there was nothing in the event worth noting in detail. Aguinaldo has denied that he ever received a demand to evacuate, but insists that General Otis withdrew his demand and substituted a request. This I know to be false, for the letter which is referred to contained only an acknowledgment of the visit of commissioners, and a request to Aguinaldo to attend carefully to their report of General Otis's views, which remained unchanged after sending the ultimatum. The mistake of allowing the insurgents to occupy the suburbs on the 13th of August, and to hold the water-works, which they still control, has caused much trouble and inconvenience and some loss of life. Besides, it put the American army in the humiliating position of being besieged in Manila by the very forces whom they had used as allies—a humiliation which the troops will not soon forget. F. D. MILLET.

AGUINALDO ARRIVES.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

THERE was a great mystery about the coming of Aguinaldo to Malolos. No one knew how or when he would arrive. It might be on horseback, in a carriage, or by train, and at any hour. The personal safety of the President required that he should take some care in the matter of travelling. So the people waited, standing aimlessly about and saying nothing.

The convent swarmed with young fellows connected with the civil government or with the army. They strutted about in all sorts of uniform and in no uniform, looked pleased with themselves, and were happy. The average Tagalog is a ready chap in certain ways. He puts on his hat, for instance, and is prepared for a six months' campaign. He comes to town in civilian dress, plain white clothes, and finds the occasion one of military show. He tucks his trousers into his boot-tops, pins a strip of gilt and black across his coat sleeve, sticks a couple of stars on his shoulders, and he is an officer in full uniform. It's as simple as getting into jail under Spanish rule.

The young men of the staff and the civil government sat down to tiffin in the big dining-room, fifty of them at one table, and Spaniards whom they had taken prisoners served them, still wearing their Spanish uniforms. Just as the meal was finished some one announced that Aguinaldo was coming. They spoke of him as "Ma Aguinaldo." A telegram had come from the next station toward Manila saying that the President's special train had just left. The young men, some of whom were jingling with swords and spurs, jumped up and ran to the windows overlooking the court-yard. The convent bells began to ring vehemently. People poured out of all the streets and swarmed into the yard at the signal. Bugles sounded up side streets, and presently soldiers appeared at the four corners of the yard.

Then there was a flourish of trumpets down the street; the sound of horses' hoofs reached the convent over the buzz of the crowd. There was a shout down by the big gate, and then around the corner and over the bridge dashed a dozen horsemen, officers of the Filipino army, with swords drawn. A company of soldiers was quickly thrown along the broad path from the gate to the convent. They lined both sides, and just as the horsemen reached the gate came to a present. Behind the little group of officers came half a squadron of hard-riding Filipino cavalry. The horses were covered with mud and foam, but the men were erect, sturdy, and bright-eyed. Their carbines were slung on their backs, with bayonets fixed, and from every bayonet there flew a little Filipino flag.

Then came Aguinaldo, in a closed carriage, with three of his generals. Two white horses, with long manes and tails, hauled the carriage, and they came at a full run. The carriage was surrounded by mounted officers with drawn swords, and the whole cavalcade charged through the convent yard at top speed, and halted in front of the main entrance to the building with a jerk. The stolid guards who lined the broad pathway never stirred as their commander-in-chief flashed by.

Behind Aguinaldo came the bands, playing stirring marches, and the soldiers, four full companies of them. They marched into the yard, and the people crowded about them. Under the heavy shade of four or five giant caballero-trees Aguinaldo's subjects waited to hear what he might say to them. They were a picturesque crowd. Brilliant reds and yellows and greens and blues marked the dresses of the women. The men were mostly in white, but here and there among them a black-coat stood out sharply in contrast. Their bright eager faces, brown as old copper, with sparkling black eyes, were all upturned toward the convent windows. More than four thousand of them were jammed together in the throng that stood under the great caballeros.

Aguinaldo jumped quickly out of his carriage as it stopped at the convent door—slight of stature, lithe and agile, a very military figure in his new khaki uniform and white helmet. He skipped nimbly up stairs, and presently, with some of his councillors, appeared at the window. The crowd that had cheered a little when he came in gave another shout at this sight of him, and then one of the councillors spoke. The speech was in Tagalog, and it was full of nice things about the people, their loyalty to and suffering for the cause, the achievements they had won, the glory that would be theirs, the greatness of their leader and his devotion to their common cause. It wound up with a call for vivas for Aguinaldo and liberty, and then I heard how Filipinos can yell. They would make a notable impression on a football field. The crowd which had listened with absolute silence turned itself loose at the word, and filled the air with its shouts. There was a response from one of the local dignitaries standing in the crowd. Then Aguinaldo disappeared from the window, the bands played the Filipino national air, and the great home-coming of the King was over.

OSCAR KING DAVIS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

RAIL-SHOOTING.— Drawn by A. B. Frost.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

IN THE SECOND HALF—U. OF PENN. NEARING CHICAGO'S GOAL.

CHICAGO BLOCKS U. OF PENN. WHILE HERSCHBERGER KICKS.

AMATEUR SPORT

This Department went to press this week on Friday, November 4, 1898.

THE INCONCLUSIVE RESULTS in the team finals of the inter-collegiate golf meeting call attention again to the need of new legislation on the question of scoring. Team matches are a modern innovation, and the present system of scoring, according to the aggregate of holes won, came into use simply because it was the logical outcome of the craze for medal play. When the Englishmen took up golf ten years or more ago they proceeded to develop it along the lines of medal play, to the unbounded indignation of the old crusted Scottish school of golfers. The record of the course, rather than the winning of matches (by hole play), became the ultimate object of the players' endeavor, and everything had to be adjusted to this virtually numerical standard. Naturally, then, when team matches came into vogue the struggle resolved itself into scoring the largest possible number of points (aggregate holes), and the results of individual matches became a matter of comparative indifference.

IT COULD, AND OFTEN DID, HAPPEN that a team might count a majority of matches won, and yet tie or lose on the total number of holes scored. In the finals between Harvard and Yale at Ardsley, Yale won four of the six matches, but her total of eleven holes was equalled by Harvard, through the accident of Hubbard's outclassing his Yale opponent. Even then the holing of a two-foot putt by Robertson on the home green would have given the victory to Yale.

IF TEAM MATCHES ARE TO BE PLAYED under the rules for hole play, it is surely inconsistent that the scoring should be essentially that of medal play. It would be far more logical to adopt the out-and-out system (used in combination team matches) of adding together the medal scores of the several players, and awarding the victory to the team returning the lowest aggregate total. Good red herring is better eating than something which is neither fish nor fowl.

It is evident that the present system is unsatisfactory, and last March the executive committee of the U.S.G.A. appointed a special committee to consider the question, and to report upon the advisability of making a change. The special committee being one of those timorous committees we have known on other occasions advised against new legislation, and there the matter rests. The Morris County and Tuxedo clubs, in their home and home team matches, tried the experiment of counting a single point for each individual match, but the result was not wholly satisfactory. Under this system a tie may occur as often as not, and it is obvious that the chances of this contingency should be reduced to a minimum.

ONE SUGGESTION MADE provides that the individual matches should have varying values according to the margins by which they are won. Under this system a match won by one or two holes would be scored as a "single," counting one team point; a match by three or four holes up would be a "double," counting two team points; and a match won by five or more holes would be a "treble," and be valued at three team points. The system is analogous to the scoring at short whist, and has the merits of simplicity and conclusiveness.

A better suggestion, perhaps, is to allow one point for the match and a half-point for the bye-holes (if any). Under this system a decision would almost invariably be obtained, the better team would win, and the interest of the several matches would be sustained to the end. A player might win his match and lose the bye-holes, or vice versa, and the fractional points would minimize the chances of a tie. Under the present clumsy and ridiculous system the Yale team was deprived of a fairly earned victory.

THE YALE CAPTAIN WAS RIGHT unquestionably in his contention that the tie should be decided by each pair playing single holes until one side or the other could show a clear lead. It is true that the rules make no definite provision for this particular contingency, but by analogy the rule for the decision of ties in single matches may be held to cover the case. Under ordinary circumstances it would be impossible to play the entire match over again, and if a decision were wanted, it would have to be obtained (as in baseball) by playing extra innings—i. e., single holes. Under the circumstances it was practicable to play another full round, and Yale yielded gracefully. As it turned out, Harvard would have won either way.

YALE LOST ON THE PLAY-OFF through the reversal of form shown by Barnes. He is a young player, and the day's work was too heavy for him. Hubbard saved the match for Harvard in the morning round, and scored handsomely in the play-off. He is undoubtedly a coming player, and should show up well at the amateur championship meeting next year. In the all-round play a marked advance over the golf shown at the first meeting a year ago was apparent. Princeton's team was a much weaker one than represented the orange and black last May. Vanderpool, Bayard, and Blair having been graduated, but there is good material in her team.

As between Reid, the new inter-collegiate individual champion, and his collegemate W. B. Smith, there is little to choose. Both men play brilliantly at times, and each is lacking in steadiness. Smith did the better work at Morristown, being the runner-up to Douglas, and he also won the championship of Yale over Reid a few weeks ago. But at Ardsley Reid came away with a game that was close to par figures, and Smith seemed to have gone a bit stale. The ex-champion, J. F. Curtis, of Harvard, did not succeed even in qualifying for the match rounds, and his general work of the season has not fulfilled the promise of earlier form.

As a matter of record, it may be noted that this was the third inter-collegiate championship meeting. The second was held last May, Yale winning team match, Harvard second, and J. F. Curtis taking individual honors, with Reid runner-up, and it was then resolved to change to an autumn date, and so avoid clashing with the various spring athletic interests.

KROMER,
West Point's Captain and Quarter-back.

C. B. HERSCHBERGER,
University of Chicago's Full-back.

"A SECTION OF AMERICAN GOLFERS [says London Golf] are putting it about that Mr. Findlay Douglas is hardly a bona fide amateur, and even go so far as to assert that he was 'put up' to play by an enterprising firm which sells golfing commodities! There does not seem to be a shadow of foundation for these and other complimentary statements, and we forbear to comment on this graceful method of accepting defeat."

The charges against Mr. Douglas's amateur standing were certainly unfounded, but the editor of London Golf does not seem to know that the opposition to Mr. Douglas was almost entirely due to the attitude of two of his fellow-countrymen. I also forbear to comment. Douglas is an employee of an electric-supply house in this city, and saved up his vacation of two weeks in order to enter the amateur championship at Morristown.

When he appeared at the tee for the first day's play, so industriously had these malicious reports against his status been circulated by his fellow-countrymen that there was hardly a hand-clap. However, he stuck quietly to his work, and by his unassuming demeanor and unvarying sportsmanship he made his final victory a popular one with every sportsman in the gallery.

This is worth noting as an instance of the sense of American fair play, as Smith, the runner-up to Douglas, is a native-bred player and a college boy, and naturally carried with him the sympathy of the spectators.

It is also worth while noting that the only piece of sharp practice which occurred during the tournament stands to the discredit of a golfer who is not an American.

IT WOULD BE MISLEADING, not to say discourteous, to the Carlisle Indian eleven to refer to that team as "good practice." Carlisle is too near equality with the larger university elevens of the East not to be regarded at all times as a worthy opponent. While the Indians may lack the finesse of football play, shown, for example, by their men failing on occasions to take advantage of unexpected developments and situations oftentimes outside the ordinary football routine, yet Carlisle does possess to an enviable degree the consistency of hard, clean, dogged, and aggressive execution of such fundamental principles as have been mastered.

To put it another way, Carlisle has no off days. The eleven plays uniformly well to-day, to-morrow, or a week hence, meeting in turn a majority of the strongest Eastern teams. Others may meet whom they choose and as few as they choose. Carlisle meets them all, and the YALE'S SHARP OFFENCE.

CHICAGO UNIVERSITY ELEVEN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148 ability of the Indians to do this, and their cleanliness in the doing of it, cannot fail to command respect.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Carlisle demonstrated her grasp of fundamentals in the game lost to Harvard (5–10) at Cambridge the other day. Harvard showed Carlisle the need to success of a clear knowledge of football rules—of knowing, for instance, how to put a player on side, when to do it, and what to do with him when put on side. Carlisle showed Harvard the necessity to success of consistent, rugged resistance—or defence—and an active, untiring, well-directed, and united attack—or offence. In short, Carlisle was the exponent of primary football, and qualified to advance to a higher grade: Harvard was the exponent of middle-grade football, and evinced ignorance of elementaries which suggested the need of another term in the primary department.

HARVARD'S MANNER OF PLAY against Carlisle was her usual combination of punting and rushing. The object in frequent punting being to put distance between her opponents and her own goal, as a means of strengthening her defence, and the chances of her opponents fumbling—with the possibility of profit to the Harvard offence. To this was added a single attempt at goal by drop-kick from the field.

Carlisle's programme of endeavor, in the main, was like Harvard's, except that Carlisle put more stress in simple rushing of the ball and in drop-kicking, and less stress in punting.

Measuring the result by what each eleven attempted, Harvard's victory was due to her punting, and Carlisle's five points to her drop-kicking. One cannot regard Harvard's rushing attack other than as a failure, and, since Carlisle's rushing did not result in a touch-down, or more chances for goals from the field, the obvious conclusion is that the Indians' rushing was also a failure.

Such critical deductions, however, are really hypercritical and do not quite fit the facts, especially so far as Carlisle's rushing attack is concerned. The Indians did not score a touch-down, and Hudson only twice had a favorable opportunity for try at field-goal, but, considering total yards gained, Carlisle's rushes were as success opposed to failure when compared to Harvard's work with the ball in hand. No one doubts that Carlisle would have made more of the opportunity than Harvard did had she, like Harvard, had the ball on opponents' five-yard line five times during the game.

IN THE EXECUTION LAY the main difference between Carlisle and Harvard attack. Carlisle had impetus and determination when her backs struck the Harvard line, and whether for a straight plunge at centre or a revolving plunge directed at tackle, there were clean fierceness and unity that Harvard lacked entirely. Hudson, in his quickness of passing and in his direction and running of plays, would find place upon almost any eleven, even though he had no other football qualifications to commend him. But he has others—to wit, agility on his feet equal to that with his hands; assistance to runner on any attack from centre to end without in the least slowing the play by getting into it himself; skill at drop-kicking. Summing up, we have a quarter-back but little inferior to De Saulles of Yale and a type of player indispensable to team-play. The other Carlisle backs, to a man, seconded Hudson's efforts, and dragged, pushed, and actually hurled each other for gains. With one exception, Carlisle could not gain round the ends, but her dashes against other portions of the Harvard line were generally quite successful.

Defensively, Carlisle was not so strong against good rushing tactics, the fault being, however, rather with the support of her rush-line backs than with the forwards, the backs at this work seemingly not knowing just what was expected of them, and not distributing themselves to the best possible advantage.

THE FAULTS OF THE HARVARD ATTACK have been suggested somewhat in speaking of Carlisle. Briefly, each man was for himself, and even so revealed little of the clean dash so apparent in the Indian runners. When Daly, at quarter, was not slow in getting the ball to the runner, the backs were tardy in starting. There was no sharp unbroken meeting of ball and runner, and the result was the expected one. Harvard's forwards are not good at opening up a way for their backs, but that failing cut slight figure in the result against Carlisle, for the back-field attack was so slow in starting and ragged in striking as to have been unable to take advantage of even the quickest openings. Against the Carlisle ends Harvard lacked the same unison noticeable in the line attacks, her interference being scattered, slow, and spasmodic. A few Harvard end gains were more the result of good luck than of good direction.

THE HARVARD DEFENCE WAS SUFFICIENT to prevent Carlisle from scoring at will, but not strong enough to hold repeatedly for downs. The speed of Carlisle's attack seemed to take the Harvard line off its feet, with the result that the balance of impetus, and consequently the possibility of gain, was with Carlisle. The Carlisle line was not bent back quickly enough into the runner and his interference. On the defence, also, Harvard's line backs, especially Reid and Warren, were weak, ignoring those unexpected opportunities whose quick seizure indicates the football head.

Individually, Smith, the Carlisle centre, was superior to Jaffray in the small but important qualifications of the position, such as continuously clean snapping back to quarter and a quick sure pass to full-back. Boal and Burden (Harvard) at guard held their own offensively and defensively with Redwater and Scott. Bemus Pierce played a particularly superior defence against Harvard's left tackle, Donald, while H. Pierce (Carlisle) at right tackle had more of an even thing with Mills and Haughton. One could hardly be satisfied with 'varsity ends that failed, as Harvard's did, of bringing off even the small gains that at times their Indian opposites, Rogers and Archiquette, manœuvred round Carlisle's left and right.

In getting down on punts and preventing their being run back, the Carlisle men quite excelled Cochrane and Hallowell.

Daly's passing was slow, and his play not so uniformly good as I believe him capable of showing. Comparison with Hudson was not to Daly's advantage, but some of his blocking was excellent on interference, and he had a tackle or two to his credit quite up to the best of the Indian's. Dibblee excelled any Indian back save Hudson, and made one quite as brilliant twenty-yard gain as a similar effort of Cayou's—indeed, more brilliant, since Dibblee was practically unaided, and his effort, supplemented by a little spurt of the Harvard attack, resulted in a touch-down. Reid and Warren were perhaps on equality with Miller and Metoxen, save in offensive work.

Haughton and Cochrane did Harvard's punting, and, on the whole, did it well.

HARVARD'S CHANCE OF SUCCESS against Yale is decidedly an unknown quantity. Until the Univ. of Penn. game shows us whether Harvard is capable of stiffening the line and putting more force and unison into the defensive work, one may not venture even a guess on the outcome of the 19th. Certainly a supple line and indifferent support given the runner would result more disastrously for Harvard against Yale than would the same faults against Univ. of Penn. The back-field work of Yale and her general offensive play exhibit even today, when tried out, more concentrated force than that of any other eleven, and would therefore be especially telling against such manner of play as Harvard showed against Carlisle. While Yale's defence—referring particularly to that exhibited in the West Point game—was loose, it must be remembered that the blue invariably reaches its full development as late as can be without detriment to effectiveness in its final games. And that full development we can always count on as being strong. The fact that her defence against West Point was loose is no warrant for assuming it will be weak against Princeton or Harvard.

In discussing the prospective work of Harvard or Princeton in forth-coming final games, the chances of their attaining perfected play, of the eleven's full strength being utilized, must always be taken into consideration, and the saving "if" is indispensable. But concerning Yale we may be positive. The team from New Haven can be depended upon to realize its fullest possibility on the day of its game. If beaten, it is by the superior play of the opponent, and not through ragged or weak or unperformed work of its own. Yale is a known quantity in the crowning efforts of her athletic teams, and intermediate contests are but preliminary practice to the coveted end of which her coaches never lose sight. That is why it is so very misleading to reckon Yale's football possibilities by the scores the eleven has made during the trial season.

THE YALE–WEST POINT GAME (won by the former, 10–0) was noteworthy chiefly in revealing the attacking power of Yale's backs, and in emphasizing the consistency with which West Point annually develops first-class teams despite handicaps that would wreck the prospects of men less earnest and of less pronounced sportsmanship. The present season provided a crucial test of both qualities, but there has been no lessening endeavor by the cadets, nor slacking of interest among that usual little group of officers, whose personnel changes from year to year as duty separates them, but whose interest is always active and wholesome, and counts for so much in the perpetuity and encouragement of the sport. The excellent work of the '98 team means more when I say that this year is the first in which West Point has relied strictly upon its own coaching resources. Last year the system was inaugurated, though Harmon Graves, who may be said to have brought West Point football up to its present standard, continued his supervision. This season, however, the coaching has been done by Lieutenants Ames, Morrow, and Stout, and Koehler, the Academy sword-master. Furthermore, of the '97 team, the centre, both guards, a tackle, and a half-back were graduated, and of these were Nesbitt and Scales, rated with the best in their positions. To fill these places among only 325 men seemed impossible, and yet how nearly it has been accomplished the team's work against Yale showed. It is suggestive of the sportsmanly spirit that permeates the Academy that the expenditures incident to athletics are met largely by contributions from alumni, and it is indicative of the ruling spirit to learn that even this year, with its excitement of war and work, there has been no diminution in support, checks coming from even Manila, Havana, and Alaska.

WEST POINT WAS HARDLY FIT for stiff play when she met Harvard, and was defeated (0–28), but the team was well settled to its work in the Yale game two weeks later, and though again defeated (0–10), showed greatly improved and thoroughly excellent work. Many times during the game West Point opened up Yale's strongest lines, and repeatedly made gains with telling formations well executed. In fact, for several periods during both halves the cadets took the ball on downs, carrying it towards Yale's goal, until the latter recovered itself by one of those familiar braces. The ball was in the air a great deal of the time, and there was little to choose between the punting of Romeyn (West Point) and McBride (Yale); Romeyn's work showed up better because he did not overkick his ends, as did McBride, and his handling of the ball was cleaner. McBride muffed inexcusably, and overkicked his ends invariably; but his line-bucking and interference were of a high order. Kromer, West Point's clever quarter, rarely failed to get under McBride's punts, or to run back with them from 10 to 20 yards; twice he narrowly missed a field goal, and once gained 25 yards by skillfully working the quarter-back kick.

Kromer ran his team well, is a heady captain, and a player of the first class. Foy at right tackle and Smith at end are a strong pair—there are few better in the country. The cadet ends outplayed their opponents; Ennis, guard, played strongly. Waldron's half-back work was brilliant; twice he went around Hubbell's end for gains of 20 and 25 yards; he is a strong ground-gainer, and hard to stop. West Point's weak point is left tackle, and Yale hammered it for most of her gains through the line. With that exception the West Point line showed up well. The cadet backs were strong on the defensive; compared with Yale they are slow in getting off; in fact, that criticism applies generally to the West Point team—it does not get off and into the play sharp enough.

YALE'S DEFENSIVE WORK was indifferent, even taking into consideration the customary tardiness of Yale teams in reaching their form, and it was the more noticeable because the regular 'varsity line was practically intact. Brown and Cutten were notable exceptions to the general disjointed line-work; Coy was a bit of an exception also, but by no means a satisfying 'varsity end. Cutten does not follow the ball closely enough. Hubbell, on the other end, was a mark for the cadets. The back field, McBride excepted, comprised the second string, but their work was superior to that of the first string in the line. It was their fierce attack which gave Yale her points. Sullivan handled the ball sharply and accurately. McBride must send the ball higher on punts or there will be trouble; Yale has no ends who can get down the field on his long low kicks. There is not likely to be any touch-down on a muffed punt if McBride overkicks his ends as he did in the West Point game. Considering his recent convalescence, Chamberlin's work was creditable. The line-tackling was poor.

Yale was a repeated and flagrant offender at holding in the line. The umpire seemed strangely indifferent.

PRINCETON IS THE ONLY ONE of the Eastern 'varsity elevens that up to this date (November 4) has kept its opponents (Carlisle not being among them) from scoring. Yet the team's work has been so irregular from week to week that dependence upon it is out of the question. The difficulty of defeating Cornell (6–0) and Penn. State (5–0)—both hard teams to score against, however, especially Cornell—scattered Princeton hopes, which were raised afresh by the satisfactory tally against Brown (23–0), only to be finally crushed by the very indifferent showing against Virginia (12–0) last Wednesday. I must confess that not since '93 have I seen Princeton, against a weak team, exhibit periods of such poor offence ten days before her Yale game. On the other hand, there were moments of as good defensive line-work as I have seen put up by a Princeton eleven in practice.

I am not so sure that Princeton's obvious undevelopment ten days before her final game is really so serious a matter as it appears to be. Hitherto her fatal error has been over-development. The team has, almost without variance, been at top form a week or ten days too soon, creating the vexing and most difficult problem of how to keep it from going back. It is always better to be a bit under than over trained, and so, too, it seems to me, it is best to attain to your full playing power and skill during the last week or ten days.

In theory that sounds well, but it is not given to every set of players or trainers to put theory into practice. So far as bringing her eleven up to its best in the last week, Yale has made magnificent practical use of this theory; but with Princeton it will be an experiment. At Yale it has long since passed that stage and become a tradition; at Princeton it is new to players, coaches, and the students, and the first and last show their strangeness to the unusual situation.

UNTIL TEAMS SETTLE DOWN in the last ten days or so and play their regular men, it is wellnigh impossible to accurately judge of their capabilities. The employment of substitutes or candidates usually gives an entirely different character to the play—both in formation and execution. We get some idea of the team's style and quality, but, except in the case of Yale, as I have already said, we cannot know what those last ten days are going to do for the players and their work.

As I last saw the Yale–Princeton teams, Princeton had a great deal more to do in these ten days than had Yale. Princeton's line was stronger than Yale's on the defensive, but, with the exception of the ends, not so strong as Yale's on the offensive. Princeton's ends, though light, were of much more service to their team than were Yale's. In the back field Yale was superior in every position. The question is, therefore, how much improvement is Princeton capable of in the remaining week; how much latent football is there in the men? The Princeton line, I believe, can be made the equal of Yale's for all-round work, although I feel Yale will always have a shade the better of it on the offensive. As for the back field, neither in personnel nor in plan or execution of attack are they comparable. Judged by what I have already seen, it seems hardly possible that Yale will not have a distinct advantage in the back field next Saturday. On the other hand, Princeton's line, already somewhat stronger on the defensive, may, in these last days, increase its superiority to such a degree as to neutralize Yale's superior attacking power. We have seen a Princeton line do that before, but it had Wheeler, Holly, Lea, and there are none such in Princeton's line this year.

THE TROUBLE WITH THE PRINCETON TEAM is lack of snap all along the line and behind it, and slowness, and absence of support on attack. The large teams are usually pretty evenly matched in the line, and more often than not also in the personnel of the backs. Therefore what generally makes the differences between the winning and losing team is not individual prowess in or back of the line, or marked superiority in one or the other of these departments, but rather the manner in which the plays are executed. The eleven men who are on their toes, and get into the play every time hard and without delay, are the men that win. If there is one thing Princeton did not do last week, it was to get, not to say keep, on its toes. The whole line except the ends, and all the backs save Kafer, stood flat on their feet. That kind of play will not win next Saturday.

Princeton, however, is sure to put steam in her work—how much no one can say in this her first year of late development. Certainly there should be enough steam to make a close, hard-fought game. Princeton's defence ought to keep Yale's score down very low, but unless the Princeton back field makes tremendous improvement, its attacking power will be hardly equal to driving through Yale for a touch-down. There is sure to be much kicking, and Princeton may get a chance to score—through her speedy ends and Yale's muffing. Home grounds may give Princeton unexpected chances in this direction. It would be fallacious to take a line on Yale and Princeton through their West Point games. Princeton ought to make a better score than did Yale. The Princeton game with the cadets (last Saturday while we were on the press) should, however, give us an inkling as to Princeton's ability to get more speed and force in her attack.

Pennsylvania–Chicago University game discussed next week.

CASPAR WHITNEY.

"HOW TO GET STRONG, AND HOW TO STAY SO."—By William Blaikie.—New and Enlarged Edition.—Illustrated.—$1 75.—Harper & Brothers, Publishers.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE GENERAL CONVENTION.

THE Triennial General Convention of the Episcopal Church, at Washington, D. C., has ended its customary three weeks of session without startling incident or conclusion of any work of immediate consequence. Circumstances will determine the significance and importance that may be involved in the new constitutional regulation: "That provision may be made by canon for the temporary use of other forms and directories of worship [besides the prayer-book] by congregations not already in union with this Church who are willing to accept the spiritual oversight of the bishop of the diocese." In fact, the convention of 1898 will probably go into history as "dull"—by no means a bad reputation for any legislative body.

As heretofore indicated in this column, the venerable presiding bishop (Dr. Williams of Connecticut) was detained from his place by bodily infirmity, the Bishop of Albany (Dr. Doane) being elected chairman of his House; and the Rev. Dr. Dix, rector of Trinity Parish, New York, was for the fifth time chosen president of the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies. On taking the chair, Dr. Dix intimated that he should be unwilling ever again to undertake the heavy labors of the office; but the House, in a vote of thanks to him adopted towards the close of the session, expressed the hope that he might yet consent to serve again. However this may prove to be, Dr. Dix probably now holds the "record" for length of continuous service in this responsible place, and the reputation of standing supreme among all the capable presiding officers whose services the House has enjoyed.

It was remarked some weeks ago in this place that the proposed revision of the constitution and canons must be the main occupation of the convention, and that its whole time would scarce suffice for that single purpose. Almost its whole time was, in fact, employed in this work, with the result that only the constitution was adopted at the last moment, the canons going over to the convention of 1901 for consideration. The constitution also must be confirmed verbatim in 1901 before it shall go into effect, and since a committee was appointed to report in 1901 a new constitutional article "setting forth the Standard Bible," that committee's report, should it be then adopted, will require affirmative action by the next following convention in order to become effective, so that in the most favoring conditions the complete constitution cannot become operative until 1904.

The constitution as adopted this year contains nothing revolutionary; the most important thing is the provision for "temporary use of other forms and directories of worship" above mentioned, from which much is hoped by many persons. This was introduced in substance in the convention of 1895. Its fate then and now furnishes a typical instance of the conservative manner characteristic of the convention's action—the careful, slow waiting for opinion to settle and clear itself before effecting new legislation of importance. The constitutional prohibition of more than one diocese in the same city was expunged, in order to provide for the case of New York, in which city the civil authority has now, by the new charter, included Brooklyn and Queens, wherein lies the main spiritual and financial strength of the Diocese of Long Island. A long-standing wrong has been righted by allowance of canonical provision for courts of review and appeal in the trial of criminous clerks, for whom, until the present time, there has been no means of relief from unjust judgment in the trial court. Constitutional allowance of "the provincial system" has at last been made. Various efforts to change the name of the Church were all defeated.

Five missionary bishops were elected, as follows: the Rev. Samuel Cook Edsall, D.D., rector of St. Peter's Church, Chicago, to North Dakota; the Rev. William H. Moreland, rector of St. Luke's Church, San Francisco, to Sacramento; the Rev. James Bowen Funsten, rector of Trinity Church, Portsmouth, Virginia, to Boisé; the Rev. Junius Moore Horner, of Oxford, North Carolina, to Asheville; and the Rev. Lucien Lee Kinsolving, of the Brazilian mission, to be Bishop of Grande do Sul, Brazil. On the last's nomination the question of intrusion was raised, seeing that there is a valid episcopate in that country; but the convention was of opinion that the sort of Christianity prevalent in Brazil need not preclude other efforts. One foreign missionary bishop elected by the House of Bishops was defeated by the House of Deputies. This was in executive session, according to the rule in all such cases, but credible report says that the objection was based on the nominee's age of fifty-two and the fact that he had to master a difficult language in order to be effective in his office. A deputy urged that he himself had learned ten languages after the age of sixty, but in spite of this example the "dead-line" of fifty-two plus a language to learn remained inexorably drawn.

The Diocese of Indiana was divided, the present bishop (White) choosing the new diocese, Northern Indiana, for his own. The remaining diocese of Indiana will elect its bishop.

Application from Hawaii for admission to the American Church was denied, the convention deeming it inexpedient to interfere at present with the existing status, which is that of a missionary district of the Church of England. A commission was appointed to consider the cases of Cuba and Puerto Rico in consultation with the English Bishop of Antigua, who has a congregation at Ponce waiting to be transferred to the American Church.

A joint commission was established to report in 1901 on the validity of orders in the Reformed Episcopal body, in which body there is a movement towards return to the communion from which it seceded.

The proposed more stringent canon of marriage and divorce was defeated in the House of Bishops; the House of Deputies referred it to a special committee of thirteen, to report in 1901, the report to be in the hands of deputies by the end of 1900. From the composition of this committee it seems unlikely that any report whatever can be made with substantial unanimity, and possibly no report of much substance and significance can even obtain a majority, so different at present are opinions on the question among men of equal earnestness, piety, and learning.

San Francisco was appointed the place of session in 1901, and the House of Deputies voted to hold its meeting then in an unconsecrated building—a vote which probably will prevent all further use of sacred places for the business of legislative assemblies.

Mention should here be made of the Triennial Meeting of the Women's Auxiliary, at which the offering amounted to about $82,000. The convention resolved that the offering of the same body in 1901 should be devoted to Domestic Missions, in addition to the regular appropriations from the Board of Missions, the work among the colored people to receive its proportionate share.

To this brief review should be added the following statistics of the growth of the Church, compiled by Bishop Coleman of Delaware for the Church Eclectic:

At the beginning of the year 1873 we had in the United States about 2950 clergymen, including 48 bishops. We now have in the same territory about 4700 clergymen, including 83 bishops. During the twenty-five years preceding 1873 there were 51 bishops consecrated, as against 85 bishops consecrated since 1873. Twenty-five years ago there were about 260,000 communicants. There are now not less than 660,000, which means nearly, if not quite, three millions of members, or at least of avowed "adherents." The number of American dioceses and missionary jurisdictions then was 45. Their present number is 77. The average contributions in money for Church purposes, as reported then, were about $4,000,000 annually. They are now about $13,000,000 annually.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa.—[Adv.]

INFANT HEALTH.

INQUIRIES prompted the publication of "Infant Health" in pamphlet form, by the N. Y. Condensed Milk Co., N. Y., and the appreciation of its value led to an elaborate edition. Sent on application.—[Adv.]

SUPERIOR to Vaseline and Cucumbers, Crème Simon, marvellous for the complexion and light cutaneous affections; it whitens, perfumes, fortifies the skin. J. SIMON, 13 Rue Grange Batelière, Paris; Druggists, Perfumers, Fancy-goods stores.—[Adv.]

THEY'LL tell you of others, but speak of none with the assurance of Abbott's—The Original Angostura Bitters.—[Adv.]

NOTHING contributes more to digestion than DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS.—[Adv.]

USE BROWN'S Camphorated Saponaceous DENTIFRICE for the TEETH. 25 cents a jar.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

OR SAMPLE CASE OF 4 BOTTLES, $5.00.
Blank cases, without marks indicating contents, when desired. All orders delivered, expressage paid.
HISTORY.—This Whisky was made in 1882 and 1883, exported in bond to Europe, and after twelve years returned to Louisville Customs Warehouse, where it was found necessary to repack it in glass, owing to the ancient and unsafe condition of the barrels, and which was done by special permit of the United States Treasury and under Government supervision.
AUG. COLDEWEY & CO., LOUISVILLE, KY.
Established 1848. Reference: Any Local Bank.

LOOK IN THE CUP.

Before being shaved, it's well enough to find out what soap your barber is using. If it is WILLIAMS' SHAVING SOAP, you are always sure of a healthful, refreshing and delightful shave. You can feel absolutely safe from the risk of blood poisoning and from the burning and smarting sensations always caused by harsh, impure soaps. But if it is one of the so-called Cheap Soaps—beware! Danger lurks in the cup.

No one knows where these soaps are made or what they are made of. Such soaps are strong and rank. They contain germs of disease, which, once in the system, cause untold suffering. The pores of the face are little mouths, which greedily absorb these disease germs when applied with the shaving brush.

Can you afford to take such risks? Can you afford to be experimented on with the so-called Cheap, Unknown Soaps?

The only safe way is to insist upon having Williams' Shaving Soap—the "Only Real Shaving Soap." The reputation of WILLIAMS' SOAP has been established by a test of more than Half a Century. Its Mild, Soothing qualities and its Rich, Luxurious Lather, make it the recognized standard all over the world.

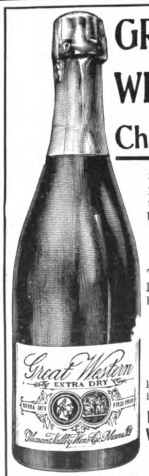
WILLIAMS' SOAPS are for sale everywhere, but if your dealer does not supply you, we mail them — to any address — postpaid on receipt of price.

Williams' Shaving Stick, 25 cents.
Genuine Yankee Shaving Soap, 10 cents.
Luxury Shaving Tablet, 25 cents.
Swiss Violet Shaving Cream, 50 cents.
Jersey Cream (Toilet) Soap, 15 cents.
Williams' Shaving Soap (Barbers'), 6 Round Cakes, 1 lb., 40c. Exquisite also for toilet. Trial cake for 2c. stamp.

London: 64 Great Russell St., W. C.
Sydney, Australia: 161 Clarence St.
Address The J. B. Williams Co., Glastonbury, Ct., U. S. A.
Williams' Exquisite "Jersey Cream" Toilet Soap, 15 cents.

Gold Seal
Champagne

is a natural sparkling wine produced in America under the supervision of expert foreign wine-makers.



It is equal in flavor to many brands of imported wines with inflated reputations, and for purity is unexcelled.

The difference is only in the price, the foreign article costing two and one half times as much as Gold Seal.

Why pay the difference?

A trial case will convince you of the excellence of this genuine American product. For sale by all wine-dealers and grocers. Send for illustrated booklet on wine-making.

URBANA WINE CO., Urbana, N.Y.

GREAT WESTERN
Champagne

is more acceptable to palate and stomach than imported wines, because of its

UNQUESTIONED PURITY.

—hes the pocket lightly—yet fills the bill.

Served at all first class Clubs, Cafes and Buffets everywhere.

The vintage now marketed is especially pleasing and very dry.

Pleasant Valley Wine Co.,
SOLE MAKERS,
Rheims, - N. Y.

Sold by { H. B. Kirke & Co., New York. / S. S. Pierce Co., Boston.

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,
BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

BOKER'S BITTERS

The oldest and best Specific against dyspepsia; an appetizer and a promoter of digestion.

Ask your Grocer, Liquor Dealer, or Druggist.

THE CELEBRATED
SOHMER
Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.

Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade.
Our name spells—
S—O—H—M—E—R
New York Warerooms
SOHMER BUILDING
Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE PRUDENTIAL

VOLUME XV. NEWARK, N. J., AUGUST, 1898. NUMBER 4.

Helping a Hero's Widow.

GEORGE H. ELLIS, Chief Yeoman of the Brooklyn, the only man killed in the great naval action off Santiago on July 3, which resulted in the destruction of Cervera's entire fleet and the capture of the Admiral, officers and men, was insured in The Prudential—had been for ten years. When fifteen years of age a small policy was issued to his parents on the boy's life, and later a second policy. The aggregate of the two policies—over $350—was promptly paid to the young widow, Mrs. Sarah M. Ellis, who resides at 819 Dean street, Brooklyn. She is left with an infant seven months old. The crew of the Brooklyn have raised a fund of about $1,000 for Mrs. Ellis, so that with the pension she will receive from the Government, she and her little one are secured against pecuniary distress. Yeoman Ellis was twenty-five years of age. The office of Yeoman is an important one. The Yeoman has charge of all the ship's stores, such as rigging, armament, ammunition, paint, oil, canvas, everything, literally, from a needle to an anchor—that is, everything outside of the food, clothing, cash and medical stores. He keeps account of everything on board the ship in the way of ship supplies, and issues nothing to any one on board, not even a broom or a marlin spike, without an order from the executive officer. He heads the list of first-class petty officers and ranks with a Sergeant Major in the army.

---

The following communication explains itself:

John F. Dryden, Esq.,
Pres't of Prudential Insurance Co.

Dear Sir:—

I desire to express my thanks to you for the prompt payment of the insurance on my late husband, George H. Ellis' policies, who was killed in the naval battle at Santiago, July 3, 1898.

I recommend very highly The Prudential Insurance Company, as I received $11.26 more than my policies called for.

Very respectfully,
Sarah M. Ellis.

Mohammed on True Charity.

EVERY GOOD act is charity: Your smiling in your brother's face; your putting a wanderer in the right road; your giving water to the thirsty, is charity; exhortation to another to do right is charity. A man's true wealth hereafter is the good he has done in this world to his fellow-men. When he dies people will ask, What property has he left behind? But the angels will ask, What good deeds has he sent before him?
—From a Sermon by Mohammed.

Age of "Old Glory."

"Old Glory" is older than the present flag of Great Britain, which was established in 1801; than the flag of Spain, which was established in 1785; than the French tricolor, decreed in 1794; than the flag of Portugal, established in 1830; than the Italian tricolor, established in 1848; than the flags of the old Empires of China and Japan, and of the Empire of Germany, which represents the sovereignty of fourteen distinct States, established in 1870.

The Largest in the World.

THE new 126-ton gun, intended to be placed on Romer Shoal, just north of Sandy Hook, New York, and now receiving its finishing touches at Watervliet arsenal, is the largest cannon in the world, six tons heavier and five feet longer than the

Her Papa.

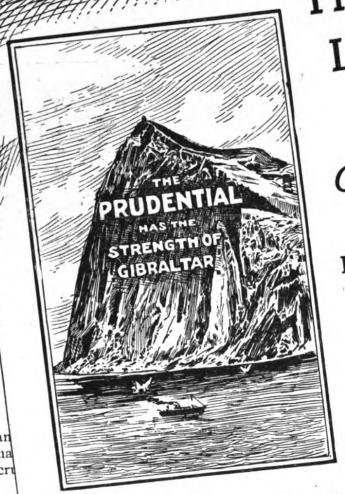
My papa 's all dressed up to-day;
He never looked so fine;
I thought when I first looked at him,
My papa was n't mine.

He 's got a beautiful new suit—
The old one was so old—
It 's blue, with buttons, O, so bright,
I guess they must be gold.

And papa 's sort o' glad and sort
O' sad—I wonder why?
And every time she looks at him
It makes my mamma cry.



Who 's Uncle Sam? My papa says
That he belongs to him;
But papa 's joking, 'cause he knows
My uncle's name is Jim.

My papa just belongs to me
And mamma. And I guess
The folks are blind who cannot see
His buttons, marked U. S.

U. S. spells us. He 's ours—and yet
My mamma can't help cry,
And papa tries to smile at me
And can't—I wonder why?
—Mary Norton Bradford in Insurance Critic.

Great Men's Opinions of Women.

The society of ladies is the school of politeness.—Mont

Profit-Sharing Life Insurance Policies.

ORDINARY—
$500 to $50,000.
Premiums Payable Yearly, Half-Yearly or Quarterly.

INDUSTRIAL—
$15 up.
Premiums Payable Weekly.

A copy of this paper, printed and published by The Prudential (with a circulation of over 1,500,000) will be sent free to anyone who will write for it.

THE PRUDENTIAL
INSURANCE CO. OF AMERICA
John F. Dryden, Pres. Home Office, Newark, N. J.

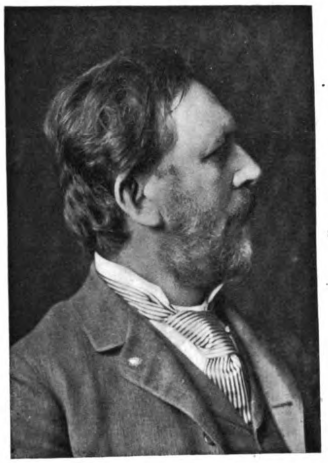
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



advance of her previous performance; with contin- schooling in such parts there is hope of something hly intelligent and artistic. And when, after her ex- itious marriage, the wicked jilt tells her that Remsen married her merely out of revenge, there is a touch rue pathos that promises well for the rest of the play. 'ain promise! Her subsequent life is spent mainly in tting Remsen as he scuttles through the various holes he wall that open before him whenever he is hard press- by the British officers. The quality of the first act serves inly to suggest what "The Colonial Girl" might have d for us. Remsen might have been a true figure of olonial patriot: in point of fact, he is little more than ostume, though it is animated, to be sure, by Mr. Soth- 's personal charm. The British officers might have n—British officers: they are movable uniforms, valu- e chiefly as lending color to the scene. The tragedy Mollie's romantic marriage might have been made gen- ie dramatically, and therefore deeply appealing: as ne follows scene it is obscured by the brilliancy and portuneness with which she aids the walls in opening to eive Remsen. If it had been vouchsafed to Mr. Sothern appear the scatter-brain Remsen was, he might have been laimed by Mollie's sincerity and loyalty: the situation which a man falls in love with his wife is certainly as pable of skilful variation as the tavern situation in "She ops to Conquer." In a word, the play might easily ve been a legitimate romance of early American life.

Why was it not so written? I beg to be excused from inking that the authors are incapable of the mere perspi- city and the rightness of heart that are needful to a genuine drama. We have the Mollie of the first act. Ex pede Herculem. More likely the authors still believe in the ancient fic- ns that conversation is fatal to the movement that is cessary to a drama, and that what affects an audience is uation rather than substance and vitality. On the stage which we have become familiar with the ripest of Pi- ro's plays, it is late to point out that movement may nsist in mental and spiritual developments, and that ithout vitality a "situation" is little more potent than ometrical theorem. Perhaps, however, the authors aim- l the play at the limitations of their actors; no doubt e true craftsman makes his play to fit his actor. Molière d, and probably Shakspere. But in so doing they ig- ored the mannerisms, and aimed to develop the full ower of their interpreters. I have little doubt that hat recommended the play was the fact that it gave iss Harned an opportunity to develop her powers.

Tailor-made Parts.

"Catherine," at the Garrick, has taken new interest om the fact that Mr. Charles Frohman has announced a urpose in its presentation. He selected the play as the greatest success of last season in Paris, and deliberately undertook to stage it and cast it as well as it was staged and cast at the Comédie Française. We are challenged to dge it by the highest standard. As for the play, it ould be scarcely worth while to point out in detail the rrors in structure and in taste. The actors are the main oint. If Mrs. Sarah Cowell-Le Moyne has a defect, it the defect of her quality—in uttering the wisdom and oodness of her part so unmistakably, the fineness of anner that would be imparted at the Comédie Française lacking; there is not the distinction of class between he Duchess and Catherine that the play requires. Joseph lolland, as Catherine's bourgeois lover, makes a similar mistake. The key to his actions is the thoughtful, almost stoical, generosity that is the virtue of the best men of his class. The rendering of the part is outspoken, aggressive. Miss Ethel Barrymore on leaving her mother's drawing-room curtsies to a guest in a manner that aims to be Parisian if it is not, and then waves adieu to her brother with a comradely flutter of the wrist that a student of social phenomena could doubtless locate as belonging to certain blocks abutting on Fifth Avenue. Such ineptitudes are foreign to the best Parisian acting. Yet they are so slight in effect that in ordinary circumstances they would scarcely be worth pointing out, and I hasten to add that I very much doubt if the French production had so many positive excellences as ours. All of our principal actors are unusually skilful and vigorous. Miss Elsie de Wolfe, whose rôle is most trying and difficult, stands up to it like a little man, and with her native honesty almost redeems its Gallic loathsomeness. Of Miss Russell enough cannot be said. It would be such fun to have a whole new dictionary full of beautiful words to speak her praises! Let us be thankful for what the gods have given us. It is pleasant to know that anything so good can come out of the syndicate.

"Catherine" Paris and in New York.

EMIL PAUR,
Conductor of "The New York Orchestra."

"The Liars," which is still playing to good houses at the Empire, has taken new interest from a rumor as to its

"THINK WHAT I HAVE ENDURED!"
Elsie de Wolfe as Helen, and Frank Worthing as Duke de Coutras, in "Catherine," playing at the Garrick Theatre, New York.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

authorship. It is said that it was written by Oscar Wilde, and that Henry Arthur Jones was induced to lend his name to it because the proceeds are to be applied to the education of Wilde's children. "The British are no better than their neighbors," as Sir Christopher remarks in the play, "but, thank God, they pretend to be, and make it hot for those who think otherwise!" With the case of the British public and its latest scapegoat we have nothing to do; but it is significant that in the play in question this sentence bites deeper than any other. There are verbal passages among the women folk the bizarre cleverness of which might serve as an ear-mark. The best passage in the play of any length is that in which Sir Christopher describes the various fates of those who sin against the laws of society—the long speech toward the end of the last act—which Mr. Drew delivers so admirably. In the fact that it sounds like a moral preachment it is suggestive of Mr. Jones; but the shallowness of it all is obvious on a second thought. Witness the unconsciously flippant and delightfully absurd moral of the play: if your wife is going to run away with another man it is your own fault, so take her on your arm and give her the best supper London can provide! It is to be added that the rumor, which has not yet found its way into print, comes from people who are likely to know. JOHN CORBIN.

The Authorship of "The Liars."

MUSIC

THE NEW YORK ORCHESTRA.

It is so soon that I am done for,
I wonder what on earth I was begun for.
—Epitaph on a Promising Infant in Arms.

WHAT malignant star insists on blending its rays with any effort in New York city to establish another local concert-orchestra, proper to the place, by name at least? to form a band which shall yield the sort of playing that is the pride of one or two other musical communities of our country? What, pray, have we done, what are we always doing, that makes the Far-Darter keep his arrows hot on the string against every plan maturing to take away our scorn in the market-place of Boston and our reproach in the gateways of Chicago? Apollo—like another very great Personage—is supposed to take care of his own. Are we, then, none of Apollo's? Or do we sacrifice so much to opera that the graver Fates are offended forever? Shall not zeal, guarantees, talkative ladies, impulsive gentlemen, solemn incorporation, and even a sparkling outsetting save new undertakings for giving us a superfine orchestra all our own? If so, I suppose that we must just quietly go on and on in humbleness, content with our good old Philharmonic's industries and traits—though, by-the-bye, a rumor is current that the miracle of miracles, a change much for the better, has come over them since a new leadership has taken their season in hand. This we shall see for ourselves with the Society's opening concerts this week, taking place on too late a day for review in this article. Meantime the usual bad fortune has been assaulting "The New York Orchestra." It made a début, a most brilliant début, in Carnegie Hall a week earlier than these lines are in press—the incident being the introduction to what promised us altogether new reason for musical delight and pride during a long winter.

Unfriendly Stars —not of Opera.

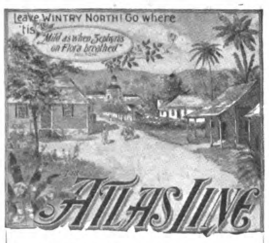
The advance rumors that declared Mr. Löwenstein's new organization to be one of the very first class, and its performances as likely to be quite the finest ones heard in New York city from any symphonic band of distinctly local origin, and meant especially for a local concert service, proved correct. If we have lost it, we have suffered a great loss. The one evening when it showed what sort of orchestral players were united in it, and what was meant by Mr. Paur's strong hand over it at its rehearsals or in public work, must have decided that much in any unprejudiced ears. The new orchestra is of about a hundred men. In it will be found a good deal of the pick of the city's instrumentalists—those we have already heard under other conductors, and several newcomers, along with a fraction from the Boston Symphony Orchestra and other outside sources. Mr. Nahan Franko is the concert-master; and be it said here that never has Mr. Franko, accomplished violinist as he is, played in any symphony-band as he played on this occasion. The first 'cellist is Mr. Leo Schulz, a virtuoso of the highest esteem, with whose merits the cities in the route of the Boston Orchestra's tours have become familiar. The strings in general are a splendid force, if yet something unpolished in voice. The wood-wind, and the brass, too, are of the very best. In all the band's full ranks one could remark only old and tried symphonic friends. But one other matter could also be remarked from the instant their playing began—an expression of discipline, an attitude of artistic responsibility, an unbroken watchfulness of a new musical pilotage. There was a rapport already vividly established between musicians and leadership—all to a degree not discernible in the performances of a local orchestra until now. The conductor's disciplinary earnestness, and the fact that he knew perfectly well what he was aiming at, and was determined to have Weber, or Beethoven, or Rimsky-Korsakov, or any other composer, played as he should be played—these were breathed about in the atmosphere of the first performance of this "New York Orchestra" before the first half-dozen pages of the "Freischütz" overture had been turned. One felt that Mr. Paur was the man to shake our musicians out of the rut of conventional duty, to break the lethargy of dulled temperaments, the slovenliness due to perfunctory and few rehearsals, to stir the most lethargic instrumentalists. There came the pleasant sense that a new standard was already set by a hand able to uphold it.

"The New York Orchestra."

The programme presented five extremely familiar works—though for one of them never can familiarity breed indifference unless the immediate performance be at fault. The overture to "Der Freischütz" began the scheme. The "Rienzi" prelude closed it. Between these old, old war-horses of many concert-directors came Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, Volkmann's honeyed Serenade in D, and a sparkling, fiery, chaotic Russian novelty, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capriccio Espagnol." The Beethoven symphony demonstrated that Mr. Paur had yet to smooth and to make more fluently coalescent the stringtone of his new charge. But there was present, in telling passages, a rounded eloquence that should soon prevail altogether. Along with it, certain qualities of the band's other choirs will deepen. In any event, this performance of the symphony was the most truly Beethovenish one we have heard, except on evenings when we have sighed to find how much better gracious visitors to us have interpreted the classics than New York's own conductors and own orchestras have served them. The gigantic frolicsomeness of the Scherzo—with that one inarticulate interruption to its joy in the Trio—the climaxes of the last movement that pile onto each other until it seems as if something must break, either Beethoven's inspiration or an orchestra's ascending voice—they were spoken out under Mr. Paur's bâton that evening in richness and full sense of their vitality. One felt that Beethoven was being played as he should be played—with no unlicensed readings, no liberties. If the Third Symphony ever loses its interest, it is not that it is hackneyed; the fault lies in the leader and his men. Mr. Paur is a Beethoven conductor to the manner born. The saccharine Volkmann Serenade (in which Mr. Schulz's obbligato duty was masterly) was a more complete success as to the string quality of the orchestra. The "Rienzi" overture was played with a brio to make it sound not only endurable, but interesting. As for the Rimsky-Korsakov score, a show-piece of wholly unvaluable contents, but exhausting all the tricks and devices of even the "extra" orchestra, and demanding great virtuosity from the whole band, it was given with such spirit, precision, and brilliancy, that one had—once more—to dismiss previous comparisons of a New York kind in considering such a performance. The evening long, all was new life, spirit, care for nuance, balance of tone. The basses did not lumber along like a Fifth Avenue omnibus; the wood-wind did not play as on mouth-organs and jew's-harps; the brass did not bluster and blare.

The Programme's first, perhaps last, Programme and Concert.

The evening was a demonstration of Mr. Paur's abilities, a triumph of plain, straightforward musicianship and resolution that must have gratified his well-wishers. Again there came to us a good object-lesson in what Mr. Paur is as a leader, quite aside from the Boston Symphony Orchestra's connection and qualities. When Mr. Paur first came to Boston, and so visited New York, he was not any too discerningly measured, I fear, by any of us. The suavities of Mr. Nikisch—suavities that nevertheless attest the velvet glove on an iron hand—were in our minds. Mr. Paur's rugged, ungraceful, self-forgetting way of leading his men was not pretty. There is no prettiness in it now. There is a bit of the leonine in his personality. We did not like him to stamp his foot and clap his hands, and turn around to view his band, so to say. It seemed poor form. He was not a gentleman, either, to care for dancing attendance in the drawing-rooms of Commonwealth Avenue or of upper Fifth Avenue; too much a musician and a man for mere social foolishness and flattery. His programme-making also was, and is, often curious. And Mr. Paur really was not the concert-leader into which he has ripened since his Mannheim days of opera. He has undoubtedly improved. But on what fine capital the outward improvement was to accrue we now see. His dignity of aims, his musical conscientiousness, his unwearied labor, his sense of responsibility toward a public and a composer, his vigorous musical individuality—all these make Mr. Paur a conductor indeed valuable for what he is, whether in the business of leadership for our music or for music elsewhere. New York has grown into a warm respect for him. I question whether any director to be transplanted to us, coming here without a great European advertisement, would be more a persona grata; and it may also be questioned whether any other one could achieve more definitely satisfactory results with the material we have to offer. It is solid musicianship, united to refinement and to a wholesome masculinity of methods, that tells in a musical leader's responsibility.



Mr. Paur as a Conductor.

Altogether, then, if we have heard Mr. Löwenstein's "New York Orchestra" only to hear it no more, we have suffered a manifest subtraction. Its presuming name was a just choice. For, such a band would represent New York in symphonic work as has none until now. The orchestra directed by the late Anton Seidl, the quality of performance from the now dispersed Symphony Society, the Philharmonic (as we have had it these many years), and other bands to our city's count were all wholly outdone. It was a royal orchestra with a new orchestral utterance. At last accounts the manager had turned over all his engagements and affairs to his lawyer. Nobody could say what would float on the surface of a stormy sea. If "The New York Orchestra" can be buoyed up, it ought to be only a question of a season to make it the talk of New York's connaisseurs. If not, why, those who are partial to other and less concrete plans for our symphonic welfare, or who still cherish needless sentimentality toward Mr. Seidl's memory and services to us, ought to have heard the first concert of this "New York Orchestra" with sufficiently clear perceptions to exclaim, with Juliet:

My only love sprung from my only hate!
Too early seen unknown, and known too late!

E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A TRIP TO JAMAICA

The Queen of the West India Islands.

Avoid the severity of our American winters and take your vacation at this garden spot of the earth. About $5.00 a day pays all expenses.

Send for our beautifully illustrated pamphlet K for full particulars.

PIM, FORWOOD & KELLOCK,
24 STATE ST., NEW YORK CITY.

THE HAIR 27th Ed., 25c. (or stamps). Why it Falls Off, Turns Grey, and the Remedy. By Prof. HARLEY PARKER, A. N. LONG & CO., 1013 Arch St., Phila., Pa. "Every one should read this little book."—Athenæum.

MAGIC LANTERNS WANTED AND FOR SALE OR EXCHANGE. HARBACH & CO. 809 Filbert St. Phila. Pa.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE

thoroughly revised and classified, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

HUNTER BALTIMORE RYE

The American Gentleman's Whiskey.

Sold at all First-class Cafés and by Jobbers.
WM. LANAHAN & SON, Baltimore, Md.

YOURS TO COMMAND!

SMITH & WESSON Revolvers are always ready. All calibers. Either long or short barrel.

Write for descriptive catalogue.
SMITH & WESSON,
16 Stockbridge St., Springfield, Mass.

Do you know how difficult it is to find any good cigars?

Van Bibber Little Cigars

are really good little cigars — for a short smoke — instead of half a large one.

Have you ever tried them?

It is not an expensive experiment: — 10 for 25c. They are made of the very best imported whole leaf tobacco and never vary in quality.

Ask your dealer for them, or send 25c. (stamps) for trial bundle of 10, in neat pocket pouch, by return mail.

H. ELLIS & Co., Baltimore, Md
The American Tobacco Co., Successor

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak.

Holidays are Kodak Days

Catalogues free at the dealers or by mail.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

National Horse Sho
14th Annual Exhibition.
Madison Square Gard
Nov. 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19
Open Day and Even
CONCERTS BY LANDER
A few choice arena and ... boxes secured by early applica... at the box-

Digitized by Google
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google
PENN STATE

Londonderry

Gives a relish to your meals, and a distinct aid to digestion. SOLD EVERYWHERE

LITHIA WATER

Pepsalt...

is the best of table salt, into every grain of which is incorporated digestive substances natural to the stomach. Fill your salt-cellar with Pepsalt and use it in place of salt at your meals. If you have indigestion your stomach does not supply the necessary amount of the dissolving or digestive juices. Pepsalt taken in place of salt at your meals makes good this deficiency, as you take with every mouthful of your food a similar substance to that which is required and at the right time, and your indigestion is a thing of the past.

Send for sample in salt-shaker bottle and try it.

Price 25 cents, postpaid.

THE VAUPEL SAMARITAN CO., 45 Sheriff St., Cleveland, Ohio.

Indigestion Has No Terrors For Him That salt-shaker is filled with Pepsalt

PEPSALT CURES AND PREVENTS INDIGESTION

No. 4711. WHITE ROSE GLYCERINE SOAP.

Transparent as crystal. The perfect cleansing properties and absolute purity, as well as the refined and delicate perfume of this toilet soap, have placed it at the apex of all.

SOLD UNIVERSALLY. SAMPLE CAKE 15 CENTS.

MÜLHENS & KROPFF, U. S. AGENTS, NEW YORK

A better Cocktail at home than is served over any bar in the World.

THE CLUB COCKTAILS

MANHATTAN, MARTINI, WHISKEY, HOLLAND GIN, TOM GIN, VERMOUTH and YORK.

We guarantee these Cocktails to be made of absolutely pure and well matured liquors and the mixing equal to the best cocktails served over any bar in the world. Being compounded in accurate proportions, they will always be found of uniform quality.

Connoisseurs agree that of two cocktails made of the same material and proportions the one which is aged must be the better.

Try our YORK Cocktail made without any sweetening—dry and delicious.

For Sale on the Dining and Buffet Cars of the principal railroads of the U. S.

AVOID IMITATIONS.

For Sale by all Druggists and Dealers.

G. F. HEUBLEIN & BRO., Sole Props., 39 Broadway, N. Y., Hartford, Conn. 20 Piccadilly, W. London, Eng.

WONDERFUL TRIËDER BINOCULARS

½ Actual Size.

Prices Range from $44.50 to $72.50.

Have 8 to 10 times the power of the best of the old-style field and opera glasses.

Pocket size—invaluable for Army and Navy, War Correspondents, Race Meets, Regattas, Travel, and the Theatre.

Send for Descriptive Catalogue. For sale by leading jewelers and opticians throughout the United States. Among them:

New York—Theodore B. Starr, F. G. Schmidt, Gall & Lembke, Queen & Co., Ga Nun & Parsons.
Brooklyn—J. B. Hoecker, 312 Fulton St.
Chicago—C. D. Peacock, Spaulding & Co., Hyman, Berg & Co., N. Watry, H. Borsch.
Philadelphia—Queen & Co., Bonschur & Holmes, Williams, Brown & Earle.
Washington—Franklin & Co., Moore & Leding, D. N. Walford.
Boston—Pinkham & Smith.
St. Louis—A. S. Aloe Co., Erker Bros.
San Francisco—Hirsch & Kayser, Henry Kahn & Co., Geo. H. Kahn.

G. P. GOERZ, 52 Union Sq. (East), N. Y. City

Two Books by Frederic Remington

CROOKED TRAILS

Illustrated by the Author. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $2 00.

As those who read "Pony Tracks" are aware, Mr. Remington presents a perfect combination when he works with himself, supplementing his own letter-press with his own illustrations and vice versa. In this new volume he shows that the combination still retains all of its former vigor and power to please. Indeed, in many instances, picture and text go to form a whole which the reader could not well grasp were it not for the supplementary quality of each in its bearing upon the other.—Albany Journal.

All in all, Mr. Remington's book is a delightful one. . . . The volume is a comely one, and, it will make a tempting gift-book when the Holiday season comes.—Chicago Dial.

PONY TRACKS

Illustrated by the Author. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 75.

This is a spicy account of real experiences among Indians and cowboys on the plains and in the mountains, and will be read with a great deal of interest by all who are fond of an adventurous life. No better illustrated book of frontier adventure has been published. The sketches were made from nature, and are executed in the brilliant manner made familiar by Mr. Remington's well-known artistic work.—Boston Journal.

The pictures are better than the articles, and the articles are very good indeed, which is equivalent to saying that the pictures are remarkably fine. Remington has few equals and certainly no superiors in drawing light cavalrymen, cowboys, Indians, "greasers," or horses. All of his drawings are delightful. . . . Remington draws the West to the very life.—Brooklyn Times.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers

New York and London

The Berkshire Hills Sanatorium,

FOR THE SCIENTIFIC TREATMENT OF CANCER

Tumors, and all Forms of Malignant and Benign Growths,

Without the use of the Knife

THE LARGEST AND BEST EQUIPPED PRIVATE INSTITUTION IN THE WORLD.

We have never failed to effect a permanent cure where we have had a reasonable opportunity for treatment.

Please state your case as clearly as possible and our book with complete information will be mailed free. Address,

Drs. W. E. Brown & Son, North Adams, Mass.

PETTIJOHN'S

Breakfast Food

FEEDS THE BODY AND THE BRAIN

THE AMERICAN CEREAL CO. CHICAGO

SO SIMPLE A CHILD CAN USE THEM.

SUNART CAMERAS

28 Styles from $5.00 to $100.00

All Cameras Sold under a Positive Guarantee

Send 2c. stamp for Catalogue. SUNART PHOTO CO. 92 Aqueduct St., Rochester, N.Y.

THE INESTIMABLE BLESSING OF SIGHT. NOTHING MORE USEFUL OR SUITABLE FOR A PRESENT.

THE IDEAL SIGHT RESTORER

AVOID HEADACHE OR SURGICAL OPERATION. READ "ILLUSTRATED TREATISE ON THE EYE. IMPAIRED VISION, WEAK, WATERY, SORE OR INFLAMED EYES, ASTIGMATISM, PRESBYOPIA, MYOPIA, CATARACT, AND THE WORST DISORDERS OF THE EYE." MAILED FREE. THE IDEAL COMPANY, 239 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

The Shortest Time

Chicago to Los Angeles last year was 72 hours. This year it will be 66, just 2¾ days, by the California Limited, Santa Fé Route. Barber-shop and Ladies' observation car have been added.

Address General Passenger Office,

The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway,

CHICAGO.

Guerlain

15, RUE DE LA PAIX, PARIS

Catalogue post free on application.

Most Exquisite Retail Perfumery

The elegant and fashionable Parisian World uses:

Eaux de Cologne: Hégémonienne, Impériale, Russe, Ambree.
Scents: Baume de Violette, le Jardin de mon Curé, Vere Novo, Jadis.
Sapocetti, special soap for the face; Maréchale, Duchesse, Violette, Pao Rosa.
Powder for the face: Ladies in all climates Pink, Yellow, White.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A LIKELY REMEDY.

MR. J. "What would you suggest, doctor, for insomnia?"
DR. PILLSBURY. "I would suggest that you attempt to sit up with a sick man and give him his medicine every hour for a few nights."

A delicious drink sold at all soda fountains and cafes.

Vigoral

"Concentrated Beef"

Represents all the nutriment and flavor of prime roast beef in a condensed form. It builds up the invalid. Strengthens the convalescent.
Our Chafing Dish Recipe Book sent upon request. At all Grocers and Druggists.
ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

Wedding Silver

The Gorham Co., Silversmiths, always prepare something new in Sterling Silver for each Wedding Season, but they believe never so much or so successfully as for the present.

Equipped with the latest inventions and processes of manufacture, they are enabled to offer the choicest wares at the most favorable prices. An examination for comparison is suggested.

GORHAM MFG. CO.
Silversmiths
Broadway & 19th St. 23 Maiden Lane

"A PERFECT FOOD—as Wholesome as it is Delicious."
Walter Baker & Co.'s
Breakfast
Cocoa
The Standard for Purity and Excellence....
Trade-Mark.
Costs less than one cent a cup.
Our Trade-Mark on Every Package.
Walter Baker & Co. Ltd.
DORCHESTER, MASS.
ESTABLISHED 1780.

PERFECTION MATTRESS FOR CAMPING
ONLY 10 LBS. WHEN ROLLED UP AND IT CAN BE FILLED IN NO TIME WITH A FOOT PUMP.
Campers and Yachtsmen can have home comforts by providing themselves with our "PERFECTION" AIR MATTRESSES and CUSHIONS. Waterproof—Light—Convenient. Made in any shape or size desired.
Illustrated catalogue sent free on application.
MECHANICAL FABRIC CO.,
Air-Goods Department. PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Archarena Combination Boards with Net Pockets and Carrom Rings
(ELEGANT CHERRY FINISH)
No. 2. has CROKINOLE, TEN PINS, and CARROM GAMES, 10 in all, for $3.50, express paid east of Omaha. No. 1 board, 4 games, $2.50. If not at your dealer's write for rules to ARCHARENA CO.
Manufacturers,
Peoria, Ill.

Arnold Constable & Co.
Oriental Rugs.
Exclusive designs in rich and soft Colorings for Drawing-Rooms, Reception and Dining-Rooms, Libraries, Halls, etc.
Carpets.
Axminster, Wilton and Brussels Carpets
Of the finest qualities manufactured.
Broadway & 19th st.
NEW YORK.

1831 Sixty-Ninth Year. 1899
THE
Country Gentleman
The ONLY Agricultural NEWSpaper,
AND ADMITTEDLY THE
Leading Agricultural Journal of the World.
Every department written by specialists, the highest authorities in their respective lines.
No other paper pretends to compete with it in qualifications of editorial staff.
Gives the agricultural news with a degree of fulness and completeness not even attempted by others.
Best Reviews of the Crops,
Best Market Reports,
Best Mechanical Execution,
Best Everything.
INDISPENSABLE TO
ALL COUNTRY RESIDENTS
WHO WISH TO
KEEP UP WITH THE TIMES.
Single Subscription, $2;
Two Subscriptions, $3.50;
Four Subscriptions, $
SPECIAL INDUCEMENTS TO RAISERS O LARGER CLUBS.
Write for Particulars on this Point.
Free till Jan. 1 to New Subscribers for 189
SEND FOR SPECIMEN COPIES,
Which will be mailed Free, and compare them w any other rural weekly; it will not take long to the difference. Address
LUTHER TUCKER & SON,
ALBANY, N. Y.

CHEW
Beeman's
The Original
Pepsin Gum
Cures Indigestion and Sea-sickness.
All Others Are Imitations.

Blakemore Whiskey 7 years Old.
NOTHING BETTER MADE OR SOLD.
Matured in wood and bottled in bond under Governmental Supervision.
If your dealer hasn't it, send us TWELVE DOLLARS, and we will have sent to your address by express prepaid a sample case containing TWELVE BOTTLES.
Freiberg & Workum,
Cincinnati, O.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,
BANKERS.
ESTABLISHED 1873.
2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.
Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.
Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.
Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.
A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.
Correspondence solicited.

Joseph Gillott's
STEEL PENS.
GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.
THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

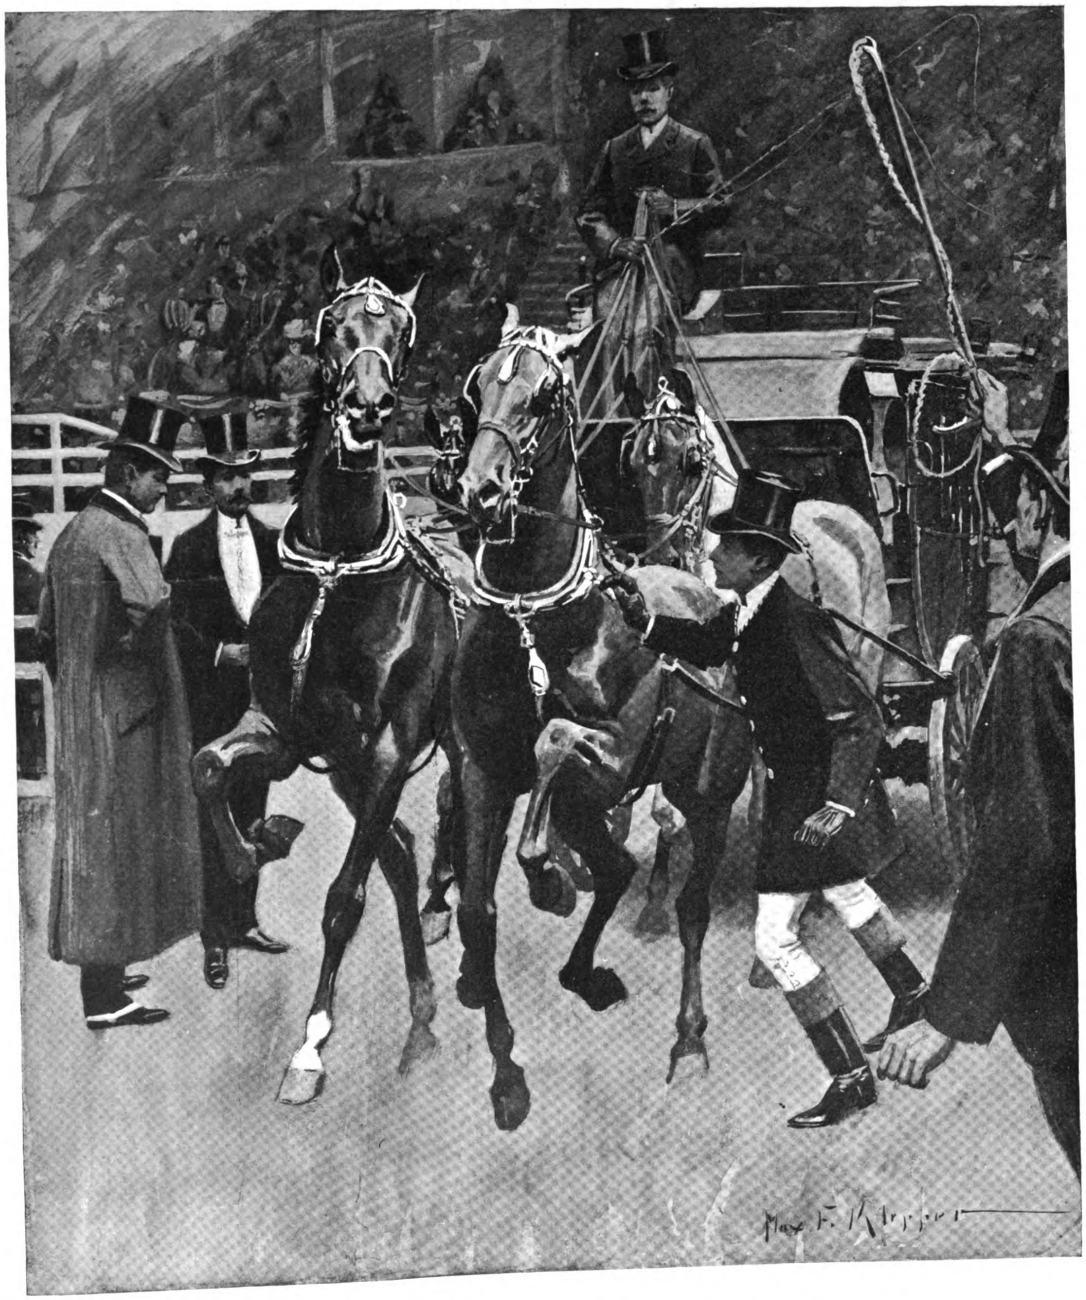
PATENT secured or money all returned. Search free. Collamer & Co., 1036 F St., Wash., D. C.

The Lake Shore is Famous
As the route of the Fast Mail Trains. The greatest mail trains in the world run over the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway between Chicago and New York. The United States Government selected this line as the route for its trains because of its excellent record for safe, fast and punctual service.
The same careful consideration is given to the operation of all its passenger trains. When you have occasion to travel between Chicago, Cleveland, Buffalo, New York and Boston you will make no mistake if you use this route.
A. J. SMITH,
G. P. & T. A., Cleveland,

HARPER'S CATALOGUE
A descriptive list of over 3000 volumes, will be sent to any address on receipt of Ten Cents in stamps.

E & W TRADE MARK
EARL & WILSON'S
LINEN
COLLARS & CUFFS
BEST IN THE WORLD.

The New York Central's Grand Central Station, The very Centre of City of New York.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—No. 2187. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1898. TEN CENTS A COPY. FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All Rights Reserved.

AT THE HORSE SHOW—PULLING UP BEFORE THE JUDGES.

DRAWN BY MAX F. KLEPPER.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, NOVEMBER 19, 1898.

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4 00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, and Mexico

Subscriptions may begin with any Number

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

London: 45 Albemarle Street, W.

Also for sale at Brentano's, 37 Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris

GREAT BRITAIN continues to make warlike preparations, and no one seems to know precisely, now that Fashoda is abandoned by the French, why she continues this work. Lord SALISBURY was expected to declare a protectorate over Egypt at the Lord Mayor's banquet, but he did not, although he hinted that it was well enough to be ready for grave emergencies. Whatever the cause of this active warlike preparation may be, the character of the English government assures the belief that if there be a cause for war it is a grave and dignified one, and one in which the British Empire will doubtless have the sympathy of the United States. Whether the prospective enemy be France or Russia, this will be true.

AMONG the pleasantest results of the election is the defeat of the Bryanites in BRYAN'S own State, Nebraska, and the consequent speedy end of the political career of that Populistic and silver demagogue Senator WILLIAM V. ALLEN. Nebraska has been too prosperous during the last two years to remain Populistic. This defeat and other Republican successes in the West end the free-silver movement, although we cannot hope that the end of financial heresies will come until the whole monetary system of the country shall be reformed.

IT has often been said that science not less than war has had its martyrs, and the truth of the assertion is attested by many examples; the unscientific like the unmilitary public may be pardoned for wishing to see the martyrdoms confined to those who are willing to run the risk. The outbreak of the bubonic plague in a Vienna hospital is a case in point. No one can too greatly admire the self-sacrifice of the professional man who deliberately risks his own life to investigate the means by which so terrible a scourge as the plague which has been devastating India during the last two years may be cured or prevented; but when it comes to risking the importation of the plague into central Europe, there is another side to the question. The bubonic bacillus may have an overwhelming interest for the men of science on his own account, but for the general public the interest centres around the idea of keeping him as far away as possible. The recent events at Vienna would seem to point the moral pretty plainly, and it is to be hoped it will not soon be forgotten in the public interests. It is not only unobjectionable, but highly meritorious, on the part of the pioneers of medical science, to risk their own lives in the experiments which have proved so fatal to all concerned at Vienna, but they have no right to risk the lives of other people. If they wish to make the nearer acquaintance of the bubonic bacillus, the proper place to do it is where they can find him at home. At Bombay, for instance, the enthusiastic professor might have taken the plague and died, but if he had done so there would have been an end of it, as a few thousand bacilli more or less could hardly make much difference there. Inoffensive people at Vienna have surely a right to choose their company, even among bacilli.

LORD SALISBURY, in his speech at the Lord Mayor's banquet last week, spoke of the appearance of the American republic among Asiatic factors and in European diplomacy as a "grave and serious event, which might not conduce to the interests of peace." What Lord SALISBURY said on this occasion is worthy of serious consideration. Are we prepared to do anything that is a menace to the peace of the world? Is not the whole teaching of the republic against that? Are we prepared to take a step that will invite war? In other words, are we to cease to be the greatest influence for peace that the world has ever known? The part which the republic has played thus far in international history is one that is distinctly honorable to us. We have been proud of the fact that we have encouraged the settlement of international difficulties by arbitration, and that we have settled more of our own disputes with various powers in this peaceable manner than any other power in the world. If this has been a proper subject of national pride, as we believe, how can we also be proud of the fact that what we do in the future will make for war?

IT is probably true, as some of the opponents of the expansion policy say, that a plan should be formulated for the better government of the Philippine Islands that does not involve their annexation to the United States. Senator HOAR has made a suggestion which, if carried out, would put the islands in commission under the control of several of the civilized powers; and there seems to be really no reason why some arrangement might not be made which would begin the instruction of the Filipinos in the art of self-government. The problem is not a difficult one for real statesmanship, and it could be solved easily enough if we should set real statesmen at it. In the mean time the status quo ought to be maintained, and the subject of the Philippines and their future omitted from the treaty of peace.

THE difficulty is, as we have suggested, that real statesmanship will probably not be permitted to concern itself with the Philippines. Judging from the manner in which we have begun with these islands, and with the other outlying possessions that we are apparently seeking, we have not yet developed the capacity for dealing with the initial questions that are arising. The administration is seemingly without any faith in the capacity of its own friends to transact international business involving negotiations with the accredited representatives of Spain. Consequently the commissioners at Paris are so bound up by instructions from Washington that they have no initiative and no latitude. In other words, they have no real power to negotiate. The consequence is that a meeting of minds between the two commissions is going to be difficult, and the delay resulting from the transmission to this country of counter-propositions from Spain may cost us advantageous terms, because, since they cannot be accepted at the moment when they are offered, they may be withdrawn before the final word goes from Washington. We are also manifesting an absolutely absurd and mediæval tendency in dealing with our trade regulations, evidence of which is the decision that trade with Puerto Rico is coastwise trade, and therefore must be carried on in American bottoms. This is the kind of colonial policy that cost Great Britain her colonies in this country, and that has finally brought Spain to her knees, and has plunged her into the depths of poverty. No steps whatever seem to have been taken looking to a change in our century-old navigation laws, and no member of the administration has suggested the necessity of providing for a colonial administrative force. In short, the expansionists are devoting their minds wholly to the subject of land-grabbing, and it is not surprising, therefore, that those who are opposed to land-grabbing should be simply insisting that the national word shall be kept, and that the country shall not be burdened with any more islands until it has made some progress towards devising a scheme for governing those we have; but, as we have already said, if we might only secure the services of statesmen, the problem of the Philippines would be settled without placing the whole burden on the United States.

WE are not inclined to make use of the misfortunes of the country for the purpose of aiding our side of a controversy, but it seems to us to be just to point to the outrageous condition of affairs in North Carolina and South Carolina following the election as an indication of the essential weakness in our system of government of the presence of large aggregations of what are called inferior people. The trouble in the South does not indicate that the American people are not competent to govern themselves and their country. It does show what the American politician can accomplish when he sets out to promote distrust and hatred between the blacks and the whites for his own profit and advantage. The war in North Carolina and South Carolina, by which civil government has been overturned in populous communities, is due to the fact that Republican politicians have promoted race hatred for the gain of their party. In view of the state of things that the politicians have succeeded in bringing about in the South, it seems to us the height of folly to turn over to these same politicians the control of alien races in distant lands, where an outbreak similar to that which has taken place at Wilmington, North Carolina, might easily precipitate the whole country into a disastrous foreign war.

THE ELECTIONS.

THE results of the elections throughout the country cannot be wholly satisfactory to either political party. The friends of expansion, who have lately become more than ever the friends of Mr. MCKINLEY, have been insisting that the verdict of the elections would have a strong bearing upon their enterprise. They have stated that Spain was awaiting this verdict with anxiety, and they have put this in a way that has made it difficult for many conscientious persons to escape voting the Republican ticket. They have stated that the issue was the approval or disapproval of the war. Now the war is one thing and expansion is another thing. Whether we Americans believe that the war was properly begun or not, we are behind the administration so long as the war is going on; but that does not make us supporters of the administration's policy of taking the Philippines, or of the plan to transform this democratic government into an imperial power.

The result has been confusion of mind among voters who did not want to express any sentiment that would be pleasant to Spain, while, on the other hand, they did not desire to approve of the absorption of the Philippines. The mixed result is perhaps the consequence of this. At any rate, it is most gratifying to our patriotic pride to take it so, for we do not wish to look upon the Republican loss in the House of Representatives as indicative of any feeling on the part of the American people in favor of Spain. We take it, on the contrary, that it means simply that expansion and the army administration are not popular, and that if expansion had been presented on its naked merits, the administration would have been overwhelmingly defeated. As it is, the Republican party has lost seriously in the House; and it has suffered severely in Minnesota, where the leading expansionist and jingo of the Senate and the Paris Peace Commission, CUSHMAN K. DAVIS, is a candidate for re-election to the Senate. He is going to be elected, no doubt, but his prestige is badly damaged by the vote on the State ticket.

This much, we think, is clear from the election statistics: Mr. MCKINLEY'S expansionist policy is not popular. The voters have not ratified the shouts of the people who met him at the railroad stations on his Western trip. On the leading domestic or "parochial" issue, that of sound money, the result is far from evil. The administration has not done much for sound money since it came into power, and the Republicans in Congress have failed to be able to do anything; but, on the whole, the country has reason to expect more from the Republican party on this question than from the Democratic party. How absolutely incompetent the latter is to deal with this subject is shown by the fact that the sixteen candidates for Congress in this city, who are to represent sound money constituencies, obeyed the command of the ignorant person who owns their political form and souls, and refused to say a word on this vital issue. Although the Republican Congress has done anything for sound money, something still is to be expected in the near future, since the party retains its power in the House. This body probably not to be immediately realized, because while the present House may push through the pending excellent bill, the present Senate will pass it; but we hope that the next House can be counted on for something in the way of sound financial legislation. In this connection, the defeat of Representative WALKER of Massachusetts is to be regretted, for he was a man of light and leading on the money question, and his absence will be felt when the debate begins.

QUAY'S victory in Pennsylvania is one of the worst of the evil results of the election. His candidate STONE was elected by a large majority, the Legislature will probably make QUAY his successor. We had hoped for better things of the State, and had been assured that we might expect them. But apparently Pennsylvania prefers the iniquitous QUAY to any virtuous Democrat. Of course there is hope as long as there is life, but, as the New York Times suggests, QUAY may die of old age before Pennsylvania becomes virtuous enough to repudiate him.

On the whole, it is a sign of great weakness that the administration not to be able to carry the country at an election held before the war is regarded. Many of the Republican politicians who voted for the war did so believing that the result would be a Republican triumph. They have been disappointed for a variety of reasons, one of which, of course, is the ob-

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google treatment of the soldiers; but the chief cause of the failure of the Republican party to hold its own in the House is the fact that the administration has insisted upon expansion as the leading feature of its programme.

THE NEW YORK ELECTION AND ITS SIGNIFICANCE.

THE success of Mr. ROOSEVELT is one of the good signs of the times. We dismiss, of course, the contention that will be made at Washington, and perhaps in Europe, that his election as Governor of New York is an endorsement of Mr. MCKINLEY'S scheme for loading the country with the Philippines in the interests of what he calls "destiny" and of what the missionaries call "religion." Mr. ROOSEVELT'S victory not only means nothing of the kind, but it was evident to within ten days of the election that his expansion and jingo sentiments were a detriment to his canvass. The people of the State did not respond to the military side of his campaign, while some of his best friends voted against him, or did not vote at all, because they thought that he was playing the demagogue in a way that was quite unworthy of his character, his intellect, and his antecedents. Not only were his jingoism and imperialism visibly unpopular, but so was the presence of the theatrical Rough Riders in uniforms which they had no right to wear after they were mustered out of the service of the United States. There was a good deal of objection, too, to the exaggerated claim that seemed to be put forward as to Mr. ROOSEVELT'S part in the assault on San Juan Hill—a claim that ignored the much more brilliant part played by General HAWKINS and the regular infantry. For much of this we are sure that Mr. ROOSEVELT was not responsible, and we know that he is incapable of making or sustaining any claim in his behalf that is beyond his deserts, or that involves an injustice to any one else. We mention these features of the campaign for the purpose of reminding those who are seeking to point a moral in national affairs that the military pomp and circumstance of the struggle injured rather than helped Mr. ROOSEVELT. And this was not because the people of New York, or of the country in general, do not love a military hero. They have proved the contrary too often and too decisively to permit the expression of a doubt as to their partiality for successful soldiers. Indeed, Mr. ROOSEVELT is himself an example of this passion of theirs. He would not have been nominated at all if he had not been a hero at San Juan. The politicians did not want him. PLATT and his knew him thoroughly. They had had bitter experiences with him before. They realized that his election would mean a Governor hostile to the machine. Apparently, however, they wanted to win this year, and they knew that with the ordinary machine candidate the Republican party would be beaten. The popular hero was forced upon them. If it had been only as a popular hero that Mr. ROOSEVELT ran, a campaign in his behalf would hardly have been necessary; but gradually the idea of imperialism became a definite part of Mr. ROOSEVELT'S military career, and this obscured and finally destroyed the glory he had won on the battlefield. As a political issue, imperialism was a failure in New York, and apparently no one realized this more keenly than Mr. ROOSEVELT, who won his campaign in the last ten days by devoting himself to the real issues of a State election, and by paying particular attention to Mr. CROKER'S sinister appearance in State politics. In a word, the significance of Mr. ROOSEVELT'S success as to national affairs is adverse to Mr. MCKINLEY'S attitude on the Philippine question, and while it is difficult to count on Mr. PLATT or any one of his friends in a matter of high politics, we believe that he and his colleague in the Senate, whether the latter be MURPHY or a Republican devoted to PLATT, will vote against the ratification of any treaty of peace which includes the cession of the Philippines. To do otherwise would be to fly in the face of their constituents.

Primarily Mr. ROOSEVELT'S victory is the triumph of character. He was elected because the people of the State really believed that he would give them a good administration. His opponent, an excellent man, we are told, laid great stress on the canal frauds as an issue, and it is highly probable that if the Republican party had nominated any other candidate it would have been defeated on that issue. Evidently the party has not repented of its crimes and its criminals, for the ridiculous WOODRUFF and the peccant ALDRIDGE were permitted to defend themselves during the campaign, and thus to imperil ROOSEVELT'S chances. No one believes in PLATT or his associates, but, at the same time, no one believes in CROKER as a reformer, and throughout the struggle VAN WYCK has stood for CROKER. On the other hand, Mr. ROOSEVELT stood for himself. While his visit to PLATT, and some of his campaign assertions touching PLATT, alienated some of his friends from him, his character and his past convinced the majority of the people that if canal or other thieves were to find an enemy in the gubernatorial chair as an outcome of this campaign it must be through the election of ROOSEVELT. It is a sterling quality of good Americans that character stands for so much with them that the man who has earned their respect cannot easily forfeit it by hot campaign utterances, or even by anxiety to secure a nomination.

But it was not only Mr. ROOSEVELT'S positively good character that carried him to success, the comparison between himself and CROKER won him thousands of votes. CROKER, probably more than any other one factor of the campaign, insured ROOSEVELT'S success. The Tammany boss intruded himself in all his hideousness. He named the Democratic candidate. He ordered the poor creatures who were candidates on his ticket for Congress to say nothing on the money question. He shoved a judge off the bench because he had refused to take orders from Tammany Hall. His baleful shadow was projected over everything. He dominated the politics of his party. He was even mentioned as the Senator to come. Finally the WEEKLY showed the kind of government New York city enjoyed under his rule, and CROKER'S answer to the charges was a confession. The growing power of this boss frightened the people. In his fatuous and cynical confidence in his power he began to talk, to pour out his vulgarity, to boast of his overlordship; and every time he talked, and by everything that he did, he helped ROOSEVELT. The State has not only chosen ROOSEVELT for his good character, it has elected him in order that it might escape CROKER. We have enough of this foul creation of sham politics in the City Hall. We do not want him at Albany or at Washington.

Looked at in this way, Mr. ROOSEVELT'S election is one of the happy signs of the time—one of the signs that, left to themselves, undistracted by policies and efforts foreign to democracy, the people of this country will rise to the heights of their opportunity, and will meet and overcome even the emergencies that boss rule has created. That Mr. ROOSEVELT agrees with our judgment of the forces which elected him he has declared himself in the utterance which he made on receiving the news of his election. He said:

"I shall try to administer the office of Governor in the interest of the whole people. It is by so doing that I can best show my appreciation of the support given me by the independents and Democrats, who have themselves put the welfare of the State first, declining to follow those of their leaders who, in this crisis, either ranged themselves outright on the side of the forces of dishonesty, or else supported them in effect by standing aside from the real contest."

This is the spirit for whose triumph in the United States good citizens are longing, and it is because he possesses it that they rejoice in Mr. ROOSEVELT'S election.

DAVID AMES WELLS.

BY WORTHINGTON C. FORD.

IN the death of Mr. David Ames Wells the country loses one of its foremost writers on applied economy. For more than thirty years he has sought to teach the people the necessity of placing the national and local systems of taxation upon a more equitable and reasonable basis, of removing from them those features that lead to undue pressure of taxes in some directions and to unfair discrimination in favor of certain interests in others. By voice and pen he has been in the lead of the revenue-reformers, and it is on this his public activity that his reputation will rest.

Mr Wells was born in Springfield, Massachusetts, June 17, 1828, and was a graduate of Williams College. He was for some years connected with the Springfield Republican, and even in late years contributed to that journal. Under Agassiz he studied in the Lawrence Scientific School, and the series of text-books on science, which enjoyed a high popularity in their day, was one of the results of this training. Other and more important results were a scientific method of investigation, and a happy, because direct and lucid, style in expressing his thoughts.

This closeness of investigation and clearness of exposition he carried into his studies on taxation. There are men still living who can recall the dark days of the civil war, when apprehension for the safety of the government was at its height, and was fully reflected in the low credit of the national Treasury. The greenback was quoted in gold at less than one-half its face value, in spite of every effort to counteract the depreciation, and the United States bonds were nearly in the same low estimation. With the possibilities of further issues of paper and enormous loans, and with the actual presence of a costly and, as it then appeared, an uncertain war, the financial depression threatened to close all sources of the necessary funds to the government, and thus force it into a confession of national bankruptcy. It was at this crisis that Mr. Wells undertook to show why the nation's credit was still unimpaired, and why the national economy was able not only to make good the losses already suffered, but to be still further drawn upon without injury. In "Our Burden and Our Strength," the balance-book of the national credit was set forth in popular form, and the many large editions of this pamphlet, widely circulated, produced an appreciable recovery of public confidence in the ability of the nation to meet the heavy demands made upon its credit.

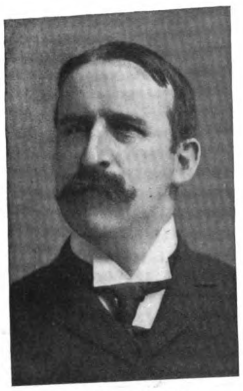
At the close of the war the question of reducing national taxation stood prominent as one of the many problems to be solved; and under Mr. McCulloch, the Secretary of the Treasury, a special commission was formed to report upon the existing methods of obtaining revenue and the changes to be desired. Mr. Wells was placed upon this commission as chairman, together with Stephen Colwell, of Pennsylvania, and S. S. Hayes, of Illinois. The first report was presented in 1866, and embodied a general discussion of the internal and customs revenue, but contained few important suggestions of change. A great body of information was obtained on home and foreign taxation, and the domestic interests were granted a hearing; but the report did not lead to a practical reform, and in the next session of Congress the office of Special Commissioner of the Revenue was created. In recognition of the ability with which Mr. Wells had performed his duties at the head of the old commission, he received the new appointment.

Mr. Wells entered into his new office with a strong belief in the protection of native industries through a high tariff. He had received his training in economics from Henry C. Carey and Stephen Colwell, and was as strong a supporter of the principles of the "American system" as either of those gentlemen. His first report and the tariff bill submitted with it were constructed on the lines of protection. But as his investigations continued, and as he had the opportunity to compare conditions of manufacturing at home and abroad, a change came over his beliefs, and his confidence in the efficacy of protection was shaken. With a widening experience, under conditions peculiarly advantageous for comparing relative ability for manufacturing in England, France, and the United States, he was brought to recognize the fact that a high tariff, intended to restrict trade and competition, could be mischievous and wasteful, and better fitted to disorganize industries at home than to develop them on a lasting basis of natural prosperity. With characteristic courage he announced his conversion from protection, and his last report contained a full exposition of the causes of this conversion, and what was equivalent to a primer of tariff reform.

The merit of this exposition was at once recognized in Europe as well as in the United States. It was a lucid arrangement of facts proving the great natural resources of the country, and how inevitably they would lead to industrial and commercial supremacy over other nations. Artificial encouragements or restrictions by tariff duties could only stimulate unequal development, and by not recognizing the different needs of a country having so many diverse interests as the United States a waste of resource and a misdirected application of labor and capital would result. His former associates now turned from him, and the office he held was abolished. But his reports were printed in England and France, and led to a general acknowledgment of his abilities as an economist.

I have dwelt upon this incident in Mr. Wells's career because it illustrates his patient and careful study of whatever problem came before him, and his courage in announcing his conviction when fully formed by this study.

Upon leaving the service of the government his time and abilities were in demand in many quarters. He served on a commission to report on the system of State taxation in New York, submitting two reports, which were republished in England, and directed attention to the many anomalies of the State tax laws. He reported also on the subject of canal tolls, a matter of vital importance to the commercial interests of New York city and State. Associated with Charles Francis Adams, Jr., he was for some years a member of the board of railroad arbitration. When the national government was urged to purchase the telegraph systems of the country, Mr. Wells made a study of the economic points involved, and in an elaborate essay declared against governmental ownership. Belonging to the school of laisser faire economists, he looked with distrust upon any unnecessary extension of the control of the government over private concerns. His intimate knowledge of the practical side of tariff legislation made him opposed to creating further opportunities for special favors to the few at the expense of the many.

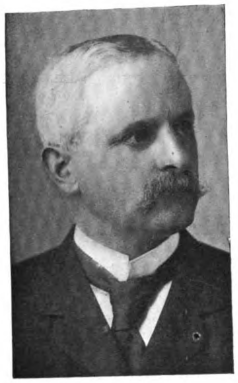


His point of view in State affairs widened with his more intimate knowledge of the moral questions they contained. The same convictions that led him to oppose a tariff that sacrificed revenue to protection led him to criticise schemes of land nationalization and to favor civil service reform. The same idea that taught him the inequalities of customs legislation, both for the country and for individuals, led him to favor honest government and political honesty. Because of his acquaintance with the laws of trade and the importance of international commerce he believed in drawing more closely the relations of the United States with the countries of Europe, and especially with Great Britain. His writings on political and economic topics are numerous, and hardly a public question in the last thirty years has not engaged his attention. Because of their practical qualities these writings have received high praise, and the many honors given to the writer by learned societies in Europe are evidence of the high estimation of his worth entertained in England, France, and Italy. The Institute of France, and the Lyncean Society of Italy, an even older institution, the Royal Statistical Society of Great Britain and the University of Oxford, recognized his work by honoring the man.

"There are few of my official acts," wrote Mr. Hugh McCulloch in his autobiography, "that I look upon with more satisfaction than the appointment of David A. Wells to be a revenue commissioner. . . . All of the reports which were made by Mr. Wells exhibited the most careful, painstaking, and intelligent investigation. In clearness and accuracy of statement and in logical force they have not been surpassed on either side of the Atlantic. Their ability was admitted even by those who disagreed with the writer in his conclusions. To the reputation which Mr. Wells acquired as a special commissioner of the revenue he has added very largely by his numerous papers upon economics. It is not too much to say that his rank is among the first of political economists of the time, in Europe as well as in the United States."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

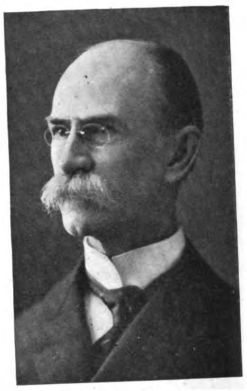
GEORGE E. LOUNSBURY,
Connecticut, Republican.



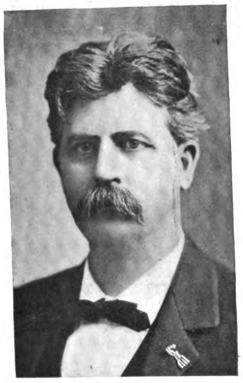
FRANK L. ROLLINS,
New Hampshire, Republican.

WILLIAM A. STONE,
Pennsylvania, Republican.

FOSTER M. VOORHEES,
New Jersey, Republican.



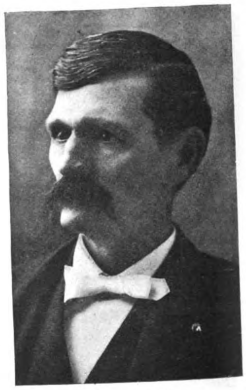
ROGER WOLCOTT,
Massachusetts, Republican.



THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
New York, Republican.
Copyright, 1897, by Rockwood.

HAZEN S. PINGREE,
Michigan, Republican.

CHARLES S. THOMAS,
Colorado, Fusion.



HENRY T. GAGE,
California, Republican.

JOHN LIND,
Minnesota, Democrat.

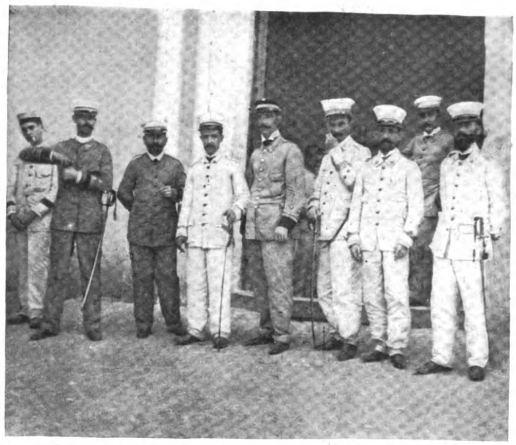
W. E. STANLEY,
Kansas, Republican.

W. A. POYNTER,
Nebraska, Fusion.

JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
Texas, Democrat.

BENTON McMILLIN,
Tennessee, Democrat.

F. B. FANCHER,
North Dakota, Republican.



DE FOREST RICHARDS,
Wyoming, Republican.

GOVERNORS CHOSEN AT THE NOVEMBER ELECTIONS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SPANISH SOLDIERS IN SAN CRISTOBAL BARRACKS.

SPANISH OFFICERS IN FRONT OF SAN CRISTOBAL BARRACKS.

RAISING THE FLAG OVER SAN JUAN, OCTOBER 18.

SAN JUAN HARBOR—VESSELS DECORATED IN HONOR OF THE DAY.

UNITED STATES TROOPS TAKING POSSESSION OF THE ARMORY OF THE 1ST (SPANISH) INFANTRY, SAN JUAN.

THE EVACUATION OF PUERTO RICO—SCENES ATTENDING THE FORMAL SURRENDER BY THE SPANISH GOVERNMENT.

PHOTOGRAPHS FROM WILLIAM DINWIDDIE, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."—[SEE PAGE 1139.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

MR. WHEELER H. PECKHAM, the noted New York lawyer, who has a house at Morristown, New Jersey, has transferred his legal residence to New Jersey to escape the tax laws in New York. The trouble with such of the New York tax laws as men like Mr. Peckham object to is that they are inequitable in their operation. They tax personal property in such a way that shrewd men who will condescend to evade them can easily do it without absolute lying. Widows and other persons whose property is held in trust cannot readily escape them. These laws therefore mulct helpless and highly conscientious persons, while more masterful and less scrupulous citizens scoff at them. When reputable citizens frankly leave the State to escape its taxes, it is pretty safe to conclude that the tax laws need amendment. There is no doubt at all that the present laws taxing personal property in New York cause an amount of mischief and hardship that is out of all reasonable proportion to the revenue they bring in.

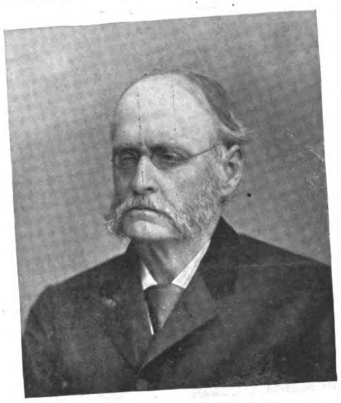
Dr. J. D. Emmet, of New York, writes to the WEEKLY in praise and cordial support of the efforts of the Tree-Planting Association (64 White Street) to promote the planting of trees along the streets of New York. By following the methods recommended by the association trees can be started in life, with fair prospects, for ten dollars each. Dr. Emmet believes in the movement, and has confidence that the sparrows will take care of the inch-worms, which formerly made shade trees in New York a nuisance.

Elsewhere in this number of the WEEKLY a picture shows the demolition of the Palais de l'Industrie in Paris to make room for buildings of the exposition of 1900. The exposition grounds as now provided for will include, besides the Champ de Mars, the Quai d'Orsay and the Esplanade des Invalides on the left bank of the Seine, and on the right bank the Cours-la-Reine and the site of the Palais de l'Industrie.

Nothing will be shown at the exposition which will be of so much interest to transatlantic visitors as the people who are getting up the show. A recent visitor to Paris, who went one day to a lecture at the Sorbonne, speaks of being delighted with the lecture, but shocked at the appearance of the students who were listening to it. Their physiognomy, their misshapen heads, small stature, and general appearance, impressed her as obvious tokens of degeneration, and she found evidences of the same sort in the soldiers and policemen of Paris, who impressed her as being undersized and stupid.

The New York Times, which lately reduced its price to one cent, begins to brag, as might be expected, of the great increase of its circulation. The experiment of the Times is interesting to observers of the conditions of the newspaper business as a test of the real taste of newspaper readers. Heretofore in New York a reduction of price by a big morning paper to one cent has been accompanied by an outburst of "popular features," such as cheap pictures and highly sensational reporting. The Times, so far, maintains the same quality and character that it had as a three-cent paper. If it continue to maintain that quality, and can demonstrate by actual experiment that there is as large a demand for a sanely conducted penny paper as for one that has chronic hysteria, the conclusion will be very creditable to the public taste and will justify its cost.

We, the people of the United States, had a fire on Sunday afternoon, November 6, in our Capitol at Washington. A violent explosion of gas in a small room under the hall on which the law library of the Supreme Court opens wrecked the floor above it, and was followed by an outbreak of fire, which did some damage to the law library, and also to the old Senate-Chamber, in which the Supreme Court now holds its sittings. The firemen came promptly and put the fire out, and the newspapers tell us that, though the Supreme Court will be turned out of its room for a month, our losses are not important, and can be made good for $5000 or $10,000. Some of the books in the library were damaged by fire or water, and will need new bindings, but no valuable papers were burned, and no harm befell our paintings, busts, or the interesting old furniture of the justices' robing-room. Thanks to the selection of Sunday as the day of the explosion, no one was hurt.



The controlling sentiment about the loss of the Maria Teresa was that it was a bit of very hard luck for Lieutenant Hobson that, after he had been at such pains to bring her up from the bottom of the sea, she should not have kept afloat. On Tuesday, November 1, being on her way from Guantanamo to Norfolk, under command of Lieutenant-Commander Ira Harris, in company with the collier Leonidas, and in tow of the wrecking-tugs Vulcan and Merritt, she was abandoned in a heavy northeast gale, about thirty miles north of San Salvador. All her crew were taken off and saved. Commander Harris reached Charleston on the Merritt on November 5, and reported his loss to the Navy Department. According to his report, the storm began about one o'clock on the morning of November 1. As it increased and the sea rose, the ship leaked badly, and the sea broke over her bows, making trouble for the forward pumps. Then water got into the forward fire-room, swashing the coal about and choking more pumps. It became difficult to keep up a serviceable amount of steam, and the mariners passed a laborious and very disagreeable night. About one o'clock P.M. Commander Harris determined that the ship was no longer tenable, and began to transfer his men to the Merritt. This was accomplished with great labor. At 5.30 the Vulcan, which up to that time had towed the Maria Teresa, slipped her hawser and cast her off. The Merritt then lost sight of the war-ship, and could not find her again, though twenty hours were spent in a search for her.

On Monday, November 7, a report reached New York that a steamer with two funnels, believed to be the Maria Teresa, was ashore on Cat Island. The report being confirmed, the Vulcan was sent from Norfolk, under command of Captain McCalla, and the Potomac from Guantanamo, in charge of Captain Converse, to investigate and take action. Lieutenant Hobson went with the Vulcan to get his old friend afloat again if she is found.

One result of the election that we have reason to be thankful for is the defeat of James Hamilton Lewis, of Washington State, Fusionist candidate for Congress. Lewis, whose portrait made a memorable appearance in the WEEKLY last spring, is a political blatherskite, who believes in advertising, and would far rather be known as a fool than not known at all. There are good and sensible people in the State of Washington who must feel relieved by the assurance that after next March they will no longer be represented in Congress by a mountebank.

It is evident from the verdict of the coroner's jury on the death of Harold Frederic that the British mind lacks the imaginative powers which would qualify it to deal with Christian Science in a manner satisfactory to Christian Scientists. The doctors whom the coroner summoned testified that Mr. Frederic had heart-disease and rheumatic fever, but would in all human probability have got over his illness if he had had proper care. The evidence was that he was too ill to take the responsibility for his own treatment, and that Mrs. Mills and Miss Lyon, who assumed that responsibility, had neglected to call in medical aid, and had themselves done nothing for him which the jury was able to regard as useful. The verdict was manslaughter. The accused were committed for trial and admitted to bail.

Next day, November 9, they were arraigned in the police court at Henley and remanded for a week. There is much interest in the case in this country, and its issue will be watched with close attention. Mrs. Mills was examined by the coroner as to her theories, and made glib statements of them which absolutely failed to convey any ideas to the minds of the coroner or his jury. A theory of the ascendency of mind over matter and of truth over error may never appeal to the British mind as a satisfactory preliminary to a funeral.

HON. DAVID AMES WELLS.

Born, June 17, 1828. Died, November 5, 1898.—[See Page 1123.]

The unsettled state of Europe has caused the German Emperor to cut short his visit in Palestine, and at this writing he is on his way home. His intention of stopping at some port of Spain is matter of much speculation. Only the sons of the prophets can speak with assurance in advance about William's purposes, but a despatch from Madrid, dated November 10, declares positively that he will land at Cartagena, visit Madrid, and take ship again at Cadiz; that he and the Empress will travel incognito while in Spain, and that his visit is expected to have important political consequences. A despatch from Berlin dated November 11 states that he will not leave his yacht.

On November 9 the Emperor was at Damascus, and went to a banquet, where he spoke highly of Saladin, and assured the Mohammedans of his imperial friendship. Among the more conspicuous political results of his tour have been the strengthening of his friendship with the Sultan, the propping up of the Sultan's throne, the weakening of the prestige of France as the protector of Catholics in the East, the placation of German Catholics by his gift of the Blessed Virgin's former residence to the Pope, and the gratification of German Protestants by the acquisition of important trade privileges in the East. German merchants, it seems, are to have the commercial port at Haidhr Pacha; the German railway from Bagdad to the Mediterranean is to be completed; the construction of a new railroad to connect the Sea of Marmora with the Persian Gulf is to fall into German hands; and the outlook for German commercial supremacy in Asia Minor is extremely promising. Besides all else, the Kaiser has undoubtedly had a first-rate time, and has advanced in an important degree his claim to rank as the Theodore Roosevelt of Europe. It is a great year for the political centre rushes; and so England seems to feel, judging by the vigorous way in which she still continues to scour her war-ships, and fill them with fighting-men and coal and victuals.

The most conspicuous result of the election is a large Republican loss in the House and a very important Republican gain in the Senate. In the Fifty-fifth Congress, which lasts until next March, the Republicans have controlled the House by a majority of about fifty, but were weak in the Senate, and unable to command a majority for all party measures. In the Fifty-sixth Congress, beginning March 4, 1899, the Republicans will have a majority of about twenty in the House and a majority of from twenty to twenty-five in the Senate. This strong Republican majority in the Senate is reasonably sure to outlast the present administration, and is a safeguard against free-silver legislation for a good many years to come. The States in which the Republican Congressional losses occurred were Illinois (three), Kentucky (one), Maryland (two), Massachusetts (two), Missouri (one), New Jersey (two), New York (thirteen), North Carolina (one), Pennsylvania (seven), Virginia (four), West Virginia (one) —in all thirty-seven members. The States in which the Republicans gained Congressmen were California (three), Delaware (one), Kansas (five), Michigan (two), Nebraska (one), Ohio (one), South Dakota (two), Washington (two) —in all seventeen. Populism in Kansas has been overwhelmed. Quayism is doubtless responsible for Republican losses in the Congressional districts, though Quay's candidate for Governor, Stone, was elected by a plurality estimated at 125,000. Greater New York elected a solid body of sixteen Democratic Congressmen. Two others were elected in other districts of the State, so that eighteen out of New York's thirty-four coming Congressmen are Democrats. Roosevelt's election as Governor of New York by a plurality of 17,634 is accompanied by the election of a Republican Legislature, which insures a Republican successor to Senator Murphy. Other Senators who will lose their seats and will have Republican successors are White of California, Gray of Delaware, Turpie of Indiana, Smith of New Jersey, Roach of North Dakota, Mitchell of Wisconsin, and Clark of Wyoming.

The beauties of the triumphal arch and rostral columns of the court of honor set up in Philadelphia for the recent peace jubilee are reported to have induced aspirations among the Philadelphians for a permanent reminder of the set-to we had with Spain. The T-Square Club, an organization of architects, approves the idea, and has started a fund for its realization. New York owes its Washington Arch to the public delight in a temporary arch set up for a special occasion. Perhaps Philadelphia may conclude to preserve one of her jubilee structures in marble.

The presidency of Oberlin University has been offered to Dr. John Henry Barrows, a distinguished preacher of Chicago, who lately returned to that town after a missionary lecturing tour in India, China, and Japan. Dr. Barrows is one of the eminent clergymen whose names have lately got into print as possible successors of Dr. Hall in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church in New York. He is a native of Michigan, fifty-one years old, and, besides being pastor of a church in Chicago, is a member of the faculty of the Chicago University, and a lecturer in its Divinity School.

Election brought out very serious rioting between negroes and whites in North and South Carolina. It is still difficult to get at the correct details of these occurrences, or to discover all the immediate causes of them, but the gross results in dead men are conspicuously considerable. As the results of election riots near Greenwood, South Carolina, about a dozen negroes and half as many white men are reported dead, and many others are wounded. Some of the negroes were shot; others were hanged. Still more serious, if possible, were the proceedings in Wilmington, North Carolina. In that city a newspaper, the Record, edited by a negro, published an article derogatory to white women. A mass-meeting of white citizens, called on November 9, ordered his expulsion from the city within twenty-four hours and the removal of his press. A committee of twenty-five appointed by the meeting called in fifteen prominent negroes and gave them notice of the meeting's edict. It appears that they agreed to try to comply with the demands of the committee, but their letter to that effect, being mailed instead of personally delivered to the committee's chairman, was not received in time. The editor of the Record ran away; but no action being taken about his press within the specified time, a mob of white citizens, led by former Congressman Waddell, proceeded, on November 10, to destroy the Record's press and gut its printing-office. Incidentally the mob burned the building. These proceedings agitated the negroes of the town, who feared a general massacre and began to get together. Fighting soon ensued between negroes and whites, and continued briskly during the day. About a score of negroes were killed and several whites. In the evening the Board of Aldermen resigned, one by one, the place of each being filled by his colleagues. When the board had thus been renewed the Mayor and Chief of Police resigned, and their places were filled by the new Board of Aldermen. Then 250 special policemen were sworn in, and with their help and that of three militia companies the new government hopes to restore order.

There are about 10,000 Russians members of a sect called the Doukhoborski, for whom a home is wanted somewhere, if possible in this country. The newspapers told a fortnight ago of the arrival in New York of an Englishman, Mr. Mode, who came to confer with a little group of Americans about the prospects of these people. The Americans who are interested in the matter include Mr. Howells, Mr. W. L. Garrison, Mr. Bolton Hall, Mr. Jane Addams, Mr. Ernest H. Crosby, Mr. J. N. Seligman and others. Trouble began with the Doukhoborski a century and a half ago, when some one—it is said to have been an English Quaker—taught them the doctrine of non-resistance. With it they gained, or added to, various other peculiar religious doctrines, which they believed and practised with contentment and satisfaction. But the Russian police discovered, about 1[illegible], that their piety did not conform to Russian standards, and in 1799 active persecution of them began. They were banished to the mines of Siberia, and compelled to work in chains. Later, under Alexander I., discipline relaxed, and they were allowed to hold farms in Siberia. But their unwillingness to bear arms got them into serious trouble, and subjected them to terrific punishments. In 1860 they were allowed to return to Russia, but were not been suffered to have any permanent abiding-place there, and have been driven from place to place. Meanwhile their numbers have dwindled from 25,000 to 10,000. Very recently Tolstoi got leave for them to emigrate from Russia. They are poor, but industrious, and the effort is to be made to find some spot on earth where they may live in laborious enjoyment of the privilege of [illegible] no man any harm.

E. S. MAR[illegible]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LONDON.

October 29, 1898.

A CARTOON in Punch representing France as an importunate organ-grinder with a monkey, asking John Bull what he would give him to go away, has been much condemned — in the press. I believe, however, that Mr. Burnand the editor, and Sir John Tenniel the veteran artist, have read the real mind of their undiplomatic countrymen with more perception than any of the newspaper critics. The average man, if he were honestly outspoken in public, undoubtedly does regard French government policy towards England in Egypt and elsewhere very much as the average householder views peripatetic musicians who trade on the desire for quiet in order to extort cash for the suppression of ear-splitting discords. The real reason for the unanimity of Englishmen to-day is that they are not only tired of the tail-twisting process indulged in by every French ministry, and resent successive concessions to people of that stamp, but despise the French in the mass as sincerely as when Nelson wrote to his wife on May 20, 1794, "I always was of opinion, have ever acted up to it, and never had any reason to repent it, that one Englishman is equal to three Frenchmen." Manners have improved and knowledge increased since then, and that sort of statement is no longer publicly avowed. But the conviction of serious and sober middle and working class Britons is still that the French in the mass are good dancers, fiddlers, and cooks, but that they have made themselves intolerable as neighbors, and that the time has come for England to give them a thrashing if they really wish to insist on their ridiculous pretensions with regard to the Nile Valley.

Still, war with France over Fashoda is looked on as a disagreeable necessity by the nation at large. There is no pleasure or sense of triumph among the people as a whole in their ability to whip France, but the prevailing sentiment is that they must stand firm against the claims of the French politicians. It is admitted that if there is a war it will benefit Germany and injure England, but probably break France as a leading power. It is understood that the Queen has relaxed her unflinching principles of peace at almost any price, and that Lord Salisbury has now a free hand.

The Queen is sincerely and deeply interested in Egypt and in the recovery of the Sudan to civilization and peace. General Gordon's abandonment and murder affected her Majesty personally. She shed many bitter tears over the catastrophe at Khartum thirteen years ago. Gordon's Bible, marked with his own hand, is a conspicuous object in the Long Gallery at Windsor, and is looked on by her Majesty as one of her most priceless possessions. The Queen, who is naturally well informed about everything, knows that our neighbors, the French, with all their good qualities, are not remarkable for success in their dealing with savage tribes. Indeed, a revelation recently made by a French army surgeon, of the conduct of the French in Senegal, Tonkin, and other French possessions, makes it strongly desirable that the valley of the Nile should be developed by clean-living and healthy-minded Anglo-Saxons and Anglo-Celts.

I have spared no pains to ascertain the truth about the prospects of a naval war with France if it were to break out now. Of course the unknown is a factor upon which it is idle to prophesy; but naval efficiency, the respective merits of vessels of war, the training and number of crews, marksmanship, national temperament, and coolness in action are factors which are known on both sides of the Channel and can be assessed with something like accuracy. Without going into any of the elaborate detail placed before me by the authorities I have consulted, it may be said that, on a moderate estimate of the chances of war with England, France will be virtually beaten in six weeks, although that result is not necessarily equivalent to peace. She would fight heroically, but her coasts, her colonies, her great naval cities, and her fleet would be at the mercy of England.

Sober-minded people are fully alive to the fact that the settlement of the Fashoda question with France has not removed standing troubles with that country. The Newfoundland French shore is a question that will shortly come to the front. There are many others. But whatever dispute takes place between England and France in the near future, provided we have a good case, it will not be England that will retire. If France wants war she can have it. Many people, not jingoes by conviction or heredity, consider that the psychological moment has arrived to settle up all our differences with France in Egypt, Africa, Newfoundland, New Guinea, Siam, and everywhere else. At the same time there is a prevailing sense that it would not be quite fair on the part of England to take advantage of French distractions in order to put an end to the French nagging to which Britannia has been subjected for the last fifteen years. With our fleet in its present state of efficiency we are never more likely than to-day to be in a better position to inflict condign punishment upon France with slighter loss to ourselves. It would, however, be contrary both to instinct and tradition to pick a quarrel for the purpose of declaring war. What will be done, therefore, is to take our stand on our rights.

The inherent love of peace in these islands sustains interest in the Tsar's proposals, which still continue to occupy unofficial attention. I learn from Russia that the conference will not consider burning questions. The churches, advanced Liberals, and humanitarians, in their enthusiasm, generally omit two matters which bear upon the Russian Eirenikon. The first point is that in any question of present or future disarmament the subtraction of equals from unequals gives an unequal remainder, and that therefore the result must favor the strongest powers and thus facilitate aggressive wars. The other point is that Russia has been in the past strongly in favor of altering the usages of war, nominally for humane purposes, but practically with the object of placing obstacles in the way of patriotic resistance to the parties attacked. I have previously mentioned the tentative Conference of 1874, held at Brussels. The delay (now ended) in the reply of England to the Tsar's proposal of 1898 is not improbably based on the precedent of 1875, when England, in common with the other great powers, received a proposal from the Russian government to a formal conference at St. Petersburg for the purpose of considering ruling practice on the points at issue in the usages of war. Lord Derby then bluntly declared, as Foreign Secretary, that the projected code of war urged by Russia was likely to favor the strongest party and to facilitate aggressive wars. There is a secular conflict between the Tsar, who is invariably pacific, and his advisers on foreign affairs, who are invariably ambitious and expansionist. Germany and Austria have, no doubt, the strongest desire to meet the wishes of Nicholas II. in the matter of disarmament, but the Conference of 1899 seems likely to break down on precisely the same ground as the abortive attempt of 1875—namely, on the question as to whether naval warfare, which at the Brussels Conference of 1874 was expressly excluded from the deliberations, should on the coming occasion be included among the subjects of discussion and regulated in a manner contrary to the interests of the Anglo-Saxon race.

At such a time as the present the weight of the chief organs of the English press, as exercised on the side of vigorous action, is probably a matter of interest across the Atlantic. I do not claim that the following summary analysis of the chief organs of public opinion is either exhaustive or omniscient, but it may stand, at all events, as impartial. The Times is a British institution, and, like other British institutions, it has survived many revolutions by continually adapting itself to the spirit of the age. The policy of the Times, since it possessed a policy at all, has been to stand firm for England; to denounce fraud, cant, and pretence; to protect the poor, defend just rights, and to redress real grievances. In following this policy the Times has often allied itself with the weaker side, and has sometimes found itself in the wrong. But, taken as a whole, the leading articles of the Times on grave national questions, such as that of Egypt, are certainly the weightiest, as they are distinctly the most moderate, declarations of English opinion. This paper, which has peculiar advantages in dealing with Egyptian questions, has never once screamed over Fashoda. Mr. Moberly Bell, the manager, who is currently credited with the chief share in wielding the thunder-bolts of Printing House Square, was long resident in Egypt, where he was engaged in commerce and at the same time represented the Times as its correspondent. He occasionally engages in controversy under a nom de plume, but has never yet known defeat. His knowledge of foreign affairs, and particularly of the Near East, is remarkable. There is a note of distinction in the manner in which the sedate traditions of the Times, in these days of hurry and flurry, are still maintained. The undertone of the articles that are now appearing, notwithstanding their calmness and courtesy, are noticeably hostile to France. The conductors of the Times know, behind the scenes, the maddening provocations to which English rulers in Egypt have been subjected by the French during the last fifteen years, and if there are now many men convinced that the time has arrived when the pretensions of France should be abated, it is due to the good taste as well as to the purpose and moderation with which the Times for a long series of years has dealt with our volatile neighbors. In well-known periods Kinglake has described the power and depravity of the Times. The historian attributed to the leading journal responsibility for the Crimean war. Whatever may be the justice meted out by Kinglake to the Times, there is no doubt that the paper is making history to-day in its resolve to pin Lord Salisbury to the attitude of inflexible determination which he has at last permitted himself to assume.

In point of authority the next most important journal is the infant Daily Mail, published at one cent, with an alleged circulation of over half a million daily. The Daily Mail is a marvel of sub-editing. Its foreign correspondence is sometimes of the best, at others beneath criticism. Its reputation in this department has steadily risen since Mr. G. W. Steevens, in his recent letters from the Sudan, obliterated the demarcation between literature and journalism. The leading articles of the Daily Mail, however, carry little weight. They bear marks of haste and of being the product of many minds and of young or half-informed men. Nor are they consistent. One explanation of these defects is said to be the overcrowding necessary in the editorial department until the new premises on the Thames Embankment are ready for occupation. The Daily Mail's articles, however defective in form or lacking in cogency, are never partisan. The Daily Mail is an Imperial organ, with a strong leaning to Mr Rhodes, sometimes displayed with more zeal than knowledge. It has admittedly injured its older rivals, and as a political force is not to be ignored. Next to the Times, Frenchmen quote the Daily Mail as representative of English opinion. It is controlled by Mr. Alfred Harmsworth, a modern marvel of organization and commercial courage. Whether his great fortune supports or is augmented by the Daily Mail is unknown to the public.

The Daily Telegraph is the property of Sir Edward Lawson and his family, who acquired it with his uncle, Mr. Levy. The Daily Telegraph is strongly patriotic, bright, and up to date. Since the loss of Mr. George Augustus Sala and the rise of the Daily Mail, the influence of the Daily Telegraph has declined. Sir Edwin Arnold, Mr. Le Sage, and Mr. Beatty Kingston are understood to be largely responsible for the production of the Daily Telegraph. The recent Egyptian and Sudan telegrams of Mr Bennett Burleigh tended to the restoration of the paper to its old position, but newspaper men who accept titles from government necessarily lose weight with half the reading public.

The Daily Chronicle is a curious melange of opposing forces. The editor, Mr. H.W. Massingham, is lovable and idealist. Quick to appreciate the tendencies of public opinion, and humanitarian to his finger-tips, strict political consistency is not his strong point, but the lack of it adds to the zest of his writings. He is always to be found on the side of the oppressed and the needy, and he is generally "agin" the government, whichever side is in power. Collectivist in sentiment and opinion, the Daily Chronicle often runs counter to the economic individualism of the British Philistine, but the services it has performed in educating the tax-payers to bear the burdens informed in educating the tax-payers to bear the burdens incident to the possession of a strong navy, and the unusual knowledge of foreign affairs possessed by Mr. Henry Norman, the second in command, make the Daily Chronicle one of the most interesting, if not the most insular, vehicles of public opinion. Mr. Massingham's recent exposure of the impostor de Rougemont, or Grin, is an example of his versatility and analytical power. De Rougemont having been accepted as a lecturer by the British Association, Mr. Massingham's score has attracted world-wide attention.

The Daily News is the official Liberal paper, and supports the Rosebery section of the party. At one time Mr. Labouchere had a share in this journal, but is understood to have parted with it. Mr. E. T. Cook, formerly of the Westminster Gazette, is the scholarly editor. Mr. Cook has one of the most wonderful memories of any public man of his time. I have known him listen for half an hour to a long and complicated statement of facts without taking a note, and reproduce it without a single mistake. In addition to memory, Mr. Cook has scholarship, culture, and imagination. The Daily News is an exceedingly proper paper. Mr. Herbert Paul, formerly a member of Parliament, and gifted with a mordant pen, is a force which makes the leading articles in the Daily News a living power. Mr. Paul's pen portraitures of some Liberal politicians are some of the cleverest productions of English journalism. The Daily News is largely read by non-conformists, but its influence is not now equal to that of its erratic but more brilliant competitor, the Daily Chronicle. On Fashoda the Daily News has supported the government.

The Morning Post is the property of Lord Glenesk, once Sir Algernon Borthwick. The note of the Morning Post is aristocratic, and in many great houses the ladies of the family read nothing but Lord Glenesk's paper. It is a great property, since the cooks, valets, and ladies' maids in London obtain their situations through its advertisement columns. Mr. Spencer Wilkinson, who ranks as one of the best civilian experts on strategy and armaments who have caught the public ear, is a prominent contributor to the Post, and hence some of the most powerful appeals to the public and to the ministry for stronger armaments and greater firmness in foreign policy are found in the columns of the Morning Post. Correspondence is a feature of the paper, but, as a whole, it preaches to the converted and carries little weight in the country.

Of the evening papers, the Pall Mall Gazette, owned by Mr. Astor and edited by Sir Douglas Straight, is the most liberal pennyworth. Nothing is stinted. Sir Douglas Straight has recently performed a considerable service both to journalism and the community by exposing the system of newspaper bribes offered by city men of a certain class. The particular case involved was that of a company of which Lord Dufferin is chairman. Much to the surprise of the public, the former Viceroy of India and Canada and the ex-ambassador to Paris has not yet resigned his position in the company in question. The Pall Mall has the knack of getting news earlier than its rivals. Mr. Gladstone's retirement, the Anglo-German agreement, and the result of Thursday's cabinet council are cases in point.

The Globe is published on pink paper, and, being edited by an ex-lieutenant in the navy and the son of the proprietor, Sir G. Armstrong, is one of the most outspoken of the journals against the enemies of its country. The Globe's Rabelaisian references to France, and especially to the gallant Major Marchand, during the present crisis have been more remarkable for vigor than for taste. Still the Globe is, as a rule, extremely well edited, and abounds in a certain dry humor which is rarer in these days than when Addison wrote for the Spectator.

The St. James's Gazette is owned by a foreigner and follows strict Conservative lines. The Westminster Gazette is a Liberal journal published on green paper, owned by Sir George Newnes, the newspaper king, and edited by Mr. Spender, who is probably the ablest of the editors of the evening journals. For sheer influence on public opinion I consider Mr. Spender's verdant sheet to exceed that of his more popular rivals. It has a biting common-sense that takes with the average man.

Of the weekly papers, the Spectator is easily first. Through the influence and abilities of the late R. H. Hutton, who probably exercised more power and influenced more opinion than any man outside the cabinet, the Spectator acquired a reputation for calm sagacity and philosophic analysis of burning questions which it has not wholly lost under the control of Mr. St. Loe Strachey.

A prominent example of the keener interest now felt in American affairs exists in the fact that the investigation of HARPER'S WEEKLY into the condition of "wide-open" New York under Tammany rule was telegraphed over here in considerable detail. The municipality of New York is of greater interest to English readers than that of any other city outside the empire; and the intrepid public spirit displayed by the WEEKLY is warmly appreciated.

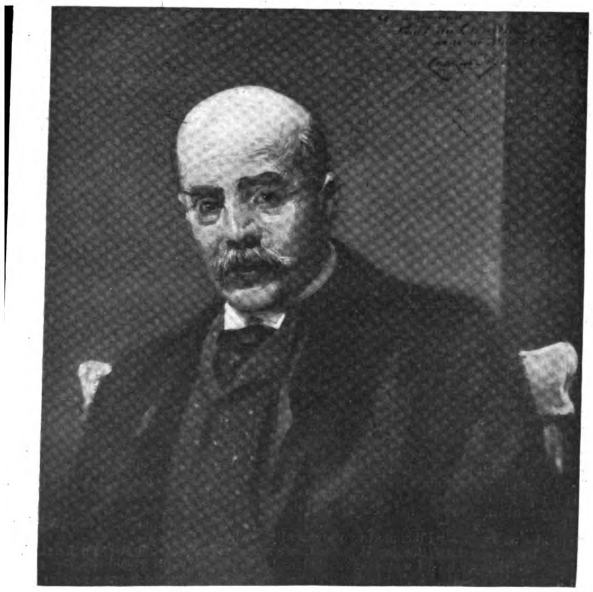
The late Emperor of Russia, whose passion for peace was his most distinguishing characteristic, was much attached to the late Queen of Denmark, his mother-in-law. Never having been educated for the throne, the burdens and cares of autocracy sat heavily upon him. The late Queen of Denmark had a shrewd tongue, and was wont to exercise it on her numerous and powerful connections. As a mother-in-law she was not deficient in those qualities attributed by barbarian and civilized nations alike to the mother of a man's wife. The Prince of Wales has not visited the Danish Court except at rare intervals. With the late Russian Emperor it was different. He enjoyed his annual visit to Fredensborg as the happiest period of his year, and his zest was enhanced by the way in which he was taken to task by his mother-in-law, who vigorously scolded him when his actions did not, in her opinion, achieve the standard she laid down for her sons-in-law. I was told on one occasion, when the Tsar was in Copenhagen, by a high functionary at the Danish Court, that the late Russian Emperor was probably the only man in Europe who looked forward to his mother-in-law's annual scoldings as one of the keenest pleasures of his life. His late Majesty was rebuked by nobody else. The contrast was novel; and to an autocrat luxurious.

ARNOLD WHITE.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SNIPE-SHOOTING.— Drawn by A. B. Frost.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



"UNRECONCILED."—F. S. Church, N.A.

ISELAND.

"DAY-DREAMS."—Irving R. Wiles, N.A.

SKETCH FOR PORTRAIT (PAUL DU CHAILLU).—Carroll Beckwith, N.A.

HIBITION OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

LLY FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."—[See Page 1135]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE AWKWARD AGE.*

A Novel.

BY HENRY JAMES,

AUTHOR OF "DAISY MILLER," "AN INTERNATIONAL EPISODE," ETC.

XVIII.

"WOULD you," the Duchess said, "be, for five minutes, awfully kind to my poor little niece?" The words were addressed, in charming entreaty, to Mr. Longdon who, issuing from the house late on the Sunday afternoon—the second evening of his stay, which the next morning was to bring to an end—encountered the speaker at one of the extremities of the wide cool terrace. There was at this point a subsidiary flight of steps by which she had just mounted from the grounds, one of her purposes being apparently to testify afresh to that anxious supervision of little Aggie from which she had momentarily suffered herself to be diverted. This young lady, established, in the pleasant shade, on a sofa, of light construction, designed for the open air, offered the image of a patience of which it was a questionable kindness to break the spell. It was that beautiful hour when, towards the close of the happiest days of summer, such places as the great terrace at Mertle present to the fancy a recall of the banquet-hall deserted—deserted by the company lately gathered at tea and now dispersed, according to affinities and combinations promptly felt and perhaps quite as promptly criticised, either in quieter chambers where intimacy might deepen or in gardens and under trees where the stillness knew the click of balls and the good-humor of games. There had been chairs, on the terrace, pushed about; there were ungathered teacups on the level top of the parapet; the servants in fact, in the manner of "hands" mustered by a whistle on the deck of a ship, had just arrived to restore things to an order soon again to be broken. There were scattered couples in sight below and an idle group on the lawn, out of the midst of which, in spite of its detachment, somebody was sharp enough sometimes to cry "Out!" The high daylight was still in the sky, but with just the foreknowledge, already, of the long golden glow in which the many-voiced caw of the rooks would sound at once sociable and sad. There was a great deal, all about, to be aware of and to look at, but little Aggie had her eyes on a book over which her pretty head was bent with a docility visible even from afar. "I've a friend—down there by the lake—to go back to," the Duchess went on, "and I'm on my way to my room to get a letter that I've promised to show him. I shall immediately bring it down, and then, in a few minutes, be able to relieve you. I don't leave her alone too much—one doesn't, you know, in a house full of people, a child of that age. Besides"—and Mr. Longdon's interlocutress was even more confiding—"I do want you, so very intensely, to know her. You, par exemple, you're what I should like to give her." Mr. Longdon looked the Duchess, in acknowledgment of her appeal, straight in the face, and who can tell whether or no she acutely guessed from his expression that he recognized this particular juncture as written on the page of his doom?—whether she heard him inaudibly say "Ah, here it is: I knew it would have to come!" She would at any rate have been astute enough, had this miracle occurred, quite to complete his sense for her own understanding and suffer it to make no difference in the tone in which she still confronted him. "Oh, I take the bull by the horns—I know you haven't wanted to know me. If you had you would have called on me—I've given you plenty of hints and little coughs. Now, you see, I don't cough any more—I just rush at you and grab you. You don't call on me—so I call on you. There isn't any indecency, moreover, that I won't commit for my child."

Mr. Longdon's impenetrability crashed like glass at the elbow-touch of this large, handsome, practised woman who walked, for him, like some brazen pagan goddess, in a cloud of queer legend. He looked off at her child, who, at a distance, and not hearing them, had not moved. "I know she's a great friend of Nanda's."

"Has Nanda told you that?"

"Often—taking such an interest in her."

"I'm glad she thinks so then—though really her interests are so various. But come to my baby. I don't make her come," she explained as she swept him along, "because I want you just to sit down by her there and keep the place, as one may say—"

"Well, for whom?" he demanded as she stopped.

It was her step that had checked itself, as well as her tongue, and again, suddenly, they stood quite consciously and vividly opposed. "Can I trust you?" the Duchess brought out. Again then she took herself up. "But as if I weren't already doing it! It's because I do trust you so utterly that I haven't been able, any longer, to keep my hands off you. The person I want the place for is none other than Mitchy himself, and half my occupation now is to get it properly kept for him. Lord Petherton's immensely kind, but Lord Petherton can't do everything. I know you really like our host—"

Mr. Longdon, at this, interrupted her with a certain coldness. "How, may I ask, do you know it?"

But with a brazen goddess to deal with—! This personage had to fix him but an instant. "Because, you dear honest man, you're here. You wouldn't be if you hated him, for you don't practically condone—"

This time he broke in with his eyes on the child. "I feel, on the contrary, I assure you, that I condone a great deal."

"Well, don't boast of your cynicism," she laughed, "till you're sure of all it covers. Let the right thing for you be," she went on, "that Nanda herself wants it."

"Nanda herself?" He continued to watch little Aggie, who had never yet turned her head. "I'm afraid I don't understand you."

She swept him on again. "I'll come to you presently and explain. I must get my letter for Petherton; after which I'll give up Mitchy, whom I was going to find, and, since I've broken the ice—if it isn't too much to say to such a polar bear!—I'll show you le fond de ma pensée. Baby darling," she said to her niece, "keep Mr. Longdon. Show him," she benevolently suggested, "what you've been reading." Then again to her fellow-visitor, as arrested by this very question: "Caro signore, have you a possible book?"

Little Aggie had got straight up and was holding out her volume, which Mr. Longdon, all courtesy for her, glanced at. "Stories from English History. Oh!"

His ejaculation, though vague, was not such as to prevent the girl from venturing gently: "Have you read it?"

Mr. Longdon, receiving her pure little smile, showed he felt that he had never so taken her in as at this moment, and also that she was a person with whom he should surely get on. "I think I must have."

Little Aggie was still more encouraged, but not to the point of keeping anything back. "It hasn't any author. It's anonymous."

The Duchess borrowed, for another question to Mr. Longdon, not a little of her gravity. "Is it all right?"

"I don't know"—his answer was to Aggie. "There have been some horrid things in English history."

"Oh, horrid—haven't there?" Aggie, whose speech had the prettiest, faintest foreignness, sweetly and eagerly quavered.

"Well, darling, Mr. Longdon will recommend to you some nice historical work—for we love history, don't we? —that leaves the horrors out. We like to know," the Duchess explained to the authority she invoked, "the cheerful, happy, right things. There are so many, after all, and this is the place to remember them. A tantôt."

As she passed into the house by the nearest of the long windows that stood open Mr. Longdon placed himself beside her little charge, whom he treated, for the next ten minutes, with an exquisite courtesy. A person who knew him well would, if present at the scene, have found occasion in it to be freshly aware that he was, in his quiet way, master of two distinct kinds of urbanity, the kind that added to distance and the kind that diminished it. Such an analyst would furthermore have noted, in respect to the aunt and the niece, of which kind each had the benefit, and might even have gone so far as to detect in him some absolute betrayal of the impression produced on him by his actual companion, some irradiation of his certitude that, from the point of view under which she had been formed, she was a remarkable, a rare success. Since to create a particular little rounded and tinted innocence had been aimed at, the fruit had been grown to the perfection of a peach on a sheltered wall, and this quality of the object resulting from a process might well make him feel himself in contact with something wholly new. Little Aggie differed from any young person he had ever met in that she had been deliberately prepared for consumption and in that, furthermore, the gentleness of her spirit had immensely helped the preparation. Nanda, beside her, was a northern savage, and the reason was partly that the elements of that young lady's nature were already, were publicly, were almost indecorously, active. They were practically there, for good or for ill; experience was still to come and what they might work out to still a mystery; but the sum would get itself done with the figures now on the slate. On little Aggie's slate the figures were yet to be written; which sufficiently accounted for the difference of the two surfaces. Both the girls struck him as lambs with the great shambles of life in their future; but while one, with its neck in a pink ribbon, had no consciousness but that of being fed from the hand with the small sweet biscuit of unobjectionable knowledge, the other struggled with instincts and forebodings, with the suspicion of its doom and the far-borne scent, in the flowery fields, of blood.

"Oh, Nanda, she's my best friend after three or four others."

"After so many?" Mr. Longdon laughed. "Don't you think that's rather a back seat, as they say, for one's best?"

"A back seat?"—she wondered with a purity!

"If you don't understand," said her companion, "it serves me right, as your aunt didn't leave me with you to teach you the slang of the day."

"The 'slang'?"—she again spotlessly speculated.

"You've never even heard the expression? I should think that a great compliment to our time if it weren't that I fear it may have been only the name that has been kept from you."

The light of ignorance in the child's smile was positively golden. "The name?" she again echoed.

She understood too little—he gave it up. "And who are all the other best friends whom poor Nanda comes after?"

"Well, there's my aunt, and Miss Merriman, and Gelsomina, and Dr. Beltram."

"And who, please, is Miss Merriman?"

"She's my governess, don't you know?—but such a deliciously easy governess."

"That, I suppose, is because she has such a deliciously easy pupil. And who is Gelsomina?" Mr. Longdon inquired.

"She's my old nurse—my old maid."

"I see. Well, one must always be kind to old maids. But who is Dr. Beltram?"

"Oh, the most intimate friend of all. We tell him everything."

There was, for Mr. Longdon, in this, with a slight uncertainty, an effect of drollery. "Your little troubles?"

"Ah, they're not always so little! And he takes them all away."

"Always?—on the spot?"

"Sooner or later," said little Aggie with serenity. "But why not?"

"Why not indeed?" he laughed. "It must be very plain sailing." Decidedly, she was, as Nanda had said, an angel, and there was a wonder in her possession, on this footing, of one of the most expressive little faces that even her expressive race had ever shown him. Formed to express everything, it scarce expressed, as yet, even a consciousness. All the elements of play were in it, but they had nothing to play with. It was a rest moreover, after so much that he had lately been through, to be with a person for whom questions were so simple. "But he sounds, all the same, like the kind of doctor whom, as soon as one hears of him, one wants to send for."

The young girl had, at this, a small light of confusion. "Oh, I don't mean he's a doctor with medicine. He's a clergyman—and my aunt says he's a saint. I don't think you have many in England," little Aggie continued to explain.

"Many saints? I'm afraid not. Your aunt's very happy to know one. We should call Dr. Beltram, in England, a priest."

"Oh, but he's English. And he knows everything we do—and everything we think."

"'We'—your aunt, your governess and your nurse? What a varied wealth of knowledge!"

"Ah, Miss Merriman and Gelsomina tell him only what they like."

"And do you and the Duchess tell him what you don't like?"

"Oh, often—but we always like him—no matter what it is. And we know that, just the same, he always likes us."

"I see then, of course," said Mr. Longdon, very gravely now, "what a friend he must be. So it's after all this," he continued in a moment, "that Nanda comes in?"

His companion had to consider, but suddenly she caught assistance. "This one, I think, comes before." Lord Petherton, arriving apparently from the garden, had drawn near unobserved by Mr. Longdon, and the next moment was within hail. "I see him very often," she continued—"oftener than Nanda. Oh, but then Nanda. And then," little Aggie wound up, "Mr. Mitchy."

"Oh, I'm glad he comes in," Mr. Longdon returned, "though rather far down in the list." Lord Petherton was now before them, there being no one else on the terrace to speak to, and, with the odd look of an excess of physical power that almost blocked the way, he seemed to give them, in the flare of his big teeth, the benefit of a kind of brutal geniality. It was always to be remembered for him that he could scarce show without surprising you an adjustment to the smaller conveniences; so that when he took up a trifle it was not perforce, in every case, the sign of an uncanny calculation. When the elephant in the show plays the fiddle, it must be mainly with the presumption of consequent apples; which was why, doubtless, this personage had half the time the air of assuring you that, really civilized as his type had now become, no apples were required. Mr. Longdon viewed him with a vague apprehension and as if quite unable to meet the question of what he would have called, for such a person age, the social responsibility. Did this specimen of his class pull the tradition down, or did he just take it where he found it—in the very different place from that in which, on ceasing so long ago to "go out," Mr. Longdon had left it? Our friend doubtless averted himself from the possibility of a mental dilemma; if the man didn't lower the position, was it the position then that let down the man? Somehow he wasn't positively up. More evidence would be needed to decide; yet it was just of more evidence that one remained rather in dread. Lord Petherton was kind to little Aggie, kind to her companion, kind to every one, after Mr. Longdon had explained that she was so good as to be giving him the list of her dear friends. "I'm only a little dismayed," the elder man said, "to find Mr. Mitchett at the bottom."

"Oh, but it's an awfully short list, isn't it? If it consists only of me and Mitchy he's not so very low down. We don't allow her very many friends; we look out too well for ourselves." He addressed the child as on an easy jocose understanding. "Is the question, Aggie, whether we shall allow you Mr. Longdon? Won't that rather 'do' for us—for Mitchy and me? I say, Duchess," he went on as this lady reappeared, "are we going to allow her Mr. Longdon, and do we quite realize what we're about? We mount guard awfully, you know"—he carried the joke back to the person he had named. "We sift and we sort, we pick the candidates over, and I should like to hear any one say that in this case at least I don't keep a watch on my taste. Oh, we close in!"

The Duchess, with the object of her quest in her hand, had come back. "Well then, Mr. Longdon will close with us—you'll consider henceforth that he's as safe as yourself. Here's the letter that I wanted you to read—with which you'll please take a turn, in strict charge of the child, and then restore her to us. If you don't come I shall know you have found Mitchy and shall be at peace. Go, my little heart," she continued to the child, "but leave me your book to look over again. I don't know that I'm quite sure!" She sent them off together, but had a grave protest as her friend put out his hand for the volume. "No, Petherton—not for books; for her reading I can't say I do trust you. But for everything else—quite!" she declared to Mr. Longdon, with a look of conscientious courage, as their companion withdrew. "I do believe," she pursued in the same spirit, "in a certain amount of intelligent confidence. Really nice men are steadied by the sense of your having had it. But I wouldn't," she added gayly, "trust him all round!"

XIX.

Many things, at Mertle, were strange for Mr. Longdon, but nothing perhaps, as yet, had been so strange as the sight of this arrangement for little Aggie's protection—an arrangement made in the interest of her remaining as a young person of her age and her monde, as her aunt would have said, should remain. The strangest part of this impression, too, was that the provision might really have its happy side and his lordship really understand better than any one else his noble friend's whole theory of perils and precautions. The child herself, the spectator of the incident was sure enough, understood nothing, but

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2180.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the understandings that surrounded her, filling all the air, made it a heavier compound to breathe than any Mr. Longdon had yet tasted. This heaviness had grown, for him, through the long, sweet summer day, and there was something in his at last finding himself ensconced with the Duchess that made it supremely oppressive. The contact was one that, none the less, he would not have availed himself of a decent pretext to avoid; with so many fine mysteries playing about him, there was relief, at the point he had reached, rather than alarm, in the thought of knowing the worst; which it pressed upon him, somehow, that the Duchess must not only supremely know, but must, in any relation, most naturally communicate. It fluttered him rather that a person who had an understanding with Lord Petherton should so single him out as to wish for one also with himself: such a person must either have great variety of mind or have a wonderful idea of his variety. It was true indeed that Mr. Mitchett must have the most extraordinary understanding, and yet with Mr. Mitchett he now found himself quite pleasantly at his ease. Their host, however, was a person sui generis, whom he had accepted, once for all, the inconsequence of liking, in pursuance of the need he occasionally felt to put it on record that he was not narrow-minded. Perhaps at bottom he most liked Mitchy because Mitchy most liked Nanda; there hung about him still, moreover, the faded fragrance of the superstition that hospitality not declined is one of the things that "oblige." It obliged the thoughts, for Mr. Longdon, as well as the manners, and, in the especial form in which he was now committed to it, would have made him, had he really thought any ill, ask himself what the deuce then he was doing in the man's house. All of which didn't prevent some of Mitchy's queer condonations—if condonations in fact they were—from not wholly, by themselves, soothing his vague unrest, an unrest which never had been so great as at the moment he heard the Duchess abruptly say to him: "Do you know my idea about Nanda? It's my particular desire that you should—the reason, really, why I've thus laid violent hands on you. Nanda, my dear man, should marry at the very first moment."

This was more interesting than he had expected, and the effect produced by his interlocutress, and doubtless not lost on her, was shown in his suppressed start. "There has been no reason why I should attribute to you any judgment of the matter; but I've had one myself, and I don't see why I shouldn't say frankly that it's very much the one you express. It would be a very good thing."

"A very good thing, but none of my business?"—the Duchess's briskness was not unamiable.

It was on this circumstance that her companion for an instant perhaps meditated. "It's probably not in my interest to say that—I should give you too easy a retort. It would strike any one as quite as much your business as mine."

"Well, it ought to be somebody's, you know. One would suppose it to be her mother's—her father's; but in this country the parents are even more emancipated than the children. Suppose, really, since it appears to be nobody's affair, that you and I should make it ours. We needn't either of us," she continued, "be concerned for the other's reasons, though I'm perfectly ready, I assure you, to put my cards on the table. You have your feelings—we know they're beautiful. I, on my side, have mine—for which I don't pretend anything but that they're strong. They can dispense with being beautiful when they're so perfectly settled. Besides, I may mention, they're rather nice than otherwise. Edward and I have a cousinage, though for all he does to keep it up—! If he leaves his children to play in the street, I take it seriously enough to make an occasional dash for them before they're run over. And I want for Nanda simply the man she herself wants—it isn't as if I wanted for her a dwarf or a hunchback or a coureur or a drunkard. Vanderbank's a man whom any woman, don't you think? might be—whom more than one woman is—glad of for herself: beau comme le jour, awfully conceited and awfully patronizing, but clever and successful and yet liked, and without, so far as I know, any of the terrific appendages which, in this country, so often diminish the value of even the pleasantest people. He hasn't five horrible unmarried sisters for his wife to have always on a visit. The way your women don't marry is the ruin, here, of society, and I've been assured in good quarters—though I don't know so much about that—the ruin also of conversation and of literature. Isn't it precisely just a little to keep Nanda herself from becoming that kind of appendage—say to poor Harold, say, one of these days, to her younger brother and sister—that friends like you and me feel the importance of bestirring ourselves in time? Of course she's portance of bestirring ourselves in time? Of course she's supposedly young, but she's really any age you like: your London world so fearfully batters and bruises them."

She had gone fast and far, but it had given Mr. Longdon time to feel himself well afloat. There were so many things in it all to take up that he laid his hand—of which, he was not unconscious, the feebleness exposed him—on the nearest. "Why, I'm sure her mother—after twenty years of it—is fresh enough."

"Fresh? You find Mrs. Brook fresh?"

The Duchess had a manner that, in its all-knowingness, rather humiliated than encouraged; but he was all the more resolute for being conscious of his own reserves. "It seems to me it's fresh to look about thirty."

"That indeed would be perfect. But she doesn't—she looks about three. She simply looks a baby."

"Oh Duchess, you're really too particular!" he returned, feeling that, as the trodden worm will turn, anxiety itself may sometimes tend to wit.

She met him in her own way. "I know what I mean. My niece is a person I call fresh. It's warranted, as they say in the shops. Besides," she went on, "if a married woman has been knocked about, that's only a part of her condition. Ella l'a bien roulu, and if you're married you're married; it's the smoke—or call it the soot!—of the fire. You know, yourself," she roundly pursued, "that Nanda's situation appalls you."

"Oh, 'appalls'!" he restrictively murmured.

It even tried a little his companion's patience. "There you are, you English—you'll never face your own music. It's amazing what you'd rather do with a thing—anything not to shoot or to make money with—than look at its meaning. If I wished to save the girl as you wish it, I should know exactly from what. But why differ about reasons," she asked, "when we're at one about the fact? I don't mention the greatest of Vanderbank's merits," she added—"his having so delicious a friend. By whom, let me hasten to assure you," she laughed, "I don't in the least mean Mrs. Brook! She is delicious, if you like, but believe me when I tell you, caro mio—if you need to be told—that for effective action on him you're worth twenty of her."

What was most visible in Mr. Longdon was that, however it came to him, he had rarely before, all at once, had so much given him to think about. Again the only way to manage was to take what came uppermost. "By effective action you mean action on the matter of his proposing for Nanda?"

The Duchess's assent was noble. "You can make him propose—you can make, I mean, a sure thing of it. You can doter the bride." Then as with the impulse to meet benevolently, and more than half-way, her companion's imperfect apprehension: "You can settle on her something that will make her a parti." His apprehension was perhaps imperfect, but it could still lead somehow to his flushing all over, and this demonstration the Duchess as quickly took into account. "Poor Edward, you know, won't give her a penny."

Decidedly, she went fast, but Mr. Longdon, in a moment, had caught up. "Mr. Vanderbank—your idea is—would require on the part of his wife something of that sort?"

"Pray, who wouldn't—in the world we all move in—require it quite as much? Mr. Vanderbank, I'm assured, has no means of his own at all, and if he doesn't believe in impecunious marriages it's not I who shall be shocked at him. For myself, I simply despise them. He has nothing but a poor official salary. If it's enough for one, it would be little for two, and would be still less for half a dozen. They're just the people to have, that blessed pair, a fine old English family."

Mr. Longdon was now fairly abreast of it. "What it comes to then, the idea you're so good as to put before me, is to bribe him to take her."

The Duchess remained bland, but she fixed him. "You say that as if you were scandalized, but if you try Mr. Van with it, I don't think he'll be. And you won't persuade me," she went on finely, "that you haven't, yourself, thought of it." She kept her eyes on him, and the effect of them, soon enough visible in his face, was such as presently to make her exult at her felicity. "You're of a limpidity, dear man!—you've only to be nudged and you confess. Consciously or unconsciously—the former, really, I'm inclined to think—you've wanted him for her." She paused an instant to enjoy her triumph; after which she continued: "And you've wanted her for him. I make you out, you'll say—for I see you coming—one of those horrible benevolent busybodies who are the worst of the class, but you've only to think a little—if I may go so far—to see that no 'making' at all is required. You're only one link with the Brooks, but that link is golden. How can we, all of us, by this time, not have grasped and admired the beauty of your feeling for Lady Julia? There it is—I make you wince: to speak of it is to profane it. Let us by all means not speak of it then, but let us act on it." He had at last turned his face from her, and it now took in, from the vantage of his high position, only the loveliness of the place and the hour, which included a glimpse of Lord Petherton and little Aggie, who, down in the garden, slowly strolled in familiar union. Each had a hand in the other's, swinging easily as they went; their talk was evidently of flowers and fruits and birds; it was quite like father and daughter. And one could see half a mile off, in short, that they weren't flirting. Our friend's bewilderment came in odd, cold gusts; these were unreasoned and capricious; one of them, at all events, during his companion's pause, must have roared in his ears. Was it not therefore through some continuance of the sound that he heard her go on speaking? "Of course you know the poor child's own condition."

It took him a good while to answer. "Do you know it?" he asked with his eyes still away.

"If your question's ironical," she laughed, "your irony's perfectly wasted. I should be ashamed of myself if, with my relationship and my interest, I hadn't made sure. Nanda's fairly sick—as sick as a little cat—with her passion." It was with an intensity of silence that Mr. Longdon appeared to accept this; he was even so dumb for a minute that the oddity of the image could draw from him no natural sound. The Duchess once more, accordingly, recognized an opportunity. "It has doubtless already occurred to you that, since your sentiment for the living is the charming fruit of your sentiment for the dead, there would be a sacrifice to Lady Julia's memory more exquisite than any other."

At this, finally, Mr. Longdon turned. "The effort—on the lines you speak of—for Nanda's happiness?"

She fairly glowed with hope. "And, by the same token, such a piece of poetic justice! Quite the loveliest, it would be, I think, one had ever heard of."

So, for some time more, they sat confronted. "I don't quite see your difficulty," he said at last. "I do happen to know, I confess, that Nanda herself extremely desires the execution of your project."

His friend's smile betrayed no surprise at this fruit of her eloquence. "You're bad at dodging, Nanda's desire is, inevitably, to stop off, for herself, every question of any one but Vanderbank. If she wants me to succeed in arranging with Mr. Mitchett, can you ask for a plainer sign of her private predicament? But you've signs enough, I see"—she caught herself up: "we may take them all for granted. I've seen perfectly from the first that the only difficulty would come from her mother—but also that that would be stiff."

The movement with which Mr. Longdon removed his glasses might have denoted a certain fear to participate in too much of what the Duchess could see. "I've not been ignorant that Mrs. Brookenham favors Mr. Mitchett."

But he was not to be let off with that. "Then you've not been blind, I suppose, to her reason for doing so." He not been blind, I suppose, to her reason for doing so." He might not have been blind, but his vision, at this, scarce showed sharpness, and it determined in his interlocutress the shortest of short-cuts. "She favors Mr. Mitchett because she wants 'old Van' for herself."

He was evidently conscious of looking at her hard. "In what sense—for herself?"

"Ah, you must supply the sense; I can give you only the fact—and it's the fact that concerns us. Voyons," she almost impatiently broke out; "don't try to create unnecessary obscurities by being unnecessarily modest. Besides, I'm not touching your modesty. Supply any sense whatever that may miraculously satisfy your fond English imagination: I don't insist in the least on a bad one. She does want him for herself—that's all I say. 'Pourquoi faire?' you ask—or rather, being too shy, don't ask, but would like to if you dared, or didn't fear I'd be shocked. I can't be shocked, but, frankly, I can't tell you either. The situation belongs, I think, to an order I don't understand. I understand either one thing or the other—I understand taking a man up or letting him alone. But I don't, really, get at Mrs. Brook. You must judge, at any rate, for yourself. He could, of course, tell you if he would—but it wouldn't be right that he should. So the one thing we have to do with is that she's in fact against us. I can only work Mitchy through Petherton, but Mrs. Brook can work him straight. On the other hand that's the way you, my dear man, can work Vanderbank."

One thing, evidently, beyond the rest, as an effect of this vivid demonstration, disengaged itself to Mr. Longdon's undismayed sense, but his consternation needed a minute or two to produce it. "I can absolutely assure you that Mr. Vanderbank entertains no sentiment for Mrs. Brookenham—"

"That he may not keep under by just setting his teeth and holding on? I never dreamed that he does, and have nothing so alarming in store for you—rassurez-vous bien!—as to propose that he shall be invited to sink a feeling for the mother in order to take one up for the child. Don't, please, flutter out of the whole question by a premature scare. I never supposed it's he who wants to keep her. He's not in love with her—be comforted! But she's amusing—highly amusing. I do her perfect justice. As your women go, she's rare. If she were French she'd be a femme d'esprit. She has invented a nuance of her own, and she has done it all by herself, for Edward figures in her drawing-room only as one of those queer extinguishers of fire in the corridors of hotels. He's just a bucket on a peg. The men, the young and the clever ones, find it a house—and Heaven knows they're right—with freedom of talk. You'll tell me we go farther in Italy, and I won't deny it, but in Italy we have the common-sense not to have little girls in the room. The young men hang about Mrs. Brook and the clever ones ply her with the uproarious appreciation that keeps her up to the mark. She's in a prodigious fix—she must sacrifice either her daughter or what she once called to me her intellectual habits. Mr. Vanderbank, you've seen for yourself, is one of the most cherished, the most confirmed, of these. Three months ago—it couldn't be any longer kept off—Nanda began definitely to 'sit'—to be there and look, by the tea table, modestly and conveniently abstracted."

"I beg your pardon—I don't think she looks that, Duchess," Mr. Longdon lucidly broke in. How much she had carried him with her in spite of himself was betrayed by the very terms of his dissent. "I don't think it would strike any one that she looks 'convenient.'"

His companion, laughing, gave a shrug. "Try her and perhaps you'll find her so!" But his objection had none the less pulled her up a little. "I don't say she's a hypocrite, for it would certainly be less decent for her to giggle and wink. It's Mrs. Brook's theory moreover, isn't it? that she has, from five to seven at least, lowered the pitch. Doesn't she pretend that she bears in mind every moment the tiresome difference made by the presence of sweet virginal eighteen?"

"I haven't, I'm afraid, a notion of what she pretends!"

Mr. Longdon had spoken with a curtness to which his friend's particular manner of overlooking it only added significance. "They've become," she pursued, "superficial or insincere or frivolous, but at least they've become, with the way the drag's put on, quite as dull as other people."

He showed no sign of taking this up; instead of it he said abruptly: "But if it isn't Mr. Mitchett's own idea—?"

His fellow-visitor barely hesitated. "It would be his own if he were free—and it would be Lord Petherton's for him. I mean by his being free Nanda's becoming definitely lost to him. Then it would be impossible for Mrs. Brook to continue to persuade him, as she does now, that by a waiting game he'll come to his chance. His chance will cease to exist, and he wants so, poor darling, to marry. You've really now seen my niece," she went on. "That's another reason why I hold you can help me."

"Yes—I've seen her."

"Well, there she is." It was as if, in the pause that followed this, they sat looking at little absent Aggie with a wonder that was almost equal. "The good God has given her to me," the Duchess said at last.

"It seems to me then that she herself is, in her remarkable loveliness, really your help."

"She will be doubly so if you give me proofs that you believe in her." And the Duchess, appearing to consider that with this she had made herself clear and her interlocutor plastic, rose in confident majesty. "I leave it to you."

Mr. Longdon did the same, but with more consideration now. "Is it your expectation that I will speak to Mr. Mitchett?"

"Don't flatter yourself he won't speak to you!"

Mr. Longdon wondered. "As supposing me, you mean, an interested party?"

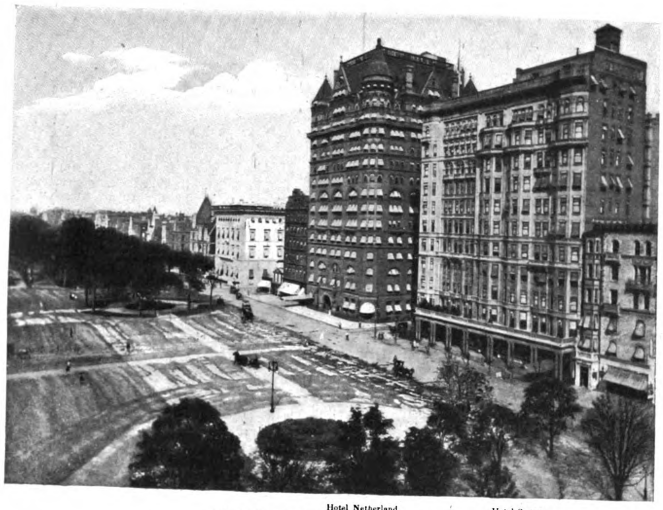
She clapped her gloved hands with joy. "It's a delight to hear you practically admit that you are one! Mr. Mitchett will take anything from you—above all perfect candor. It isn't every day one meets your kind, and he's a connoisseur. I leave it to you—I leave it to you."

She spoke as if it were something she had thrust bodily into his hands and wished to hurry away from. He put his hands behind him—straightening himself a little, half kindled, still half confused. "You're all extraordinary people!"

She gave a toss of her head that showed a limited enthusiasm. "You're the best of us, caro mio—you and Aggie, for Aggie's as good as you. Mitchy's good too, however—Mitchy's beautiful. You see it's not only his money. He's a gentleman. So are you. There aren't so many. But we must move fast," she added more sharply.

"What do you mean by fast?"

"What should I mean but what I say? If Nanda doesn't get a husband early in the business—"

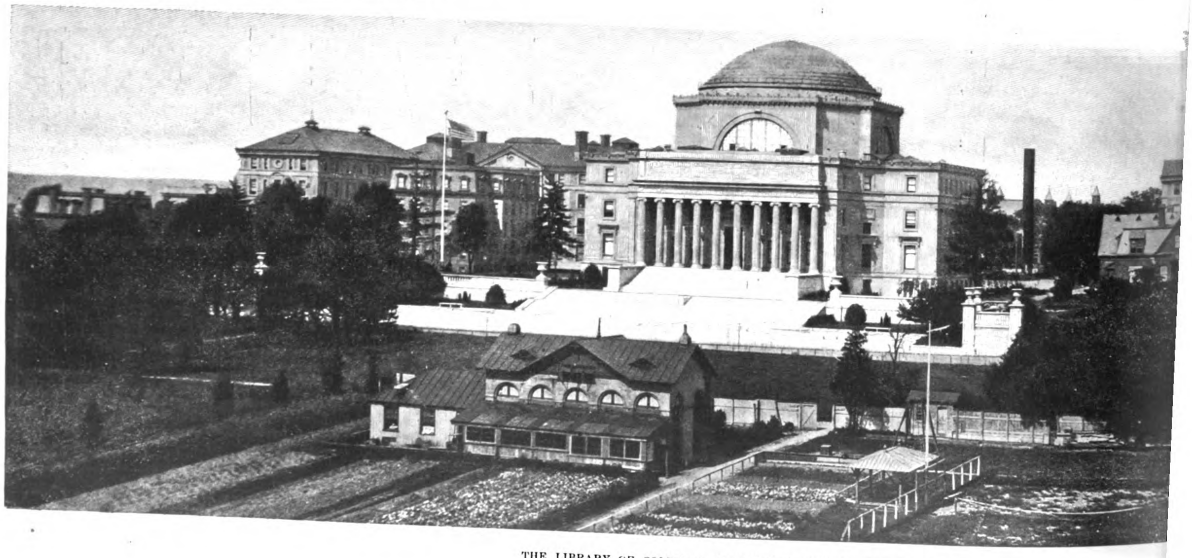


"Well?" said Mr. Longdon, as she appeared to pause with the weight of her idea.

"Why, she won't get one late—she won't get one at

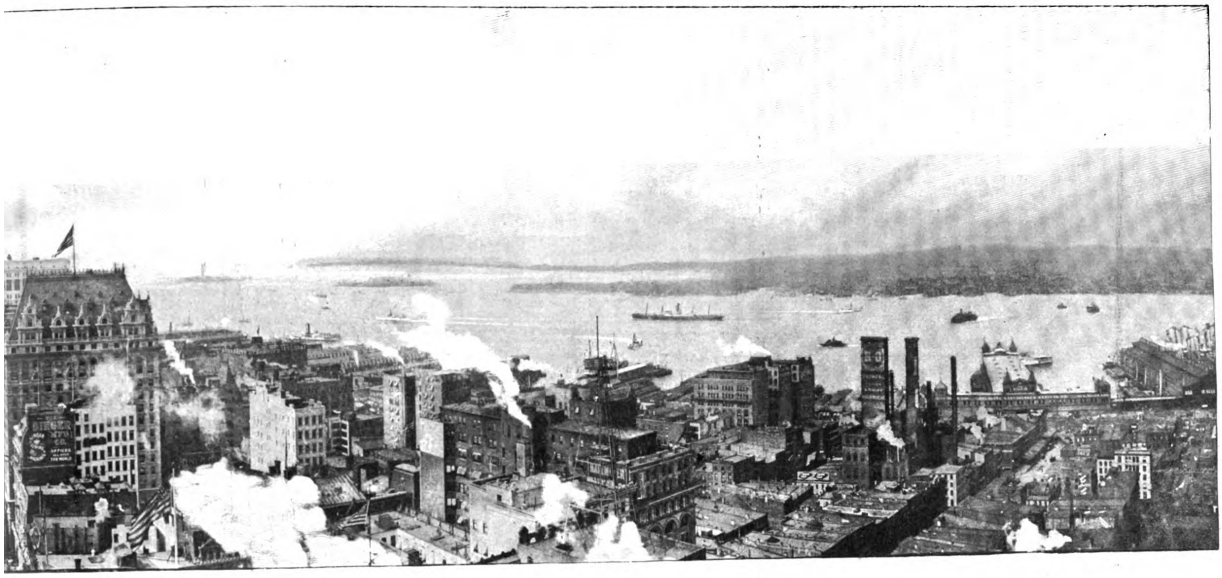
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PANORAMIC VIEW OF LOWER NEW YORK, SH

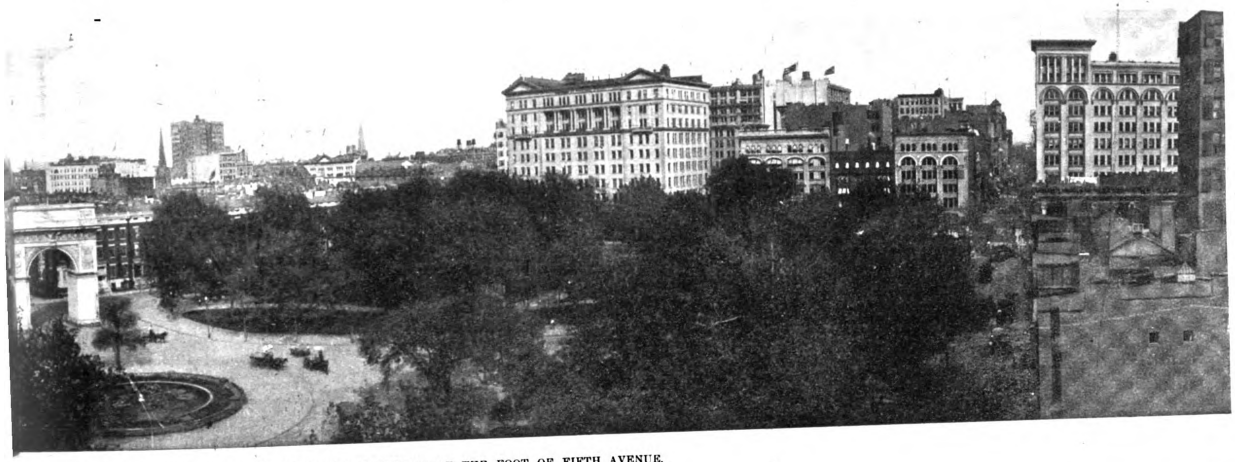


Hotel Netherland.

THE PLAZA, FIFTY-NINTH STREET.

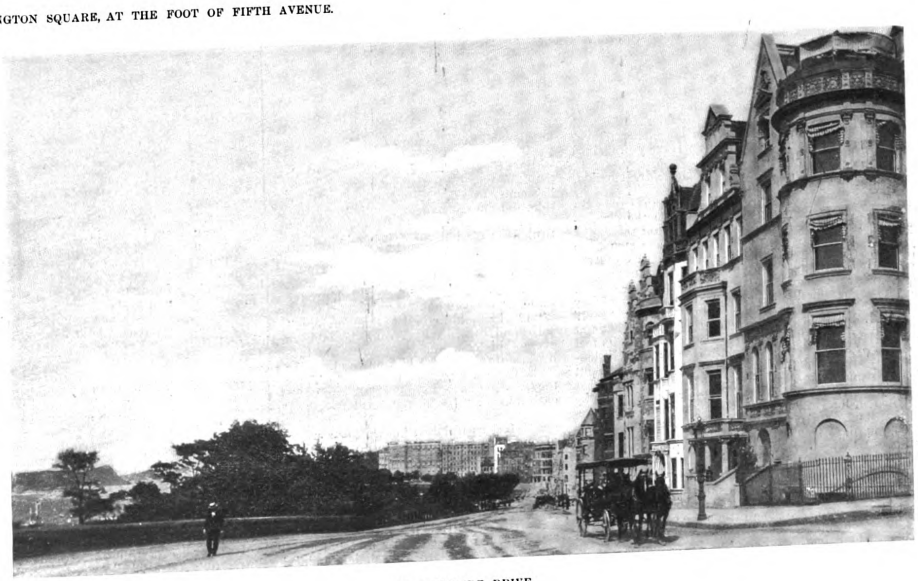


Hotel Savoy.



THE LIBRARY OF COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY, MORNINGSIDE HEIGHTS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



ING THE MULTIPLICATION OF SKY-SCRAPERS.

THE WASHINGTON ARCH AND WASHINGTON SQUARE, AT THE FOOT OF FIFTH AVENUE.

ON RIVERSIDE DRIVE.

WS OF NEW YORK CITY.—From Recent Photographs.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

all. One, I mean, of the kind she'll take. She'll have been in it long for their taste."

She had moved, looking off and about her—little Aggie always on her mind—to the flight of steps, where she again hung fire; and had really succeeded in producing in him the manner of keeping up with her to challenge her. "Been in what?"

She went down a few steps while he stood with his face full of perceptions strained and scattered. "Why, in the air they themselves have made for her!"

XX.

Late that night, in the smoking-room at Mertle, as the smokers—talkers and listeners alike—were about to disperse, Mr. Longdon asked Vanderbank to stay, and then it was that the young man, to whom, all the evening, he had not addressed a word, could make out why, a little unnaturally, he had prolonged his vigil. "I've something particular to say to you, and I've been waiting. I hope you don't mind. It's rather important." Vanderbank expressed, on the spot the liveliest desire to oblige him and, quickly lighting another cigarette, mounted again to the deep divan with which a part of the place was furnished. The smoking-room at Mertle was not unworthy of the general nobleness, and the fastidious spectator had clearly been reckoned on in the great leather-covered lounge that, raised by a step or two above the floor, applied its back to two quarters of the wall and enjoyed, most immediately, a view of the billiard table. Mr. Longdon continued, for a minute, to roam with the air of dissimulated absence that, during the previous hour and among the other men, his companion's eye had not lost; he pushed a ball or two about, examined the form of an ash-stand, swung his glasses almost with violence and declined either to smoke or to sit down. Vanderbank, perched aloft on the bench and awaiting developments, had a little the look of some prepossessing criminal who, in court, should have changed places with the judge. He was unlike many a man of marked good looks in that the effect of evening dress was not, with a perversity often observed in such cases, to overemphasize his fineness. His type was rather chastened than heightened, and he sat there moreover with a primary gravity quite in the note of the deference that, from the first, with this friend of the elder fashion, he had taken as imposed. He had a strong sense for shades of respect and was now careful to loll scarcely more than with an official superior. "If you ask me," Mr. Longdon presently continued, "why, at this hour of the night—after a day at best too heterogeneous—I don't keep over till to-morrow whatever I may have to say, I can only tell you that I appeal to you now because I've something on my mind that I shall sleep the better for being rid of."

There was space to circulate in front of the dais, where he had still paced and still swung his glasses; but with these words he had paused, leaning against the billiard table, to meet the interested gayety of the reply they produced. "Are you very sure that, having got rid of it, you will sleep? Is it a pure confidence," Vanderbank said, "that you do me the honor to make to me? Is it something terrific that requires a reply, so that I shall have to take account, on my side, of the rest I may deprive you of?"

"Don't take account of anything—I'm myself a man who always takes too much. It isn't a matter about which I press you for an immediate answer. You can give me no answer, probably, without a good deal of thought. I've thought a good deal—otherwise I wouldn't speak. I only want to put something before you and leave it there."

"I never see you," said Vanderbank, "that you don't put something before me."

"That sounds," his friend returned, "as if I rather overloaded—what's the sort of thing you fellows nowadays say?—your intellectual board. If there's a congestion of dishes, sweep everything, without scruple, away. I've never put before you anything like this."

He spoke with a weight that, in the great space, where it resounded a little, made an impression—an impression marked by the momentary pause that fell between them. He partly broke the silence, first, by beginning to walk again, and then Vanderbank broke it as through the apprehension of their becoming perhaps too solemn. "Well, you immensely interest me, and you really couldn't have chosen a better time. A secret—for we shall make it that, of course, sha'n't we?—at this witching hour, in this great old house, is all that my visit here will have required to make the whole thing a rare remembrance. So, I assure you, the more you put before me the better."

Mr. Longdon took up another ash-tray, but with the air of doing so as a direct consequence of Vanderbank's tone. After he had laid it down, he put on his glasses; then, fixing his companion, he brought out: "Have you no idea at all—?"

"Of what you have in your head? Dear Mr. Longdon, how should I have?"

"Well, I'm wondering if I shouldn't perhaps have a little in your place. There's nothing that, in the circumstances, occurs to you as likely for me to want to say?"

Vanderbank gave a laugh that might have struck an auditor as slightly uneasy. "When you speak of 'the circumstances' you do a thing that—unless you mean the simple thrilling ones of this particular moment—always, of course, opens the door of the lurid for a man of any imagination. To such a man you've only to say 'Boh!' in a certain tone for his conscience to jump. That's at any rate the case with mine. It's never quite on its feet—so it's now, already, on its back." He stopped a little—so his smile was a trifle strained. "Is what you want to put before me something awful I've done?"

"Excuse me if I press this point"—Mr. Longdon spoke kindly, but if his friend's want of ease grew his own thereby diminished. "Can you think of nothing at all?"

"Do you mean that I've done?"

"No, but that—whether you've done it or not—I may have become aware of."

There could have been no better proof than Vanderbank's expression, on this, of his having mastered the secret of humoring without appearing to patronize. "I think you ought to give me a little more of a clew."

Mr. Longdon took off his glasses. "Well—the clew's Nanda Brookenham."

"Oh, I see." Vanderbank had responded quickly, but for a minute he said nothing more, and the great marble clock that gave the place the air of a club ticked louder in the stillness. Mr. Longdon waited with a benevolent want of mercy, yet with a look in his face that spoke of what depended for him—though indeed very far within—on the upshot of his patience. The hush, for that matter, between them, became a conscious, public measure of the young man's honesty. He evidently at last felt it as such, and there would have been for an observer of his hand, some, controlled face a study of some sharp things. "I judge that you ask me for an utterance," he finally said, "that very few persons, at any time, have the right to expect of a man. Think of the people—and very decent ones—to whom, on many a question, one can only reply at best that it's none of their business."

"I see you know what I mean," said Mr. Longdon.

"Then you know also the distinguished exception I make of you. There isn't another man with whom I'd talk of it."

"And even to me you don't! But I'm none the less obliged to you," Mr. Longdon added.

"It isn't only the gravity," his friend went on; "it's the ridicule that inevitably attaches—"

The manner in which Mr. Longdon indicated the empty room was in itself an interruption. "Don't I sufficiently spare you?"

"Thank you, thank you," said Vanderbank.

"Besides, it's not for nothing."

"Of course not!" the young man returned; but with a look of noting, the next moment, a certain awkwardness in his concurrence. "But don't spare me now."

"I don't mean to." Mr. Longdon had his back to the table again, on which he rested with each hand on the rim. "I don't mean to," he repeated.

His companion gave a laugh that betrayed at least the drop of a tension. "Yet I don't quite see what you can do to me."

"It's just what, for some time past, I've been trying to think."

"And at last you've discovered?"

"Well—it has finally glimmered out a little in this extraordinary place."

Vanderbank frankly wondered. "In consequence of anything particular that has happened?"

Mr. Longdon had a pause. "For an old idiot who notices as much as I, something particular is always happening. If you're a man of imagination—"

"Oh," Vanderbank broke in, "I know how much more, in that case, you're one! It only makes me regret," he continued, "that I've not attended more, since yesterday, to what you've been about."

"I've been about nothing but what, among you people, I'm always about. I've been seeing, feeling, thinking. That makes no show, of course I'm aware, for any one but myself, and it's wholly my own affair. Except indeed," he added, "so far as I've taken into my head to make, on it all, this appeal to you. There are things that have come home to me."

"Oh, see, I see"—Vanderbank showed the friendliest alertness. "I'm to take it from you then, with all the avidity of my vanity, that I strike you as the person best able to understand what they are."

Mr. Longdon appeared to wonder an instant if his intelligence now had not almost too much of a glitter; he kept the same position, his back against the table, and while Vanderbank, on the settee, pressed, upright, against the wall, they recognized in silence that they were sounding each other. "You're much the best of them. I have my ideas about you. You've great gifts."

"Well then, we're worthy of each other. When Greek meets Greek—!" and the young man laughed as, a little with the air of bracing himself, he folded his arms. "Here we are."

His companion looked at him a moment longer, then, turning away, went slowly round the table. On the further side of it he stopped again and, after a minute, with a nervous movement, set a ball or two in motion. "It's beautiful—but it's terrible!" he finally murmured. He had not his eyes on Vanderbank, who for a minute said nothing, and he presently went on: "To see it, and not to want to try to help—well, I can't do that." Vanderbank still neither spoke nor moved, remained as if he might interrupt something of high importance to him, and his friend, passing along the opposite edge of the table, continued to produce in the stillness, without the cue, the small click of the ivory. "How long—if you don't mind my asking—have you known it?"

Even for this, at first, Vanderbank had no answer—none but to rise from his place, come down to the floor and, standing there, look at his friend across the table. He was serious now, but without being solemn. "How can one tell? One can never be sure. A man may fancy, may wonder, but with a girl, a person so much younger than himself and so much more helpless, he feels a—what shall I call it?"

"A delicacy?" Mr. Longdon suggested.

"It may be that; the name doesn't matter; at all events he's embarrassed. He wants not to be an ass on the one side, and yet not some other kind of brute on the other."

Mr. Longdon listened with consideration—with a beautiful little air indeed of being, in his all but finally contracted state, earnestly open to information on such points from a magnificent young man. "He doesn't want, you mean, to be fatuous?—and he doesn't want to be cruel?"

Vanderbank, visibly preoccupied, produced a faint, kind smile. "Oh, you know!"

"I? I should know less than any one."

He had turned away from the table on this, and the eyes of his companion, who after an instant had caught his meaning, watched him move along the room and approach another part of the divan. The consequence of the passage was that Vanderbank's only rejoinder was presently to say: "I can't tell you how long I've imagined—have asked myself. She's so charming—so interesting, and I feel as if I had known her always. I've thought of one thing and another to do—and then, on purpose, I haven't thought at all. That has, mostly, seemed to me best."

"Then I gather," said Mr. Longdon, "that your interest in her—"

"Hasn't the same character as her interest in me?" Vanderbank had taken him up responsively, but, after speaking looked about for a match and lighted a new cigarette. "I'm sure you understand," he broke out, "what an extreme effort it is to me to talk of such things."

"Yes, yes. But it's just effort, only? It gives you no pleasure? I mean the fact of her passion," Mr. Longdon explained.

Vanderbank had really to think a little. "However much it might give me, I should probably not be a fellow to gush. I'm a self-conscious stick of a Briton."

"But even a stick of a Briton—!" Mr. Longdon hesitated. "I've gushed, in short, to you."

"About Lady Julia?" the young man frankly asked.

"Is that what you call it?"

"Say then we're sticks of Britons. You're not in any degree at all in love?"

There fell between them, before Vanderbank replied, another pause, of which he took advantage to move once more round the table. Mr. Longdon meanwhile had mounted to the high bench and sat there as if the judge were now in his proper place. At last his companion spoke. "What you're coming to is of course that you've conceived a desire."

"That's it—strange as it may seem. But, believe me, it has not been precipitate. I've watched you both."

"Oh, I knew you were watching her," said Vanderbank.

"To such a tune that I've made up my mind. I want her so to marry—" But on the odd little quaver of longing with which he brought it out the old man fairly hung.

"Well?" said Vanderbank.

"Well, so that on the day she does she'll come into the interest of a considerable sum of money—already very decently invested—that I've determined to settle upon her."

Vanderbank's instant admiration flushed across the room. "How awfully jolly of you—how beautiful!"

"Oh, there's a way to show practically your appreciation of it."

But Vanderbank, for enthusiasm, scarcely heard him. "I can't tell you how admirable I think you." Then eagerly, "Does Nanda know it?" he demanded.

Mr. Longdon, after a hesitation, spoke with comparative dryness. "My idea has been that, for the present, you alone shall."

Vanderbank also hesitated. "No other man?"

His companion looked still graver. "I need scarcely say that I depend on you to keep the fact to yourself."

"Absolutely, then, and utterly. But that won't prevent what I think of it. Nothing, for a long time, has given me such pleasure."

Shining and sincere, he had held for a minute Mr. Longdon's eyes. "Why, you do care for her."

"Immensely. Never, I think, so much as now. That sounds of a grossness, doesn't it?" he laughed. "But your announcement really lights up the mind."

His friend, for a moment, almost glowed with his joy. "The sum I've settled upon would be, I may mention, substantial, and I should of course be prepared with a clear statement—a very definite pledge—of my intentions."

"So much the better! Only"—Vanderbank suddenly pulled himself up—"to get it she must marry?"

"It's not in my interest to allow you to suppose she needn't, and it's only because of my intense wish for her marriage that I've spoken to you."

"And on the ground also, with it"—Vanderbank so far concurred—"of your quite taking for granted my only having to put myself forward."

If his friend seemed to cast about, it proved but to be for the fullest expression. Nothing, in fact, could have been more charged than the quiet way in which he presently said: "My dear boy, I back you."

Vanderbank, clearly, was touched by it. "How extraordinarily kind you are to me!" Mr. Longdon's silence appeared to reply that he was willing to let it go for that, and the young man next went on: "What it comes to then—as you put it—is that it's a way for me to add something handsome to my income."

Mr. Longdon sat for a little with his eyes attached to the green field of the billiard table, vivid in the spreading, suspended lamp-light. "I think I ought to tell you the figure I have in mind."

Another person present might have felt rather taxed either to determine the degree of provocation represented by Vanderbank's considerate smile, or to say if there was an appreciable interval before he rang out: "I think, you know, you oughtn't to do anything of the sort. Let that alone, please. The great thing is the interest—the great thing is the wish you express. It represents a view of me, an attitude toward me—!" He pulled up, dropping his arms and turning away, before the complete image.

"There's nothing in those things that need overwhelm you. It would be odd if you hadn't, yourself, about your value and your future, a feeling quite as lively as any feeling of mine. There is mine, at all events. I can't help it. Accept it. Then of the other feeling—how she moves me—I won't speak."

"You sufficiently show it!"

Mr. Longdon continued to watch the bright circle on the table, lost in which a moment he let his friend's answer pass. "I won't begin to you on Nanda."

"Don't," said Vanderbank. But in the pause that ensued each, in one way or another, might have been thinking of her for himself.

It was broken by Mr. Longdon's presently going on: "Of course what it superficially has the air of is my offering to pay you for taking a certain step. It's open to you to be grand and proud—to wrap yourself in your majesty and ask if I suppose you bribable. I haven't spoken without having thought of that."

"Yes," said Vanderbank sympathetically, "but it isn't as if you proposed to me, is it? anything dreadful. If one cares for a girl one's deucedly glad she has money. The more of anything good she has the better. I may assure you," he added with the brightness of his friendly intelligence and quite as if to show his companion the way to be least concerned—"I may assure you that, once I were disposed to act on your suggestion, I would make short work of any vulgar interpretation of my motive. I should simply try to be as magnificent as yourself." He smoked, he moved about; then he came up in another place. "I dare say you know that dear old Mitchy, under whose blessed roof we're plotting this midnight treason, would marry her like a shot and without a penny."

"I think I know everything—I think I've thought of everything. Mr. Mitchett," Mr. Longdon added, "is impossible."

Vanderbank appeared for an instant to wonder. "Wholly then through her attitude?"

"Altogether."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Again he hesitated. "You've asked her?"

"I've asked her."

Once more Vanderbank faltered. "And that's how you know?"

"About your chance? That's how I know."

The young man, consuming his cigarette with concentration, took again several turns. "And your idea is to give one time?"

Mr. Longdon had, for a minute, to turn his idea over. "How much time do you want?"

Vanderbank gave a head-shake that was both restrictive and indulgent. "I must live into it a little. Your offer has been before me only these few minutes, and it's too soon for me to commit myself to anything whatever. Except," he added gallantly, "my gratitude."

Mr. Longdon, at this, on the divan, got up, as Vanderbank had previously done, under the spring of emotion; only, unlike Vanderbank, he still stood there, his hands in his pockets and his face, a little paler, directed straight. There was disappointment in him even before he spoke. "You've no strong enough impulse—?"

His friend met him with admirable candor. "Wouldn't it seem that if I had I would by this time have taken the jump?"

"Without waiting, you mean, for anybody's money?" Mr. Longdon, for a little, cultivated a doubt. "Of course she has seemed—till now—tremendously young."

Vanderbank looked about once more for matches and occupied a time with relighting. "Till now—yes. But it's not," he pursued, "only because she's so young that—for each of us, and for dear old Mitchy too—she's so interesting." Mr. Longdon had now stepped down, and Vanderbank's eyes followed him till he stopped again. "I make out that, in spite of what you said to begin with, you're conscious of a certain pressure."

"In the matter of time? Oh yes, I do want it done. That," the old man simply explained, "is why I myself put on the screw." He spoke with the ring of impatience. "I want her got out."

"'Out'?"

"Out of her mother's house."

Vanderbank laughed, though, more immediately, he had colored. "Why, her mother's house is just where I see her!"

"Precisely; and if it only were not, we might get on faster."

Vanderbank, for all his kindness, looked still more amused. "But if it only were not, as you say, I seem to see that you wouldn't have your particular vision of urgency."

Mr. Longdon, through adjusted glasses, took him in with a look that was sad as well as sharp, then jerked the glasses off. "Oh, you understand me."

"Ah," said Vanderbank, "I'm a mass of corruption!"

"You may perfectly be, but you shall not," Mr. Longdon returned with decision, "get off on any such plea. If you're good enough for me, you're good enough, as you thoroughly know, on whatever head, for any one."

"Thank you." But Vanderbank, for all his happy appreciation, thought again. "We ought, at any rate to remember, oughtn't we? that we should have Mrs. Brook against us."

His companion faltered but an instant. "Ah, that's another thing I know. But it's also exactly why. Why I want Nanda away."

"I see, I see."

The response had been prompt, yet Mr. Longdon seemed suddenly to show that he suspected the superficial. "Unless it's with Mrs. Brook you're in love." Then on his friend's taking the idea with a mere head-shake of negation, a repudiation that might even have astonished by its own lack of surprise, "Or unless Mrs. Brook's in love with you," he amended.

Vanderbank had for this any decent gayety. "Ah, that of course may perfectly be!"

"But is it? That's the question."

He continued light. "If she had declared her passion shouldn't I rather compromise her—?"

"By letting me know?" Mr. Longdon reflected. "I'm sure I can't say—it's a sort of thing for which I haven't a measure or a precedent. In my time women didn't declare their passion. I'm thinking of what the meaning is of Mrs. Brookenham's wanting you—as I've heard it called—for herself."

Vanderbank, still with his smile, smoked a minute. "That's what you've heard it called?"

"Yes, but you must excuse me from telling you by whom."

He was amused at his friend's discretion. "It's unimaginable. But it doesn't matter. We all call everything—anything. The meaning of it, if you and I put it so, is—well, a modern shade."

"You must deal then yourself," said Mr. Longdon, "with your modern shades." He spoke now as if the case simply awaited such dealing.

But at this his young friend was more grave. "You could do nothing?—to bring, I mean, Mrs. Brook round."

Mr. Longdon fairly started. "Propose, on your behalf, for her daughter? With your authority—to-morrow. Authorize me, and I instantly act."

Vanderbank's color again rose—his flush was complete. "How awfully you want it!"

Mr. Longdon, after a look at him, turned away. "How awfully you don't!"

The young man continued to blush. "No—you must do me justice. You've not made a mistake about me—I see in your proposal all, I think, that you can desire I should. Only you see it much more simply—and yet I can't just now explain. If it were so simple I should say to you in a moment 'Do speak to them for me'—I should leave the matter with delight in your hands. But I require time, let me remind you, and you haven't yet told me how much I may take."

This appeal had brought them again face to face, and Mr. Longdon's first reply to it was a look at his watch. "It's one o'clock."

"Oh, I require"—Vanderbank had recovered his gayety—"more than to-night!"

Mr. Longdon went off to the smaller table that still offered to view two bedroom candles. "You must take of course the time you need. I won't trouble you—I won't hurry you. I'm going to bed."

Vanderbank, overtaking him, lighted his candle for him; after which, handing it and smiling: "Shall we have conduced to your rest?"

Mr. Longdon looked at the other candle. "You're not coming to bed?"

"To my rest we shall not have conduced. I stay up a while longer."

"Good." Mr. Longdon was pleased. "You won't forget then, as we promised, to put out the lights?"

"If you trust me for the greater you can trust me for the less. Good-night."

Vanderbank had put out his hand. "Good-night." But Mr. Longdon kept him a moment. "You don't care for my figure?"

"Not yet—not yet. Please." Vanderbank seemed really to fear it, but on Mr. Longdon's releasing him with a little drop of disappointment they went together to the door of the room, where they had another pause.

"She's to come down to me—alone—in September."

Vanderbank hesitated. "Then may I come?"

His friend, on this footing, had to consider. "Shall you know by that time?"

"I'm afraid I can't promise—if you must regard my coming as a pledge."

Mr. Longdon thought on; then raising his eyes: "I don't quite see why you won't suffer me to tell you—"

"The detail of your intention? I do then. You've said quite enough. If my visit positively must commit me," Vanderbank pursued, "I'm afraid I can't come."

Mr. Longdon, who had passed into the corridor, gave a dry, sad little laugh. "Come then—as the ladies say—'as you are'!"

On which, rather softly closing the door, Vanderbank remained alone in the great empty, lighted billiard-room.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

SEVENTEENTH AUTUMN EXHIBITION AT THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

A PICTURE show at the National always contains much that, depending upon the point of view, is either a snare or an instruction. The Academy is a venerable institution, considerably overgrown with moss, and the moss covers a great deal that fifty years ago would have seemed admirable, but for which the modern art-lover has no use. If one realizes this, the exhibitions have a historical and antiquarian interest that is very instructive, such as might be afforded by a survey of steamships from the first paddle-wheel boat to the modern ocean greyhound. The opportunity of comparison makes the visitor recognize more clearly what strides have been made in the way of improvement. On the other hand, every one is more or less posted upon the progress which has been made in shipbuilding, but only a limited number consider it a necessary part of a liberal education to be equally conversant with the progress in painting and sculpture. Herein is the snare. The uninitiated, seeking knowledge, visit the exhibitions, reasonably supposing that the appearance of a picture upon the walls of the National Academy is a guarantee of its excellence. Therefore it cannot be too often and too clearly stated that this is not the case. National academicians the world over regard their institutions as close corporations existing for their own individual exploitation. Monopoly makes them satisfied with themselves and intolerant of outside influences. They take in new members from time to time, but these are always too few in number to leaven the mass, which is mainly fossilized. So the fossils predominate and continue to monopolize the best and biggest part of the walls. This is not an attack upon our National Academy per se, but on these institutions generally. A visit to the Royal Academy in London, or to the Salon in Paris, will not give you a correct idea of English or French modern art. These places have the prestige and draw the crowds, but the majority of the exhibits are commonplace, and the best work of the year is, for the most part, conspicuous by its absence, or, if admitted, hung often at a disadvantage.

So much as a preface to the survey of this present exhibition. You will find a large number of pictures that, without individual characterization, do not possess the qualities which we look for and find in modern work. In the landscapes, for example, Nature has not been the direct inspiration. The infinite loveliness of her moods, by turns pensive, joyous, grand, and tender, has not been studied; the magic of light, the mystery of atmosphere, have been overlooked, and the painter has viewed the scene with the same sort of eye that belongs to the camera in the hands of an unpoetical photographer. More details than the human eye can comprehend at a glance are crowded into the foreground, the subtle fascination of successive distances is lost, and the inanimate machine cannot share Nature's particular mood of the moment. The painter, instead of responding to the mood like a poet, observing the scene with a more penetrating vision than belongs to the average eye, grasping all and yet selecting only the points essential to represent the sentiment of the scene, has given us a record which aims at mere material fidelity. He has missed the poetry and falls behind the photograph in accuracy.

Keeping this in mind, the visitor to the Academy will have no difficulty in distinguishing between the work which is characteristic of the aims of fifty years ago and that which thrills with the modern spirit. A comparison can hardly fail to make him conscious of the superiority of the latter. Among the landscape and water pieces exhibited are many admirable canvases. Jules R. Mersfelder sends two studies of Gloucester Harbor, one a gray day, the other an evening effect. Both are characterized by a delightful sense of repose and mysteriousness. "Twilight," by Joseph H. Boston, represents a wooded road winding down into darkness. A laborer is moving homewards, and in a pasture on the right cows loom out of the gathering shade. It is a strong, earnest composition in which the vanishing light is well expressed. George A. Williams contributes an interesting little picture, "A Gray Studia." Gray wooden farm buildings, fence, and tree stems are contrasted with the vivid gray-green of grass, through which a road passes, having a solitary puddle that brings a bit of the blue sky into the foreground. It is a little pensive poem very musically rendered. J. Alden Weir's "A Rainy Day," in the same room, has much the same suggestion, but the problem was more difficult, and its solution involved more technical ability. The subject is a queer one—a chicken-pen composed of a scaffolding of irregularly shaped saplings covered with netting. A few chickens stand about, with flecks of bright color on their plumage, and there is a mass of light green trees beyond. With a world so full of beauty, it seems an uninteresting subject to have chosen, but perhaps it was all that was visible from the painter's window on some wet day. However, of its technical skill there can be no question. The netting is suggested without being painted, and the atmosphere is thick with warm moisture. Close by is a very attractive picture by Edward Potthast, "Evening Low Tide, Annisquam," a favorite summer haunt of painters. A tremulously vaporous sky of gray-purple, with a watery moon, hovers over a blue-purple reach of land, with a smooth expanse of water in front, reflecting gray and crimson, and sprinkled with flots of brown-red sea-weed. In the foreground is a kind of jetty, made of rough, uneven stones, with a shingle building at one side. With the exception of the stones, the various parts of the picture are beautifully painted, but they do not quite key together into a harmonious whole. The same painter also shows a very clever "Study—Late Afternoon" of a man in a boat, lying upon his oars, on a smooth sea. It might have been painted with the same palette as the other picture, only here the dreaming is replaced by a clear and vivid arrangement of color that culminates in the man's brilliantly white shirt. It is interesting to compare with this a picture by Theodore Wores, entitled "Crabbing." Here too there is a brilliant white spot. A boy is standing in smooth water, with a blue shadow thrown by his broad-brimmed straw hat upon the shoulders of his white jumper. Somehow in this case the white seems to jar.

Returning to the landscapes, one remembers Charles Warren Eaton's "The Wood Road," with its velvety mass of dark brown-green trees framing in a slumberous, golden sky; and "The River," by Francis C. Jones, yellow sunlight over bright green willows and smooth water, very daintily treated. Then there is a view at close range of cottages peeping out from a profusion of foliage, a stream in the foreground with a bed of rushes, and figures moving along the bank. It is by William E. Plimpton, and called, "By the Brook-side," a strongly painted picture of luxuriant vegetation and prosperous homesteads. "A Gray Day in Spring," by H. Bolton Jones, "Just a Hay-stack," by A. Francis Watson, "Moonlight," by Eliot Clark, and Cullen Yates's "September Moonlight" will well repay attention. Andrew Teggin, in "Sandy Hook"—a stretch of water with a patch of weeds, sandy shore, and bank covered with stunted dark-colored trees—has kept close to nature, and by selecting a mellow light produced a canvas very rich in color. "Night in Halifax Harbor," by H. M. Rosenberg, has some beautiful qualities. The whole scene swims in a bath of green-blue vibrating with pale light. Sea is scarcely to be distinguished from sky, but a smoky blur in which roofs and chimneys are discernible marks the horizon. The limpidity and luminosity of the atmosphere are delightfully expressed. One wonders if the quality of the blue is true to nature, but is glad to accept it for its beauty as a piece of decoration. There is a landscape by G. A. Traver that would seem to have much charm, but it has been hung where it is impossible to see it properly.

The portraits are not numerous. Carroll Beckwith shows an interesting sketch and a finished "Portrait of Miss Rice," a dainty conception without, however, much distinction. The "Portrait of Miss E.," by Benjamin Eggleston, involves a handsome arrangement of black, brown, and cream color. The picture arrests attention, but upon examination scarcely proves impressive. J. Allen St. John's "Portrait of Caroline M. Hoyt" represents the lady in a cream satin Empire dress against a gray-green background. The painting is dry and a little hard, but the unaffected dignity and graciousness of both the color and the characterization are extremely agreeable. The little "Portrait of Alden Freeman, Esq.," by H. R. Poore, should not be overlooked. It is a study in gray, brown, and black, which, with the ruddy coloring of the hands and face, make a very distinguished ensemble. It is quite small, but is painted so straightforwardly and carefully that it makes its mark.

Among the subject pictures is a "Head of Christ," by George B. Butler, which one would like to study away from its surroundings. The face is long, the hair and short beard a tawny red, and the eyes very dark. A study of some of Durer's work might have suggested the character of the expression. It combines the human and the spiritual, idealism and realism. It is impressive without being exactly noble, and yet it is a picture that one feels one must go and see again. It is most shockingly hung. In "The Christmas Tree" J. Alden Weir has represented with masterful fidelity the reflection on a child's face and dress from the flare of wax tapers in daylight. It is difficult to see in the picture anything more than the results of most minute observation expressed with consummate skill. F. Luis Mora's "Arabian Harness-Maker," a seminude workman handling some brilliant-colored horsegear, is a well-composed, vigorous picture, far above the average. It is also far above the eye and in a corner! "Noonday Rest" is an agreeable little canvas by Henry Mosler. There is a great deal that is interesting in Irving R. Wiles's "Day Dreams," and Henry W. Parton and M. V. Wolf send charming studies of flowers. Noticeable amongst the sculpture are J. Massey Rhind's four sketches for the bronze statues on the Exchange Court Building on Broadway, and a new sketch for a statute of Lincoln by C. H. Niehaus. CHARLES H. CAFFIN.

A NIGHT THOUGHT.

NIGHT'S darkness is an airy dust of coal
Which Morn with shining shovel joyous pours
Upon the sun—Day's smiling rosy grate.

At eve the orange flames burn dull and low
And, as Night's wing's unfolded on the world,
I know glad Nature's laying in the coal
Whose light shall wake the lark's exultant song
And glisten in the dew, whose crystal spheres
Tremble upon the flower and the vine.

Then Nature stands the tongs and turkey wing
Within the corner, and the poker takes
And gently rakes the sun-grate's brazen bars
Till Day's gray silver ashes drift away
And vanish o'er the still and drowsy fields.
Then the white fallen coals all bloom, the stars
Upon the blue hearth of the boundless sky!

R. K. MUNKITTRICK.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PARIS PREPARING FOR THE EXPOSITION OF 1900—THE DEMOLITION OF THE PALAIS DE L'INDUSTRIE TO MAKE ROOM FOR THE EXPOSITION BUILDINGS.
Drawn from Life by P. Renouard.—[See Page 1126.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

AMATEUR SPORT

HARVARD'S VICTORY OVER UNIV. OF PENN. (10–0) Saturday last at Cambridge rudely revealed the illusory character of that far-famed "guards-back" play which for several years in Philadelphia has been as a fetich. And it is eminently fitting Harvard should be the means to that end, since defeat of the crimson first brought the guards-back play into prominence, while repeated conquest over the same opponent nourished the fallacy of its invincibility. Not that the awakening on Saturday lay in the mere defeat, but rather in the manner of it.

Perhaps in the history of American football no single style of play has brought to a university eleven renown so widespread or success so continuous, and Univ. of Penn.'s confidence in its invulnerability is not difficult to understand. Yet to the unpartisan observer the day of reckoning has appeared inevitable; the wonder is it has been so long delayed. To those of us who follow football more or less closely the wonder has been, too, that Univ. of Penn. should place such dependence on any one style of play, be it never so strong. And here again we may the better appreciate the Univ. of Penn. view-point if we remember that for five years her only big game has been with Harvard. It was doubtless entirely natural Univ. of Penn. should disregard other plays for one that proved so peculiarly telling against the well-known football weaknesses of her single big adversary.

BUT UNIV. OF PENN. SHOULD HAVE STUDIED the work, not the scores, of her team against Harvard, and of Yale's against Harvard, and of Yale's against Princeton, and taken the hint the comparative showings offered. Not, perhaps, that Univ. of Penn.'s rank in the respective seasons would have been materially altered, but her football sponsors must have realized the error of subordinating all play to the guards-back formation; or rather, to put it more pointedly, of relying almost solely on that style for the team's effective offence. As a matter of fact, and entirely beside the question as to the probable winner, a game with either Yale or Princeton in any one of the last four years would have convinced Univ. of Penn. of the danger of this kind of development.

No one will deny the guards-back play to be a very powerful one against the best of teams; properly done, perhaps it is the most powerful one we have seen; even slovenly executed, it is irresistible against elevens of only slightly inferior skill and endurance. But, on the other hand, for its full effectiveness no play yet developed demands so much of its men in absolute timeliness and endurance. It must start as a flash and move like lightning, with every man fitting into his place like a piece of finely adjusted machinery. It requires speed and strength and harmony to an unusual degree, and if only one of these qualities is missing, the play sinks at once to mediocrity. Its full power can be realized only by the employment of exceptional material, and to the fortunate possession of such and to Harvard's hitherto inability to profit by past experience Univ. of Penn. owes her repeated victories over the crimson eleven.

ONE OF PENN.'S FUMBLES.

THE WORK OF UNIV. OF PENN. against Chicago University disclosed the vulnerability of the guards-back formation and the weakness of the team with its main dependence shattered. Added to which it foreshadowed defeat at Cambridge a week later, if only Harvard could put a team in the field of equal endurance with Univ. of Penn., and a line quick enough and strong enough to take advantage of the obvious lack of unison and of speed in Univ. of Penn.'s this year's exploitation of the play that has earned her so many touch-downs. It must be frankly acknowledged that those who had witnessed Harvard's work against the Carlisle Indian team were confused as to the crimson's chances against Univ. of Penn. The altogether new signs of physical strength gave encouragement, but it seemed hardly likely that an attack so slow and unsupported would be effective against a team, like Univ. of Penn., of known aggressiveness.

Truth to tell, the Harvard-Univ. of Penn. game was replete with surprises, not the least one of which was that Harvard gained about 195 yards with the ball in hand during the two halves of the match. I will warrant that in a big game so many yards were never before gained by an attack that started so slowly and straggled forward so disunitedly. Time and again the interferers and the runners fell foul of one another, and repeatedly the runners simply ambled into the line. That they gained at all was due to the shoving support Harvard gave her runners, and to the breaking down of Univ. of Penn.'s defence. Harvard completely outplayed and outgeneralled Univ. of Penn. in every department of the game, and won the contest strictly on its merits. But neither exhibited first-class football except in spots. Harvard fumbled too much for her welfare, had she been playing against Yale, but Univ. of Penn.'s fumbling was execrable, and this and the muffing of punts more than anything else worked to her defeat.

THE LINES OF BOTH TEAMS were strong on the defensive, Harvard's the more so. Neither was first-class on the offensive. Back of the line, Harvard, because of Haughton's punting, completely outclassed Univ. of Penn., whose only kicker was Hare, a wonderful man at line-bucking, but who kicked so low as to invite blocking, or, escaping that fate, so fast as to give his ends no time to get under the ball, and consequently Harvard invariably ran back on caught punts twenty or more yards. In line-bucking the teams were about evenly matched, each making about 195 yards, and, quite reversing previous records, and as suggestive of the physical condition of the team, Harvard making the greater gains in the second half. In running the ends Univ. of Penn. was the better, boxing Harvard's ends, especially Cochrane, on nearly every attempt. Harvard could do little on the ends, her interference being broken up repeatedly. One of Harvard's most glaring blunders was lack of provision against Univ. of Penn.'s ends, who frequently got clear behind Harvard's line and tackled the runner almost in his tracks.

THERE WERE VERY FEW OCCASIONS during the game when the runner broke clear of the line, and those few were to the credit of Hare and McCracken (guards) and Outland of Univ. of Penn. The great majority of gains were by hard line-smashing for a yard or two at a time. For Harvard, Captain Dibblee made some pretty gains on caught punts, and in the second half ran his team with excellent judgment. A little more kicking in the first half, it seemed to us on the side-line, would have been serviceable. Daly's work at quarter was of high order. He not only handled the ball cleanly and speedily, but made the only end run of consequence for his side, besides several other gains in the back field on caught punts. On the defensive he was even stronger, his tackling stopping many a gain for Univ. of Penn., and probably on one occasion, when he tackled McCracken, saving a touch-down against Harvard. Harvard used only two of her rushers in running with the ball, and of these Boal did the only noteworthy work.

FOR UNIV. OF PENN., Hare seemed always to be the man with the ball; certainly he was the only man who could with surety gain in the line, and some of his drives through the centre were really notable exhibitions of line-bucking. Outland and McCracken were called on, and did their work well; but Hare was the only dependable line-hitter. Univ. of Penn.'s backs were chiefly noticeable for their fumbling, though Harrison made one two ten-yard runs, and Outland helped out Hare and McCracken, on whom the main offence of Univ. of Penn. appeared to rest. Gardiner was outclassed by Daly, and the quarter-back kick which he tried several times lost as much ground as it gained.

Perhaps the most startling surprise of the entire game, however, was the persistency with which Univ. of Penn. clung to the guards-back play in the second half, when it was being stopped on nearly every occasion, to the wear and tear of her own men. Harvard had shown her ability to break up the play in the first half, and in the second completely turned it. Yet Univ. of Penn. continued to work it desperately, apparently demoralized, or with no other play to work. Univ. of Penn.'s generalship was poor throughout the match, and in the last half distinctly bad. Harvard's judgment in the second half somewhat redeemed her exhibitions in the first, when frequently, from her own twenty-five and thirty yard line, she attempted to run the ball, very often only to lose it on downs before getting fairly started. In the second half, however, the ball was repeatedly sent back to Haughton, who kicked it to the Univ. of Penn. backs, who almost invariably muffed it. Haughton's punting was done as cleanly and with as good judgment as any we have seen. He gave his ends ample time to get down, and yet was not blocked once. Hare, on the other side, had two kicks blocked, Boal and Burden being responsible.

P. D. HAUGHTON,
Right Tackle.

Both teams began the game in prime physical condition, and ended it without accident. Harvard put in two new men—Farley at end (who proved a decided improvement on the one he succeeded), and Burnett at centre—in the middle of the second half, to replace Cochrane and Jaffray, worn out. Univ. of Penn., at the beginning of the second half, replaced Coombs with McMahon because of the former's fumbling. There were two missed tries for goal from field, one by Outland from Harvard's twenty-yard line, and one by Cochrane from Univ. of Penn.'s twenty-two-yard line.

It is interesting to note that of Univ. of Penn.'s rush-line, all save Folwell were on the '97 team, and Folwell was a substitute in '97. Outland played tackle last year, and the balance of the men are new. Of the men on Harvard's team who lined up against Yale or Univ. of Penn. are Boal, Haughton, Dibblee; Cochrane, Donald, and Warren have had previous 'varsity experience, however.

THE STORY OF THE GAME begins with Harvard scoring in perhaps record time, and ends with the ball in Harvard's possession two feet from Univ. of Penn.'s goal line. Univ. of Penn. won the toss, and chose the goal from which the wind was blowing. On the kick-off by Cochrane, Coombs muffed on his five-yard line, and before he or the spectators realized it, the Harvard guard Boal had made a touch-down. Time, six seconds. It was some minutes before we on the side-line could adjust ourselves to the unusual conditions; when we did, Hare had just sent the ball to Harvard's fifteen-yard line, where Daly caught and ran it back twenty-five yards. Harvard fumbled on the next line-up, Univ. of Penn. getting the ball, and now for the first time we viewed the strength of Harvard's line on the defence. Neither Hare nor Outland could gain; and Harvard, in Dibblee, secured the ball on Gardiner's quarter-back kick. Harvard could not gain around the ends, and punted to Gardiner. Line-bucking gave Univ. of Penn. her distance, and another quarter-back kick resulted in no gain, though Univ. of Penn. kept the ball. More line-bucking for short gains by Univ. of Penn. and another quarter-back kick gave Daly the ball on Harvard's twenty-five-yard line. From now on to the end of the first half the ball changed hands repeatedly, neither keeping it for longer than a second first down at most, and more often kicking or yielding it for no gain. There was not much punting in the first half, however. Univ. of Penn. in the first half gained twenty-five more yards than Harvard with the ball in hand, but it became apparent after fifteen minutes' play that Penn.'s guards-back was not up to its previous efficiency, and that Harvard was stopping it, and could win if she had endurance and played a kicking game.

MOST PEOPLE, NO DOUBT, EXPECTED the usual when the teams came out for the second half—looked for Harvard to weaken, and Univ. of Penn.'s well-known endurance to pull the game out to her credit. This was another of the day's surprises. Harvard not only failed to weaken, but started in on the aggressive, playing harder and faster than in the first half—something no one has seen a Harvard team do for years. She held Univ. of Penn. on downs, and when she could not herself gain, which until the last ten minutes was frequently, Haughton punted the ball. Univ. of Penn.'s gains with ball in hand were lessening, and she was losing on every exchange of kicks.

Burnett's goal from the forty-five-yard line on Daly's free catch seemed to assure Harvard of victory, and gave a dash and confidence to her play which found responsive

PENN. GOING AROUND HARVARD'S END.

REID GOING THROUGH PENN.'S CENTRE.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

dispirited endeavor on Univ. of Penn.'s part, though the latter played hard, and for all she was worth, to the last. McCracken's fine run, until downed by Daly, was the only bit to gladden Univ. of Penn. hearts in the last of the second half. For ten minutes before time was called Harvard had been ripping the Univ. of Penn. line to pieces and breaking up the guards-back play, outkicking, outcatching, outplaying Univ. of Penn., who finally lost the ball on her own ten-yard line with less than three minutes to play; when the whistle blew, Harvard had the ball two feet from Univ. of Penn.'s goal-line. Univ. of Penn.'s conduct all through the game and after her defeat was sportsmanlike. Play was fierce at all times, and the struggle desperate on each side, but the game was entirely free of unpleasant features. It was clean, hard football.

ALTHOUGH HARVARD'S GAME WITH UNIV. OF PENN. showed, as compared with her work against Carlisle the week previous, the capacity of the eleven for considerable improvement—much greater advance is necessary if Harvard is to score on, not to say defeat, Yale. And this, despite the altogether extraordinary fumbling of Yale in the Princeton game. It is safe to say that such a slow scattering attack as Harvard revealed at Cambridge against Univ. of Penn. would yield no gains against Yale. Then, too, Yale will strike the Harvard line with a force it was not called upon to withstand in the Univ. of Penn. game, despite the battering guards-back play. Speed and concentration in attack are precisely what Yale emphasizes in her play, and any elasticity in Harvard's line will be fatal to her chances of winning. It is not enough that the line must stand as firmly on the defence as it did on the 5th; it must also be more of an aggressive factor in the offence. Harvard is unlikely to have so much of the good luck she had against Univ. of Penn., or so generous a profit in Yale's fumbling as Princeton enjoyed. Fumbles similar to those Harvard made on Soldiers' Field, few though they were, are apt to be more costly in the Yale game than they proved to be against Univ. of Penn.

IF HARVARD'S DEFENSIVE WORK acquires the usual profit of a big game, it should be satisfactory next Saturday. Of the offensive one cannot write so definitely. Certainly it was short of the required strength last week. Whether unison and speed can be drilled into the men in these remaining days is more than one can venture to say. Sometimes I feel that these football virtues in the back field are more largely matters of individual disposition than of coaching. Under the most favoring conditions, the attack of a team cannot always be changed from slow and indifferent to fast and direct in ten days, and Harvard will be accomplishing a great deal if she succeeds in steaming up her attacking force to the requisite power. Still, Harvard has so entirely upset tradition this year in the physical condition and consequent endurance of her team, that there is some reason for expecting the team to yet further disturb the monotony of previous records.

It will, however, be a trying day for the Harvard eleven—with the traditional prowess of Yale looming large on its mental horizon, and the cheers and songs of the rival's home grounds sounding in their ears—but for all that, not in six years has Harvard had such substantial cause for hope of victory.

If Harvard does succeed in developing an attack sharp, strong, and harmonious, and, for the rest, plays to the full of the team's ability, defeat of Yale is more than a probability.

Such an attack as that employed against Univ. of Penn., however, will not enable Harvard to cross Yale's goal-line, always provided Yale does not offset weak attack by weaker fumbling. On the other hand, Harvard's defence is so strong that, failing herself to score, she should yet make it exceedingly difficult for Yale to secure five points.

It is not possible, in discussing a coming game, to take into consideration such wretched fumbling as Yale was guilty of last Saturday. Should Yale repeat that exhibition, the score may be any number against her. The chances are, however, she will better her Princeton game by 50 per cent., but even so I doubt if that will be good enough to win. Harvard will be stronger on the ends, at quarter, and probably in the kicking game generally. Added to which, Harvard, in the line and back of it, is fitter than Yale to play a hard, desperate game to the finish. This indeed is most unusual, the reverse having hitherto been the case. There is something the matter with Yale's training this year.

There may, of course, be some startling reversals next Saturday. We have before seen Yale come up with a wonderful brace and Harvard go to pieces—but if the Harvard team realizes its capabilities it ought to defeat Yale.

Needless to say, every sportsman would rejoice in a merited victory by Harvard over the rival to whom she owes so many defeats on the gridiron.

CHICAGO UNIVERSITY'S PLAY against Univ. of Penn. in Philadelphia came as a revelation to the East. Perhaps this section may be further enlightened by the statement that there are two other football teams in the Middle West—University of Michigan and University of Wisconsin—in the class with Chicago. Moreover, a full half dozen not a great deal inferior to these larger university elevens perform in the same neighborhood. Not far away is Oberlin, whose recent strong showing against Cornell (0-6) is indicative of the westward spread of football prowess. Cornell, it may be remembered, was beaten by Princeton (6-0) in October.

The most gratifying feature of Middle Western success in the game is that the superior strength and skill of the elevens came after the downfall of that semi-professionalism which flourished a few years ago. There have been trying times recently, but, on the whole, the result is most satisfactory. In some directions I regret to see no improvement, and will take up the matter fully a little later. For the time being the Middle West generally is to be congratulated on the results of its splendid efforts for wholesome sport. I particularly congratulate University of Wisconsin on her final recognition of the only plan upon which permanent prosperity in amateur sport may be attained—cleanliness.

COMPARING CHICAGO AND UNIV. OF PENN. as they played in Philadelphia, there can be no question that superior physical strength and not superior football gave Univ. of Penn. the victory. And in the attainment she had to extend herself to the full, using some of the tricks probably stored for Harvard. In all-round football Chicago was a better-drilled eleven. Besides, it was more resourceful. Univ. of Penn. clung to the "guards-back" one style of play was far from perfectly executed. Chicago's back field was much the stronger, but her line was the weaker, especially at the ends; in the handling of the ball, Chicago's quarter, Kennedy, outclassed Gardiner, whose work and that of Folwell must have made Harvard spectators hopeful for their coming game.

In truth, the eleven seemed the poorest one Univ. of Penn. has had since '94. The men did not fit into the offensive work as they must to make Univ. of Penn.'s style of play telling against strong teams, nor did the plays start off with that dash absolutely needful.

CHICAGO STARTED IN WITH A RUSH that appeared to dazzle the Pennsylvanians, and for the first half the famous guards-back was not only futile in ground-gaining, but often broken up for a loss. Chicago was playing straight football, and playing it so hard and clean that Univ. of Penn. was driven to resort to fake and delayed passes, which, by-the-way, were worked astonishingly well by both sides.

Curious how these hoary chestnuts continue prosperous e'en in their sear and yellow!

Masterful punting by Herschberger, fumbling by Gardiner, and runs by Clarke—one for twenty yards around Folwell—gave Herschberger his first opportunity to try for goal from placed kick, which Univ. of Penn. stopped, though Chicago secured the ball. A trick play or two and a run through left tackle soon after gave Chicago the ball on Univ. of Penn.'s five-yard line, and on the next play Clarke went past Folwell for a touch-down, making the score 6-0 in favor of Chicago six minutes after the game was called. For some little time after the scoring Univ. of Penn. was outplayed—failing to gain in rushes, and repeatedly surrendering the ball on downs; meantime, Chicago made her distance at nearly every effort. Herschberger, the while, was punting remarkably, one drive being for about seventy yards. A prettily executed fake pass gave Penn.'s first touch-down after a fifty-yard run by Ouland around Chicago's right end, and thus the half ended with the score 6-5 in Chicago's favor.

THE GUARDS-BACK FORMATIONS, which resulted in no gain for Univ. of Penn. in the first half, worked in the second as they had so frequently in other games—satisfactorily and tellingly. That added energy which Woodruff has been able to put into his men in the second half was very much in evidence, and Chicago was weakening. She had not the physical endurance to stand the hammering for another period. So much at least the guards-back play had accomplished; it had worn out the opponents and become a scoring play. With Chicago in possession of her full vigor, it had been futile.

But for Herschberger's repeated punting, Univ. of Penn. would have rolled up the score. Even so, there was a period in the second half when Chicago's line, battered though it was, braced, and held Univ. of Penn. from again scoring for fifteen minutes after she had made a touch-down by line plunges straight down the field. Univ. of Penn. was not to be denied, however, and though Herschberger made a field-goal, the result was foreseen. Score—Univ. of Penn wins, 23-11. Chicago has reason to be proud of her team's showing, and of Clarke, Kennedy, and Herschberger.

It looks very much now as if Herschberger would also close the year number one on the full-back list. Certainly his punting thus far outchasses that of any other back, while goals from the forty, forty-five, and even fifty yard lines show his possibilities.

He kicks with either foot, and is said to be a strong and fast man with the ball, though he was used so little with the ball in hand in the Univ. of Penn. game as to give us no opportunity to judge of his work in that direction.

THE SCORE OF THE PRINCETON-WEST POINT game (5-5), although suggesting the first-class all-round work of the cadets, hardly indicates the strength of the offence Princeton developed. It is by no means belittling the work of the cadets to say that perhaps ten points added to Princeton's score would more fairly represent the relative strength of the two teams on that day. By steady and irresistible rushes Princeton twice put the ball on West Point's ten-yard line, and once on her fifteen-yard line, only to lose it by the umpire's ruling which, to some on the side-lines, seemed to conflict with the permission, in the revised rules, given a back on the offence to take one step forward before the ball is put in play. At the rate Princeton was driving through the West Point line, undoubtedly a touch-down would have resulted on two of the three occasions referred to. But West Point, at the outset of the game, took the same risk in the umpire's judgment as Princeton, and though the latter suffered the more, the game must go on record as a moral victory for West Point, for that is virtually what a tie game with Princeton means to the cadets.

WEST POINT'S GAME was a clever exhibition of heady play. Driven down the field by Princeton's heavy formations on tackle, and unable in turn to make much impression on her opponents' strong line, West Point devoted her skill and energy to kicking, and to such good advantage as to keep Princeton's score down, while on one of the many exchanges Humphrey made a free catch on Princeton's thirty-five yard line, which Romeyn converted into five points by a pretty goal from place kick. This was near the end of the second half. Previously, in the first half, with only two minutes of play remaining, Princeton had scored a touch-down by rushing, and Geer missed an easy goal. That extra point added to the touch-down by the football committee alone saved Princeton from a recorded defeat in '98 by West Point.

There was a great deal of punting first and last in the game, and Romeyn on every exchange outkicked the Princeton full-back Ayres. Kromer ably followed up every advantage Romeyn's punting gave, and once made a run of forty yards aided by exceedingly good interference. Kromer is one of the strongest quarters in the country. He has the alertness and surety, and in addition is a powerful runner, perhaps the hardest man to stop of all the quarter-backs. West Point may well be satisfied with the work of her eleven. Saturday's game was the cadets' best this season, which they close with the satisfaction of being the only team in '98 to score against Princeton.

This is a fitting and, to all sportsmen, a thoroughly gratifying completion of the year's football-work of an academy whose team for four years has shown more uniformly first-class play than any other eleven outside the four great Eastern universities. No disparagement of others hereby intended—certainly none to the other national academy, Annapolis, which cannot be included in comparisons simply because geographical position prevents its meeting the strongest elevens.

YALE'S DEFEAT BY PRINCETON (6-0) on Saturday may be directly attributed to three separate causes: first, poor judgment in starting the game with a quarter-back obviously unequal to the demands of so important a position; second, wretched handling of Princeton's kicks; third, persistent and the most startling exhibition of fumbling a 'varsity eleven has given within my recollection. The display was the more surprising because so unusual in a Yale team. Princeton's touch-down was due to a fumble by a Yale half-back. Although scores resulting from fumbling are always unsatisfactory to non-partisan onlookers, yet they provide no reason for belittling the achievements of the victor. It is just as much a part of the game that a team should suffer by loss of the ball on fumbles as by its loss on downs. It is quite as much the business of a runner to hold on to the ball as to gain with it. Therefore sportsmen have no patience with excuses offered for games lost through fumbling. Princeton's play was none the less excellent because of her opponent's shortcomings, of which she took indeed swift advantage on nearly every occasion.

In some respects the game was the most remarkable I have ever witnessed. Perhaps there has never been a more telling illustration of how completely the splendid work of forwards may be wrecked by miserable blunders of the back fielders, or how severe the penalties which may be visited upon a team by weakness in even a single department of the game. Time and again in the first half Yale lost her opportunity, and often the ball also, by a fumble just as the play was fairly under way; several times when the team had settled to steady gaining, a disheartening fumble gave the ball to Princeton, who, after perhaps a try at line-bucking, usually punted. In the first half Princeton ran more and kicked less, but in the second half she punted at once almost invariably. It was one of the features of this somewhat extraordinary game that the side which lost had immeasurably the better of it in line-bucking. During the entire game Princeton gained five yards in the required number of downs only a few times. Yale, on the other hand, sent her runners repeatedly through Princeton's line and around the ends, not always for considerable or continuous gains, but more often than not for their distance. Several times Yale rushed the ball, before losing it, ten and fifteen yards, and once carried it fifty yards.

IT WAS IN THE KICKING GAME that Princeton made her ground, not so much in the distance of her own punts as in running back with those of Yale. During the greater part of the first half the ball was in Princeton's territory, thereafter it went backwards and forwards, several times getting near the goal-line of each—but for the greater part travelling near the centre of the field. In the second half Yale usually secured the ball on a punt somewhere in the middle of her territory, when she would begin rushing, to lose eventually on a fumble or down, only to have Princeton punt back, and Yale begin rushing over again. Sometimes Yale lost ground by fumbling caught punts, and almost without variance she failed of getting the full benefit of her own kicks, because her ends so seldom were near enough the Princeton backs to keep them from running the ball back. Two exceptions to the general rule I recall—both by McBride—one a beautiful punt down the side-lines, and the other a low twister which went over the Princeton full back's head. Thus in nearly every exchange of kicks Yale lost ground, and as in the Harvard-Univ. of Penn. game, the danger to the team failing in that department was emphasized. Yet, despite the fumbles, the game was most closely contested, and the teams evenly matched. Three times Yale had the ball on Princeton's 20-yard line, to lose it on downs, and once on the 10-yard line, to lose it by the fumble which gave Poe, twelve minutes after the game was called, the chance to make Princeton's touch-down after a run of ninety yards. Twice Princeton had the ball on Yale's 10-yard line, and once on her 3-yard line, losing it on downs. Chamberlin tried a field-goal from the 25-yard line, and Wheeler made an attempt from the 40-yard line, and both missed.

PRINCETON PLAYED TO THE LIMIT of her capability; the men were fit to the hour, and none failed to show his best game. The defensive strength of the line was usual and expected, but the great improvement in attack and excellent handling of kicks proved rigorous and painstaking coaching in the ten days preceding the game. Notwithstanding Yale sent runs around each of them, Palmer and Poe were more valuable to their team than were Yale's ends to theirs. Considering his experience, Geer played exceptionally opposite so strong a tackle as Chamberlin. The same may be said of Stillman, who opposed Hillebrand, one of the best tackles of the day. The great weight of Princeton's centre trio did not save them from being a bit outplayed. Edwards ought to have been ruled off. Duncan was an acceptable quarter, and Wheeler outplayed McBride.

All the Yale backs were able to gain against Princeton, but Durston and Benjamin spoiled their work by fumbling; Corwin and Townsend did better. De Saulles was in no condition to play, and gave positive evidence of it before he had been on the field five minutes; the wonder is he was not taken off sooner. Had Ely started the game, the team no doubt would not have become so unsteady. Such lack of judgment and the condition of the team suggest something wrong with the New Haven management this year.

CASPAR WHITNEY.

"AMERICAN FOOTBALL."—BY WALTER CAMP.—NEW AND REVISED EDITION.—POST 8VO. CLOTH, $1.25.—HARPER & BROTHERS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE EVACUATION OF PUERTO RICO.

SPAIN formally released Puerto Rico from her sovereignty at twelve o'clock on Tuesday, October 18, 1898, by the withdrawal of her troops from the capital city of San Juan.

In the harbor lay a Spanish transport, ready to carry home the soldiers, while outside, on a calm ocean, lay our ships, loaded with blue-uniformed men, waiting for the moment when the booming of the mid-day gun was to sound the death-knell of Spanish supremacy and give Puerto Rico to the American government.

At daylight on Tuesday the last callings of the Spanish bugles rang through the town from the cuartels of San Cristóbal and Morro, and sixteen hundred Spanish soldiers, who had spent the day before in preparation for departure, came marching through the massive-walled portals, down the narrow streets of the town, and out to the westward suburban town of Santurce, where they were to camp temporarily, until the arrival of a second Spanish steamer.

The Spanish soldiers and Guardia Civil have married largely among Puerto-Rican women, and have become factors in the domestic life of the island. The evacuation programme did not provide for a condition like this, so the Spaniard goes back to his own country, though only for a time perhaps, and his wife and children must weep and go hungry until his return.

As the hour of twelve drew near, American soldiers stood before the white front of the balconied home of past Spanish captains general, and in the plaza before the Chamber of Deputies and the City Hall, and again at the gates of the castles of Morro and San Cristóbal, patiently awaiting the coming of the hour. Around them at all these places were gathered queer, interesting, and withal motley crowds of American tourists and newspaper men, of well-dressed Spanish and Puerto-Rican merchants and landholders, and of the dark-colored ragged and tattered natives. The minutes were passed in hushed waiting, a straining of eyes toward the bare flag-poles, and a nervous consultation of watches.

Now it was coming, and a long-drawn breath sighed through the packed crowds, followed by the first uneasy shuffling of feet. The cry of "Attention!" caused every soldier to straighten rigidly on his heels, except a few poor fellows who had dropped, weak and sweltering, under the fierce heat of the sun, and lay uncaring beneath the shaded walls. The newsmen craned their necks in eager expectancy, and the click of adjusted camera-shutters could be heard from every point of elevation.

At each flag-staff a shoulder-strapped man stood grasping the flag-halyards, trying them now and again, in fear lest they might fail at the critical moment, and from their high-perched positions they watched the clock-towers, or looked seaward toward the bold, rugged, fortified castles for the first flash of fire and smoke from the great black guns.

Ding! and the little sweet-toned bell of a near-by cathedral sang the first stroke of twelve; it was overpowered in its first vibrations by the deep-bellowing clang of the great bell of the City Hall. They answered each other in rhythmic chime, the ponderous and the weak, one after another, until the last echoing thrill of twelve made Puerto Rico ours.

The stars and stripes rose gently over every building, and were wafted by a new-born breeze as if in sympathy with the rousing cheers of the surging Americans beneath, and as if in salutation to the roaring guns which belched their smoke far to seaward as they boomed out the twenty-one shots of honor and of freedom.

It was a deeply impressive occasion. Done without ostentatious display, done without gold-laced uniforms or martial panoply, but well done. The very simplicity of the celebration appeals to American hearts. Our attitude was not that of the dictator, but of the protector. No bombastic speeches wounded the still sensitive Spanish pride; no great military pomp caused the teeth of a vanquished enemy to grind in hidden rage; we raised our flag softly—proudly, if you like—but we raised it with an outstretched hand of friendship.

With the floating of our flag over Spain's provincial capital of San Juan the United States became not only the master of a veritable Garden of Eden, but the possessor of a vast amount of government property. In the cities of the whole island permanent structures have been erected in the nature of buildings for officials, barracks for soldiers, many hospitals, and, on the sea-coast, massive stone forts. In San Juan itself our prizes include two wonderful stone forts, whose gray moss-covered walls tell a story of antiquated defences, but which would even at the present offer a very material protection against modern projectiles. On them were mounted fifty-six guns, new and old, twenty-eight of which are fairly modern 6-inch breech-loading rifled guns, and four modern mortars. In the magazines were stored immense quantities of powder and ammunition; in fact, shortly before war was declared, an entire ship-load of the most approved projectiles was landed at San Juan, and now belongs to our government. Again, in this city we now own a five-storied infantry barracks, which has been constructed during the last five years. It was damaged badly, but not beyond repair, during the three hours' naval bombardment of the city. There are two other immense barracks, but they are of old Spanish architecture—the cuartel San Cristóbal and the marine barracks. The United States also owns a new City Hall and a great public building, the "Intendencia," both facing the Plaza of the city. The value of our entire acquisitions runs up into millions of money.

The American officers who had the honor of raising the flags at San Juan were Major J. T. Dean at the Governor's palace; Colonel Goethals, of the Engineer Corps, over the "Intendencia"; Major Carson, of the Quartermaster's Department, at the City Hall; and Major Day, in command of a battery of the Fifth Artillery, over Morro Castle. Major Day also raised the first American flag floated on the island.

Few troops took active part in the ceremony—two battalions of the Eleventh Infantry at different points, Troop A of the Sixth Cavalry at the palace, and the Fifth Heavy Artillery at Morro and San Cristóbal. All the afternoon, however, the soldiers were marching from camps without the city's limits, until at nightfall several thousand men were scattered through the town. On Monday night, at every street corner stood the Spanish Guardia Civil, the official tyrant of the island, while sentries of the Spanish army were posted near all government buildings; when Tuesday's sunset came our armed soldiers paced back and forth over the selfsame posts, while the Spanish soldiers, without guns, though armed with bayonets, wandered through the town as aliens, or gathered in clusters in animated discussion. It was a curious metamorphosis.

WILLIAM DINWIDDIE.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa.—[Adv.]

BEST BECAUSE NATURAL.

THE market is flooded with so-called baby foods. Experience demonstrates that scientifically prepared cow's milk is the best when the natural supply fails. Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is the best infant food.—[Adv.]

A WELL-DESERVED AWARD.

FASHIONABLE ladies all the world over will be pleased to learn of the honor just bestowed upon the ORIZA PERFUMERY: L. LEGRAND, of Paris, appointed by Royal letters-patent—L. LEGRAND, the great Parisian Perfumer, who counts amongst his aristocratic clientèle all the French, English, and American high-life, has indeed just been appointed "Purveyor to Her Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria." It is a real dedication, well earned by "ORIZA," who so truly possesses the skilful art of combining rare perfumes, and whose last product, "Prince Albert Violet," met in England with the same favor as the delicate perfume "Violets of the Czar," so keenly appreciated in the United States.—[Adv.]

WALTER BAKER & Co., Ltd., the well-known cocoa and chocolate manufacturers of Dorchester, Mass., have carried off the highest honors at the Trans-Mississippi Exposition in Omaha. Two gold medals were awarded to them—one for Breakfast Cocoa and one for chocolate preparations, including their Premium No. 1, Vanilla, Caracas, and German Sweet. They also received a silver medal for Cocoa Butter.

There have been few international or local exhibitions during the last fifty years from which Walter Baker & Co. have not received the first prize for their manufactures.—[Adv.]

SUPERIOR to Vaseline and Cucumbers, Crème Simon, marvellous for the complexion and light cutaneous affections; it whitens, perfumes, fortifies the skin. J. SIMON, 13 Rue Grange Batelière, Paris; Druggists, Perfumers, Fancy-goods stores.—[Adv.]

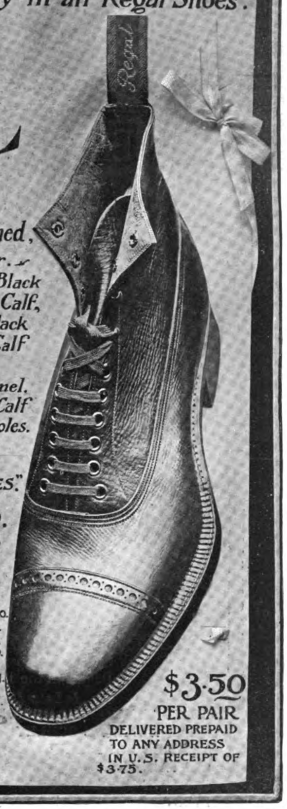
BITTERS that better the physical condition of every one who uses—ABBOTT'S—THE ORIGINAL ANGOSTURA. Take none but the genuine—"ABBOTT'S."—[Adv.]

DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS are the most efficacious stimulant to the appetite.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pears'

What is wanted of soap for the skin is to wash it clean and not hurt it. Pure soap does that. This is why we want pure soap; and when we say pure, we mean without alkali.



Pears' is pure; no free alkali. There are a thousand virtues of soap; this one is enough. You can trust a soap that has no biting alkali in it.

All sorts of stores sell it, especially druggists; all sorts of people use it.

"Flint" Stone Oak" Sole leather used exclusively in all Regal Shoes.

THE REGAL SHOE

The Regal-English-Calf-Lined, For-Fall-and-Winter-Wear. Made in lace of Russet or Black "KING CALF" and Black Wax Calf, Leather Lined: Russet or Black "KING CALF" and Black Wax Calf Cloth lined. Also imported English Enamel, Patent Calf lace and Patent Calf and Enamel button, Single Soles.

SEND POSTAL FOR NEW FALL CATALOGUE H. AND BOOK "THE CARE OF SHOES."

L. C. Bliss & Co.
MAIL ORDER DEPARTMENT,
109 Summer St., Boston.

STORES
BOSTON. BROOKLYN. ATLANTA. DETROIT. PROVIDENCE. PHILADELPHIA. PITTSBURG. CHICAGO. NEW YORK. WASHINGTON. CLEVELAND. UTICA. BALTIMORE. ST. LOUIS. DENVER. ALBANY. BUFFALO. CINCINNATI. WALLA WALLA WASH.
FACTORY WHITMAN, MASS.

$3.50 PER PAIR
DELIVERED PREPAID TO ANY ADDRESS IN U.S. RECEIPT OF $3.75.

WRIGHT'S GENUINE HEALTH UNDERWEAR

Constructed on the hygienic principle of maintaining an equable temperature, whether the body is at rest or during exercise.

The wool is woven to the outer fabric in tiny loops, thus providing inter-air-space. This method represents the scientific construction of a genuine health garment.

We were the originators of this process of manufacture.

NOTICE

We will mail you free our illustrated booklet, giving valuable information on undergarments.

WRIGHT'S UNDERWEAR COMPANY
75 Franklin Street New York City

When the Cold Weather comes on, your feet get damp and cold. This causes much of the winter sickness. Allen's Foot-Ease keeps the feet dry and warm, absorbs perspiration and is a certain cure for Chilblains and Frost-bites.

ALLEN'S FOOT-EASE. A Powder for the Feet.

Shake Into Your Shoes

Allen's Foot-Ease, a powder for the feet. It cures painful, swollen, smarting, nervous feet, and instantly takes the sting out of corns and bunions. It's the greatest comfort discovery of the age. Allen's Foot-Ease makes tight-fitting or new shoes feel easy. It is a certain cure for sweating, callous and hot, tired, aching feet. We have over 10,000 testimonials. TRY IT TO-DAY. Sold by all druggists and shoe stores, 25c. Do not accept an inferior imitation. Sent by mail for 25c. in stamps.

"Oh, What Rest and Comfort!"

FREE TRIAL PACKAGE sent by mail. Address
ALLEN S. OLMSTED, Le Roy, N. Y.
(Mention this paper.)

Absolutely Reliable Always

Remington Standard Typewriter.

WYCKOFF, SEAMANS & BENEDICT,
327 Broadway, New York.

THE CELEBRATED

SOHMER

Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.

Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade.

Our name spells—

S—O—H—M—E—R

New York Warerooms SOHMER BUILDING Fifth Ave., cor. 22d St.

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google
Google
Original from PENN STATE

Europe offers nothing finer, no more desirable contents or handsomer bottle, than is found in

EAGLE LIQUEURS

An American product that excels all foreign makes in true excellence, purity and healthfulness. Connoisseurs admit its superiority. Has no equal in perfect distillation, fruity flavor, deliciousness.

Digestive, Nutritive, Sedative.

The EAGLE BRAND is to be found at the best cafes, club and private sideboards, everywhere.

A case of twelve assorted bottles of EAGLE LIQUEURS makes an elegant Christmas Gift. If your dealer cannot supply you write to us for Illustrated Booklet and Prices.

Eagle Liqueur Distilleries,

Rheinstrom Bros., Distillers and Exporters,
933-955 Martin St. and 934-954 E. Front St., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Highest Awards. Established 1875.

---

Hunter Baltimore Rye.

The American Gentleman's Whiskey.

10 YEARS OLD

Pure and Mellow.

WM. LANAHAN & SON, Baltimore, Md.

---

Eau de Cologne No. 4711

The most pungent, exhilarating and refreshing Perfume. Used by persons of refinement. Imported into America for three-quarters of a Century. Be sure to get "No. 4711," which is the standard in all civilized countries.

MÜLHENS & KROPFF, N. Y., U. S. AGENTS.

---

SPANISH WAR SERIES

CAPTAIN SIGSBEE
On the Destruction of the "Maine."
Begins in the November CENTURY.

LIEUTENANT HOBSON
On the Explosion of the "Merrimac."
Begins in the December CENTURY.

In Later Numbers

REAR-ADMIRAL SAMPSON
REAR-ADMIRAL SCHLEY
COMMODORE PHILIP
CAPTAIN EVANS
CAPTAIN TAYLOR
LIEUTENANT-COMMANDER WAINWRIGHT
LIEUTENANT EBERLE
Each one will tell his own personal experiences in connection with the destruction of Cervera's fleet.
CAPTAIN MAHAN
CAPTAIN CROWNINSHIELD
CAPTAIN BARTLETT
Are among the other writers who will contribute to this great series.

Miniature reproduction of full-page picture in the December CENTURY. Sampson, Schley, and Hobson on the deck of the "New York."

"The latest enterprise of THE CENTURY throws into the shade nearly everything that has been done in the past."—New York Tribune.

THE CENTURY IN 1899

will be richer than ever in general features—in spite of the Spanish War Series. There will be A Superbly Illustrated Life of Alexander the Great.

Marion Crawford's New Historical Novel, "Via Crucis."
Papers by Paul Leicester Ford on "The Many-Sided Franklin."
Stories by Mark Twain, Frank R. Stockton, and all the leading writers, etc., etc., etc.

Send in your subscription AT ONCE. The December CENTURY, ready December first, will be the most entertaining Christmas number ever issued. Lieut. Hobson's graphic story begins in that issue. New subscribers should commence with November and so get first chapters of all the serials. Price $4.00 a year. All dealers take subscriptions, or remittance may be made directly to the publishers,

THE CENTURY CO.,
Union Square, New York.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE

---

1831 Sixty-Ninth Year. 1899
THE

Country Gentleman

The ONLY Agricultural NEWSpaper,

AND ADMITTEDLY THE

Leading Agricultural Journal of the World.

Every department written by specialists, the highest authorities in their respective lines.
No other paper pretends to compete with it in qualifications of editorial staff.
Gives the agricultural news with a degree of fulness and completeness not even attempted by others.

Best Reviews of the Crops,
Best Market Reports,
Best Mechanical Execution,
Best Everything.

INDISPENSABLE TO

ALL COUNTRY RESIDENTS

WHO WISH TO

KEEP UP WITH THE TIMES.

Single Subscription, $2;
Two Subscriptions, $3.50;
Four Subscriptions, $6.

SPECIAL INDUCEMENTS TO RAISERS OF LARGER CLUBS.

Write for Particulars on this Point.

Free till Jan. 1 to New Subscribers for 1899.

SEND FOR SPECIMEN COPIES,

Which will be mailed Free, and compare them with any other rural weekly; it will not take long to see the difference. Address

LUTHER TUCKER & SON,
ALBANY, N. Y.

---

THE HAIR 27th Ed., 25c. (or stamps). Why it Falls Off, Turns Grey, and the Remedy. By Prof. HARLEY PARKER, A. M. LONG & CO., 1013 Arch St., Phila., Pa. "Every one should read this little book."—Athenæum.

---

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak.

Holidays are Kodak Days

The long evenings of Christmastide are made doubly delightful by taking flash-light pictures of one's friends.

Picture taking by daylight or flash-light is easy with a Kodak.

Kodaks $5.00 to $35.00.

Catalogues free of dealers or by mail.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

---

are perfect in action. Over 40 years' experience guides the manufacture. Get the improved. No tacks required. To avoid imitations, notice script name of Stewart Hartshorn on label.

---

Half a Day Saved

By the California Limited, Santa Fé Route. 2¾ days Chicago to Los Angeles. Three times a week. New features this season.

Address General Passenger Office,
The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway,
CHICAGO.

---

---

A TRIP TO JAMAICA

The Queen of the West India Islands.

Avoid the severity of our American winters and take your vacation at this garden spot of the earth. About $5.00 a day pays all expenses.

Send for our beautifully illustrated pamphlet K for full particulars.

PIM, FORWOOD & KELLOCK,
24 STATE ST., NEW YORK CITY.

---

Harper's Catalogue

Descriptive list of their publications, with portraits of authors will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"KATE KIP, Buyer," the new farce by Mr. Glen MacDonough, with which Miss May Irwin bids fair to hold the Bijou Theatre for the rest of the season, has the initial virtue of being inspired by a phase of American life. It has to do with the rivalries of two Western cities that both aspire to be the capital of the State. As Kate Kip, the travelling buyer of a department store, Miss Irwin is no less American. In a flying visit of two hours and a half she undertakes to bring the coveted prize to her brother's town, merely that he may marry the girl he loves on the proceeds of a lot he has invested in. In two acts she is able to twine herself about the hearts and pockets of three influential Senators, and at the same time to spare a few minutes now and then to give a coon song for the especial benefit of the audience. In the last act she is so busy tricking and countertricking her political allies that she is obliged to take advantage of the right of female suffrage, granted by our chivalrous West, and sing to the Senate in session a coon song that, by all precedent, belonged to the audience. To those who know Miss Irwin's coon songs it is needless to say that she wins the Senate, hands down and arms akimbo. The idea of the play is familiar enough to be easily intelligible, and the jokes cannot be lost by any one who has followed our funny papers. That dear old tale (from Life, I think) of Finnigan. Off again. On again. Flanagan. greets us as an elaborate song. And even if the plot and jokes had not, as the people at the universities say, "the strength of appeal that belongs alone to a fable derived from antique folklore," I think we should all understand them, they are so very American in every syllable. Some of Miss Irwin's syllables are the quintessence of Americanism. Any one who is homesick for the West, as happened to be the case with the present deponent, will have to restrain the weeps at those syllables in which she burrs the letter "r." And as for the wisdom she utters, it is positively gnomic—"Our first loves make splendid wives and husbands—for somebody else.... Marriages made from raw material don't wear."

The Homeliest Girl that ever Crossed the Pike.

But what is the use? Miss Irwin is Miss Irwin. She jokes about her Falstaffian figure in a neo-Falstaffian vein. She jokes about her age and the blondness of her hair with the abandon of utter good-comradeship. She orders dry Martini cocktails at regular intervals—and has the good sense not to allow them to be brought on the stage. And at last she blandly falls flat on her back on the stage in a faint, with Ignatio Martinetti for an acrobatic pillow. It is as if Audrey had the wit and good-humor of Sir John. Her joviality is so full of the deeper homeliness of human nature that we might as well call it Shaksperean as anything. Homely, that is the very word. I went away from the theatre softly humming the refrain of one of her coon songs that we are all fated to hear more of,

> You is de homelies' wench dat ever cross' de pike,
> But dere's sumfin about you dat I like.

A late journalistic encounter between "Max," the successor of G. B[ernard] S[haw], as dramatic critic of the Saturday Review, and W[illiam] A[rcher], who holds the corresponding position on the World, has given us no end of suggestions with regard to criticism and the drama in England and elsewhere. "Max" is one Max Beerbohm, a weighty jester, who won fame by proposing his brother, Beerbohm Tree, as a prominent subject for one of a series of articles on "Humble Brothers of Great Men."

More Shakspere, or less?

MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE,
Pianist.

When Bernard Shaw had ridden his broomstick-horse of detraction of Shakspere to a stand-still, "Max" was unlucky enough to be chosen to continue the splendid race. Accordingly "Max" comes out with a proposal to abolish Shakspere from the English stage for a period of thirty years. His solemn reason is that we are so familiar with Shakspere that the freshness of plot and the surprise in action necessary to dramatic effect are impossible. Our heads are so filled with the details of various interpretations, that the representation loses all force as a drama and becomes a mere text for comparative criticism. In answer to this Mr. Archer has said a few memorable things: "The memory for the details of acting is the rarest of faculties. I have known only two or three people in the course of my life (and these professed students and enthusiasts) who possessed it in any marked degree. The immense majority of an audience, after a month has passed, retains nothing but a vague general impression of even the vividest performance.... The 'comparative criticism' which he denounces as 'dreary' is quite beyond the power of most critics, and is very rarely practised.... Not one in five hundred of any given audience comes to the theatre with the vaguest idea, or ideal, as to how a play or a part should be acted." Mr. Archer then points out that, though freshness of plot and surprise in the action are necessary to the first success of a play with all of us, they have to do only indirectly with the true delight we find in a masterpiece. "A great play is like a great piece of music: we can hear it again and again with ever new realization of its subtle beauties, its complex harmonies, and with unfailing interest in the merits and demerits of each particular rendering.... If people saw these great plays oftener they would enjoy them more.... What we really want is, that audiences should feel an intelligent pleasure in the manifold and marvellous spiritual achievement represented by each of these plays.... If we had a theatre where (as at the leading German theatres) our great stage classics were frequently passed in review, instead of being sumptuously revived at intervals of from five to fifty years, they would rapidly educate their smaller but still numerous and commercially adequate public, and familiarity would breed not boredom, but subtler understanding and livelier pleasure." What Mr. Shaw had to say to us about Shakspere and the drama was so clever and suggestive, even in his moments of ecstatic perversity, that, with one exception, he was never adequately answered. That exception was when some one asked him if he did not spell his name with a P. Mr. Beerbohm would do better if he would make it possible for us not to take him seriously.

JULIA ARTHUR AS ROSALIND.
As she will appear at Wallack's Theatre, New York.

The succès d'estime which Miss Annie Russell and her company scored in Lavedan's "Catherine" is steadily taking the more substantial form of a popular success. At the same time the staging has been refined and the book improved. Miss Elsie de Wolfe's even ing gown is now accompanied by the palliation of a sunset glow behind the scenes; and several passages in the action have been shortened. The translation, which is said to be by Mr. Max Beerbohm, and upon which I have already animadverted, has had especial attention. For instance, where Catherine's father (Mr. Le Moyne) at first caused irrelevant mirth by greeting the Duke's proposal with "This is so sudden!" he for a time substituted unexpected and afterward wonderful. And now it is announced that the translation is to be given the final Hall-mark of the author of "The Christian." Let us hope that it will not prove, as some one has foreboded, the brand of Caine. At any rate, we have an excellent example of that enlightened management the infrequency of which Mr. Zangwill so bitterly deplored. Let others profit by its success.

A good Thing profitably Done.

Best of all, Miss Russell's acting is gaining in power. Or perhaps it is only that one is beginning fully to comprehend it! At first I merely felt sure that it was excellent technically. Of the more deeply artistic delight of the performance it was not easy to speak—it would have been stupid not to allow for a possible personal equation! Five hearings, while they have multiplied the shortcomings discernible in the rest of an unusually excellent company, only convince me the more that one is utterly right in being delighted with Miss Russell. There is something in her Catherine beyond the accuracy, variety, and strength of her powers of expression, and far removed from any mere personal charm. It is given to some to express with fidelity to the author the differing shades of their different parts; it is given to others to add to each part an unvarying modicum of personal charm. What one likes in Catherine is, in a measure, both of these; but above both is an impalpable essence that belongs neither to personality nor to expression—the power of creative individuality, the word for which has been too often profaned. It is the virtue of this individuality that it cannot be expressed except as Miss Russell expresses it. One can only say that it is wholly refined, both in feeling and in utterance, wholly true to the rarest instincts of feminine nature.

Last week Mr. Hall Caine "invited" the clergymen of Greater New York to come to the Knickerbocker and see for themselves what a highly moral play "The Christian" is. This week Mr. Al Hayman is sending about a list of the nightly box-office receipts, which shows how great a success the play has since become financially. The incident lends new point to the remark in Life that others than the Syndicate are able to "do" the Christian. It has long been gossiped in London that, one night at the Garrick Club, Mr. Caine discussed at length the edifying question of whether he more nearly resembled the portraits of Shakspere or those of Our Lord. At that time he was dressing up to the Shakspere ideal; but his success was somewhat impaired by the fact that he had unadvisedly chosen as his model the Chandos portrait, which has Jewish features, and is almost beyond question spurious. He has since apparently chosen his alternative rôle, and with a similar result. How should one break the news to an admiring public that he seems more expert, on the whole, in such pursuits as concern thirty (or more) pieces of silver?

Which is the Christian here, and which Hall Caine?

Mr. Joseph Jefferson was unable to appear during the last days of the time allotted to "The Rivals," and a few days later his reappearance in "Rip Van Winkle" was postponed a week. His illness is reported to be no more serious than a hoarseness that prevents his speaking, but he is so endeared to the hearts of his public that one is easily led into alarm. To thousands of Americans the dearest memory of the stage is the serene beauty of his acting. JOHN CORBIN.

Mr. Jefferson's Illness.

MAX ALVARY AS SIEGFRIED.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MUSIC

CONCERTS AND CONDUCTORS.

THE history and influences of the Philharmonic Society make up a career of such dignity and benevolence that we may properly be anxious whenever something like a new chapter is to be opened. A new conductor almost inevitably must mean such a chapter. Between the Society's outset, far back in the winter of 1842–3, and last spring, just six leaders have been its pilots—Eisfeld, Bergmann, Neundorff, Leopold Damrosch, Thomas, and Seidl. When Mr. Seidl's death deprived the Society of his services and his personal prestige, there were many troublous considerations affecting not only the choice of a successor (whom the actual players in the Society's band elect), but his utility. For at least a dozen years the Society's orchestra has suffered artistically, while no firmer pecuniary support could be asked from a great public more devoted than keen. Rehearsals have been scanted; and rehearsals are the marrow of symphonic duty. The new and auxiliary musicians have not always been well chosen, and when above par they have been tantalizingly kept in the rear of serviceableness. Again, many of the Philharmonic's authoritative players have lost the fire of youth, have become wonted to playing as a bit of annual mechanics, and so the interpretations of works, both new and old, have lacked eloquence and virtuosity. Temperament is a gift to be cherished, but it evaporates in academic musical air. Moreover, the veteran musician is not apt to new schooling, not tender to being kept up to his full duty and nervosity. The vieilles moustaches of an orchestra have their own ideas. Like Hubert in "Ivanhoe"—"My grandsire drew a good bow at the Battle of Hastings and never played at such a mark in his life and—neither will I." Such members of an orchestra would rather have King Log than King Stork. Should King Stork be chosen and persist in being every inch a king, why, the symphonic frog-pond can make his reign a fine purgatory for him.

The Philharmonic Society of New York.

Mr. Emil Paur's selection in Mr. Seidl's place wounded no sentimentalities, could augur only a rule of the highest musical capability and conscientiousness. Yet there were misgivings in our minds as to Mr. Paur's concrete success when the time for work should come. Never was a concert-director summoned to a post more demanding tact, firmness, knowledge of human nature, and insight into a special status in quo, for reasons quite below general public observation. Mr. Paur could be trusted for his part. But would he be met half-way? The Philharmonic's public seemed to expect so, for never has the Society's year set out with a more splendid subscription. The patrons already have their reward. The first concerts seem conclusive of Mr. Paur's personal esteem from his great charge, and of the new life that he will breathe into it. I have heard the Philharmonic for some twenty-odd years. I have not heard it play in a dozen seasons with the vigor, the ensemble quality of tone, and with the precision in the work of individual members which entered into its opening rehearsal and concert for this fifty-seventh season. The musicians—yes, even Mr. Arnold and Mr. Schmitt and Mr. Roebbelen, and many more of the honored conscript fathers of the Society—seemed to have had a sip of the Fountain of Youth. They watched their new leader as a man to be watched, and perceptibly they obeyed him. The quality of the great orchestra's tone is noticeably more refined, rounded, and solidified already, and it continually leaped to a life quite new. The strings rose to a noble sonority; the wood-wind group—never the Philharmonic's golden treasury—was more intent on nuances and tone than it has been since Mr. Thomas's days of authority. The brass was mellower, and significantly discreet or alert in turn. The programme gave well-worn numbers, but wisely picked—Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" prelude, Brahms's B flat piano-forte concerto, and Beethoven's Symphony in A. Mr. Paur is, beyond doubt, one of the truest "readers" and leaders of Beethoven now before any public, and again came evidence thereof. The Brahms concerto (perhaps the most beautiful one yet written) brought again to New York auditors Miss Adele aus der Ohe. Her absence from us has certainly not lessened by a shade her exquisite, sensitive, reserved art, and that charm of sincerity and high musicianship that has set her apart from a thousand other pianists of her sex in a profession so over-crowded that often there seems hardly room where she is—at the top.

An old Society's new Leadership and new Season begun.

The procession of this winter's great concerts is fairly forward. There was nothing if not success and enthusiasm in the entrance last week, on Wednesday and Thursday, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on a thirteenth season that has none of the omens belonging to the number mentioned. How insidiously do years and orchestral anniversaries succeed! These orchestras and singers and players betray us pitilessly by their beguilements. Last week, strikingly less than real seemed the flight of so much time since the Boston Orchestra first came to us. With Mr. Gericke it came. Long terms, new leaders, have intervened. But now was not Mr. Gericke again here, tall and straight, before us bodily and vigorously once more?—looking in every essential detail quite the same disciplinarian, the same vigilant creator of the Orchestra's glory, that he was when he left his charge. Mr. Gericke, too, was conducting it to-day with all that admirable leadership, calm yet inspiring, unostentatious yet dignified, which charmed us aforetime. The Orchestra's experiment of afternoon concerts here (with programmes quite other than those of the evening series, though with identical soloists) opens with every outward success. Both concerts, in fact, were crowded. Both repeated the cordiality toward Mr. Gericke, and the intent, discriminating delight in the Orchestra which warmed to its yearly visits under his direction of old, not to speak of our regard for the work of the many seasons when Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur have been the leaders before us. The band this year has turned to Carnegie Hall for its auditorium, an excellent change from the dreadful hollow of the Metropolitan's area. The effect of the playing of the afternoon and evening was vastly the gainer by the removal. The programmes respectively offered (a) Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Chopin's piano-forte concerto in E minor, Brahms's "Chorale 'St. Antoni'" variations, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; and (b) Schumann's symphony in C major, Scharwenka's second concerto for piano-forte, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" tone-poem, and the prelude and death-finale of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde." Mr. Rosenthal was the soloist. It is of interest to notice that Mr. Gericke finds the band he now redirects as little altered in actual personnel by the decade as he himself is by his absence. Less than a dozen changes have occurred. But in gradual and sure progress upward toward a perfection of ensemble not surpassed by any symphonic organization either in America or Europe, the Orchestra has passed into a finer individuality, season by season, not a little with thanks to the integrity of its wise early adjustment under the director who is once more at its head to-day.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra: Mr. Wilhelm Gericke returns.

The note of personal tragedy always sounds more dolorous in connection with the stage than under any other circumstances, especially if the sorrow come untimely. The death of Max Alvary, which has occurred in his German home, must have been a shock and regret to a great circle of the American musical public. Mr. Alvary's career was built on his brilliant and just American successes as a member of the German companies who gave us especially such bright pages of our Wagnerian chronicle between 1883 and 1890–1. His début here occurred in the autumn of 1885. Like many German tenors, Mr. Alvary had a better voice than skill in its use, and was, on the whole, more an artist in his diction and acting than a really accomplished opera-singer. But his free and magnetic art as an actor, the resonance of a tenor voice originally not "heroic," but rapidly developed in its volume and fibre, and his personal charm, captivated all the public. He became its bright star, and he had no rival. As Adolar in Weber's "Euryanthe" Alvary was a real individuality; as Assad in Goldmark's "The Queen of Sheba," as Loge in Wagner's "Rheingold," scarcely less so. He was a charming Walther, too, in "Die Meistersinger." But of all his impersonations his Siegfried—the boyish Siegfried of the third Nibelungen music-drama—was the most unapproachable. We have never had another Siegfried like him, and we shall never have one. Alvary was as if born for this part, and he made it his own with a verve and beauty to haunt the eye and the ear through a lifetime. It is in just that remembrance that I have taken out of a large pile of portraits of him lying at my hand, not his every-day self, but his Siegfried identity, as it was before us in 1887 or 1888, in all its graceful and statuesque beauty. Mr. Alvary last returned to America early in 1896, and though singing less effectively, was welcomed with renewed favor. About three years ago accident created a lingering and dreadful disease—cancer of the stomach. His career was closed. I understand that, through no fault of his, it was closed in poverty, and that his family are penniless. His life was the romance of a gentleman, a successful artist, and a nature of beautiful refinement and perceptiveness, suddenly cast into shadow and an untimely fate. It is only in such lovely fables as Andersen's "The Nightingale" that Death can be kept away by a song!

Max Alvary: 1856–98.

The Castle Square Company is reviving a special success of last year—"Carmen." As usual, Bizet's masterpiece has the fullest attention from a public that grows more and more general. "Il Trovatore," "Roméo et Juliette," and "The Pirates of Penzance" have succeeded each other recently. The principal lack of this interesting and faithful organization, of which much may come, is a couple of light tenors who have good looks as well as good voices and training, and a considerable repertory into the bargain. Both Mr. Sheehan and Mr. Lavin are wholly insufficient or ill placed in romantic opera.

The Castle Square Company's Chief Lack.

E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

"Sublime tobacco! which from East to West Cheers the tar's labor or the workman's rest."
—BYRON.

Of no other pipe tobacco can it be said—"here is perfection of quality, rare, delightful fragrance, mild, delicious flavor."

Yale Mixture

A Gentleman's Smoke

has all this to commend it to the "particular" smoker.

Buy it "next time."

All Problems Solved

by the

KREMENTZ

One-Piece Collar Button

Easy to button and unbutton. Stays buttoned. No lever nor twist to bother. Absolutely unbreakable in wear.

You get a new one in case of accident of any kind.

All jewelers sell them. Demand the Krementz. There's no "just as good" kind made. Postal us for booklet.

KREMENTZ & CO., 28 Chestnut Street, NEWARK, N. J.

THE "ONEITA"

PAT. APR. 21ST 1893.

Elastic-Ribbed

UNION SUITS

are complete undergarments, covering the entire body like an additional skin. Perfectly elastic, fitting like a glove, but softly and without pressure. No buttons down the front. Made for Men, Women, and Young People. Most convenient to put on or off, being entered at the top and drawn on like trousers. With no other kind of underwear can ladies obtain such perfect fit for dresses or wear comfortably so small a corset.

ONEITA KNITTING MILLS,

Office: No. 1 Greene St., N. Y.

Send for Illustrated Booklet. Address Dept. 2.

A NEW POCO.

The Folding Gem.

The neatest, smallest, most carefully built of all the low-priced cameras. A marvel of compactness weighing one pound, and only an inch and a-half thick, closed. Automatically locks itself at proper focusing distance. Closed by touching a spring.

TAKES A PICTURE 4 X 5 As perfect at edges as at centre.

COMPLETE, $7.00.

ROCHESTER CAMERA CO.

43 ELIZABETH ST., ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Esterbrook's Pens Triumphant.

IN SIGNING THE PEACE PROTOCOL

Secretary Day used our

No. 048 Falcon

And Ambassador Cambon our

No. 313 Probate

We manufacture 150 other styles. Ask your Stationer for them.

The Esterbrook Steel Pen Co., Works, Camden, N. J. 26 John St., New York.

Rare Old Violi

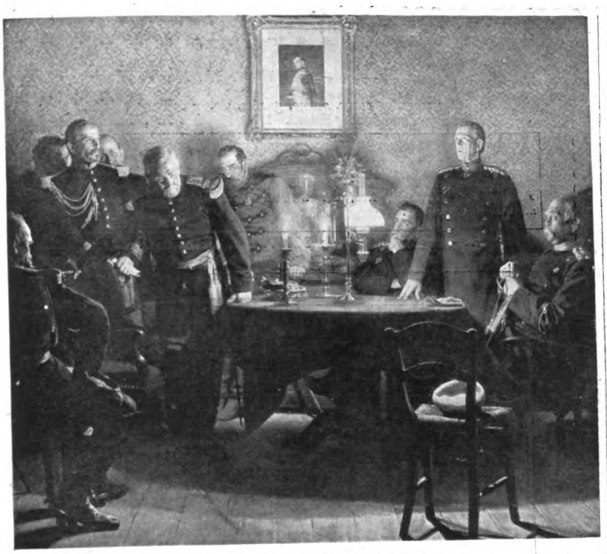
A Special Offer We will sen three old v approval and allow an examination Our new collection of old violins, the depressed conditions under whic bought, presents the Greatest Valu Offered. No teacher, connoisseur o can afford to let this opportunity parent having a child desiring a sa violin should delay corresponding wi offer fine old violins possessing a st mellow tone, dated 1570 to 1810, fro ward; Artists' violins from $50 to $ nificent violins by the greatest of th ters, from $500 to $5,000—A formal of Genuineness accompanies every in Our collection of over one thousand is the result of many years of patien Europe by our connoisseur and no can be duplicated.

Beautiful Catalogue Free

Our new catalog Violins," 272 pages, illustrated with qua etc., and gives biogra old makers, besides full description of t lins making up our

To prospective purchasers we copy free.

Easy Monthly Payments May Be Arranged.



(In writing please mention this p

THE INESTIMABLE BLESSING OF SIGH MORE USEFUL OR SUITABLE FOR A

THE SIGHT R AVOID HE SURGICAL READ TREATISE IMPAIRED V WATERY, FLAMED E TISM, PRESBYOPIA, MYOPIA, CATAR WORST DISORDERS OF THE EYE." THE IDEAL COMPANY, 239 BROADW

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE SURRENDER AT SEDAN IN 1870.

The French army, 84,000 men, surrender to the German army of 250,000 men. This event was the signal for the downfall of the French Empire and the establishment of the Republic. This is one of the hundreds of full-page illustrations from the Library (twice this size) which so clearly and beautifully illustrate the events of interest and importance in the world's history.

Sixty Centuries of History.

A Remarkable Historical Library Containing the Entire History of the World.

This is indeed a remarkable work, one which to us seems perfectly to fit the needs of the present day. A Library that enables one to thoroughly understand the history of the world from the beginning. A work that provides the way for all to become thoroughly acquainted with the makers of the world's history. One can here follow Julius Cæsar through his remarkable career, watch with interest the rise and fall of the Roman Empire, dwell awhile in company with the great Nelson, travel side by side with Napoleon through his victories and defeats, or can follow the influences of Bismarck's strong policy for Germany. In fact, with the aid of this magnificent work one may in a season's reading, or by dipping into the Library for an hour or two every now and then, acquire a wider and firmer grasp on the history of the world, and the men who have made it, than could be obtained by grubbing about for a lifetime.

Under the plan of McClure's History Club, through which the Library is being distributed, you obtain the work at a fraction of the regular price, and, if you wish, pay for it a little at a time. The entire work is delivered to Club members as soon as they join, and they pay for the work in their own way. This is an opportunity to equip your home at a trifling cost with the finest historical Library that has ever been published.

A postal card addressed to McClure's History Club, 141 East 25th Street, New York, will secure full information regarding the novel Club plan, the Library itself, and the special proposition which is just now being offered to those who become members. We believe we are doing our readers a service by advising them to investigate this remarkable offer at once.

7,000 Guns in Stock

WE SELL GUNS of every reputable American and foreign make, and give wholesale prices to everybody. We carry in stock

Fishing Tackle and Sporting Goods amounting to a quarter of a million dollars. We can please the fancy of millionaires, or meet the demands of the poorest sportsman and angler. Write for prices, or ask us to send you our Sporting Goods Catalogue. We load and sell over

1,000,000 Hand Loaded Shells a Year

Ask us to send you our price card of hand and machine loaded shells. We have

The largest Gun Repair Shop in America

We make guns, re-bore, re-stock, repair—in fact, alter a gun to suit the owner, and guarantee satisfaction. Write for prices.

MONTGOMERY WARD & CO.

Originators of the Catalogue Business 111 to 120 Michigan Ave. cor. Madison St., Chicago

MENTION THIS PUBLICATION WHEN WRITING

Blakemore Whiskey 7 years old.

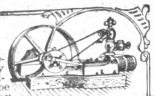
NOTHING BETTER MADE OR SOLD.



Matured in wood and bottled in bond under Government Supervision.

If your dealer hasn't it, send us TWELVE DOLLARS, and we will have sent to your address by express prepaid a sample case containing TWELVE BOTTLES.

Freiberg & Workum,
Cincinnati, O.

MONEY

is not more surely a defence against poverty than technical knowledge that can always be converted into money. You can learn now without leaving home. Success guaranteed. Best text books free.

STEAM ENGINEERING

Bridge, Electrical or Civil Engineering; Mathematics, Chemistry; Mining; Architectural or Mechanical Drawing; Surveying; Plumbing; Architecture; Metal-Pattern Drafting; Prospecting; Book-keeping; Shorthand; English Branches

TAUGHT BY MAIL $2.00 a Month

Circular free. State subject you wish to study. Estab. 1891. 45,000 students and graduates.

The International Correspondence Schools,
Box 1159 Scranton, Pa.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

| | |
|---|---|
| MAGAZINE, | $4 00 a Year |
| WEEKLY, | $4 00 a Year |
| BAZAR, | $4 00 a Year |
| LITERATURE, | $4 00 a Year |
| ROUND TABLE, | $1 00 a Year |

What Viola Allen Says:

"I have found your Johann Hoff's Malt Extract to be wonderfully strength-giving when fatigued from overwork, and gladly acknowledge its great value as a most efficient tonic."

Viola Allen

Johann Hoff's Malt Extract Gives Strength

Financial

Letters of Credit. Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,
BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

Spencerian Pens
New Series No. 37.

See That Hole?

That is for inserting a pointed instrument to eject the pen from the holder, and to prevent the ink from flowing back on the pen and soiling the fingers.

Samples on receipt of return postage. Ask for Vertical No. 37.

Spencerian Pen Company
450 Broome Street, New York.

IF YOU'RE A PIPE SMOKER

A TRIAL WILL CONVINCE THAT

GOLDEN SCEPTRE

IS PERFECTION

SEND 10 cts FOR SAMPLE PACKAGE — PRICES 1lb 1.30, ¼lb 40 cts

POSTAGE PAID. CATALOGUE FREE.

SURBRUG, 159 FULTON ST., N.Y. CITY.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE thoroughly revised and classified, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

The School-Bag

of every boy and girl who knows the best pencil, contains

Dixon's AMERICAN GRAPHITE Pencils.

Joseph Dixon Crucible Co., Jersey City, N. J.

BRASS BAND

Instruments, Drums, Uniforms, Equipments for Bands and Drum Corps. Lowest prices ever quoted. Fine Catalog, 400 Illustrations, mailed free; it gives Band Music & Instructions for Amateur Bands.

LYON & HEALY 17 Adams St., Chicago.

In the Heart of Chicago,

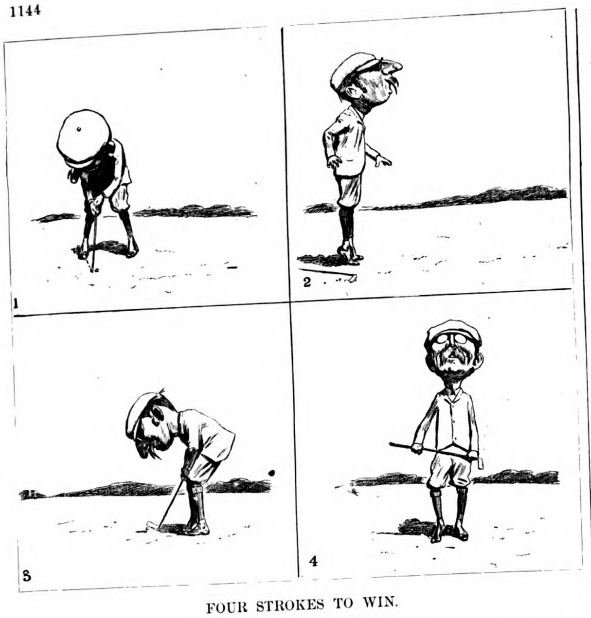
Near to the leading hotels, great stores, banks, theatres, and public buildings, the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Ry's passenger station (in Van Buren St.) is located, while all Elevated Railway trains stop at its entrance, giving quick service to nearly all parts of the city.



Convenience in traveling is best assured by using the great through trains over this route between Chicago, Cleveland, Buffalo, New York, Boston and the eastern country. Copy of "Book of Trains" sent free.

A. J. SMITH.
G. P. & T. A., Cleveland, O.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

FOUR STROKES TO WIN.

Armour's Extract of Beef

"has that rich, beefy flavor."

For preparing soups, sauces, gravies, etc. "Culinary Wrinkles" gives many ways of using Extract. It's mailed free for the asking.

ARMOUR'S CONCENTRATED TABLETS of BEEF EXTRACT and VEGETABLES—condensed food—for home use or travelers—Sample Box containing sufficient for three meals, free, for a two cent stamp and your dealer's name.

Actual size of Tablet.

Address ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

Reproduction of the cover of the Thanksgiving Number, to be published in an edition of 600,000 copies.

THIS AND ALL THE ISSUES OF THE YOUTH'S COMPANION FOR THE REMAINING WEEKS OF 1898 FREE TO THOSE WHO SUBSCRIBE NOW FOR THE VOLUME FOR 1899.

Beautiful Illustrated Announcement of the principal articles and stories engaged for the new volume sent with sample copies Free upon request.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS who will send $1.75 at once, and mention this paper or cut out and enclose this slip, will not only receive The Companion every week to January, 1900, but also the Companion Calendar for 1899, lithographed in twelve colors and gold, the most beautiful gift ever given to COMPANION readers. TU178

PERRY MASON & CO., BOSTON, MASS.

The brilliancy of those pretty things, dainty women make and like to have about them, perishes miserably in the hot suds of a strong soap. Ivory Soap because of its mildness and purity if used in warm (not hot) water will brighten them after soiling, until they are equal to new.

Copyright, 1898, by The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati.

W. & J. Sloane

Imported and Domestic CARPETS, RUGS, UPHOLSTERY GOODS, and WALL PAPERS in all grades.

Plans and Estimates for Furnishing and Decorating Interiors complete submitted upon application.

Broadway & 19th St.

NEW YORK.

Arnold Constable & Co.

Laces.

Novelties in Chiffon, Lace Net, Silk for Neckwear.
Lace Collars, Yokes, Berthas, Gauze, Crêpe Mousseline, Appliqué Scarfs, Silk Ties, Stocks.

Ostrich Feather Boas.

Broadway & 19th St.

NEW YORK.

Archarena Combination Boards for THANKSGIVING PARLOR GAMES.

(BRILLIANT CHERRY FINISH)

No. 2, has CROKINOLE, TEN PINS, and CARROM GAMES, 10 in all, for $3.50, express paid east of Omaha. No. 1 board, 4 games, $2.50. If not at your dealer's write for rules to

ARCHARENA CO.
Manufacturers,
Peoria, Ill.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,

BANKERS.

ESTABLISHED 1873.

2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.

Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.

Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.

A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.

Correspondence solicited.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE thoroughly revised and classified, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

TRADE E & W MARK

EARL & WILSON'S LINEN COLLARS & CUFFS BEST IN THE WORLD.

Six Trains Daily for Chicago—NEW YORK CENTRAL.

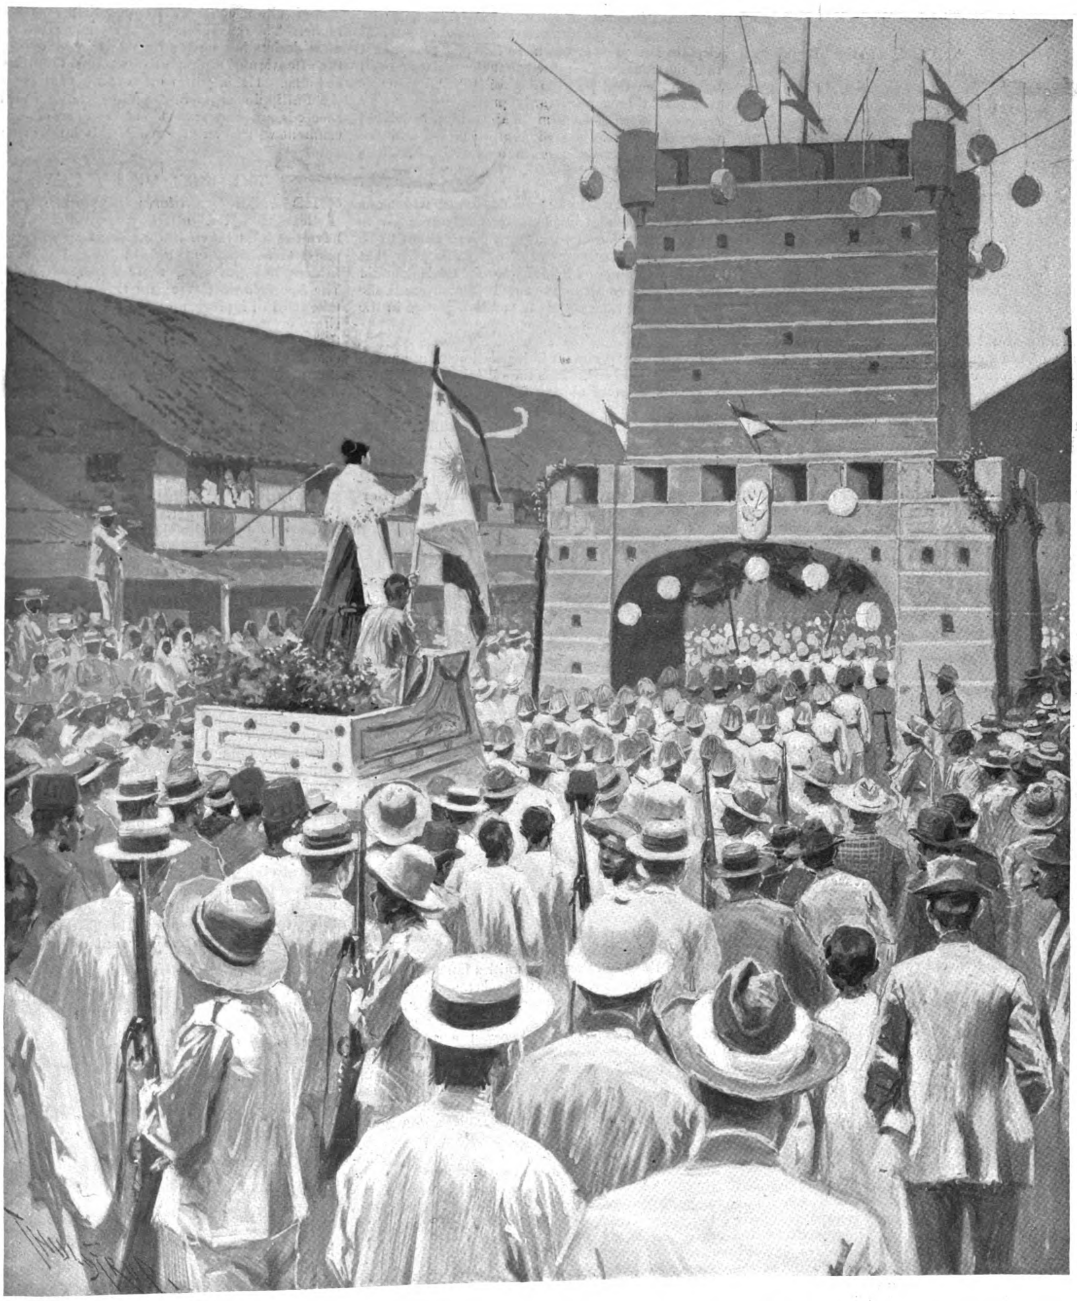
Digitized by Google



Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—No. 2188.
Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS.
All Rights Reserved.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1898.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

A TRIUMPHAL PARADE OF INSURGENT TROOPS IN MANILA.

THE GENIUS OF LIBERTY WITH THE INSURGENT FLAG ON A FLOAT DRAWN BY NATIVES.

DRAWN BY T. DE THULSTRUP AFTER PHOTOGRAPH FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, NOVEMBER 26, 1898

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4 00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, and Mexico

Subscriptions may begin with any Number

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

London: 45 Albemarle Street, W.

Also for sale at Brentano's, 37 Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris

CHAIRMAN BABCOCK, of the Republican Congressional Committee, says that, as a result of the election, "free silver and fiat money are now eliminated from politics," while Senator CULLOM says practically the same thing. As a matter of fact, fiat money will not be eliminated from our politics until our monetary system is reformed and put upon a proper basis, and that task rests with the Republican party.

WE are not yet inclined to believe that Mr. CHAUNCEY DEPEW is Mr. PLATT'S choice as a successor to EDWARD MURPHY, Jr., in the United States Senate. Mr. DEPEW would not, perhaps, be rebellious against Mr. PLATT'S power, but he would cut so much of a figure in the Senate that Mr. PLATT would be very much obscured—although he would continue to preside at the distribution of the spoils, and his practical usefulness would therefore be much the same that it is now.

IT is said that among the features of the report of the commission appointed by the President to devise a government for Hawaii is a provision for the election of a delegate to Congress similar to the provision for the election of delegates from our Territories. Unless the natives are disfranchised, this delegate will probably be one of themselves, and then we shall have the edifying spectacle of the American politician cultivating the native vote of the Sandwich Islands. We never believed that the Americans of the islands would retain their power very long after annexation, and the signs are beginning to multiply that their lease of power is short.

MR. RICHARD CROKER announces that he is temporarily tired of politics, and he has gone to Chicago to rest. Our readers who have carefully considered the articles by Mr. FRANKLIN MATTHEWS on "Wide-open Chicago" and "Wide-open New York" will find much food for reflection in this visit of the New York boss to the Western city. It is thoroughly well understood that the vicious and lawless of Chicago are permitted to ply their trades without let or hinderance from the law, in order to strengthen the kind of Democracy which Mayor CARTER HARRISON represents. Primarily this segregation of the vice of Chicago was in the interest of free silver; secondarily it was in the interest of the Democratic party; in the third place, it was in behalf of Mayor CARTER HARRISON, who seeks the Democratic nomination in 1900. Mr. CROKER permitted New York to be wide open—that is, permitted vice to rule in this city—for similar reasons. Naturally, in the hour of his defeat—for his incursion into the larger politics of the State ended in defeat—he seeks to discover from CARTER HARRISON whether his alliance is supposed to be as valuable as it was. He and CARTER HARRISON are probably consulting as to the general welfare.

INSPECTOR-GENERAL BRECKINRIDGE has given some very strong testimony against the management of SHAFTER'S campaign, and against current army administration in general. It is an interesting fact, however, that General BRECKINRIDGE himself sought for a command in the field, although he now says that he was practically displaced by an order directing inspectors in the field to report directly to the Adjutant-General. However this may be, it is a fact worthy of the serious consideration of Congress, when the subject of army reform comes before it, that both the Inspector General's department and the Adjutant-General's department were practically broken up by the sending of the officers connected with them into the field. These departments have always insisted that they should have many more officers than were granted them by Congress, because they were organized, not to perform the business of twenty-five thousand men, the peace establishment of the army, but to conduct the affairs of an army of one hundred thousand men in time of war. No sooner did war break out, however, than these officers, who were supposed to be trained to staff duties, obtained employment in the field, leaving the staff duties to be performed by newly appointed civilians and others entirely inexperienced.

THE French Court of Cassation is now on its trial in the case of Captain DREYFUS. Up to a certain point it may be admitted it has stood the test quite as well as could have been expected. Attempts were undoubtedly made to influence if not to terrorize it in the interests of the army—which means, of course, the corrupt administration of the army of France; but fortunately it appears so far to have withstood those attempts. The question that still remains is, after all, the crucial one—shall Captain DREYFUS at last have fair play? It is said that the court has required that the prisoner shall have notice that he is to be retried, and the fact that even this was solemnly protested against by representatives of the army may perhaps be looked upon as the last confession of weakness and the strongest admission of guilt on their part. This small instalment of justice, it seems, will at least be granted the prisoner of Devil's Island; but what of the rest? Is the victim of the most audacious and corrupt denial of justice probably ever perpetrated in any famous trial of modern times to be placed at the disadvantage of every disability that can be heaped upon him at his second trial? Should his judges be compelled to acquit him, after all, the result will be the greatest triumph of justice in the face of odds on record.

ONE more experiment in legislation is announced from New Zealand. This time it takes the form of a state system of old-age pensions, by which the poor are to be provided for in their old age in all cases in which they have not made a sufficient provision to secure themselves against want. As yet the details of the scheme are not available for criticism, but its main features are sufficiently distinct to arouse interest and attention. Unlike the German pension system, which is paternal in its operation by compelling workmen to contribute to a provident fund while they are young and vigorous, the New Zealand plan is evidently socialistic in idea. There is to be no special contribution by the workers to secure the advantage of the pension. As a citizen, the state recognizes that it is bound to see that he or she does not want enough food and covering in old age, and if it is clear that any one has not the means of providing these at sixty-five years, the state will supply it. The pensions are to be paid out of the general taxation of the country, and will of course be made to take the place of other state aid as administered elsewhere, in the various forms of workhouses, refuges, and other state charities. Many things may no doubt be urged both for and against the experiment in theory, but it can hardly be doubted that the civilized world may be the gainer by having it presented as an object-lesson in practice. New Zealand has already tried many things—some of them with marked success; it will be interesting to see the results that follow upon her last departure in state socialism.

THE white mobs of South Carolina and North Carolina may in the end bring about a peaceful state of things in the communities lately the scenes of violent outrage. It all depends upon the amount of killing which they can accomplish. The negroes have been overpowered, and many of them have disappeared. The war between the races, which appears to have reached a climax in Wilmington, in Greenwood, and in McCormick, is a natural result of the bestowal of political power upon the blacks. The war has been going on ever since the negroes were enfranchised. In Mississippi and in South Carolina enfranchisement has been practically abolished by constitutional provision. Nevertheless, the war between the races is not over even in those States, and it has been aggravated by the appointment of negro Federal officials, much to the disgust of the whites, who resent what they call "negro rule." There is no good reason that can be given by those who are responsible for the appointment of negroes for thus inciting disturbance of the peace. They are to blame, as all men are to blame who do not deal tactfully with the situations confronting them. It is no more right to appoint a distasteful negro as postmaster in the South than it is right to appoint a distasteful white man to be postmaster in the North. But, all this barred, so long as the government is within its right—that is, the right of its power and its jurisdiction—it should have the strength and the firmness, and its Chief Executive should have the courage, to maintain peace and order everywhere within its borders. The riot in North Carolina seems to have been entirely beyond the Federal jurisdiction; but the riot in South Carolina involved an assault upon a Federal official, and therefore invited and demands Federal interference. More serious still than either one of these riots in Southern States is the conduct of Governor TANNER of Illinois in making war upon Alabama negroes who were seeking work in Illinois, and who, as citizens of the United States, had the right to the protection of the State. The riots in the South and in Illinois are a blot upon our civilization and an impeachment of our government. The immediate duty of the country lies here and with these offenders. To distract the attention of the country from these domestic crimes and this weakness at Washington is to invite a continuance of bad government at home. The one thing that the politician of to-day most desires is a means by which he may distract the attention of the American people from his sins at home. He is just now seeking that means in the Philippines and in the West Indies, and if he succeeds, we may expect that the days of bad government will be lengthened in this land.

THE COST OF EMPIRE.

THE London Spectator, writing on "The American Colonies," utters some reflections which have not been taken into account by our own expansionists, since enthusiasm instead of thoughtfulness has governed their superheated minds. The Spectator believes that this country ought to take the Philippines, and all the other Spanish territory on which we can lay our hands. It believes that eventually we shall be able to govern these colonies wisely, but it is not much concerned with that problem, and, well-informed as it usually is, it is wholly ignorant of the defects of our administrative system and of their political causes—causes that may be said to be in the bone of our system, although, we hope, not born there and not ineradicable. The Spectator's attitude on the policy of American expansion is naturally and properly British. It believes, as Lord SALISBURY does, that British interests would be promoted, or at least protected, by the extension of the sovereignty of the republic into Asiatic waters. At the same time, the Spectator, unlike our own expansionists, is willing to count the cost of the proposed enterprise, and it realizes that it will be very great, and perhaps discouraging.

The Spectator says: "To govern such possessions, so peopled, wisely, with a certain vivifying gentleness, and yet through devices from above, is very difficult work, as we discovered when we began it, and before an experience marked by many failures had taught us a sound tradition, and the Americans will find that the task will produce many changes, both in their internal organization and their dominant ideas. They must, for example, as they already admit, greatly strengthen their navy.... Then they must have a much larger regular army.... Moreover, half their troops must be dark men—negroes, half-castes, Tagals, and, we should say, Mohammedan Malays.... A tropical civil service, again, to be pure, and to be composed of picked men, must be highly paid, and must be provided with pensions, which become in time a serious burden on the Treasury.... And lastly, the colonies are in want of public works, railways, roads, harbors, healthy barracks, quays, and light-houses, and the amount which can be spent on these 'necessities of civilization' is almost limitless. The colonies may cost a good deal of money for some years, and though the Union can pay anything, we are not quite sure of its willingness to export treasure."

The mere money cost of this colonial enterprise, even so far as we have gone, will be enormous. The annual cost of our small army on a peace footing is about $24,500,000. The cost of the administrative force and the miscellaneous and incidental expenses of the War Department is about $7,000,000, making a total of a little more than $31,000,000. The cost of the navy, counting the appropriation for its increase, is about $30,000,000. No military authority believes that we ought to maintain an army of less than 100,000 men. The pay, travelling, transportation, and general expenses of the army, as it stood before the war, were about $16,000,000. On this basis the same expenses would amount to quite $65,000,000; for not only would the pay of the troops be multiplied by four but the cost of their transportation would be increased in a much greater ratio. The cost of subsistence for the army would be increased from $1,750,000 to at least $7,000,000. The item o

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

quartermaster's supplies would grow from $2,300,000 to quite $10,000,000 for several years to come, and after that to at least $5,000,000. There would be an increase of expenditure for horses alone of about $500,000, and of at least $1,500,000 for the medical and ordnance departments and other incidentals. This estimate, which is moderate, shows an annual increase of $64,000,000 for army expenses alone if the army be increased to 100,000, while the additional cost of new fortifications, new post buildings, quarters, and barracks, would easily bring this up to $65,000,000. But it is very well understood, even by those who are talking of increasing the army to 100,000 men, that such a force would not begin to be adequate to the demands of the new colonies for their defence and for service at home, and that an army of at least 250,000 men will be necessary for these purposes, including the maintenance of peace at home; and the statesman who is counting the cost of annexation and expansion, if there be such a statesman in the country, would be imprudent to estimate for an annual increase of the army budget of less than $100,000,000.

As to the navy, we shall, in the first place, be obliged to count on an expenditure of at least $100,000,000 for the purpose of bringing it into the rank of first-class "fighting fleets," and instead of appropriating from $9,000,000 to $13,000,000 annually for the purpose of increasing it, Congress will be obliged to appropriate from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000 if we are to catch up with European governments. Even then they will be obliged to halt for us if we are to arrive speedily at their state of preparation. The annual cost of the British navy is about $115,000,000, and that of the French navy about $57,000,000. We shall be lucky if we get off with an expenditure for the navy of less than $60,000,000 a year in excess of the expenditures of 1897.

After this war we shall have to reckon on large additions to our civil list, which will be made necessary by our new colonies. They must be governed, and governed thoroughly and expensively, if they are to be governed well. The cost of a colonial service must be largely matter of conjecture. It depends on the intelligence of Congress; and we are painfully aware that the legislative branch of the government is not inclined to expend the public money merely where it is needed. Congressmen are always desirous that it shall go where it will do the most good—to them; that is, where their constituents may get a share, whether government receives a return for its expenditure or not. We are assuming, however, that in time circumstances, which are likely to be delicate on distant frontiers, will compel the establishment of a good colonial service, and in that event we fancy that its cost will be a good deal larger than the present cost of our foreign service, which is in the neighborhood of $1,700,000. The cost of our diplomatic service must also increase with new international complications, and this increase together with the cost of the colonial service will certainly amount to $3,000,000.

Thus we have at once an annual increase of expenditures for colonial defence and government of the very considerable amount of $163,000,000. The calculations on which this estimate is based are necessarily crude, but the result may be depended upon to be well within the sum which the possession of distant colonies will add to the cost of government. Moreover, this great sum must be raised by direct taxation; for the extension of the free-trade principle to these colonies—the principle which obtains between the States—will deprive the government of a main source of its customs revenue. We cannot levy a customs duty on the products of our own country. But in ordinary years raw sugar pays us more than $50,000,000 in revenue, while tobacco pays us from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000. Are the sugars of Cuba, Puerto Rico, the Philippines, and Hawaii to come in free, and the tobacco and cigars of the West Indies and the Philippines to be untaxed at the threshold of the country? Certainly, if the countries in which these products are produced are to become part of the United States. Here then we have at least $60,000,000 to be added to the amount which the colonies will actually cost, making in all something like $223,000,000 that must be raised every year by direct taxation, in addition to the present ordinary expenses of the government, which are supposed to be enormously extravagant. We repeat that this great sum must be raised by direct taxation, because we assume that in due time our politicians will come to understand that expansion and protection cannot go together. But this is a subject for future consideration. We rest content at present with showing that the cost of empire is as splendid as empire itself. We might go further, and point out that the returns from such colonies as those which are now stimulating the imaginations of our politicians would make a most insignificant showing on the other side of the ledger. Of this we may be sure, that the further we go in this predatory scheme, the more surely will we realize that empire in our time and for us will be a useless extravagance, on account of whose burdens our descendants will deride us, for they will consider annexation and expansion as the political and economic follies of the end of a century the opening of which glowed with the hope of democracy.

THE SULTAN'S FRIEND.

THE German Emperor is a remarkably clever man. Slowly it is being recognized that the Kaiser is no laughing matter; that beneath his rhetoric and extravagances there lie a purpose as cool and a statesmanship as bold and far-seeing as CAVOUR'S or DISRAELI'S. Russian diplomacy is not more effective in its slow perseverance than are the Kaiser's rattling strokes of policy.

Look only at the fruits of his policy in the Near East. It was Germany that made the Concert nugatory; it was with German arms and under the instruction of German officers that the Turks defeated the Greeks in the spring of 1897; and only the other day it was Germany, alone of all the European powers that count, that refused to join in bundling the Turkish soldiers out of Crete. The last act of friendship was still to come. His most Protestant Majesty visited, in person, the author of the Armenian massacres, embraced him as an ally and a brother, and handed in his bill for services rendered. It was honored not only in such thanks and compliments as the ruler of the Faithful had never yet bestowed on a European prince, but in solider payment. The abode of the Blessed Virgin was made over as a free gift, to be placed, by the Kaiser, in charge of the German Catholics. Railway and harbor concessions that had waited years for official favor were granted by special irades. German trade was given exclusive advantages, and arrangements were made for welcoming German colonists in the Sultan's domains.

What are the net results? The Sultan is rehabilitated. He has a protector pledged to the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, and not to be swerved by sentimentalism from the policy of self-interest. His frontier is strengthened against Russian advance by the German railroad that is to join the Sea of Marmora with the Persian Gulf. He can snap his fingers at Europe and all its concerts. He has an assured international position. For Germany the benefits are more tangible. The new lines that are to be built from the Persian Gulf to Scutari and from Bagdad to the Mediterranean will give to Germany the commercial supremacy of Asia Minor. The banks and railroads of Palestine and Syria are already largely in German hands, and more German settlers are to be found there than in the whole of Greater Germany. The Emperor's visit has laid the foundations of a German empire in the Near East.

It has done more than that. The Catholic Centre is the determinating party in the Reichstag. It holds the balance between the Right and the Left, and its support or opposition is always of first importance. The Kaiser has now laid it under obligations that must rally it to his domestic policy. To present to the Pope, in the name of the German Catholics, the abode of the Blessed Virgin was a master-stroke. It pleased and gratified the Vatican, and made it impossible for LEO XIII. to resent the snub afterwards administered to French pretensions in Asia Minor.

The protectorate over all Catholics in the Orient, French or otherwise, has been for many centuries one of the privileges of France as the eldest daughter of the Church. It was reaffirmed by the Pope just before the Kaiser started for Constantinople. The protectorate brings with it something more than a moral prestige. The missionaries receive their credentials from Paris, and in case of need apply to the French minister at Constantinople. All negotiations between the Sultan and the Pope are carried on through his office. Catholics in the Orient, no matter of what nationality, no matter whether they are missionaries, pilgrims, or travellers, have been used to look upon France as their protector. In this way a position of commanding influence was within reach of the French government, not only in the Ottoman Empire, but in China, where it likewise held the post of guardian over the lives and property of all Catholics.

The Germans, of late years, have been bent on undermining this authority. The tale of their efforts is interesting, but too long to relate. Their success was shown by the affair of Kiao-chau. Ten years ago the German government would have left it to the French minister at Peking to demand compensation for the murder of the German missionaries. The Kaiser acted otherwise. He took upon himself the protection of his own subjects, and seized a portion of Chinese territory by way of indemnity. He refused to admit that German subjects could be under the control of any government but that of Berlin. As in the Far East, so in the Near East. Speaking at Jerusalem to a body of German Catholics, the Kaiser said, with unmistakable significance: "Whenever one of you needs my protection, I am here. Let him come to me, no matter what his creed may be. Happily the German Empire is in a position to afford its subjects abroad effective protection."

By those words France is stripped of her patrimony in the Levant. The nationalization of the missions in China led directly to Kiao-chau. In the Ottoman Empire it may have results not dissimilar.

IMPERIALISM AND THE SENATE.

IT was the Home Market Club of Boston, of all bodies in the world, that described the prospect of our making ourselves responsible for the future of the Philippines as "appalling." No wonder. There is no doubt that when there was laid down in the protocol a clause reserving to the United States the occupancy of Manila pending the conclusion of a treaty of peace which should determine the control, disposition, and government of the Philippines, the President had not made up his mind what the country wanted in respect to those islands, and was waiting for light. The question was purposely left in the air by the language of the protocol. But it was not left so much in the air that it may not fairly be said that the language of the protocol did not include the demand for the whole archipelago, and that this demand is an enlargement of its terms.

However that may be, it was plain that the President was waiting for light upon public opinion, and it would be interesting to know whence he derived that estimate of public opinion which led him, a fortnight ago, to spring upon the peace commission the demand for all the Philippines. Because many of "the men of light and leading" in this country had already been heard from, and the weight of their opinion was against the acquisition. Evidence has accumulated that the policing of the islands would cost more than their whole trade could possibly come to; that they would make us not less but more vulnerable in case of foreign complications, which, moreover, the possession of them would invite; that we should have to begin our operations in them by giving a beating to our "allies," on whose account we were asked to take them; that we had no means of administering distant possessions, and were not likely to come at once into possession of any good ones; that the holding of the Philippines would be a violent contradiction of the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed; that it would be a direct violation or a pettifogging evasion of our pledge that the war with Spain was not undertaken with a view to conquest; and finally that the islands, instead of promising any benefit, threatened grave injuries, material, political, and moral, to the United States.

These considerations were making their way, unopposed by any argument on the other side. Undoubtedly it seemed that the opposition to imperialism was increasing and prevailing, when the American commissioners startled their countrymen, not less than the Spaniards, by demanding all the Philippines. The demand was apparently the result of the President's Western trip. As he journeyed he came near Indianapolis, and "suddenly there shined round about him a light." But the demand had no sooner been made as a consequence of this illumination than many and clear voices were raised in protest from the President's own party. In his long political life Senator HOAR has not done himself more honor than by his manly and patriotic denunciation. And his protest was followed by others not less weighty, from Republicans not less important.

It is long since intelligent Americans had cause to repeat WEBSTER'S congratulation, "It is fortunate that there is a Senate of the United States." But just now they can heartily re-echo that sentiment, and add their congratulations that the power of the President to make treaties is limited by the proviso that two-thirds of the Senators present concur. It seems inconceivable that such a concurrence can be obtained for a treaty annexing the Philippines, since opposition to expansion may already be called a doctrine of the Democratic party with much more confidence than expansion can be called a doctrine of the Republican party.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE SECOND ZIONIST CONGRESS.

WHAT a birthday party we have enjoyed! One year ago, on the closing day of the first Zionist congress, Dr. Theodor Herzl, author of Der Judenstaat and foremost in the leadership of the new Zion movement, casually remarked to a circle of friends: "The Roumanian Jews have long believed that the Messiah would be born on this day, the 29th of August. I now share their belief, for I too am persuaded that this day marks the birth of the Messiah, the dawn of a Messianic hope for my people." In this wise the gifted standard-bearer of Zion silenced for all time the cavillings of those who had looked upon Herzl as a self-deluded pseudo-Messiah, and, on the other hand, clearly proclaimed his personal conviction that Zionism was the—not a—solution of the Jewish question; that, in the memorable words of Max Nordau, "Der Zionismus ist die letzte, grosse moralische Anstrengung der Juden." If, then, August 29, 1897, was the birthday of the Messiah, the 29th of August, 1898, may fairly be said to have been a glorious birthday feast.

The former congress was convened in part in order that some estimate might be formed of the depth of sentiment in Jewry touched into life by the summons, "Let us journey back—in a higher sense, forward—to the land of our fathers." In so far, therefore, the gathering of a twelvemonth ago was experimental in respect of its plans of organization, and limited in the scope of its deliberations. So pronounced at the outset was this feeling of uncertainty as to the outcome, and insecurity as to the consequences, that the Russian delegates not unwisely refrained from public participation in the debates, fearful lest their eagerness to assist in the rebuilding of the Jewish nation might appear treasonable in the sight of over-alert officials. One year had changed all this—in truth, one day, for ere the sun had set on the first day of the first congress a message had gone forth to the farthest ends of the earth, telling that this Jewish assembly, far from being an international conspiracy, was but the modern and popular expression of a noble and olden aim—the undying aspiration of the scattered remnants of a people to put an end to long centuries of sore travail and wandering and homelessness by creating a "Heimstätte" for themselves. And if one year ago the scorner was constrained to respectful silence by the dignity and fervor with which a "mercenary lot" pledged their devotion, like unto Arthurian knights, to the pursuit of an ideal, this year the would-be mockers were moved to admiration of the practical statesmanship with which these idealists had set about the realization of their hopes.

DR. THEODOR HERZL.

One might have searched long and vainly for any sign of wavering or indefiniteness in the character of the second congress, for within a year Zionism had felt and tested and multiplied its own strength. The figures presented by the committee on organization were welcomed in proof of this, showing as they did that the number of organizations formally allied with the cause had increased ninefold within a few months. Statistics are scarce needed on this score, if we but think of the six millions of unhappy Jewish dwellers (citizens they are not) in Russia, Roumania, and Galicia alone, whom only the promise of release from persecution can save from the slough of abject despond by pointing comfortingly and encouragingly to the well-beloved home of their forebears.

OBVERSE. REVERSE.

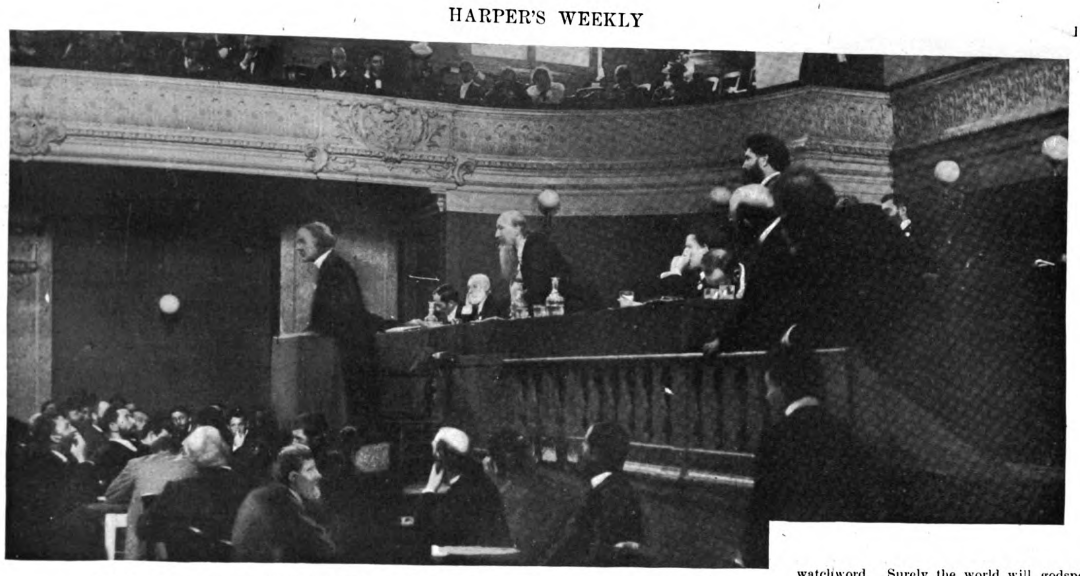
COMMEMORATIVE MEDAL OF THE SECOND ZIONIST CONGRESS.

"Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the nations, . . . and bring them into their own land."

Of far greater moment than any witness to the spread of Zionism among the Jews is the proof, yielded in abundant measure at the various stages of the congress, that Zionism has not merely gained the friendly sympathy of the Christian world, but even arrested the attention of some of Europe's crowned heads. No more watchful listener followed the proceedings of the congress than a certain visitor who is known to have been intrusted by his royal master, Emperor William of Germany, with the duty of preparing a report of the congress in all its many-sidedness. Again, on the last day of the congress, Dr. Herzl, in his official capacity as president of the congress, sent a message of congratulation to the Sultan of Turkey in honor of the celebration of his accession to the throne, to which the "Commander of the Faithful" immediately replied, by the hand of his Lord High Chamberlain, in terms most genial as compared with the ordinarily barren phrases of diplomacy. Will doubters now urge that Wilhelm and Abdul-Hamid have likewise succumbed to the blandishments of the poetry and sentiment which are oft decried as the fatal charm of Zionism? We prefer to recall that these two rulers may some day cast the decisive vote in the settlement of one phase of the Eastern question. By reason of its situation, as well as its natural endowments, Palestine has been happily named "The Gateway of the East." True, but the gate is shut and tightly barred. Who shall open it? The Turks? They lack the gift of initiative, as well as the genius of enterprise. They must be taught and trained to follow whither others have led. Shall the door be opened by one of the European powers? The proposition is unthinkable; against such aggrandizement an invincible concert of the nations would speedily array itself. Shall it not be left to the Jews to open that door, which has never been widely opened since it was closed against the outcasts of Judæa? Inasmuch as Israel is destitute of ambition for temporal power or national supremacy, will not the Jewish reoccupation of Palestine be at one and the same time the simplest and the noblest solution of one of the most perplexing phases of the great Eastern problem?

We can do no more at this place than lightly touch upon the leading incidents which occurred in congress week; for although the delegates were nominally convened for three days, this the greatest synod of the Jews in the eighteen hundred years of the Diaspora, as the congress has justly been styled, lasted throughout the whole of the week, and even longer. On the Sunday prior to the actual assembling of the delegates the minister of the Anglican Church, who conducted services at the improvised chapel of a Basle hotel, pleaded earnestly and eloquently with his Christian hearers in behalf of Zionism. His stirring discourse derived a heightened interest from the frank admission on his part that he was born in Jerusalem, of Jewish-Christian parents, and had lived in the Holy Land until his nineteenth year. Sermon texts are not always of great moment—the personal testimony of a preacher—but the Rev. Mr. Schorr's was of peculiar interest, seeing that his text was the twenty-first verse of the thirty-seventh chapter of the Prophet Ezekiel, which is engraved upon the reverse of the congress medal. How proud we were of this commemorative medal, partly because designed by a French-Jewish Zionist and struck off in the mint of France (an act of rare and saving grace anno Dreyfus), furthermore because it so graphically illustrates the purpose of Zionism! The Genius of History points with hand uplifted to the sun of promise rising over the hills of Zion beyond the sea, and is evidently bent upon urging a typical Jewish family to heed the summons of destiny. The father leans heavily upon his travelling-staff, the tragic symbol of his people's lot; the mother holds an infant to her breast; some young children are near by; but the faces of all betoken the resolution to follow the bidding of the vision before them.

Wednesday evening witnessed a splendid demonstration in honor of the arrival of Dr. Herzl. A hundred or more delegates waited at the railroad station for hours in a blinding rain-storm, the enthusiasm of the welcome being marred in slight degree by the failure of the party to have agreed in advance upon some common form of salutation. Master of a dozen tongues though he is, Dr. Herzl was for a moment bewildered by the Babel-like storm of greetings. This was perhaps the only occasion upon which the "polyglotism" of the delegates was noticeable. German, the Jewish Volapük, was the official language, but Hebrew and French were heard on every hand, varied by the occasional accents of Russian, Polish, Roumanian, Arabic, English, Dutch, Italian, and Turkish, most or all of which tongues not a few delegates spoke with equal facility. The following days—Thursday, Friday, and Saturday—were given over to a multitude of preliminary conferences on the important questions of policy which it was known would arise. "Safety-valves" these forgatherings were called by a witty German jurist; "peace negotiations" by another, who was cognizant of the many differences to be healed prior to the assembling of the delegates.



A seemingly trivial incident occurred on Friday evening, which afforded the deepest satisfaction to the lovers of Zion in Basle assembled. It was the twenty-sixth day of August, the feast of St. Jacques, in annual commemoration of the great national victory of 1444. As the holiday procession filed by the meeting-place of the congress, the grotesquely attired lines paused under the blue and white flag of Zion unfurled for the first time from the balcony of the Stadt-Casino, and shouted aloud: "Hoch die Juden!" "Hoch die Zionisten!" Herzl was visibly moved by this show of good feeling, and in his presidential address rightly interpreted this friendly act as a sign of sympathy with the manly, outspoken stand taken by the Zionists in their determination to help themselves.

On the Sabbath morning the stately synagogue of the town became the Mecca of the visitors. Favored, blessed shrine! Since last the pilgrims of Jerusalem offered up their prayers in the Temple of the Most High, no altar had sheltered such a body of worshippers, come together literally from the four corners of the earth. What rapt devotion! What tearful entreaty! What fervent thanksgiving! Within these walls there reigned no confusion of tongues, for the speech of the prophets and the sweet singers in Israel lived again. How these hosts thundered forth the Shemang Yisrael, Israel's ancient declaration of faith in the unity of God! Instinctively the congregation rose in reverence as Herzl mounted the altar steps and

GROUP OF DELEGATES AT THE ZIONIST CONGRESS, BASLE.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AT THE SECOND ZIONIST CONGRESS, BASLE, SWITZERLAND—SPEAKING FROM THE TRIBUNE.

stood with bowed head before the holy scroll of the Law; and as the "Vorbeter" chanted in a soft minor strain such passages as "Have Thou mercy on Zion, for it is the house of our life," strong men covered their faces and silently wept.

I must forbear to dwell upon the actual proceedings of the congress, and can do no more than make the briefest mention of the chief features of those eventful days. These were, though perhaps not in the order of their importance—first, the scenes of enthusiasm which were enacted at the close of the inaugural address of Herzl, and the incomparably fine review of the past year in Jewry by Dr. Nordau; second, the masterly summary of the aims of Zionism, in which Professor Mandelstamm, the eminent oculist of Kiev, proved the nearest task of Zionism to be the upbuilding of the physical and moral life of the Jewish people as the first step on the way to self-government; third, the tumultuous receptions again and again accorded Bernard Lazare, the French littérateur who paved the way for the revision of the Dreyfus case by burrowing out the proofs of the illegality of the trial and placing them in the hands of Scheurer-Kestner and Émile Zola—these scenes reaching a climax on the day following the adjournment of the congress, when the confession and suicide of Colonel Henry were announced; fourth, the joyous acclaim with which the congress hailed the reading of the Czar's proposal to call a conference of the powers, to the end that the peaceful offices of arbitration be substituted for the cruel arbitraments of war—the congress coupling with these congratulations the heartfelt prayer that the proposed conference deal in a spirit of wisdom and justice with the affairs of the afflicted Jews, and further the return to their ancestral home; fifth, the admirable paper, by Dr. Motzkin, based upon personal study and painstaking investigation, showing that the Holy Land, provided its resources were properly developed, could again be made to support a population of millions; sixth, the Fest-Commers of Monday night arranged by the young Zionists of Basle, at which, in true German-student fashion, goblets of Palestinian wine were emptied, amid the singing of tuneful Zion songs in classic Hebrew by a thousand voices, and the presentation of some simple plays, portraying side by side the helpless, wailing Jews of the old Zion and the sturdy, contented husbandmen of Zion the new; seventh, the high order of the post-prandial oratory at the luncheon of Tuesday, given in honor of the representatives of the press, upon which occasion Dr. Herzl, who is editor of the Neue Freie Presse of Vienna, proudly stated that his book calling attention to the "Judenelend" the world over was put forth as the work of a journalist, for he conceived the office of journalism was to speak of the wrongs of to-day in order that they might be righted on the morrow; eighth, the matchless dignity and beauty of that early Wednesday morning hour when, after a practically continuous day and night sitting, Dr. Herzl brought the congress to a close with the words: "Zionism is both a mournful necessity and a glorious ideal. We are to journey henceforth along new paths; Judaism is about to set out upon a moral pilgrimage. Whither shall the way lead?.... Let us hope for better and brighter days!"—cheers and sobs dying in men's throats as they beheld the first ray of the dawning day fall prophetically upon the noble countenance of their loved leader, and light up a large map of the land of promise hanging overhead.

The results of the congress—who can accurately foresee at this early hour? We may, howbeit, confidently declare that a tremendous uplift has been given to the cause by the second Zionist congress. For one thing, Zionism has resolved that the immigration of foreign Jews into Palestine shall not be abetted or countenanced as long as the restrictive and prohibitive laws be not repealed from the statute-books. Zionism will not sanction or even tolerate further evasion; Jews shall not smuggle or beg their way back into Palestine. We shall wait until we can return with head erect and the firm step of men knowing and cherishing their rights. We can wait a little longer, for who will deny to the long-suffering house of Israel the possession of the virtue of patience? Again, acting upon the report of a committee headed by Professor Gottheil of Columbia University, and president of the American Federation of Zionists, the second Zionist congress emphasized the fundamental principle that Zionism shall take no account of the differences touching the religious beliefs and practices of its adherents. We hope to teach the world a lesson in the true meaning of toleration; the most rigidly orthodox shall not be hindered in the performance of Jewish rites and ceremonies as he understands them; on the other hand, the largest freedom shall be allowed such as reject the olden forms and customs of Judaism. Last, the establishment by the congress of the Jewish Colonial Bank at London, with a preliminary capitalization of ten million dollars, shows that, whenever needed, the means will be forth-coming with which to consummate the plans of Zionism. One-tenth of the aforementioned sum had already come to hand unsolicited from the very slender purses of the Russo-Jewish working-classes. Large sums will surely be at the disposal of the cause when such as are favored and prosperous among the Jews will awaken to the understanding of the grandeur of the Zionist movement.

THE ZIONIST FLAG.

"Ubi bene, ibi patria!" How the world despises such as cling to this maxim, "Wheresoever I am prosperous shall be my home"! Shall the Jew forever be expected to moan in tones of resignation, "Ubi male, ibi patria"? Shall there be no pity for such as cry out from the depth of their misery and suffering, "Where I am hated and wronged cannot be meant to be my father-land"? "Let us go back to our home, to our fathers' land," has become the new watchword. Surely the world will godspeed with love and helpfulness the aims of the Jews, who, after centuries of exile, turn with longing, aching hearts to Zion.

REV. STEPHEN S. WISE,
Secretary for the English Language of the Second Zionist Congress.

STADT-CASINO AT BASLE, WHERE THE CONGRESS MET.

THANKSGIVING FOR ALL.

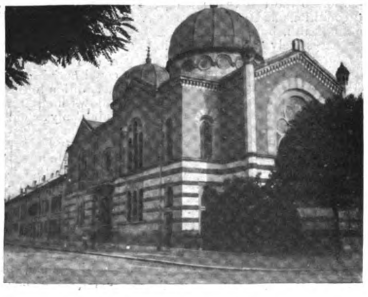
NOVEMBER 24, 1898.

LET all the nations of the earth on this Thanksgiving day
Unite in one grand swelling hymn, and grateful homage pay
For all the mercies of the year, and blessings unsurpassed,
Which have relieved the meed of war by which we've been harassed.

Let Johnny Bull rejoice that he now after many years
Of an estrangement kept alive by bickerings and jeers
With Uncle Sam is friends again, and that across the sea
Their hands once more are firmly clasped in perfect amity.

And let the Cossack folk rejoice that in these latter days
A light has dawned upon the mind that regulates their ways,
For he who seeks the reign of peace cannot be very far
From substituting love for hate in cold Siberia.

And let the Teuton race rejoice that he whose destiny
Has placed him on a lofty throne in glorious majesty
Has lived throughout another year, and in its tedious length
Done nothing to impair at all his people's wondrous strength.



And ancient France, now fallen low, let even France rejoice,
However humbled be her pride, or strident be her voice,
That though she's murdered justice, and is full of shame and dread,
The fact of Zola proves at least her conscience is not dead.

And as for Spain—poor walloped Spain!—she too may join the hymn;
For though her power's broken, and her glories all are dim,
She's lost her chiefest troubles in her mutineering lands,
And knows at last beyond all doubt exactly where she stands.

And Uncle Sam? Well, rather! He should fairly bellow praise
Until the very skies are rent, and all the heavens raise,
For Dewey, Hobson, Sampson, Clark, and all their gallant crew,
For men who stood behind the guns, the grimy stokers too;

For heroes on the hill-side, and for heroes in the vale,
With blood to shed and grit to show before the shotted hail;
For strong and sturdy men at home whose hearts were in the cause
To fight for Justice till 'twas won and give the Tyrant pause!

JOHN KENDRICK BANGS.

SYNAGOGUE AT BASLE.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

DAILY LIFE OF POPE LEO XIII.

It may seem fanciful or whimsical to recall the fact that the venerable Cardinal Joseph Pecci described the birthplace of Leo XIII., the little Volscian town of Carpineto, as "an eagle's nest, placed for security high above the plain, between two gigantic rocks," and then, in immediate conjunction with this statement, to place the equally indisputable assertion that the two hundred and sixty-third successor of St. Peter in the bishopric of Rome is the first of all the line to look westward searchingly with such clear vision that he is eminently the foreigner who could supply a just definition of Americanism.

But I find that other students have been led towards a similar conclusion from wholly different starting-points. "My friend Paul Bourget," the Vicomte de Vogüé has written, "defines the American as 'a man who invariably uses the newest method.' This is also the dominant trait in the character of Leo XIII. Within the measure permitted him by a heavy chain of traditions, he does not hesitate to grasp the most modern weapons.... He relies upon the example set by the great popes of the Middle Ages, who, in their day, came down to the market-place, stirred the crowds, and led the people on to new horizons."

M. de Vogüé does not, so far as I have read, expressly refer to the inability of the prisoner of the Vatican to "come down to the market-place" in order to "lead the people on to new horizons," but he dwells upon Leo's desire to speak directly to the masses, to draw them to himself by every means, and in the throne-room he hears expressions that would seem to have been caught west of the Mississippi rather than in the Eastern States: "We must go to the people, conquer the hearts of the people. We must seek the alliance of all honest folk, whatever their origin or opinion." And he makes a point of telling us that the Pope finds time, in his day which somehow balances twenty hours of activity against four hours of rest, good-humoredly to explain his politics to an editor of Le Petit Journal. But this expansiveness may follow hours of literary work, in which the Holy Father became so absorbed that he wiped his pen on his white sleeve.

And the same writer, who is, among Frenchmen, probably the most competent observer in this particular field, says that Leo XIII. "looks upon mysterious America as Noah must have gazed at the peak of Mount Ararat when the waters of the deluge were rising, seeking there the place of refuge in which the divine promises shall be fulfilled, and whence the rescued people may start afresh and begin a new cycle of life."

In the vast building, begun in the time of Charlemagne and improved and enlarged by saintly, penitent, or ostentatious persons during a thousand years, until it has now eight grand staircases, two hundred smaller ones, and four thousand four hundred and twenty-two rooms, Leo XIII. is still in character and manner unchanged since the time when, as Bishop of Perugia, he composed his pastoral letter on the abuses of magnetism. Indeed, one may go further: the characteristic marks of the native of south-Italian mountains have not been effaced in the eighty-eight years of his life. Constant devotion to the highest ideals, daily contacts with the most cosmopolitan people, have not altogether prevailed against certain formative influences that he shared with other inhabitants of the little town situated in a cleft of the Monti Lepini. Both Signor Giovanni Amadi and Mr. F. Marion Crawford have been especially impressed with the many evidences of this survival, and no doubt the reader of the present sketch will recognize traits that suggested to the Italian writer, as well as the American, that eyry in the southern mountains where Joachim Vincent Raphael Louis, fourth son of Count Domenico Lodovico Pecci, was born, on March 2, 1810.

Summer and winter the Pope is awake at six o'clock in the morning, and rather before than after that hour; and he may have, in token of a sleepless night, a piece of Italian or Latin poetry to dictate to one of the secretaries before mass. Or maybe there is some more practical affair that has kept him awake while he outlined the essential points in an argument, an appeal, a letter of instructions (in this case he dictates from the notes, which are afterwards scrupulously destroyed). This immense capacity for literary work is only one manifestation of the uncommon vigor derived from his early training. Mr. Crawford has called attention to the fact that not only were the conditions at Carpineto most favorable to health, but that "as a boy he was excessively fond of birding, the only form of sport afforded by that part of Italy"; and still—or until the last year or two—one could hear it said in the Vatican, "Il Papa corre sempre." In addition to the four or five hours of sleep at night, he allows himself a nap after dinner (in a little room containing only an old lounge and an easy-chair), but otherwise he has occupations from morning till night. To begin the day he says early mass, ordinarily in the chapel in his private apartments, but on Sundays and feast-days in a room that is large enough to accommodate the visitors who have received permission to be present. Dressed in a cassock of pure white, a circle of snow-white hair showing beneath the white skull-cap, or beretta, the Pope is seen holding a silver aspersory, sprinkling holy water on the assembled worshippers; and so much in harmony with his surroundings is this figure that Rev. Bernard O'Reilly is led to say, "It is as if one of Fra Angelico's glorified saints had walked out of the canvas, or come down from the frescoes on the wall, and shone on us." Immediately after saying mass himself he hears a second one, said by a private chaplain. The second mass of thanksgiving being finished, an arm-chair is brought and placed on the Epistle side, and the Pope is seated. All present go forward in turn, to kneel at his feet, kiss his hand, and receive communion. Then a frugal breakfast follows of coffee and a bit of bread and goat's milk.

At ten o'clock the Secretary of State is in consultation with the Holy Father, and this conference lasts until about eleven; but on Tuesdays and Fridays the Under-Secretary confers with the Pope, while the diplomatic corps assembles in the apartments of the Secretary of State; and there is also the duty of receiving ambassadors and distinguished Italians and foreigners. The congregations of cardinals report regularly, and we barely intimate the importance of the subject-matter thus reported when we state that all things connected with the administration of a Church numbering perhaps two hundred millions are divided among these standing committees. In some cases the sessions are actually held in the Pope's presence, and even when that additional tax upon his attention and his strength is avoided, it still remains true, as the author last quoted asserts, that his "solicitude extends to every diocese and mission on the surface of the globe." And besides these, many other congregations and commissions charged with special work must satisfy Leo's demands for the utmost regularity, punctuality, and exactness in their reports. The Cardinal Vicar has his audience every Saturday evening to report on affairs of the diocese of Rome, when every detail is gone into most carefully. The progress of the various schools, primary and secondary, and of the higher institutions of learning, the condition of the confraternities, and the parochial work in all the churches are to the Pope, as Bishop of Rome, matters of such interest that he insists upon examining and judging for himself, even when these departments are confided to his ablest lieutenants.

If we were to speak at greater length of the congregations and commissions devoted to the studies in which Leo XIII. has always especially excelled, the enumeration would seem needlessly precise. In a single sentence, then, let us convey a sense of activity in the discharge of duties that form a series "as uninterrupted as the circulation of the blood": After having received ambassadors, archbishops, bishops, pilgrims, deputations, and addresses from Catholic unions and committees and congresses, the quiet hours of the night are reached; but then, in the time that others give to sleep, Leo's encyclicals, his consistorial allocutions, his addresses to pilgrims, deputations, and societies, his most important bulls or constitutions, are written or corrected.*

Between breakfast and dinner the Pope takes a cup of broth, and he dines about an hour after noon. When the weather is fine enough to permit of walking or driving in the gardens, two Noble Guards and a corps of fifty monsignori ride beside the carriage doors. Mr. Crawford gives many interesting details in this connection. During the great heat of summer, after mass the Holy Father goes into the gardens and spends the whole day there, receiving as he would in the Vatican, dining and resting in the fresh air. In the evening he attends at a recitation of the rosary, or evening prayers, by his private chaplain; then retires to his room, where he reads and writes. A light supper is brought to him about ten o'clock. Virgil and Dante are his favorite poets, and he knows a great part of both by heart. He reads the newspapers, of course, but to save time the most important and interesting passages are marked. He particularly likes to see and talk with men of letters.

Of late years the services in St. Peter's and the Sistine Chapel have not been conducted by the Pope, who nevertheless makes a concession in favor of the many strangers who visit Rome during Holy Week, and celebrates mass in the Sala Ducale.

Magnificent staircases of marble lead to the Pope's apartments, and before coming into his presence one must pass through eight anterooms, where soldiers of the Swiss Guard with their mediæval halberds and the courtly Maestro di Camera may perhaps divide the visitor's attention with the matchless objects of art and of historical interest accumulated in this building, that was designed to stand forever. Reigning sovereigns and persons of distinction are received in the grand throne-room, beyond which the princes' suites are not admitted, though the Pope may retire with his special guest to the small private throne-room.

It is understood that strict economy is observed in the management of the Vatican. The splendid and costly objects that one sees are gifts. All money contributed by Catholics in the various countries of the globe (in the aggregate a very large sum, of course) is held in trust for the Church, used in the purchase of Italian national bonds, or otherwise invested, the finances being under the "direct and exceedingly thrifty control of the Pope himself." The Pope's personal tastes are so simple that the expense of his table is said to be less than 250 lire a month, or about one dollar and a half a day.

The rare union of qualities suited to the varied and exacting duties of his position has been well summarized by one of our authorities, who says: "The head of the Catholic Church to-day must be a modern man, statesman, and administrator as well as Holy Father—and he is all four in the august person of Leo XIII.; he must be able to cope with difficulties as well as with heresies; he must lead his men as well as guide his flock; he must be the Church's steward as well as her consecrated arch-head; he must be the reformer of manners as well as the preserver of faith; he must be the understander of men's venial mistakes as well as the censor of their mortal sins."

The photographs on pages 1156 and 1157 were selected for reproduction in this issue of the WEEKLY from a large number taken by Mr. W. Kennedy-Laurie Dickson, for the mutoscope and biograph, who gives an interesting account of his experiences at the Vatican.

"I was granted five separate sittings," Mr. Dickson says. "Two scenes were taken in the upper Loggia of the Vatican. A carefully planned picture of his Holiness driving through the gardens of the Vatican (April 20) was the next achievement. Several weeks later I was admitted to the Vatican gardens, on which occasion his Holiness recognized the biograph, and asked if it were not the same apparatus and I the same gentleman he had seen in the Loggia early in the summer. On receiving an affirmative reply, he laughed, and said, 'Oh, then we must do something for him!' That evening the camera was placed opposite the door of the garden villa, and the Holy Father kindly lent himself to the requirements of the biograph. A valuable series of views was obtained, in connection with which Leo XIII. showed a kindly and intelligent interest. He asked me how long I would remain in Rome. I replied that that depended entirely upon his Holiness. 'I am altogether at your disposal,' he answered, 'and am charmed to assist you by every means in my power.' When I rose to go he detained me, entering with extreme cordiality into my description of the manner in which the mutoscopes would be placed and their important use in bringing his Holiness before that large number of people who were debarred from a pilgrimage to Rome, and the reception of the Pontifical blessing.

"When, a little later, I submitted to Leo XIII. the mutoscope containing the living reproduction of himself, he betrayed the most gleeful interest, exclaiming frequently, 'Oh, see me blessing!' Then to Monsignor della Volpa, 'Why, how splendid you look!'

"At the close of the interview I said, 'Holy Father, will you not complete the sum of my indebtedness by giving me one more sitting in the garden by the Summer Villa?' He laughed and shook his head. 'Have you not enough?' 'No,' I answered; 'but give me to-morrow morning, and I will promise to be content.' His Holiness was silent a minute, and then said: 'Well, then, I agree, but not for to-morrow morning. To-morrow afternoon at six o'clock.'

"Next day, punctually at the hour agreed, the superb carriage was seen winding its way along the avenue. The guards fell into position, and Monsignor della Volpa and Count Pecci—the one glorious in robes of scarlet and purple, the other stately in blue and gold—advanced to meet his Holiness. Roar, roar, went the great machine, all fell on their knees, and the Pontiff walked to the stone bench beside the gate. After a brief interval, during which he conversed easily with his immediate attendants, his Holiness rose to complete the programme agreed upon, and began to cross the intervening space to the throne; but here an unavoidable contretemps occurred. My assistant

COLOR-SERGEANT GEORGE BERRY, TROOP D, 10TH U. S. CAVALRY,
Who carried the Colors of the 10th and 3d Cavalry in the Charge at San Juan Hill, Santiago.
[See Page 1151.]

* See Life of Leo XIII., by Bernard O'Reilly, D.D., L.D., p. 575.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

had been so hurried that he had not had time to replace another film, so I was forced to beg his Holiness to return to the bench while this was being done—a request with which he cheerfully complied. I then threaded the machine in breathless haste, pivoting it in the direction of the throne, after which I invited his Holiness to pass into the picture, which he did, scattering smiles and benedictions, and interchanging remarks with his nephew and the maggiordomo, and finally taking his seat right royally upon the crimson throne. Before leaving, the Pontiff gave me a special blessing, and laughingly demanded if I were at last satisfied."

HARPER'S WEEKLY has been fortunate in securing the exclusive right to reproduce a number of these photographs prior to their first exhibition, which will be a private one, to be given in Washington, D. C., next Wednesday evening, before a company of Roman Catholic dignitaries, headed by Monsignor Martinelli, the Apostolic Delegate, and Cardinal Gibbons, and including Dr. Conaghty and Dr. Garrigan, the rector and the vice-rector of the Catholic University of America, Dr. Rucker, secretary of the papal legation, Rev. Dr. John D. Whitney, rector of Georgetown University, and many other dignitaries of the Catholic Church in America. MARRION WILCOX.

A SABLE HERO.

GEORGE BERRY, Troop D, Tenth Cavalry, with the rank of First Sergeant, was retired at Camp Forse, Huntsville, Alabama, November 1, 1898. That the man is alive to-day seems nothing short of a miracle, because of his conduct at San Juan Hill, where, under heavy fire, fifty feet in advance of his comrades, he waved aloft two flags, the stars and stripes of the Tenth and the Third Cavalry.

This hero did not burst upon his commanding officers as first distinguished for gallantry in the war with Spain. He had long before won his laurels, having, during his thirty years' service in the army, actively participated in six separate campaigns, against the Cheyennes, Kiowas, Arapahoes, Comanches, Apaches, Utes, in Colorado, Kansas, Texas, and New Mexico.

Sergeant Berry, who, after the manner of all real heroes, is modest of his own achievements, in speaking of his action at San Juan Hill, where he successfully planted the colors of his own regiment upon the works from which the Spaniards were even then running away, said:

"Where did my courage come from? It came from our 'war chief,' Captain Ayres. When I saw him leading his men, waving his hat in the air, shouting out like a trumpet to the soldiers to follow, I took the two sets of colors and ran, calling as I ran: 'Dress on the colors, boys! Dress on the colors!'"

During the recent peace celebration in Philadelphia, as this sable hero, bearing the tattered battle-flags he had carried so gallantly at Las Guasimas, San Juan, and Santiago, marched in the procession with the Tenth Cavalry, he was pelted with roses from the balconies and stands crowded with people.

The picture on the opposite page shows Sergeant Berry standing near Captain Ayres's tent at Huntsville, Alabama. In his left hand he holds his regimental national colors, while in his right is the regimental flag ribboned by the Spanish bullets in the three great land battles of the Spanish-American war. KATHERINE E. THOMAS.

NEW COMIC OPERAS—A NOTE ON AN OLD SERIOUS ONE.

A STORY used to be told of an eminent Boston clergyman that, when a little boy, and often a naughty little boy, he would hold out for hours at a time under punishment before capitulating toward proper behavior. One such state of unrepentance kept him seated in a corner almost all day. Suddenly the culprit—he was afterwards to be known as the Rev. Dr Phillips Brooks—burst out laughing and got down from his perch, exclaiming, with his sunniest cheerfulness: "I can't help being good, mother, in spite of myself! It's too much bother to stay bad!"

Our American comic opera, as has been pointed out lately in this journal, is more and more in the development when it seems easier for it to be good than to be bad. In spite of whatever is interpolated to give it the old aspect, I beg to maintain that it now is advanced surprisingly beyond ancient lines. The plots are entertaining, and touched—albeit incongruously—with seriousness. They give room for writing and for acting in an opera-comique vein. The dialogue is amusing, and the music is musicianly. The whole plane of actual interpretation—I mean the orchestral service and the singing—is almost wholly of an artistic order. "The Jolly Musketeer," now at the Broadway Theatre, is the latest example of this argument, and an excellent one. It is true that Mr. Stanislaus Stange and Mr. Julian Edwards must needs write the libretto and music around the personality and the purposes of Mr. Jefferson De Angelis. Mr. De Angelis is a low-comedian of very broad methods in fun-making, and he is not more of a singer than one is allowed to rank him by most liberal kindness for his intentions. Again, Mr. De Angelis has in the piece what a harmonist would call a perfect second in Mr. Harry Macdonough. Mr. Macdonough is another singing low-comedian, with almost as much natural humor as has Mr. De Angelis (I do not want to slight that rare blessing), but of cruder vein. Both these gentlemen are shining and tireless devisers of horse-play; exceedingly amusing in what really is an excrescence in the piece. Such goings-on always will be excrescences, especially if so outrageously funny. Something is wrong with the spleen or the bank account of a man who cannot laugh at the cat duet and the gymnastics of Henri de Beaupret and Didot Blanc. But if you will dismiss for a moment their clowneries, and will ask what "The Jolly Musketeer" is without them, you have, all the same, a genial, graceful, laudable remainder. The plot, turning on Richelieu's effort to suppress duelling, and on a rivalry between two friends in the Cardinal-Duke's Musketeer Guards, is romantic in the Dumas key, as well as comic. The libretto which Mr. Stange has shaped is not much, but it is distinctly effective, and it is carried from one actual incident to another with sound libretto-carpentering. One scene in it is capital comedy—that in which an excited lover is kept on an open balcony during a thunder-storm, watching his best friend's successful wooing. The music that Mr. Edwards has written, except for some lapsing toward the Vienna pattern, is remarkably charming. It is unbrokenly melodious in that light, dexterous way, which has the happy effect of sounding unstudied, though it means a careful hand and peculiarly lucid notions of operetta. Except for one concerted number—notably pretty—done in the Sullivan manner, Offenbach is more happily hinted than in any such score before us this long while. The good singing of everybody assisting Mr. De Angelis is as much a trait in "The Jolly Musketeer" as is the merrymaking of its lively little protagonist—who, by-the-bye, as Henri de Beaupret, often shows how sincerely well he can act, as well as merely cut capers, higher than Sir Andrew Aguecheek's. Miss Bertha Walzinger and Miss Maud Hollins each sing so well that the honors of a prima donna are evenly divided. Mr. Van Rensselaer Wheeler takes a long step toward real individuality by his well-balanced, spirited acting, and by singing everything in his part even better than he did the small rôle of which he made much in "The Geisha." The chorus and orchestra are satisfactory, the costumes rich, and the scenery has atmosphere as well as color. "The Jolly Musketeer" is successful, and it should be successful, even if its humor were exploited in much more subdued, refined, and reserved methods.

"The Jolly Musketeer."

JULIA ARTHUR AS PARTHENIA.

In postscript to a reference last week to the death of Mr. Max Alvary, and to the disastrous circumstances in which his illness had left a most amiable family, many readers of HARPER'S WEEKLY should be interested in knowing that a modest fund for securing to Mrs. Alvary and to her children a home and maintenance is in progress, under the care of Mrs. Edward G. Love, of No. 80 East Fifty-fifth Street, in this city. To her all remittances can be sent, and they will be forwarded promptly to Mrs. Alvary. A relatively small sum, as such things go in this country, is lacking. If all those who remember the dead singer with pleasure will only give the price, or even half the price, of the opera-ticket that admitted them to a Wagner performance, the mortgage on the house in Thuringia will soon be cancelled. The matter has been in progress some time, but it was desired to keep it from the knowledge of Mr. Alvary, and it is really public only since his decease. Nothing of the kind could be more suitable than its success.

The Alvary Fund.

"Euryanthe," that masterly opera of Weber, is announced for a special revival at the Royal Opera in Berlin. The work has fallen into an improper disuse on all those German stages which should keep so noble a score before its own public. New York did high honor to it in 1887–88. During that season, "Euryanthe" was performed repeatedly here in the finest possible way, under the late Anton Seidl, with Lilli Lehmann (Euryanthe), Marianne Brandt (Eglantine), Max Alvary (Adolar), and Ernst Fischer (Lysiart). Madame Lehmann sang the title rôle for the first time in her long career, and incomparably well. We have heard the magnificent overture played here again, on the orchestra's recent visit to us. I often read with interest what Mr. William F. Apthorp writes as music-reviewer for the Boston Transcript, and I must confess to a good deal of surprise on discovering a curious statement in his programmme notes; one that, in fact, seems inexplicable. It is—or should be—well known to every professional concert-goer that the overture to "Euryanthe" contains a passage hingeing on one of the most singular devices ever attempted in all romantic opera. In the middle of the overture to Weber's work its brilliant movement subsides. The curtain is slowly raised. A vast tomb is seen in a vault by a dim hanging light. Euryanthe is discerned on her knees praying beside the coffin of the poisoned Emma, while the wicked Lady Eglantine is crouched in shadow, spying on her. At the same time a set of strange and ghostly harmonies are heard in the orchestra from an unmuted viola (that soul of instrumental melancholy) sustained by and contrasted with muted violins—a striking combination. Then, slowly as before, the tableau fades, and the curtain descends. On rushes the overture through its former gorgeous stress to its close. The whole episode, the interpolated tomb tableau and the orchestral incident, are part and parcel of each other, and Weber, in fact, shaped them both expressly to make a little clearer the opera's incoherent and mutilated libretto. When "Euryanthe" was presented in New York every music-reviewer was on the qui vive to know whether Mr. Edmund C. Stanton, then the manager of our Opera House, would give the tableau, and so would present Weber's work as Weber wrote it. In Germany, managers have been careless about the matter, important as it is, and usually cut the tableau quite out. Luckily, Mr. Seidl, Mr. Alvary, Madame Lehmann (who sang the great rôle of Euryanthe for the first time), Madame Brandt, and Mr. Stanton were all of one mind. The tomb-scene was given, and nobody who ever attended those representations will forget the effect of it, external detail as it was in a presentation of the highest musical and dramatic force. It was one of the many instances of the good conscience toward art that entered into those Metropolitan seasons of old. Boston is not far from New York, and I should suppose reference-books were almost superfluous in so accomplished a reviewer's library. I am puzzled, therefore, to understand what is Mr. Apthorp's authority for the following:

Of the Tomb-Tableau in Weber's "Euryanthe."

> Now we come upon one of the most originally poetic episodes in all Weber. The passage is borrowed from the scene in the forest in the second act of the opera. In slow Largo [sic] eight violins soli e con sordini play the most mysterious sustained harmonies in scarcely audible pianissimo—the violas soon entering beneath them with a subdued tremolo, like the soft rustling of leaves.

The opera season in Chicago seems to have pleased the discerning of that city, as so strong a stellar organization certainly could be expected to do. But the audiences have not been proportionately large. Next Monday evening brings the opening of the Metropolitan official season. Many of Mr. Grau's singers are already with us, and the rest are on their winding way as I write. In Chicago, Mr. Ernest Van Dyk has been the most potent attraction. A portrait on this page presents him in one of his lighter parts—Lionel in "Martha." E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

Opera in Chicago

THE success of "Im Weissen Rössl" (at the White Horse Inn), Blumenthal & Kadelburg's latest farce, at the Irving Place Theatre, is an apt illustration of the fact that a true convention is more serviceable than a false one, even in the least legitimate field of the drama. A previous farce by the same authors, "Number 9," produced a year ago at Daly's Theatre, turned on one of the commonest false conventions known to the stage. The various men in the play were embarrassed in their marital and other relations by the discovery of those same old amatory episodes. For a proper enjoyment of the farce it was necessary to assume that husbands are not to be expected to be very scrupulous, and that wives and parents-in-law are nuisances generally. The farce was fresh in its machinery—the men-folk had been inveigled into their misdeeds to furnish material for a kinetoscope exhibition that later exhibited in their town; it was brisk and unexpected in its development, and was presented as well as Mr. Daly knew how. Yet it failed. The present farce is antediluvian in comparison, yet its wholesome fun kept the audience in a ripple of delight throughout the evening. The situations come from the love affairs of the inn people and their guests. Everybody is allowed to be genial and wholesome—as people mostly are—and those who show whims and crotchets turn out to be not half bad. In the end all the young people fall happily in love, as young people mostly have done, in spite of Lysander and of Shakspere himself, ever since the course of true love was invented; and all the Blumenthal-Kadelburg jokes, of which there were many excellent examples, warm the heart and tickle the diaphragm. This, I take it, is high praise, for there are only a few things in dramatic art more worthy than wholesome and natural amusement.

The Virtue of a True Convention.

To be strictly just, there are a few fresh touches in the piece. One of them is the part of a young woman who lisps so badly that she only dares to say "yes" and "no." She finds her soul's mate in a young fellow who is prematurely bald beneath a jauntily ribboned hat. He teaches her to say "Ich bin dir gut" and "Ich liebe dich" without the shadow of a lisp. Her father (Franz Kierschner) is a dear old scholar, whose stipend is so slender that he

ERNEST VAN DYK,
Tenor, with the Maurice Grau Opera Company.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Edith Hendee. Bertha Waltzinger. Maud Hollins. Helena Frederick.

QUARTETTE IN "THE JOLLY MUSKETEER," NOW PLAYING AT THE BROADWAY THEATRE, NEW YORK.

has to drink water and forswear tobacco in order that, one summer out of four, he may gratify his passion for travel. By this means he has travelled "almost everywhere"—in German Switzerland, Austrian Switzerland, French Switzerland, and Italian Switzerland. He has missed only the true Switzerland—that is too dear. When his daughter is betrothed to the bald young man, he is given his first glass of champagne, and drinks it with mingled feelings at the thought that each sip costs as much as a kilometre and a half of travel. Herr Direktor Conried and his people deserve all success, for no theatre in town produces so many good plays. Last season they produced seventy-two, and the list includes all kinds, from farces and children's plays to Suderman, Humperdinck, and Ibsen.

An adaptation of "Im Weissen Rössl" will be presented later by Mr. Daniel Frohman.

It has become the duty of this department to accuse two of the most popular theatres in New York of the gravest offence known to the theatrical profession. I mean the offence of indulging in dramatic criticism. The gravity of this cannot be fully appreciated by the unprofessional world. When Mr. Booth founded The Players, he was unwilling to admit his life-long friend, Mr. William Winter, because of Mr. Winter's nefarious connection with the New York Tribune; and though the club has always included the American men of letters who are most familiar with the stage, not a mother's son of them is permitted to have his say about contemporary plays and play-actors. At The Lambs, it is said, the mildest-mannered critic that ever cut a throat has not the right to cross the threshold that confronts the bar. Yet the stages of Messrs. Koster & Bial and Messrs. Weber & Fields every year give a dressing down to the most prominent plays and actors of the season; and these gentlemen confront the bar at The Lambs without let or hinderance. They are perhaps in a position similar to that of Molière's "Bourgeois Gentilhomme," who, to his profound satisfaction, discovered that he had spoken prose all his life without knowing it; but I doubt if they would be as delighted to learn that they have long been our most popular dramatic critics.

The obnoxious Critic.

"Sir Andy de Bootjack," at Koster & Bial's, is notable for the fact that Mr. Augustin Daly and Mr. Richard Mansfield act as chorus in frock-coats and top hats, and help along the burlesque considerably by wrangling as to their respective rights in the play, and as to what speeches shall go to Rorziana Rehan (Josephine Hall) and what to Sir Andy. When Mr. Daly asks Sir Andy to join his company, Sir Andy lampoons him with a parody of Cyrano's reply to the similar request from De Guiche. What, give up my freedom as a man? No, thank you! Submit myself to whims and crotchets? No, thank you! Have all my fattest speeches cut out, or put into the mouth of a woman? No, THANK YOU! Theatrical writers have been pretty outspoken as to these points, but for the knock-down blow commend me to the Thirty-fourth Street critics. Some of the charges are so lacking in amenity that it is not possible even to repeat them. Mr. Daly's shortcomings as a manager are well known, but our critical writers have never been sufficiently bold or sufficiently forgetful of his great services to our stage to permit themselves the license of these members of Mr. Daly's own profession. The lack of amenity is, as one might expect, an index to its lack of humor. It flatly failed.

Sir Andy de Bootjack.

"Cyranose de Bric-à-brac," at Weber & Fields's, is as delightfully good-humored as "Sir Andy de Bootjack" was stupid and painful. It is full of rollicking fun, of the kind that could be recognized as coming from Henry B. Smith, even if his name were not on the programme. The baker-poet is Ragamuffin, "author of half-baked verses, the only poet who ever had any 'dough.'" Mr. Joseph Weber introduces himself in the part as follows:

Cyranose de Bric-à-brac.

> I am a baker with the soul of a poet,
> And I like at all the theatres to go it.

I don't think that any of the rhymes in Mr. Mansfield's version are worse than that. Cyranose is described as a "champion middle-weight duellist, poet, meddler, rubber-neck-and-nose specialist." The part is taken with great spirit by Mr. Lou Fields. "I never enchoy myself," says Cyrano in the well-known dialect, "unless I'm being insulted." The duel in verse arises from the fact that he is asked if he is "stuck on" his nose, or if his nose is stuck on him. The duel takes the form of a boxing-match to the accompaniment of a cake-walk. If Mr. Mansfield could see how nearly Mr. Fields's cake-walk tread resembles his own Cyrano's airy Gascon carriage, I do not think he could fail to be amused. In the balcony scene, Cyranose shouts to Roxy, "Come oudt, come oudt, I've got a bunch of langwidges I want to t'row at you!" That is the word for Cyranose's speeches—a bunch of langwidges! In the end Roxy says to Cyranose, "You won't marry me, not even after fourteen years?" Cyranose intimates that he is more stuck on his nose than on her, and she waltzes off with the Count de Peach, to the audible delight of the women in the audience. Mr. Smith's fun is all so genial and genuine that the lover of Cyrano can laugh with the best of consciences.

The virtue of a burlesque is that in some undefinable manner it suggests the atmosphere of the original. A stupid or a malicious take-off is an offence to every artistic sensibility; but a good take-off is not only infinitely amusing, but has a rare poetic delight. For example, in "One More Last Ride Together," and in the sonnet on the two voices—"one is of the deep . . . and one is of an old half-witted sheep, and, Wordsworth, both are thine"—J. K. S[tevens] has given us more of the best quality of Browning and Wordsworth than is to be found in reams of their minor verse. It is only a step from the ridiculous to the sublime. I am not saying that Mr. Smith's "Cyranose" is all as suggestive of the original as the lines I have quoted from it. Much of it is mere buffoonery. But at times it does recreate the atmosphere of the original and comments upon it. In a word, it is true criticism, and criticism of the highest order. I say this even at the risk of imperilling his popularity with the profession.

Song 'n' Dance Criticism.

Such criticism has usually thriven side by side with the arts—even the dramatic art! The earliest criticisms of "Hamlet," for instance, are in plays and poems that did for the Elizabethan theatre much the same service that Weber & Fields's is doing for ours. The satiric phrases that one finds are innumerable, for instance:

> I will not cry Hamlet, Revenge my greeves,
> But I will call Hang-man, Revenge on thiev

Thomas Lodge tells of an "incarnate divel" who "looks as pale as the Visa[ge] of ye ghost which cried so miserably at ye Theator like an oister wife, Hamlet, Revenge." In Paris, the most artistic modern community, there is a Latin Quarter Theatre that on each New-Year reviews the popular plays of the season with all of the wit and none of the impriety one finds at Weber & Fields's. Wherever there is a truly vigorous theatrical life there will be theatrical criticism. That is one of the many hardships suffered by the most sensitive professions. The only thing they would find more unendurable is that there should be no press notices.

JOHN CORBIN

Harry Macdonough. Jefferson De Angelis.

"THE WAY TO WOO A WOMAN."
Duet in "The Jolly Musketeer."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE NEW YORK HORSE SHOW—SCENE AT THE ENTRANCE TO MADISON SQUARE GARDEN IN THE EVENING.—Drawn by H. C. Christy.—[See Page 1165.]

Original from PENN STATE
Digitized by Google
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE AWKWARD AGE.*

BY HENRY JAMES,

AUTHOR OF "DAISY MILLER," "AN INTERNATIONAL EPISODE," ETC.

XXI.

PRESENTING himself in Buckingham Crescent three days after the Sunday spent at Mertle, Vanderbank found Lady Fanny Cashmore in the act of taking leave of Mrs. Brook, and found Mrs. Brook herself in the state of muffled exaltation that was the mark of all her intercourse—and most of all perhaps of her farewells—with Lady Fanny. This splendid creature gave out, as it were, so little that Vanderbank was freshly struck with all Mrs. Brook could take in, though nothing, for that matter, in Buckingham Crescent, had been more fully formulated than the imperturbable grandeur of this very absence, on the part of the famous beauty, of articulation. Every aspect of the phenomenon had been freely discussed there and endless ingenuity lavished on the question of how exactly it was that so much of what the world would in another case have called complete stupidity could be kept by a mere wonderful face from boring one to death. It was Mrs. Brook who, in this relation as in many others, had arrived at the supreme expression of the law, had thrown off, happily enough, to whomever it might have concerned: "My dear thing, it all comes back, as everything always does, simply to personal pluck. It's only a question, no matter when or where, of having enough. Lady Fanny has the courage of all her silence—so much therefore that it sees her completely through and is what really makes her interesting. Not to be afraid of what may happen to you when you've no more to say for yourself than a steamer without a light—that truly is the highest heroism, and Lady Fanny's greatness is that she is never afraid. She takes the risk every time she goes out—takes, as you may say, her life in her hand. She just turns that glorious mask upon you and practically says: 'No, I won't open my lips—to call it really open—for the forty minutes I shall stay; but I calmly defy you, all the same, to kill me for it.' And we don't kill her—we delight in her; though when either of us watches her in a circle of others it's like seeing a very large blind person in the middle of Oxford Street. One fairly looks about for the police." Vanderbank, before his fellow-visitor withdrew it, had the benefit of the glorious mask in which Mrs. Brook alone showed the stress of thought. Lady Fanny, in the other scale, sat aloft and Olympian, so that though, visibly, much had happened between the two ladies it had all happened only to the hostess. The sense in the air in short was just of Lady Fanny herself, who came to an end like a banquet or a procession. Mrs. Brook left the room with her and, on coming back, was full of it. "She'll go, she'll go!"

"Go where?" Vanderbank appeared to have for the question less attention than usual.

"Well, to the place her companion will propose; probably—like Anna Karénine—to one of the smaller Italian towns."

"Anna Karénine? She isn't a bit like Anna."

"Of course she isn't so clever," said Mrs. Brook. "But that would spoil her. So it's all right."

"I'm glad it's all right," Vanderbank laughed. "But I dare say we shall still have her with us awhile."

"We shall do that, I trust, whatever happens. She'll come up again—she'll remain, I feel, one of those enormous things that fate seems somehow to have given me as the occupation of my odd moments. I don't see," Mrs. Brook added, "what still keeps her on the edge, which isn't an inch wide."

Vanderbank looked, this time, as if he only tried to wonder. "Isn't it you?"

Mrs. Brook mused more deeply. "Sometimes I think so. But I don't know."

"Yes, how can you, of course, know, since she can't tell you?"

"Oh, if I depended on her telling—!" Mrs. Brook shook out, with this, a sofa cushion or two and sank into the corner she had arranged. The August afternoon was hot and the London air heavy; the room moreover, though agreeably bedimmed, gave out the staleness of the season's end. "If you hadn't come to-day," she went on, "you would have missed me till I don't know when, for we've let the Hovel again—wretchedly, but still we've let it—and I go down on Friday to see that it isn't too filthy. Edward, who's furious at what I've taken for it, had his idea that we should go there this year ourselves."

"And now"—Vanderbank took her up—"that fond fancy has become simply the ghost of a dead thought, a ghost that, in company with a thousand predecessors, haunts the house in the twilight and pops at you out of odd corners."

"Oh, Edward's dead thoughts are indeed a cheerful company and worthy of the perpetual mental mourning we seem to go about in. They're worse than the relations we're always losing without seeming to have any fewer, and I expect every day to hear that the Morning Post regrets to have to announce in that line too some new bereavement. The apparitions following the deaths of so many thoughts are particularly awful in the twilight, so that at this season, while the day drags and drags, I'm glad to have any one with me who may keep them at a distance."

Vanderbank had not sat down; slowly, familiarly, he turned about. "And where's Nanda?"

"Oh, she doesn't help—she attracts rather the worst of the spooks. Edward and Nanda and Harold and I seated together are fairly a case for that—what do you call it?—investigating Society. Deprived of the sweet resource of the Hovel," Mrs. Brook continued, "we shall each, from about the tenth on, forage somehow or other for ourselves. Mitchy perhaps," she added, "will insist on taking us to Baireuth."

"That will be his way, you mean, of foraging for himself?"

Mrs. Brook just hesitated. "Unless you should prefer to take it as your own way."

Vanderbank appeared for a moment, obligingly enough, to turn this over, but with the effect of perceiving an objection. "Oh, I'm afraid that I shall have to grind straight through the month, and that by the time I'm free every Ring at Baireuth will certainly have been rung. Is it your idea to take Nanda?" he asked.

She reached out for another cushion. "If it's impossible for you to manage what I suggest, why should that question interest you?"

"My dear woman"—and her visitor dropped into a chair—"do you suppose my interest depends on such poverties as what I can manage? You know well enough," he went on in another tone, "why I care for Nanda and inquire about her."

She was perfectly ready. "I know it, but only as a bad reason. Don't be too sure!"

For a moment they looked at each other. "Don't be so sure, you mean, that the elation of it may go to my head? Are you really warning me against vanity?"

"Your 'reallys,' my dear Van, are a little formidable, but it strikes me that, before I tell you, there's something I've a right to ask. Are you 'really' what they call thinking of my daughter?"

"Your asking," Vanderbank returned, "exactly shows the state of your knowledge of the matter. I don't quite see, moreover, why you speak as if I were paying an abrupt and unnatural attention. What have I done the last three months but talk to you about her? What have you done but talk to me about her? From the moment you first spoke to me—'monstrously,' I remember you called it—of the difference made in your social life by her finally established, her perpetual, her inexorable participation: from that moment what have we both done but put our heads together over the question of keeping the place tidy, as you called it—or as I called it, was it?—for the young female mind?"

Mrs. Brook faced serenely enough the directness of this challenge. "Well, what are you coming to? I spoke of the change in my life, of course; I happen to be so constituted that my life has something to do with my mind and my mind something to do with my talk. Good talk: you know—no one, dear Van, should know better—what part, for me, that plays. Therefore when one has deliberately to make one's talk bad—"

"'Bad'?" Vanderbank, in his amusement, fell back in his chair. "Dear Mrs. Brook, you're too delightful!"

"You know what I mean—stupid, flat, fourth-rate. When one has to take in sail to that degree—and for a perfectly outside reason—there's nothing strange in one's taking a friend sometimes into the confidence of one's irritation."

"Ah," Vanderbank protested, "you do yourself injustice. Irritation hasn't been, for you, the only consequence of the affair."

Mrs. Brook gloomily thought. "No, no—I've had my calmness: the calmness of deep despair. I've seemed to see everything go."

"Oh, how can you say that," her visitor demanded, "when just what we've most been agreed upon so often is the practical impossibility of making any change? Hasn't it seemed as if we really can't overcome conversational habits so thoroughly formed?"

Again Mrs. Brook reflected. "As if our way of looking at things were too serious to be trifled with? I don't know—I think it's only you who have denied our sacrifices, our compromises and concessions. I myself have constantly felt smothered in them. But there it is," she impatiently went on. "What I don't admit is that you've given me ground to take for a proof of your 'intentions' —to use the odious term—your association with me on behalf of the preposterous fiction, as it after all is, of Nanda's blankness of mind."

Vanderbank's head, in his chair, was thrown back; his eyes ranged over the top of the room. "There never has been any mystery about my thinking her—all in her own way—the nicest girl in London. She is."

His companion was silent a little. "She is, by all means. Well," she then added, "so far as I may have been alive to the fact of any one's thinking her so, it's not out of place I should mention to you the difference made in my appreciation of it by our delightful little stay at Mertle. My views for Nanda," said Mrs. Brook, "have somehow gone up."

Vanderbank was prompt to show how he could understand it. "So that you wouldn't consider even Mitchy now?"

But his friend took no notice of the question. "The way Mr. Longdon distinguishes her is quite the sort of thing that gives a girl, as Harold says, a 'leg up.' It's awfully curious and has made me think: he isn't anything whatever, as London estimates go, in himself—so that what is it, pray, that makes him, when added on to her, so double Nanda's value? I somehow or other see, through his being known to back her, and through the pretty story of his loyalty to mamma and all the rest of it (oh, if one chose to work that!) ever so much more of a chance for her."

Vanderbank's eyes were on the ceiling. "It is curious, isn't it?—though I think he's rather more 'in himself,' even for the London estimate, than you quite understand." He appeared to give her time to take this up, but as she said nothing he pursued: "I dare say that if even I now were to enter myself it would strike you as too late."

Her attention to this was but indirect. "It's awfully vulgar to be talking about it, but I can't help feeling that something possibly rather big will come of Mr. Longdon."

"Ah, we've talked of that before," said Vanderbank, "and you know you did think something might come even for me."

She continued, however, as if she scarce heard him, to work out her own vision. "It's very true that up to now—"

"Well, up to now?" he asked as she faltered.

She faltered still a little. "I do say the most hideous things. But we have said worse, haven't we? Up to now, I mean, he hasn't given her anything. Unless indeed," she mused, "she may have had something without telling me."

Vanderbank went much straighter. "What sort of thing have you in mind? Are you thinking of money?"

"Yes. Isn't it awful?"

"That you should think of it?"

"That I should talk this way." Her friend was apparently not prepared with an assent, and she quickly enough pursued: "If he had given her any it would come out somehow in her expenditure. She has tremendous liberty and is very secretive, but still it would come out."

"He wouldn't give her any without letting you know. Nor would she, without doing so," Vanderbank added, "take it."

"Ah," Mrs. Brook quietly said, "she hates me enough for anything."

"That's only your romantic theory."

Once more she appeared not to hear him; she came up suddenly in another place. "Has he given you anything?"

Her visitor smiled. "Not so much as a cigarette. I've always my pockets full of them, and he never; so he only takes mine. Oh, Mrs. Brook," he continued, "with me too—though I've also tremendous liberty!—it would come out."

"I think you'd let me know," she returned.

"Yes, I'd let you know."

Silence, upon this, fell between them a little; which Mrs. Brook was the first to break. "She has gone with him this afternoon—by solemn appointment—to the South Kensington Museum."

There was something in Mrs. Brook's dolorous drop that yet presented the news as a portent so great that he was moved again to mirth. "Ah, that's where she is? Then I confess she has scored. He has never taken me to the South Kensington Museum."

"You were asking what we're going to do," she went on. "What I meant was—about Baireuth—that the question for Nanda is simplified. He has pressed her so to pay him a visit."

Vanderbank's assent was marked. "I see: so that if you do go abroad she'll be provided for by that engagement."

"And by lots of other invitations."

These were such things as, for the most part, the young man could turn over. "Do you mean you'd let her go alone—?"

"To wherever she's asked?" said Mrs. Brook. "Why not? Don't talk like the Duchess."

Vanderbank seemed for a moment to try not to. "Couldn't Mr. Longdon take her? Why not?"

His friend looked really struck with it. "That would be working him. But to a beautiful end!" she meditated. "The only thing would be to get him also asked."

"Ah, but there you are, don't you see? Fancy 'getting' Mr. Longdon anything or anywhere whatever! Don't you feel," Vanderbank threw out, "how the impossibility of exerting that sort of patronage for him immediately places him?"

Mrs. Brook gave her companion one of those fitful glances of almost grateful appreciation with which their intercourse was even at its darkest hours frequently illumined. "As if he were the Primate or the French Ambassador? Yes, you're right—one couldn't do it; though it's very odd and one doesn't quite see why. It does place him. But he becomes thereby, exactly, the very sort of person with whom it would be most of an advantage for her to go about. What a pity," Mrs. Brook sighed, "he doesn't know more people!"

"Ah well, we are, in our way, bringing that to pass. Only we mustn't rush it. Leave it to Nanda herself." Vanderbank presently added; on which his companion so manifestly left it that she touched, after a moment's silence, on quite a different matter.

"I dare say he'd tell you—wouldn't he?—if he were to give her any considerable sum."

She had only obeyed his injunction, but he stared at the length of her jump. "He might attempt to do so, but I shouldn't at all like it." He was moved immediately to drop this branch of the subject and, apparently to help himself, take up another. "Do you mean she understands he has asked her down for a regular long stay?"

Mrs. Brook barely hesitated. "She understands, I think, that what I expect of her is to make it as long as possible."

Vanderbank laughed out—as it was even after ten years still possible to laugh—at the childlike innocence with which her voice could invest the hardest teachings of life, then with something a trifle nervous in the whole sound and manner he sprang up from his chair. "What a blessing he is to us all!"

"Yes, but think what we must be to him."

"An immense interest, no doubt." He took a few aimless steps and, stooping over a basket of flowers, inhaled it with violence, almost buried his face. "I dare say we are interesting."

He had spoken rather vaguely, but Mrs. Brook knew exactly why. "We render him no end of a service. We keep him in touch with old memories."

Vanderbank had reached one of the windows, shaded, from without, by a great striped sun-blind, beneath which and between the flower-pots of the balcony he could see a stretch of hot, relaxed street. He looked a minute at these things. "I do so like your phrases!"

She had a pause that challenged his tone. "Do you call mamma a 'phrase'?"

He went off again, quite with extravagance, but quickly, leaving the window, pulled himself up. "I dare say we must put things for him—he does it, cares or is able to do it, so little himself."

"Precisely. He just quietly acts. That's his nature, dear thing. We must let him act."

Vanderbank seemed to stifle again too vivid a sense of her particular emphasis. "Yes, yes—we must let him." ess pursued, "from finding the fun of a whole month at Though it won't prevent Nanda, I imagine," his hostBeccles—or whatever she puts in—not exactly fast and furious."

Vanderbank had the look of measuring what the girl might "put in." "The place will be quiet, of course, but when a person's so fond of a person—!"

"As she is of him, you mean?"

He hesitated. "Yes. Then it's all right."

"She is fond of him, thank God!" said Mrs. Brook.

He was before her now with the air of a man who had suddenly determined on a great blind leap. "Do you know what he has done? He wants me so to marry her that he has proposed a definite basis."

* Began in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2180.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Mrs. Brook got straight up. "'Proposed'? To her?"

"No, I don't think he has said a word to Nanda—in fact I'm sure that, very properly, he doesn't mean to. But he spoke to me on Sunday night at Mertle—I had a big talk with him there alone, very late, in the smoking-room." Mrs. Brook's stare was serious, and Vanderbank now went on as if the sound of his voice helped him to meet it. "We had things out very much and his kindness was extraordinary—he's the most beautiful old boy that ever lived. I don't know, now that I come to think of it, if I'm within my rights in telling you—and of course I shall immediately let him know that I have told you; but I feel I can't arrive at any respectable sort of attitude in the matter without taking you into my confidence—which is really what I came here to-day to do, though till this moment I've funked it."

It was either, as her friend chose to think it, an advantage or a drawback of intercourse with Mrs. Brook that her face being at any moment charged with the woe of the world, it was unavoidable to remain rather in the dark as to the effect of particular strokes. There was therefore something in Vanderbank's present study of the signs that showed he had had to learn to feel his way and had more or less mastered the trick. That she had turned a little pale was really the one fresh mark. "'Funked' it? Why in the world—?" His own color deepened at her accent, which was a sufficient light on his having been stupid. "Do you mean you've declined the arrangement?"

He only, with a smile somewhat strained, continued for a moment to look at her; clearly, however, at last feeling, and not much caring, that he got in still deeper. "You're magnificent. You're magnificent."

Her lovely gaze widened out. "Comment donc? Where—why? You have declined her?" she went on. After which, as he replied only with a slow head-shake that seemed to say it was not, for the moment, all so simple as that, she had one of the inspirations to which she was constitutionally subject. "Do you imagine I want you for myself?"

"Dear Mrs. Brook, you're so admirable," he answered, laughing, "that if by any chance you did, upon my honor I don't see how I should be able not to say 'All right.'" Then he spoke more gravely. "I was shy of really bringing out to you what has happened to me, for a reason that I have of course to look in the face. Whatever you want for yourself, for Nanda you want Mitchy."

"I see, I see." She did full justice to his explanation. "And what did you say about a 'basis'? The blessed man offers to settle—?"

"You're a wonderful woman," her visitor returned, "and your imagination takes its fences in a way that, when I'm out with you, quite puts mine to shame. When he mentioned it to me I was quite surprised."

"And I," Mrs. Brook asked, "am not surprised a bit? Isn't it only," she modestly suggested, "because I've taken him in more than you? Didn't you know he would?" she quavered.

Vanderbank thought, or at least pretended to. "Make me the condition? How could I be sure of it?"

But the point of his question was lost for her in the growing light. 'Oh then, the condition's you only—?"

"That, at any rate, is all I have to do with. He's ready to settle if I'm ready to do the rest."

"To propose to her straight, you mean?" She waited, but as he said nothing she went on: "And you're not ready. Is that it?"

"I'm taking my time."

"Of course you know," said Mrs. Brook, "that she'd jump at you."

He turned away from her now, but after some steps came back. "Then you do admit it."

She hesitated. "To you."

He had a strange faint smile. "Well, as I don't speak of it—!"

"No—only to me. What is it he settles?" Mrs. Brook demanded.

"I can't tell you."

"You didn't ask?"

"On the contrary—I stopped him off."

"Oh then," Mrs. Brook exclaimed, "that's what I call declining!"

The words appeared for an instant to strike her companion. "Is it? Is it?" he almost musingly repeated. But he shook himself the next moment free of his wonder, was more what would have been called in Buckingham Crescent on the spot. "Isn't there rather something in my having thus thought it my duty to warn you that I'm definitely his candidate?"

Mrs. Brook turned impatiently away. "You've certainly—with your talk about 'warning'—the happiest expressions!" She put her face into the flowers as he had done just before; then as she raised it: "What kind of a monster are you trying to make me out?"

"My dear lady"—Vanderbank was prompt—"I really don't think I say anything but what's fair. Isn't it just my loyalty to you, in fact, that in this case has positively strained my discretion?"

She shook her head in mere mild despair. "'Loyalty' again is exquisite. The tact of men has a charm quite its own. And you're rather good," she continued, "as men go."

His laugh was now a little awkward, as if she had already succeeded in making him uncomfortable. "I always become aware with you sooner or later that they don't go at all—in your sense; but how am I, after all, so far out if you have put your money on another man?"

"You keep coming back to that?" she wearily sighed.

He thought a little. "No then. You've only to tell me not to, and I'll never speak of it again."

"You'll be in an odd position for speaking of it if you do really go in. You deny that you've declined," said Mrs. Brook; "which means then that you've allowed our friend to hope."

Vanderbank met it bravely. "Yes, I think he hopes."

"And imparts his hope to my child?"

This arrested the young man, but only for a moment. "I've the most perfect faith in his wisdom with her. I trust the delicacy of his tenderness. He cares more for her," he presently added, "even than we do."

Mrs. Brook gazed away at the infinite of space. "'We,' my dear Van," she at last returned, "is one of your own real, wonderful touches. But there's something in what you say: I have, as between ourselves—between me and him—been backing Mitchy. That is I've been saying to him 'Wait, wait: don't, at any rate, do anything else.' Only it's just from the depth of my thought for my daughter's happiness that I've clung to this resource. He would so absolutely, so unreservedly, do anything for her." She had reached now, with her extraordinary self-control, the pitch of quiet, bland demonstration. "I want the poor thing, que diable, to have another string to her bow and another loaf, for her desolate old age, on the shelf. When everything else is gone Mitchy will still be there. Then it will be at least her own fault—!" Mrs. Brook continued. "What can relieve me of the primary duty of taking precautions," she wound up, "when I know as well as that I stand here and look at you—"

"Yes, what?" he asked as she just paused.

"Why, that so far as they count on you, they count, my dear Van, on a blank." Holding him a minute as with the soft, low voice of his fate, she sadly but firmly shook her head. "You won't do it."

"Oh!" he almost too loudly protested.

"You won't do it," she went on.

"I say!"—he made a joke of it.

"You won't do it," she repeated.

It was as if he could not at last but show himself really struck; yet what he exclaimed on was what might in truth most have impressed him. "You are magnificent, really!"

"Mr. Mitchett!" the butler, appearing at the door, almost familiarly dropped; on which Vanderbank turned straight to the person announced.

Mr. Mitchett was there, and, anticipating Mrs. Brook in receiving him, her companion passed it straight on. "She's magnificent!"

Mitchy was already all interest. "Rather! But what's her last?"

It had been, though so great, so subtle, as they said in Buckingham Crescent, that Vanderbank scarce knew how to put it. "Well, she's so thoroughly superior."

"Oh, à qui le dites-vous?" Mitchy cried as he greeted her.

XXII.

The subject of this eulogy had meanwhile returned to her sofa, where she received the homage of her new visitor. "It's not I who am magnificent, a bit—it's dear Mr. Longdon. I've just had from Van the most wonderful piece of news about him—his announcement of his wish to make it worth somebody's while to marry my child."

"'Make it'?"—Mitchy stared. "But isn't it?"

"My dear friend, you must ask Van. Of course you've always thought so. But I must tell you, all the same," Mrs. Brook went on, "that I'm delighted."

Mitchy had seated himself, but Vanderbank remained erect and became perhaps even slightly stiff. He was not angry—none of the inner circle at Buckingham Crescent was ever angry—but he looked grave and rather troubled. "Even if it is decidedly fine"—he addressed his hostess straight—"I can't make out, however, quite why you're doing this. I mean immediately making it known."

"Ah, but what do we keep from Mitchy?" Mrs. Brook asked.

"What can you keep? It comes to the same thing," Mitchy said. "Besides, here we are together, share and share alike—one beautiful intelligence. Mr. Longdon's 'somebody' is of course Van. Don't try to treat me as an outsider."

Vanderbank looked a little foolishly, though it was but the shade of a shade, from one of them to the other. "I think I've been rather an ass!"

"What then, by the terms of our friendship—just as Mitchy says—can he and I have a better right to know and to feel with you about? You will want, Mitchy, won't you?" Mrs. Brook went on, "to hear all about that."

"Oh, I only mean," Vanderbank explained, "in having just now blurted my tale out to you. However, I of course do know," he pursued to Mitchy, "that whatever is really between us will remain between us. Let me then tell you myself exactly what's the matter." The length of his pause, after these words, showed at last that he had stopped short; on which his companions, as they waited, exchanged a sympathetic look. They waited another minute, and then he dropped into a chair, where, leaning forward, his elbows on the arms and his gaze attached to the carpet, he drew out the silence. Finally he looked at Mrs. Brook. "You make it clear."

The appeal called up for some reason her most infantine manner. "I don't think I can, dear Van—really clear. You know, however, yourself," she continued to Mitchy, "enough, by this time, about Mr. Longdon and mamma."

"Oh, rather!" Mitchy laughed.

"And about mamma and Nanda."

"Oh, perfectly: the way Nanda reminds him, and the 'beautiful loyalty' that has made him take such a fancy to her. But I've already embraced the facts—you needn't dot any i's." With another glance at his fellow-visitor Mitchy jumped up and stood there florid. "He has offered you money to marry her." He said this to Vanderbank as if it were the most natural thing in the world.

"Oh no," Mrs. Brook interposed with promptitude: "he has simply let him know before any one else that the money is there for Nanda, and that therefore—"

"First come, first served?"—Mitchy had already taken her up. "I see, I see. Then, to make her sure of the money," he inquired of Vanderbank, "you must marry her?"

"If it depends upon that, she'll never get it," Mrs. Brook returned. "Dear Van will think, conscientiously, a lot about it, but he won't do it."

"Won't you, Van, really?" Mitchy asked from the hearth-rug.

"Never, never. We shall be very kind to him, we shall help him, hope and pray for him, but we shall be at the end," said Mrs. Brook, "just where we are now. Dear Van will have done his best, and we shall have done ours. Mr. Longdon will have done his—poor Nanda, even, will have done hers. But it will all have been in vain. However," Mrs. Brook continued to expound, "she'll probably have the money. Mr. Longdon will surely consider that she'll want it if she doesn't marry still more than if she does. So we shall be so much at least," she wound up—"I mean Edward and I and the child will be—to the good."

Mitchy, for an equal certainty, required but an instant's thought. "Oh, there can be no doubt about that. The things about which your mind may now be at ease—!" he cheerfully exclaimed.

"It does make a great difference!" Mrs. Brook comfortably sighed. Then in a different tone: "What dear Van will find at the end that he can't face will be, don't you see? just this fact of appearing to have accepted a bribe. He won't want, on the one hand—out of kindness for Nanda—to have the money suppressed; and yet he won't want to have the pecuniary question mixed up with the matter—to look, in short, as if he had had to be paid. He's like you, you know—he's proud; and it will be there we shall break down."

Mitchy had been watching his friend, who, a few minutes before perceptibly embarrassed, had now recovered himself and, at his ease, though still perhaps with a smile a trifle strained, leaned back and let his eyes play everywhere but over the faces of the others. Vanderbank evidently wished now to show a good-humored detachment.

"See here," Mitchy said to him: "I remember your once submitting to me a case of some delicacy."

"Oh, he'll submit it to you—he'll submit it even to me," Mrs. Brook broke in. "He'll be charming, touching, confiding—above all he'll be awfully interesting about it. But he'll make up his mind in his own way, and his own way won't be to accommodate Mr. Longdon."

Mitchy continued to study their companion in the light of these remarks, then turned upon his hostess his sociable glare. "Splendid, isn't it, the old boy's infatuation with him?"

Mrs. Brook just hesitated. "From the point of view of the immense interest it—just now, for instance—makes for you and me? Oh yes, it's one of our best things yet. It places him a little with Lady Fanny—'He will, he won't; he won't, he will!' Only, to be perfect, it lacks, as I say, the element of real suspense."

Mitchy frankly wondered. "It does, you think? Not for me—not wholly." He turned again, quite pleadingly, to their friend. "I hope it doesn't for yourself totally either?"

Vanderbank, cultivating his detachment, made at first no more reply than if he had not heard, and the others meanwhile showed faces that testified perhaps less than their respective speeches had done to the absence of anxiety. The only token he immediately gave was to get up and approach Mitchy, before whom he stood a minute, laughing kindly enough, but not altogether gayly. As if then for a better proof of gayety he presently seized him by the shoulders and, still without speaking, pushed him backward into the chair he himself had just quitted. Mrs. Brook's eyes, from the sofa, while this went on, attached themselves to her visitors. It took Vanderbank, as he moved about and his companions waited, a minute longer to produce what he had in mind. "What is splendid, as we call it, is this extraordinary freedom and good-humor of our intercourse and the fact that we do care—so independently of our personal interests, with so little selfishness or other vulgarity—to get at the idea of things. The beautiful specimen Mrs. Brook had just given me of that," he continued to Mitchy, "was what made me break out to you about her when you came in." He spoke to one friend, but he looked at the other. "What's really 'superior' in her is that, though I suddenly show her an interference with a favorite plan, her personal resentment is nothing—all she wants is to see what may really happen, to take in the truth of the case and make the best of that. She offers me the truth, as she sees it, about myself, and with no nasty elation if it does chance to be the truth that suits her best. It was a charming, charming stroke."

Mitchy's appreciation was no bar to his amusement. "You're wonderfully right about us. But still it was a stroke!"

If Mrs. Brook was less diverted she followed perhaps more closely. "If you do me so much justice then, why did you put to me such a cold, cruel question?—I mean when you so oddly challenged me on my handing on your news to Mitchy. If the principal beauty of our effort to live together is—and quite according to your own eloquence—in our sincerity, I simply obeyed the impulse to do the sincere thing. If we're not sincere, we're nothing."

"Nothing!"—it was Mitchy who first responded. "But we are sincere."

"Yes, we are sincere," Vanderbank presently said. "It's a great chance for us not to fall below ourselves; no doubt, therefore, we shall continue to planer. We pay for it, people who don't like us say, in our self-consciousness—"

"But people who don't like us," Mitchy broke in, "don't matter. Besides, how can we be properly conscious of each other—?"

"That's it!"—Vanderbank completed his idea: "without my finding myself, for instance, in you and Mrs. Brook? We see ourselves reflected—we're conscious of the charming whole. I thank you," he pursued after an instant to Mrs. Brook—"I thank you for your sincerity."

It was an affair sometimes really to hold her eyes, but they had, it must be said for her, their steady moments. She exchanged with Vanderbank a somewhat remarkable look, then, with an art of her own, broke short off without appearing to drop him. "The thing is, don't you think?"—she appealed to Mitchy—"for us not to be so awfully clever as to make it believed that we can never be simple. We mustn't see too tremendous things—even in each other." She quite lost patience with the danger she glanced at. "We can be simple!"

"We can, by God!" Mitchy laughed.

"Well, we are now—and it's a great comfort to have it settled," said Vanderbank.

"Then you see," Mrs. Brook returned, "what a mistake you would make to see abysses of subtlety in my having been merely natural."

"We can be natural," Mitchy declared.

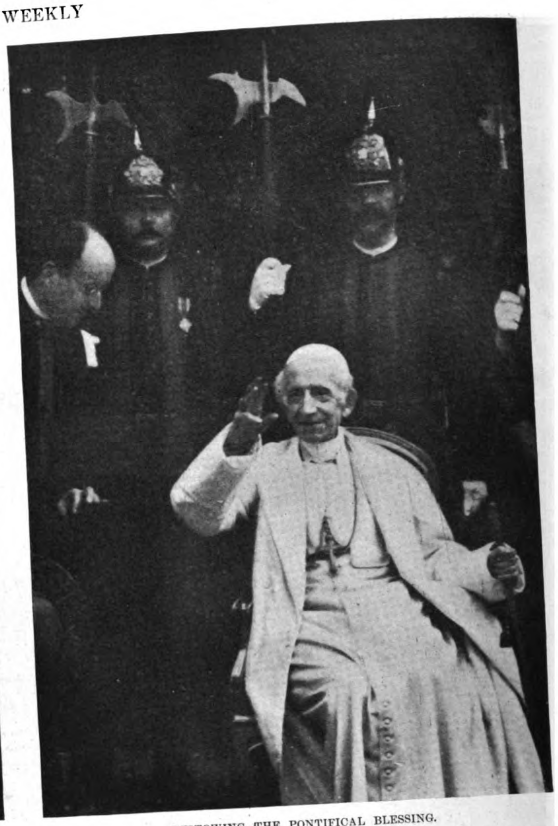
"We can, by God!" Vanderbank laughed.

Mrs. Brook had turned to Mitchy. "I just wanted you to know. So I spoke. It's not more complicated than that. As for why I wanted you to know—"

"What better reason could there be," Mitchy interrupted, "than your being filled to the finger-tips with the sense of how I would want it myself, and of the misery, the absolute pathos, of my being left out? Fancy, my dear chap"—he had only to put it to Van—"my not knowing!"

Vanderbank evidently couldn't fancy it, but he said quietly enough: "I should probably have told you myself."



"Well, what's the difference?"

"Oh, there is a difference," Mrs. Brook loyally said. Then she opened an inch or two, for Vanderbank, the

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PREPARING TO BESTOW THE PONTIFICAL BLESSING.
Copyright, 1898, by the American Mutoscope Company.

BESTOWING THE PONTIFICAL BLESSING.
Copyright, 1898, by the American Mutoscope Company.

TAKING A DRIVE THROUGH THE VATICAN GROUNDS.
Copyright, 1898, by the American Mutoscope Company.

POPE LEO XIII.

LATEST PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE PONTIFF, OBTAINED AT THE VATICAN BY W. K.-L. DICKSON.—[SEE PAGE 1150.]
Mutoscope and Biograph Photographs.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

APPROACHING A SEAT IN THE GARDENS.
Copyright, 1898, by the American Mutoscope Company.

SEATED IN THE GARDENS OF THE VATICAN
Copyright, 1898, by the American Mutoscope Company.

BESTOWING THE PONTIFICAL BLESSING.
Copyright, 1898, by the American Mutoscope Company.

TAKING A CONSTITUTIONAL IN THE VATICAN GROUNDS.
Copyright, 1898, by the American Mutoscope Company.

STARTING ON A SHORT WALK—PAPAL GUARDS IN ATTENDANCE.
Copyright, 1898, by the American Mutoscope Company.

POPE LEO XIII.

LATEST PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE PONTIFF, OBTAINED AT THE VATICAN BY W. K.-L. DICKSON.—[SEE PAGE 1150.]
Mutoscope and Biograph Photographs.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

door of her dim radiance. "Only I should have thought it a difference for the better. Of course," she added, "it remains absolutely with us three alone, and don't you already feel from it the fresh charm—with it here between us—of our being together?"

It was as if each of the men had waited for the other to assent better than he himself could, and Mitchy then, as Vanderbank failed, had gracefully, to cover him, changed the subject. "But isn't Nanda, the person most interested, to know?"

Vanderbank gave, on this, a strange sound of hilarity. "Il ne manquerait plus que cela!"

It produced, for a few seconds, something like a chill, a chill that had for consequence a momentary pause, which in its turn added weight to the words next uttered. "It's not I who shall tell her," Mrs. Brook said gently and gravely. "There!—you may be sure. If you want a promise, it's a promise. So that if Mr. Longdon's silent," she went on, "and you are, Mitchy, and I am, how in the world shall she have a suspicion?"

"You mean of course except by Van's deciding to mention it himself."

Van might have been, from the way they looked at him, some beautiful unconscious object, but Mrs. Brook was quite ready to answer. "Oh, poor man, he'll never breathe."

"I see. So there we are."

To this discussion the subject of it had for the time nothing to contribute, even when Mitchy, rising with the words he had last uttered from the chair in which he had been placed, took, sociably, as well, on the hearth-rug, a position before their hostess. This move ministered, apparently, only to Vanderbank's silence, for it was still without speaking that, after a little, he turned away from his friend and dropped once more into the same seat. "I've shown you already, you of course remember," Vanderbank presently said to him, "that I'm perfectly aware of how much better Mrs. Brook would like you for the position."

"He thinks I want him myself," Mrs. Brook blandly explained.

She was indeed, as they always thought her, "wonderful," but she was perhaps not even now so much so as Mitchy found himself able to be. "But how would you lose old Van—even at the worst?" he earnestly asked of her.

She just hesitated. "What do you mean by the worst?"

"Then even at the best," Mitchy smiled. "In the event of his falsifying your prediction; which, by-the-way, has the danger, hasn't it?—I mean for your intellectual credit—of making him, as we all used to be called by our nurse-maids, 'contrary.'"

"Oh, I've thought of that," Mrs. Brook returned. "But he won't do, on the whole, even for the sweetness of spiting me, what he won't want to do. I haven't said I should lose him," she went on; "that's only the view he himself takes—or, to do him perfect justice, the idea he candidly imputes to me; though without, I imagine—for I don't go so far as that—attributing to me anything so unutterably bête as a feeling of jealousy."

"You wouldn't dream of my supposing anything inept of you," Vanderbank said on this, "if you understood to the full how I kept on admiring you. Only what stupefies me a little," he continued, "is the extraordinary critical freedom—or we may call it if we like the high intellectual detachment—with which we discuss a question touching you, dear Mrs. Brook, so nearly and engaging so your most private and most sacred sentiments. What are we playing with, after all, but the idea of Nanda's happiness?"

"Oh, I'm not playing!" Mrs. Brook declared with a little rattle of emotion

"She's not playing."—Mr. Mitchett gravely confirmed it. "Don't you feel in the very air the vibration of the passion that she's simply too charming to shake at the window as the house-maid shakes the table-cloth or the jingo the flag?" Then he took up what Vanderbank had previously said. "Of course, my dear man, I'm 'aware,' as you just now put it, of everything, and I'm not indiscreet, am I, Mrs. Brook? in admitting for you, as well as for myself, that there was an impossibility that you and I used sometimes to turn over together. Only—Lord bless us all!—it isn't as if I hadn't long ago seen that there's nothing at all for me."

"Ah, wait, wait!" Mrs. Brook put in.

"She has a theory"—Vanderbank, from his chair, lighted it up for Mitchy, who hovered before them—"that your chance will come, later on, after I've given my measure."

"Oh, but that's exactly," Mitchy was quick to respond, "what you'll never do! You'll walk in magnificent mystery 'later on' not a bit less than you do to-day; you'll continue to have the benefit of everything that our imagination, perpetually engaged, often baffled and never fatigued, will continue to bedeck you with. Nanda, in the same way, to the end of all her time, will simply remain exquisite, or genuine, or generous—whatever we choose to call it. It may make a difference to us, who are comparatively vulgar, but what difference will it make to her whether you do or you don't decide for her? You can't belong to her more, for herself, than you do already—and that's precisely so much that there's no room for any one else. Where, therefore, without that room, do I come in?"

"Nowhere, I see"—Vanderbank seemed obligingly to muse.

Mrs. Brook had followed Mitchy with marked admiration, but she gave, on this, at Van, a glance that was like the toss of a blossom from the same branch. "Oh then, shall I just go on with you both? That will be joy!" She had, however, the next thing, a sudden drop, which shaded the picture. "You're so divine, Mitchy, that how can you not, in the long-run, break any woman down?"

It was not as if Mitchy was struck—it was only that he was courteous. "What do you call the long-run. Taking about till I'm eighty?"

"Ah, your genius is of a kind to which middle life will be particularly favorable. You'll reap then, somehow, one feels, everything you've sown."

Mitchy still accepted the prophecy only to control it. "Do you call eighty middle-life? Why, my moral beauty, my dear woman—if that's what you mean by my genius—is precisely my curse. What on earth is left for a man just rotten with goodness? It renders necessary the kind of liking that renders *un*necessary anything else."

"Now that is cheap paradox!" Vanderbank patiently sighed. "You're down for a fine."

It was with less of the patience perhaps that Mrs. Brook took this up. "Yes, on that we are stiff. Five pounds, please."

Mitchy drew out his pocket-book even though he explained. "What I mean is that I don't give out the great thing." With which he produced a crisp bank-note.

"Don't you?" asked Vanderbank, who, having taken it from him to hand to Mrs. Brook, held it a moment, delicately, to accentuate the doubt.

"The great thing's the sacred terror. It's you who give that out."

"Oh!"—and Vanderbank laid the money on the small stand at Mrs. Brook's elbow.

"Ain't I right, Mrs. Brook?—doesn't he, tremendously, and isn't that, more than anything else, what does it?"

The two again, as if they understood each other, gazed in a unity of interest at their companion, who sustained it with an air clearly intended as the happy mean between embarrassment and triumph. Then Mrs. Brook showed she liked the phrase. "The sacred terror! Yes, one feels it. It is that."

"The finest case of it," Mitchy pursued, "that I've ever met. So my moral's sufficiently pointed."

"Oh, I don't think it can be said to be that," Vanderbank returned, "till you've put the whole thing into a box by doing for Nanda what she does most want you to do."

Mitchy caught on without a shade of wonder. "Oh, by proposing to the Duchess for little Aggie?" He took but an instant to turn it over. "Well, I would propose, to please Nanda. Only I've never yet quite made out the reason of her wish."

"The reason is largely," his friend answered, "that, being very fond of Aggie, and in fact extremely admiring her, she wants to do something good for her and to keep her from anything bad. Didn't you know—it's too charming—regularly believes in her?"

Mitchy, with all his recognition, vibrated to the touch. "Isn't it too charming?"

"Well then," Vanderbank went on, "she secures for her friend a phœnix like you, and secures for you a phœnix like her friend. It's hard to say for which of you she desires most to do the handsome thing. She loves you both, in short"—he followed it up—"though perhaps, when one thinks of it, the price she puts on you, Mitchy, in the arrangement, is a little the higher. Awfully fine, at any rate—and yet awfully odd too—her feeling for Aggie's type, which is divided by such abysses from her own."

"Ah," laughed Mitchy, "but think then of her feeling for mine!"

Vanderbank still more at his ease now and with his head back, had his eyes aloft and afar. "Oh, there are things in Nanda—!" The others exchanged a glance at this, while their companion added: "Little Aggie's really the sort of creature she would have liked to be able to be."

"Well," Mitchy said, "I should have adored her even if she had been able."

Mrs. Brook, for some minutes, had played no audible part, but the acute observer we are constantly taking for granted would perhaps have detected in her, as one of the effects of the special complexion, to-day, of Vanderbank's presence, a certain smothered irritation. "She couldn't possibly have been able," she now interposed, "with so loose—or rather, to express it more properly, with so perverse—a mother."

"And yet, my dear lady," Mitchy promptly reflected, "how, if, in little Aggie's case, the Duchess hasn't prevented—?"

Mrs. Brook was full of wisdom. "Well, it's a different thing. I'm not, as a mother—am I, Van?—bad enough. That's what's the matter with me. Aggie, don't you see? is the Duchess's morality, her virtue; which, by having it, that way, outside of you, as one may say, you can make a much better thing of. The child has been for Jane, I admit, a capital little subject, but Jane has kept her on hand and finished her like some wonderful piece of stitching. Oh, as work, it's of a soigné! There it is—to show. A woman like me has to be herself, poor thing, her virtue and her morality. What will you have? It's our lumbering English plan."

"So that her daughter," Mitchy sympathized, "can only, by the arrangement, hope to become at the best, her immorality and her vice?"

But Mrs. Brook, without an answer for the question, appeared suddenly to have plunged into a sea of thought. "The only way for Nanda to have been really nice—"

"Would have been for you to be like Jane?"

Mitchy and his hostess seemed for a minute, on this, to gaze together at the tragic truth. Then she shook her head. "We see our mistakes too late." She repeated the movement, but as if to let it all go, and Vanderbank, meanwhile, pulling out his watch, had got up with a laugh that showed some inattention and made to Mitchy a remark about their walking away together. Mitchy, engaged for the instant with Mrs Brook, had assented only with a nod, but the attitude of the two men had become that of departure. Their friend looked at them as if she would like to keep one of them, and for a purpose connected somehow with the other, but was oddly, almost ludicrously, embarrassed to choose. What was in her face indeed, during this short passage, might prove to have been, should we penetrate, the flicker of a sense that, in spite of all intimacy and amiability, they could, at bottom and as things commonly turned out, only be united against her. Yet she made at the end a sort of choice in going on to Mitchy: "He hasn't at all told you the real reason of Nanda's idea that you should go in for Aggie."

"Oh, I draw the line there," said Vanderbank. "Besides, he understands that too."

Mitchy did, on the spot, himself and every one justice. "Why, it just disposes of me, doesn't it?"

Vanderbank, restless now and turning about the room, stopped, on this, with a smile for Mrs. Brook. "We understand too well!"

"Not if he doesn't understand," she replied after a moment, while she turned to Mitchy, "that his real 'combination' can, in the nature of the case, only be—"

"Oh yes"—Mitchy took her straight up—"with the young thing who is, as you say, positively and helplessly modern, and the pious fraud of whose classic identity with a sheet of white paper has been—oh tacitly, of course, but none the less practically—dropped. You've so often reminded me. I do understand. If I were to go in for Aggie it would only be to oblige. The modern girl, the product of our hard London facts, and of her inevitable consciousness of them, just as they are—she, wonderful being, is, I fully recognize, my real affair, and I'm not ashamed to say that when I like the individual I'm not afraid of the type. She knows too much—I don't say; but she doesn't know, after all, a millionth part of what I do."

"I'm not sure!" Mrs. Brook earnestly exclaimed.

He had rung out, and he kept it up, with a limpidity unusual. "And product for product, when you come to that, I'm a queerer one myself than any other. The traditions I smash!" Mitchy laughed.

Mrs. Brook had got up and Vanderbank had gone again to the window. "That's exactly why," she returned; "you're a pair of monsters and your monstrosity fits. She does know too much," she added.

"Well," said Mitchy, with resolution, "it's all my fault."

"Not all—unless," Mrs. Brook returned, "that's only a sweet way of saying that it's mostly mine."

"Oh, yours too—immensely; in fact every one's. Even Edward's, I dare say; and certainly, unmistakably, Harold's. Ah, and Van's own—rather!" Mitchy continued; "for all he turns his back and will have nothing to say to it."

It was on the back Vanderbank turned that Mrs. Brook's eyes now rested. "That's precisely why he shouldn't be afraid of her."

He faced straight about. "Oh, I don't deny my part." He shone at them brightly enough, and Mrs. Brook thoughtful, wistful, candid, took in for a moment the radiance. "And yet to think that after all it has been mere talk!"

Something in her tone again made her hearers laugh out; so it was still with the air of good-humor that Vanderbank rejoined: "Mere, mere, mere. But perhaps it's exactly the 'mere' that has made us range so wide."

Mrs. Brook's intelligence abounded. "You mean that we haven't had the excuse of passion?"

Her companions once more gave way to gayety, but "There you are!" Vanderbank said, after an instant, less sociably. With it too he held out his hand.

"You are afraid," she answered as she gave him her own; on which, as he made no rejoinder, she held him before her. "Do you mean you really don't know if she gets it?"

"The money, if he doesn't go in?"—Mitchy broke, almost with an air of responsibility, into Vanderbank's silence. "Ah, but, as we said, surely—!"

It was Mitchy's eyes that Vanderbank met. "Yes, I should suppose she gets it."

"Perhaps then, as a compensation, she'll even get more—!"

"If I don't go in? Oh!" said Vanderbank. And he changed color.

He was by this time off, but Mrs. Brook kept Mitchy a moment. "Now—by that suggestion—he has something to show. He won't go in."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE MOST NAILING BAD SHOT IN CREATION.

A Story of the Indian Mutiny.

BY FLORA ANNIE STEEL.

This, again, is one of poor Craddock's stories, which he told me when we were stretching a steel-edged ribbon of rail across shifting sand hills; that ribbon uniting West to East, on which, a few years later, he met his death in trying to rid the permanent way of something which Fate decreed should be permanently in the way.

It happened in mutiny-time. He was serving as a volunteer in one of the breastworks, which, as the long hot-weather months dragged by, began to seam and scar the face of the red rocks of the Ridge at Delhi, creeping nearer and nearer to the red face of the city wall.

And with him, as the catch-phrase runs, "lay" Joe Banks, the Yorkshireman—tall, stolid, silent. Good-looking also, with a thick close crop of curly fair hair and hard, honest blue eyes. He was not stupid, by any means, only phenomenally silent, except when the talk turned on women, and then, as Craddock put it tersely, he "damned free," perhaps because, as the latter worthy used to add, with a suspicion of sympathy in his drink-blurred face, he had "cared a sight deal too much for one woman to 'ave much likin' left for the lot."

To one side of the breastwork lay a dry ravine, where, every day, the vipers used to sun themselves on the hot red rocks. Just across it, within range, rose a small Mohammedan shrine amid sparse brushwood, which thickened a bit till it was barred by the ruined wall of a garden, where the slow oxen circled round the well, sending runnels of slippery-looking water to the scented shade of citrons, roses, and mangoes, heedless of the spent cannon-balls which sometimes came trundling like playthings down the wide walks. Not often, though, for the stress of strife lay at the other angle of the breastwork, which faced the city wall.

Still, those who came to smoke a hard-earned pipe in what was the safest spot in the outpost soon found that the pious-looking shrine, the peaceful-looking garden, were not always so innocent as they looked. In the dusk of dark or dawn they were tenanted by what, after a time, the men agreed to call the "most nailin'" bad shot in creation.

"The direction wasn't, so to speak, so bad, sir," Craddock used to explain to me. "'E'd about 'ave 'it the sea serpent for length; it was the elevation which, as Bull's Eyes said—savin' your presence, sir—was d——ficient. The top of the Monument was about in it, sir; an' that was why the only feller as really use' langwidge was Joey Banks, for 'e was a 'end and shoulders 'igher than the lot o' us."

So when, in the dark, a flash used to glimmer for a second among the brushwood like a fire-fly, the men learnt to sing out, "That's for you, Joey," "Duck, my darlin', duck," and other witticisms of that kind, until the big Yorkshireman's face darkened beyond jesting-point: for he had the devil's own temper when roused. It was this, he had the devil's own temper when roused. It was this, joined to his extreme good looks and a somewhat hazy recollection of the Bible and the classics among the volunteers, which earned him the name of Apollyon. So to soothe him some of the wilder spirits would organize a

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

charge over the ravine, scattering perhaps a few drowsy adders which had forgotten to go to bed, but nothing else. The blind old fakeer in the shrine was always fast asleep, the bullocks in the garden circling slowly, driven by a drowsy lad curled up behind them.

So the days passed, and, despite practice, the "Most Nailin' Bad Shot" shot badly as ever. The odds, however, as the men pointed out gravely to Apollyon, kept on improving, so that sooner or later there must be a "casoolty" in the garrison of No. 1 Outpost. Joey, too, would get careless; he wouldn't stoop enough, etc., etc. And, sure enough, one evening, just as the moonlight was gaining on the daylight, and Joey Banks had risen to his full height—in a huff because Craddock for once had sided against him in the perennial argument as to whether it was worth while fighting for women who didn't know what they would be at and hadn't the pluck of a mouse—one of the fire-fly flashes was followed by a sudden clapping of the giant's hands to the very crown of his head.

"We looked, sir," Craddock used to say gravely, with that reminiscent biblical knowledge of his which had doubtless supplied the name Apollyon, "for 'im to fall dead, as 'e deserve rich, for 'e'd bin damnin' uncommon free, sir. But 'e only usc' it worse. And then, savin' your presence, sir, we see that 'e'd 'ad, so ter speak, a narrer-gauge line laid down thro' 'is jungle—right through 'is curls, sir. Lordy! 'ow we laughed! It was a lady, we told 'm, as wanted some locks, an' nó mistake. It sorter made 'im mad, for 'e just stooped and gathered the lot—bein' fair, you could see it shinin' in the dust—together. 'She shall 'ave 'em, never fear,' 'e says, quiet like. 'Yes! the person who fired that shot shall 'ave more o' my 'air than he reckon for.'"

Just at that moment, however, one of those sudden alarms which, for three months, kept the men and officers before Delhi on the alert by day and night, broke up the company, and so Joe Banks's loss passed out of most minds. Except his own, of course. It lingered there, aided by that narrow-gauge over his brain, on which the cool night wind blew pleasantly.

So when the alarm passed, instead of coming back to rest, he crept out surreptitiously by the back of the breastwork—for such sorties were strictly out of order—and so by a slant downwards across the ravine. It was a brilliant moonlight night, and he caught the sparkle of many a deadly pair of eyes among the rocks. But he was in no mood to step aside from any danger, and, once beyond fear of recall, he strode along straight, as if the whole place belonged to him; it might have, for all the opposition he got. The fakeer was asleep, as usual, the oxen circling round the well, and in the scented shade of the roses and citrons he could find nothing save some drowsy birds, who fluttered and twittered helplessly as his tall head forced a way through the thickets.

Feeling ill-used, he set his face back towards the breastwork, until the extraordinary peace of the moonlit scene—which, as Craddock asserted, used in the interval of onslaught to make the beleaguered city look like the New Jerusalem—brought him to a standstill: first to look, then to take out his pipe, finally to sit on a rock and think vaguely of the Yorkshire wolds, and of some one, no doubt, who had not had the courage of her convictions; for after a bit he murmured, "She were a right down coward—that's where it is, aw'm thinkin'."

He had not much time for reflection, however, for at that moment there was a flash, a crack, and something whizzed past his left ear. The "Most Nailin' Bad Shot" was better at close quarters! His blood was up in a second, and without pausing to pick up his musket, which he had laid aside, he was off to the spot whence the flash had come. And there! Whoop, forward! Gone away! was his quarry for sure, running like a hare for some hiding-place, no doubt, among the rocks. It might have been reached, for rumor tells of many secret passages between palaces inside the city and gardens without, but for a true-lovers' knot of vipers which refused to budge from the path, which made the flying figure give a screech, and the flying feet, in their effort to overleap it, miss footing and fall.

The next instant Joe Banks was on it as it lay, conscious even in his hurry that what he gripped was something young and soft. A boy, no doubt—devil's spawn!

"Aw'm goan ter choak ye on t' hair," he said, grimly. "Open yer domned mouth. D'ye hear?"

It was almost as if the prostrate figure understood; but the next instant a set of gleaming white teeth had closed like a squirrel's round Joe Banks's first finger. He let off an echoing yell to the previous screech, and an oddly satisfied smile came to the fierce little face he could scarcely see for his big hand. It was an oval face, smooth as a girl's.

"That's nowt to Joey Banks, lad; he can kill anoother waay," he growled savagely, as he shifted a knee to pin his prisoner down, loosed his left hand, his right being detained, and deliberately drew out one of the many knives stuck in his enemy's waistband. "Aw'll lay t' hair abun tha' heeart, tha' wriggliu' worm, and driv' it hoam—that aw' wull."

In pursuance of which plan he undid an embroidered satin waistcoat and began to push aside an inner muslin vest. A sniff of musk and roses mingled with the moonlight. "Stinks and bites like a foumart," he muttered. "Son, lie thee still, will tha'? an' tak that to thissen, ma'—Gor amoighty!"

Joe Banks was on his feet; so was his enemy. Both dazed, uncertain. Flight seemed to come uppermost to the latter's thought, until the big man suddenly laughed—a low chuckle of sheer amusement.

"An' t' coom like a wild-cat at Joey Banks—that caps owt!"

The next instant he was grappling with a whirlwind of knives, nails, anything.

"Woa! woa! ma' lass! Hands off, tha' little vixen, till I git a look at tha'!" he said, soothingly, as he prisoned two small hands in one huge fist, and with the other held his adversary almost tenderly at arm's-length. What he saw, as he afterwards described it to Craddock, was just "a mort o' pistols an' pouches."

"Well! well! Aw'm jiggered!" he exclaimed at last, adding, argumentatively, "Whatten iver mad' tha' go fur t' do it, tha' foolish lass?"

Something in his broad, not unkindly rebuke seemed to take the starch out of the "Most Nailin' Bad Shot." It seemed to cower in on itself and become smaller; though, as Joe Banks told himself perplexedly, it had been small enough to begin with.

"Well! aw—aw'm jiggered!" he repeated, more softly. "Whatten made tha' do it, ma' lass?"

The answer was feminine and disconcerting—a sudden storm of tears. So they stood, the quaintest couple in the world, she bristling with cold steel of sorts, he bareheaded in the moonlight, with nothing but his hands for weapons.

"Dunnot," he said, soothingly, not without a certain trepidation. "Aw'm noan goan t' hurt thee, ma' gell. We'm not thaat soort t' womenkind; an' tha's a main pratty gell." Here he laughed softly, a laugh that was lost in a third—

"Well, aw'm jiggered!"

He appeared to be so, for he ceased thrusting her from him—she being, indeed, too much engaged with tears to make such cessation dangerous—and passed his hand over his forehead, as if to clear his brain.

"Aw'm noan goan t' hurt tha', ma' lass," he repeated suddenly, as if for his own information; "aw'm nobbut goan t' shame tha' fur tha' badness."

And with that he lifted her right up like a baby, sat down on a neighboring rock, and set her on his knee.

"Thou'rt as light as a feather," he said, almost admiringly. "An' t' coom at Joey Banks like a wild-cat; for sure it caps owt; but thou'rt a bad gell an' mun be shamed. So sit still an' be doon wi' 't."

Once more he might have claimed comprehension, for the "Most Nailin' Bad Shot" sat still, with the half-wicked, half-frightened look of a curious squirrel, as one by one he transferred knives and pistols to his own person. It was rather a lengthy business, by reason of his right hand—the one that had been bitten—being still occupied in prisoning her. Not that she struggled; on the contrary, she sat curiously still, checking even her sobs.

"Now for t' hair," he went on methodically, pulling off the large green turban wound around the small head. He sat half-perturbed and breathless after this was done, and the half-wicked, half-frightened dark eyes watching him seemed to admit a faint smile.

"Whew—w—w!" he said, under his breath; "it's long for sartin sure." It was, and a faint scent of orange blossom assailed him as he loosed the plaits. His hand trembled among them a little and lingered.

"Aw' mun be as good 's ma' word," he muttered—"as Joey Banks's word. See tha' here—sit tha' still, there's a good lass, an' let me hurry up, wilt thou?" There was almost an appeal in his voice, and both hands shook a little as the long black tresses twined themselves about the big fingers like snakes.

"Aw'm noan goan t' hurt—" he was reiterating blindly, when, perhaps fortunately, the whole bewildering face before him relapsed into a mischievous smile, and one small finger pointed derisively to the crown of his head. He flushed up scarlet.

"Thee's nobbut a wicked, bad gell!" he said, fiercely, "an' Joey Banks 'll shame tha'—a bold hussy!" So he set her on her feet and attacked her last bit of masculinity. This was a long green waistband wound round her middle, and which had carried a score or so of pistols, yataghans, and Heaven knows what murderous weapons. Of this portion of the toilet Craddock said it was hard to get Joey Banks to speak at all, and when he did his voice dropped to a whisper and he looked positively scarlet. She was so main slender, he said, that he thought he would never have done unwinding, though after a bit she helped cheerfully by twiddling like a teetotum. At last, however, she stood there, slim, girlish, her long hair shimmering, her dark eyes shining, half with tears, half with smiles.

"'An' then, Joey?' I arst 'im, sir, when 'e sate mumchance," Craddock would say at this period of his recital. "'Aw' out wi' "Fower angels rou-and ma' bed," man, an' a' up wi' her in ma' arms an' a' kissed her face fair an' oft, man—fair and oft, just t' shame her—an' a' runned awaay. Thet's what a' did, aw' runned awaay.' An' maybe, sure's my name's Nathaniel James in 'Oly Baptism, sir, he done a wise thing."

Half-way across the ravine, however, he paused to pick up his musket and look back. The "Most Nailin' Bad Shot in Creation" was standing where he had left her, with her face hidden in her hands. For an instant something tore at his heart, bidding him go back; then he set his teeth with an oath and ran on. Five minutes later he had slipped into a favorite cranny of rock beside Craddock, and was puffing away at his pipe as if nothing had happened—absolutely silent, till, according to the latter's report, he "gave a silly sort of laugh," and in the moonlight his eyes could be seen shining like stars as he turned and said, softly,

"Well, lad, a' ha' dune it this time."

"Done what, Apollyon?" asked Craddock.

"A' dunnot roightly kna', but a' ha' dune it for sartin' sure," replied Joe Banks, succinctly. And then he told the story.

"One of them gazes,* as they call 'em," interrupted Craddock, when the big man told of his discovery, in a sort of hushed voice. "They make 'em male an' female—the latter most vicious. Bad lots ut o' the bazaar needin' a passport to the skies—or the devil." Joe Banks's big fist came down like a sledge-hammer on Craddock's knee.

"Hush, mon!" he said, peremptorily. "She wo'ant none that sort. When a' kissed her—" he stopped short and blushed furiously.

"Apollyon!" remarked Craddock, after a pause, with great severity, "it ain't wholesome to keep sech things comfortable in yer buzzum. It's better to 'ave up an' done with it, an' begin again. When you kiss her, wot then?"

But Joe Banks's eyes were looking out into the soft darkness, soft and dark too, for all their shininess. "A' meant to 'a' keppen co'ont, but a' didn't, somehow." His voice was quite dreamy, and Craddock rose in wrath.

"It's my belief, same as I was in the catechising, Joey Banks, that you bin an' fallen in love with a female gaze; but mark my word, there ain't no gratitoode to speak of in gazes, and she'll nick you yet, sure as my name's Nathaniel James. She'll nick you yet, I do assure you."

But Craddock was wrong. Whatever else she did, the "Most Nailin' Bad Shot" shot no more. Not that it mattered much to Joey Banks whether she did or not, since but a few days after the long-prophesied "casoolty" came to No. 1 Outpost. Volunteer Joseph Banks, sometime canal overseer, was reported missing after a sortie; but as he had been last seen mortally wounded close to the city wall, his comrades mourned Apollyon from the first as dead. So, as Craddock said, feelingly, "there weren't even a lock o' 'is 'air for 'is old mother, an' she was a widder."

There was not, however, much time for mourning in the outpost, since the long months of the siege were drawing to a close. Then came the final assault, the ten days of struggle within the city, until even the palace was ours, and the army which had taken it prepared to move off elsewhere. It was the evening before the start, and Craddock, who as a volunteer had more liberty to go and come as he chose, went down to the now deserted outpost to smoke a last pipe and think over the past with the pleasing melancholy which goes so admirably with tobacco.

"Poor Joey Banks!" he thought, as memory came round to that episode. "'Im an' 'is female gaze. I sha'n't never forget 'em."

I will tell the rest in Craddock's own words; they suit the story.

"I look up, sir, an' you might 'ave knocked me over with a ninepin, for there was Joey, lookin' as spry as spry. 'Joey,' says I, takin' it as one does, sir, for all them sayin's of ninepins and feathers and such like, quite calm, 'so you're not dead?'

"'Na, lad,' he says back, as calm like. 'Aw'm goan t' be married, an' a've coom t' get t' best man.'

"It took me all of a 'eap, sir—sorter Malachi an' the minor prophets, sir—as things does sometimes. 'Joey, my boy,' I says, 'you ain't never goin' to marry a female gaze?' says I.

"But 'e was, sir. Ter cut a long story short, she'd found him an' nussed him. An' we all knows wot that means, white or black, sir. 'E'd a 'eap to tell—though Lord knows where 'e got it, for 'e didn't know no 'Industanee to speak of, sir—about 'ow she lived in quite a fine 'ouse, and 'ow her father an' brothers 'ad bin killed, so as she kinder 'adn't no choice but gazing. But I wasn't to be took with chaff, so I says to 'm, quite solemn like, 'Afore I'm best man, I've got to know, Joey—is she square?' 'E just look at me, sir, as if I were slush.

"'She'd gotten ma' hair in t' buzzum,' he said, and said no more.

"So I gave my word to be best man, sir, an' 'e sighed like as a weight was took off him. 'Than coom awa' wi' me t' passon,' says 'e, 'fur I'm goan t' be marri'd afoor aw' goes with t' army to-morrer.'

"'Then you've 'ad the bans cried?' said I; for, my father bein' bell-ringer—same as give me my name in 'Oly Baptism, sir—I was up to them dodges. 'E give me a real Apollyon frown, sir.

"'Na, lad; aw've noan had nought cried, but aw'm goan t' wed her fair afoor a fight; so save t' breath an' coom t' passon.'

"Well, sir, parson wasn't a bad chap, as I knowed, 'avin' seen 'im doin' dooty stiddy like the rest o' us, but 'e'd got 'is black coat on agin an' 'e were by natur' the canonized red-bricky sort; so 'e wouldn't none o' it, though I stood solemn for Joe like as if I bin godfather, tellin' 'im 'ow Joe would 'ave bin a deader but fer 'er, an' 'ow she was willin' to become a Christian in 'Oly Baptism when she 'ad a chanst, an' 'ow Joe wouldn't never 'ave bin in a 'urry without bridemaids but for bein' that eager to fight 'is country's foes agin—for of course, sir, 'e hadn't 'ad a look in at anything but beef tea an' barley water till we took the city.

"'Why doesn't he wait decently till he comes back?' says parson. 'The Sacrament of Marriage is not a responsibility to be entered into unawares, my good—'

"Joe rose up. Lord bless you! two 'eads taller than parson. 'Coom awa', best man!' 'e says. 'It's weaste toime heer, an' aw'll need tha' at t' Mosque; passon theear arn't so scrumfumptious, an' she towt ma t' Kulma this marnin', foor fear.' That's their creed, sir, same as the gazes, male an' female, yell when they're a-stickin' of you. Well, parson 'e brought up sharp at this, an' said, 'Stay a bit.' Then 'e look at Joe, an' Joe look at 'im.

"'Tha' see, she's gotten t' be ma' wife, man,' said Joe, apologetic like, an' parson he push 'is red-bricky prayer-book away fretful.

"'But I don't know anything,' he said; 'I don't even know if she is a spinster or a widow. Will you swear she hasn't a husband living?'

"Well, sir, Joe looked at parson and then 'e looked at me, an' then 'e scratch 'is 'ead—the curls 'ad grown tight as ever, sir—an' then sudden 'e smile—one o' them smiles like the sun on a daisy, sir.

"'Aw' dunnot know,' said 'e; 'aw' never arst her!'

"'Aw' never arst her,' says he, quite cheerful like. An' parson 'e look at me, an' at 'im, and at the Solemnization o' 'Oly Matrimony. Well, the end o' it was that the three o' us went down to one o' them light an' shady open-air houses, with a tree growin' out o' a wall and a lot o' pigeons. Parson 'e stood on one o' the arches raised up a step or two, an' they stood in the steps below, right in the sun, an' I stood 'twixt and between; for, you see, sir, I was clerk as well as best man.

"'Will you take this woman to be thy wedded wife?' arst parson.

"'Such is my desire,' says I, in order; but Joe wouldn't none o' that.

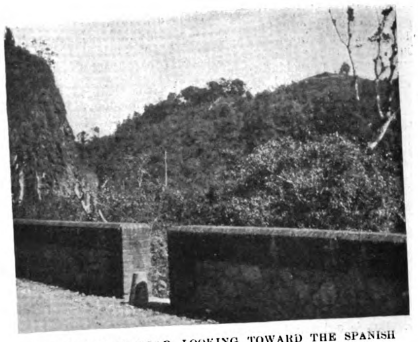
"'Fur better fur worse,' 'e says, 'fur richer, fur poorer; domned if a' doan't.'

"So 'e was wedded to the 'Most Nailin' Bad Shot in Creation.'"

"And was she pretty?" I asked of Craddock.

He shook his head. "I never set eyes on her, sir, though I was best man. She was wrapped up in a white veil, an' 'e kep' 'er so—said she liked it; they does, sir, when they've got a good 'usband."

"So they lived happy ever after?"



"Not for long, sir." Here Craddock slipped his hands into his pockets as the first step towards slouching off. "That sort o' thing don't somehow last long, sir." Here his eyes sought the gold of the setting sun, as they had a trick of doing when they grew soft. "Seems to me, savin' your presence, sir, as if there was too much o' the Noo Jerewsalem about that sort o' thing fur this world; that's 'ow it is. She died, sir, a few years after, when 'e was back in the Canals in a God-forsaken spot where there wasn't no one to—to be best man like. An' so they found 'im beside her with a bullet in his brain. So I was a minor prophet, after all, an' Joey Banks got nicked at last by the 'Most Nailin' Bad Shot in Creation.'"

* Ghazis—religious fanatics.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CLIMBING THE MOUNTAIN ON THE GREAT MILITARY ROAD, NORTH OF AYBONITO.

THE MILITARY ROAD, LOOKING TOWARD THE SPANISH POSITION AT AYBONITO.

GUAVA-TREE, FROM THE FRUIT OF WHICH GUAVA JELLY IS MADE.

SUGAR-CANE FIELDS AT VIEQUES, OR CRAB, ISLAND.
One and Two Years' Growth.

ISABELLA SEGUNDA, THE PRINCIPAL TOWN OF VIEQUES ISLAND, OFF PUERTO RICO.

THE TOWN OF AYBONITO, FROM THE SOUTH—THE HIGHEST POINT ON THE MILITARY ROAD.

CATHEDRAL AT GUAYAMA, AND THE PLAZA.

ARROYO'S WATER-FRONT, FROM A LIGHTER IN THE HARBOR.

PUERTO RICO.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILLIAM DINWIDDIE, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AMATEUR SPORT

AFTER ALL THE EXPERIENCE of last spring, it would seem that Wisconsin's athletic committee has either lost its head or had none to lose. Such is the conclusion prompted by the manner in which Wisconsin has brought her charges against members of the Chicago University eleven. There is too strong a suggestion of a revengeful spirit; too much evidence of a desire "to get even." I am told, and I have every reason to believe, that a bitter feeling against Chicago exists among the undergraduates of Wisconsin, who blame the former for the boycott of last spring. We can forgive something of this kind in the immature undergraduate, but we cannot understand a faculty that permits it to go before the world as the deliberate action of the university. If Chicago has men on her eleven who are ineligible to play, unquestionably Wisconsin is perfectly justifiable in protesting, but that protest should be made first to the committee of the Chicago University, and not through the medium of the daily press.

There should be this winter a meeting of the faculties of these several universities and another attempt made for more complete agreement as to the method of protesting members of one another's teams. Unless something of this sort is accomplished, the atmosphere of college sport in the Middle West will be long clearing.

IT WOULD BE MOST UNFORTUNATE if Wisconsin and Chicago should break relations because of the present misunderstanding. Nothing will be gained to either; on the other hand, much harm will be done Middle-Western college sport.

Chicago has good cause to be indignant over the method Wisconsin is pursuing. At the same time, Chicago and the others should remember that the course pursued last spring against Wisconsin could have been very much improved upon. There is need for charity and good faith.

The present difficulty between Chicago and Wisconsin indicates too much undergraduate impulsiveness and too little mature faculty judgment. One would think these universities surfeited with recrimination and sensational newspaper discussion. What the Middle West university athletic committees need now is more respect for one another, more confidence in one another's good intentions, less washing of soiled linen in public. I have before frequently commented on the menace to the wholesome development of sport that Western tendency to rush into print on the slightest occasion offers.

THE UNIVERSITIES OF THE MIDDLE WEST have in '98 passed through a trying year; but despite the present most unpleasant discussion between two of them, I believe it bids fair to turn out a profitable one, at least so far as concerns the ultimate bearing upon a harmonious stand for pure sport.

The season which opened in March with charges by Chicago, Michigan, and Illinois against Wisconsin ended, on the whole, with a pretty good feeling, and with some lessons learned both as to the necessity of fair and square dealing in sport, and as to the desirability of acting with frank good faith toward one another. While Wisconsin was not the only one needing the lesson, her attitude generally had for a year been antagonistic to wholesome sport, not only in upholding Maybury and Cochems, whom the Western Inter-collegiate Association had whitewashed, to its everlasting disgrace, but in the conduct of its baseball and football teams, especially the latter.

WITHOUT ENTERING UPON DETAILS, it may be assumed, and it is true, that the faculty boards of Michigan, Chicago, and Illinois universities acted conscientiously for the sake of sport in the Middle West when, last spring, they publicly charged the University of Wisconsin with condoning professionalism, and forthwith broke off athletic relations with that institution. It is to Wisconsin's credit that her own athletic council finally searched out the evidence which positively convicted Maybury and Cochems not only of professionalism in 1895, but of subsequent and repeated lying in their many declarations of innocence. Wisconsin's board was emphatically reprehensible for not having searched earlier and more diligently.

Its failure to do so gave to the other three institutions the natural feeling that a tendency to "whitewash" suspected athletes ruled at Madison. Certainly the public act of the three was tantamount to declaring that the faculty members of Wisconsin's council would not act in good faith if charges against certain men on its baseball and track teams were submitted. Coming after the '96 convention, to which all had subscribed, and whereip it had been expressly agreed that all suspected cases should be submitted to the faculty of the college concerned, and its decision accepted as made in good faith, this declaration of the three was a flagrant and insulting breach of contract, which can only be explained by the want of confidence in Wisconsin's honest wish for wholesome sport which its menacing attitude had created.

At all events, as the case stands now, Wisconsin's final action acquits her of whitewashing at least Maybury and Cochems.

THE LESSON THAT SHOULD BE HAMMERED HOME to all Western universities is the imperative need of open and aboveboard dealings with one another in the future. Let there be no further boycotting, no more seeking for newspaper notoriety, but let all protests be submitted in good faith to the faculty committee of the institution whose athletes are under suspicion. If relief be withheld, let the matter then be laid before a joint committee.

The bickerings and bad feelings of the past season must have emphasized the undesirability of leagues. If exception be made at all, then only should it be in the case of track athletics. The undergraduates are clamoring now for such an organization on a new plan, and profess confidence in smooth sailing. But the undergraduate is now, and always will be, clamorous and hopeful. The experience of the past, East and West, is against leagues. Dual meets are more nearly the ideal for the promotion of good feeling and honest sport on the track and field. Let them become more common in the Middle West and there will be no place for the phantasies of "championships" that now seem to set undergraduates and alumni by the ears. Independent athletic relationship is the healthful plan for universities, and in the annual Western conference of professors no efforts will be more surely rewarded nor work more certainly for the benefit of wholesome sport than those in this direction.

THERE WAS ONE PHASE of the athletic tangle last spring, settled at the conference suggested by Wisconsin, which reveals the type of sporting creature that represents the A. A. U. in the Middle West. When Michigan, Chicago, and Illinois withdrew from the Western Inter-collegiate Athletic Association last June because Maybury and Cochems had been scandalously whitewashed by that body, the A. A. U. officials in the West proceeded to disqualify the athletes of these three institutions for subsequently holding a triangular meet open only to college men. No criticism was made by the A. A. U. on the amateur status of the entries, the only excuse being support of the W. I. A. A., an affiliated body.

It was a presumptuous piece of business, indeed, and revealed the character of the A. A. U.'s Western representatives, whose animus was perfectly apparent. Maybury and Cochems were members of the Chicago A. A., that was recruiting a team throughout the Middle West to use against the New York club, and wanted the services of these two men. Such recruiting has increased greatly in recent years, to the notable harm of track athletics, and the A. A. U., instead of restraining the evil within legitimate bounds, has rather, through its Western representatives—men with small conception of amateur sport—encouraged it. This evidence of vicious mismanagement, and the presumption of the A. A. U. in attempting to direct the course of college sport not only by its attitude last summer, but by its attempt this autumn to usurp control of football, has drawn upon itself the contempt of Middle-Western colleges. Chicago already has a rule forbidding their athletes competing for clubs during the years they are in college. Michigan will probably adopt a like rule, aimed at the A. A. U., and forbidding its athletes wearing any but university colors during summer or college term. Unless Western colleges desire their best athletes contaminated by free board, etc., at the Chicago A. A. during the summer, they must in self-defence take such measures.

MIDDLE-WESTERN AMATEUR STATUS has been steadily improving in the last three years.

That it is not yet entirely satisfactory as is to be somewhat expected. At Wisconsin there appears to be evidence of a pretty thorough regeneration and a return to the vigorous policy which for a time characterized that institution's part in the move for reform. Meanwhile there are hints that the old evil is creeping into one or two other institutions. Faculties cannot afford to be lax for a moment so long as, in the unsettled condition now to be found in the Middle West, undergraduate and some graduate sentiment still makes for victory first and cleanliness afterwards. The flurry at Michigan over the Stuart case (in which a student sneaked in only for football and was sneaked out again) is evidence of this. At Michigan, however, the undergraduate sentiment is really more wholesome than ever before. The same can be said of Chicago, Illinois, and Northwestern universities. There are hints and rumors of football-players at these colleges whose standing is at least suspicious. So far no definite proofs are submitted; but the rumors urge upon faculties of those and all colleges the necessity of vigilance that shall be more unremitting than ever. Minnesota and Purdue have rather dropped out of the prominence they obtained through their strong football teams. Beloit and Notre Dame have taken their places temporarily, but it cannot be said the ethical condition at either of these institutions, which are not subscribers to the Western faculty rules, has improved, as was hoped it might. It is time for somebody on the faculties of these two active colleges to take hold of things.

I am glad to note that the alumni football game appears to have become a fixture. Middle-Western college sport needs nothing more than frequent contact with its alumni. Michigan started the game last autumn, and

AT THE NATIONAL HORSE SHOW—EXAMINING THE HORSES DURING THE EARLY MORNING HOURS.—DRAWN BY MAX F. KLEPPER.—[SEE PAGE 1165.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A. R. T. HILLEBRAND, Princeton's Captain and Tackle.

this year Illinois, Purdue, Wisconsin, and some of the smaller colleges have followed her example. The game at Ann Arbor this year attracted special excursions from Detroit and about 1000 alumni from different sections. This is a very large turning out for a Middle West college.

THE Harvard-Brown game (17–6) was notable chiefly for the excellent showing Brown made against her much stronger opponent. It also suggested the need of Cochrane's work being very much improved before the Yale game, or of his giving way to Farley. Brown's touchdown was made because Cochrane's punt was blocked; and neither Cochrane nor any other of the Harvard eleven was spry enough to catch Washburn before he had crossed Harvard's goal-line. No one expected Harvard to reveal her best game against Brown, but it was surprising there should be such a departure from the very strong defence shown against Pennsylvania. It was surprising, too, that, after the display of tackling at Cambridge, Brown's half-backs should have been permitted to make such gains. Richardson, in particular, seemed able to get his distance whenever he wished, not to mention a thirty-yard run around the end, and a fifty-five-yard run from scrimmage.

In the first half, Brown carried the ball from the centre of the field, without losing it, straight down the field to within six inches of Harvard's goal-line, where she lost it by a very close decision of the referee. In the series of plays by which Brown carried the ball so close to scoring, the Harvard line has not had a more continuous battering this season. Brown's backs, Washburn and Richardson, together with Murphy and Hapgood, proving irresistible in their formations.

HARVARD BEGAN THE GAME at a very lively pace, and had Brown on her twenty-five-yard line in short order.

PRINCETON FORMATION, ON THE BALL BEING SENT BACK FOR A KICK.

Then Harvard gained the ball on a fumble, and immediately afterwards lost it in the same way. A forty-five-yard run by Sawin put the ball on Brown's fifteen-yard line, and a few plays thereafter served to carry it over for a touchdown. It was immediately after this that Brown made her brace which came so near to scoring. Harvard's next score was gained in a manner similar to the first—a long run by Sawin followed by rushing the ball over. Toward the end of the first half, Brown made her touch-down, and very shortly after, Cochrane's attempt to drop a goal from the thirty-five-yard line was blocked, the half ending with the score 11–6 in Harvard's favor.

Harvard's defence stiffened considerably in the second half, although Richardson was able to make a couple of long runs; and Brown showed poor judgment in trying a drop-kick for goal when there was such a chance for a touch-down in rushing.

Harvard's next, and last, touch-down was the result of line-plunging, which carried the ball from her own forty-five-yard line straight across to Brown's goal.

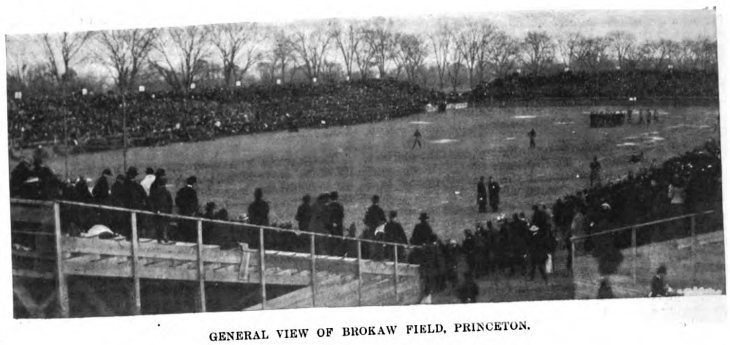
The game did not reflect creditably on Harvard, the absence of interference for her runners and the general slowness of the men in getting into the play being features one hardly expects to see emphasized by a 'varsity eleven one week before its final great game. The showing of Brown's eleven was exceedingly creditable. It handled the ball cleanly and seemed to understand the business of the play thoroughly.

PENNSYLVANIA'S GAME AGAINST CARLISLE (35–5) was just one of that kind which has done so much to create overwhelming confidence in the invariable efficiency of the guards-back play. It was one of those games in which the Pennsylvania team overshadowed its opponents sufficiently to have at no moment, in either half, its confidence shaken. There was no time when the famous play was being broken, nor was there evidence at any time of her opponents being sufficiently expert in the finesse of football to take advantage of Pennsylvania's fumbles. No play has ever been developed which, under such circumstances, produces results so satisfactory. I think I have said before, that when the opposing team is only slightly inferior, the guards-back formation is a startlingly powerful play. The reason the guards-back play failed to work against Harvard was because Harvard was stout enough to stand the terrific hammering without losing any of her own effective strength. Carlisle lacked that strength. The Pennsylvania team certainly played a dashing accumulative game against Carlisle, and let it be understood that it would have shown to equal advantage against Harvard under like conditions of opponents' inferiority.

From first to last of the game against the Indians, Pennsylvania depended almost entirely on the guards-back play. There was practically no other style attempted. Perhaps the surprise of the game was the manner in which the Indians gained through the Pennsylvania line, Metoxen, Wheelock, and Pierce seeming able to make their distance with unexpected frequency. As against Chicago, Pennsylvania's large score was due more largely to her physical than to her football superiority. Had the Indians not been so overmatched in that particular, the disparity in scores would have been less.

THIS IS BY NO MEANS TO BELITTLE Pennsylvania's work as a team, which was excellent, but merely to emphasize the comment I have already made concerning the need of physical superiority for the success of the guards-back play. Hare, as usual, was Pennsylvania's chief ground-gainer; and football has seen very few such line-bucking guards as this one of Pennsylvania. McCracken was Pennsylvania's other line-bucker of note. The most sensational features of the game were the two runs by Outland, Pennsylvania's half-back. His first was made from a kick-off. After a difficult catch on Pennsylvania's five-yard line, he carried the ball through the entire Indian team — ninety yards — to Carlisle's twenty-yard line. The other was made on a caught try for field-goal by Wheelock. Instead of touching the ball down and bringing it out for the kick-off, Outland again went through the Carlisle team, running ninety-five yards before finally tackled by Seneca. They were beautiful runs, and valuable ones to Pennsylvania, as each resulted in a touch-down. But they were exceptional opportunities that probably would not have been offered by a team thoroughly drilled in the game. The fact of their accomplishment illustrates the weakness of the Indians' team—viz., its apparent difficulty in mastering the open-field game, and in taking quick action and the proper kind when the unusual occurs. This simply means, however, that it has not been playing football long enough to know the game thoroughly. Such knowledge comes only with long experience.

Another instance of the Indians' inexperience was the gain Pennsylvania made on the quarter-back kick. In these days of football, a quarter-back kick should never be a gaining play against a first-class team; when it is, somebody is not attending to his business properly. The Indians' only goal was kicked by Wheelock from placement.



THE PENNSYLVANIA-CORNELL Thanksgiving-day game is bound to be intensely interesting. I am quite curious to see how Cornell winds up, after her brilliant start at the beginning and her slump in the middle of the season.

The team sought preliminary practice at Richfield Springs this year, and because of it its scores in first games were considerably larger than usual. But extra and harmful training had the same effect on Cornell as it has had before on the University of Pennsylvania—viz., the men reached their top form too early in the season. Cornell has probably never played better than against Carlisle, whom she defeated (23–6) October 8. It was, too, the first big game of the Indians, and their condition seemed the best shown this season. The play was very hard, and while no Cornell man left the game, several who had stood the brunt of work were hurt in practice a week later, and the team, as a whole, has not yet recovered the form displayed in October.

It looks as though she would be in tiptop shape on Thanksgiving day, and if so, it is my opinion the contest will be the closest Pennsylvania and Cornell have yet had. If Cornell does reach such form, her game will be a telling one against Pennsylvania's single reliance. Cornell at best is very aggressive.

OF THE CORNELL INDIVIDUALS, in the line, Reed (l. g.) is by all odds the strongest man on the team. He gave evidence last year of being one of the best of the season's guards, and had he not been hurt shortly after the Indian game this year, the results of Cornell's subsequent games would unquestionably have been different. Not only has his absence been felt in the line, but back of it, since Whiting's game owes much of its brilliancy to the assistance given by Reed by his interference and general co-operation.

This is not to detract from Whiting's work; he is a fast runner, a good dodger, and uses his head all the time while he has the ball; but it is literally true that his brilliant runs have by no means been so frequent during Reed's absence from the line.

GENERAL VIEW OF BROKAW FIELD, PRINCETON.

Alexander may play left tackle or he may go into the back field; that is not yet decided. In either position he ought to be a ground-gainer. He is 6 ft. 3 in., and weighs about 180 lbs., and can run 100 yards in a little over ten seconds. Formerly he played at tackle, but was changed into the back field, where first-class material appeared to be scarce. Now, however, the team has Perkins and Starbuck, and very likely he will be of more service at tackle. Last year he was hurt early in the season, so this is practically his first year. If he plays tackle, it will make the left side of the line strong.

Lueder (r. g.) and Sweetland (r. t.) are both old players; each is big and strong and knows the game pretty thoroughly; but neither is sufficiently aggressive, and each too much considers his individual efforts to fit into team-play successfully. It would be well for Cornell if she could replace these two men with two others, newer to the game, perhaps, but with more ambition and more adaptability to team-work.

Sweetland has the very valuable trait of keeping his eye always on the ball; but all his energy goes in this direction, at the expense of his general play. He seems always to be watching for a chance to pick up the ball and run for a touch-down.

CALDWELL, AT CENTRE, IS TOO SLOW. He weighs nearly two hundred pounds, and is strong proportionately, but not alive to the possibilities of his position. He passes the ball pretty well. In general play he is not so good as Dorner, whose only failing is lack of weight.

Cornell's ends are not up to the standard. Hogan appears to be showing the best of the lot; but it is uncertain who will fill right end, now that Cross is out of it. Deval will probably play at left.

(Continued on page 1166.)

L. T. PALMER,
Princeton's Right End.

ARTHUR POE,
Princeton's Left End.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE WEST INDIES.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

JAMAICA AS A TOURIST'S RESORT.

AN enterprise that perhaps as much as any other would alter for the better social economic conditions of life in Jamaica would be the extension to the island of that system of tourist trips which has done so much for places of interest in the States and Canada. Think what it has done for the White Mountains and for the Adirondacks; how it has encouraged the purchase of land and settlement at the pleasure-resorts on the Lakes, and travel to Florida and the Southern bays! Now that Cuba has been added to the list of "places that must be seen"—the battle-fields on the Santiago coast are already on the extended itinerary of the winter tourist, and as soon as the Peace Commissioners shall give the word, the entrepreneur is prepared to let loose upon the northern coast—upon Havana and Matanzas—an eager host of sight-seers. In anticipation of these prolongations of travel, far-seeing men have already taken the Bahama Islands in hand, shrewdly surmising that the visitors will prefer returning home by a different route from that by which they sallied abroad. At present, therefore, the round trip stands Florida, Cuba, Puerto Rico, Bahamas, and a sufficiently fascinating one it is. But add Jamaica to it, and how the vista of possibilities opens out. Every traveller who has been to Jamaica, and committed his impressions to print, has left on record his opinion that this island is the most beautiful spot upon the earth. For myself—and I have traversed as much of the earth's surface as probably any man—I place New Zealand first; but comparing Jamaica only with what it should perhaps be fairly compared with—the tropics, the East Indies, and South America—I give this island the palm for not only beauty, but for variety of charm and accessibility. Most excellent roads traverse the island in all directions, and the visitor, with the utmost comfort, can pass in his carriage from one point of interest to another in complete security and ease. But for tourist traffic upon a scale large enough materially to benefit the island one must presuppose a system of hotel accommodation of proportionate dimensions. At present Jamaica does not possess these. There are hotels, of course—and very delightful stopping-places they are, being located in every case on a beautiful site, and convenient to spots of special interest—but they are not all large enough for the number of tourists that may reasonably be expected, so that the first direction in which enterprise must expand is the enlargement of the present hostelries and the erection of two more, one at Port Antonio and the other at Montego Bay. This once accomplished, the influx of tourists could be received from Cuba at Port Antonio, a wondrously beautiful spot on the north coast, be forwarded thence by road or rail across the island to Kingston on the southern shore, and, radiating from there, be distributed in parties over the island. After the tour they would muster again either at Port Antonio or Kingston, and thence sail to Puerto Rico, and, taking the Bahamas en route, return to the States.

On the first approach to Port Antonio the scene is almost exciting in its loveliness. When the sun was setting yesterday there was in sight behind us only the repellent outlines of Cuba, its grim and treacherous cliffs terraced in alternate light and shade, its slopes fleeced with harsh, short scrub, and along the water-line the steep sea-wall of coral that belts the island on the south, pitted with black caverns, in and out of which the sea perpetually plunges, gnawing at the rock and grumbling. When the sun rises next morning, what a fairy change of scene! A great green island stands up in front of us, its lofty summits wonderful with pale blue mist, and as we glide towards it the verdure separates itself into many tints, painting the scene in all shades of green, while the shadows and lights of the breaking day further serve to dapple in undertones of color the undulations of the verdant land. For now the surface of the island, as the dawn grows brighter, begins to break up into hill and vale, to marshal in due order its lower heights and its upper, to reveal its plains and plateaus. But where is the harbor? We approach nearer, yet the coast-line shows no break, no opening in the solid mountain of vegetation. We are close enough now to distinguish the pale breadths of sugar-cane on the slopes, the bright green patches of bananas on the lowland flats, the darker groves of palm that crowd down to the very edge of the sea. Straight for these our pilot seems to be steering us, for, though within a few hundred yards of the shore, there is no sign of a port or of life. But the engines are slowing down, the ship is swinging, and, lo! an island that we had thought was the foreshore of the mainland seems to be turning back as if on its hinges; thus gradually opens a waterway very, very narrow, but sufficient; and gliding into this rift of still blue water, we find ourselves on a sudden in an incomparably beautiful harbor—the bay of Port Antonio. It is impossible that any one having beheld it could ever forget the first sight of this wonderful scene; the magical suddenness of the revelation of the entrance, the unexpected apparition of a spacious and beautiful harbor where all had seemed to be solid land, are never to be forgotten. Along the shore lies the little town, snugly settled at the foot of the hills, which, densely covered with valuable crops of fruit, slope backwards from the sea and rise, rampart behind rampart, up to the blue-capped heights of the loftier ranges.

PHIL. ROBINSON.

PUERTO RICO.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

THE MILITARY ROAD.

THE finest road in the Western hemisphere is to be found in the island of Puerto Rico; in fact, it is a road equalling any in the world, with the exception of some of the marvellous roadways across the Swiss Alps.

It was built by the Spanish government, at an approximate cost of four million dollars, for military purposes solely, and traverses the island from side to side diagonally across its very heart for one hundred and thirty-three kilometres (over eighty miles).

This magnificent highway was commenced in 1880, under General Sanz's military régime in Puerto Rico, and completed eight years afterwards by General Pulido Gomez. Thousands of workmen, called peons, worked year after year at a daily wage of fifty cents (Spanish), under the direction of Spanish engineers, and kept from open mutiny by a strong guard of soldiers. While the construction of the thoroughfare contemplated no philanthropic purpose, and was an expensive gift to the inhabitants, it will be in the future of incalculable commercial value, for it gives to the country the only road within the confines of the island which is really passable at all seasons of the year.

It is macadamized from end to end with finely broken calcareous rock, which cements itself into an almost solid floor. It has good bridges over the numerous fast-flowing streams, with the exception of four small rivers just north of Ponce, and the gradients are as low as it is possible to make them without extreme tortuousness of the highway. Every few kilometres are found substantial single storied houses with red roofs, called "camineros," in which the road-tenders lived, whose duty it was to keep the road up to the high standard originally set by its promoters.

There are other roads in Puerto Rico, all

(Continued on page 1164.)

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa.—[Adv.]

A VALUABLE BOOK.

"INFANT HEALTH," sent out by the N. Y. Condensed Milk Co., New York, Proprietors of the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk. It is a valuable book, that should be in every home.—[Adv.]

THE LATEST PARISIAN NOVELTY.

AN exquisiteness, a little marvel just created and of which our mundanes will be passionately fond—the Flower Sachet. Is it not a pretty idea?—roses, violets, pinks, presented in their natural shape, exhaling the sweetest natural and lasting scent, forming the most delicate decoration for stone and crystal ware, filling wardrobes and apartments with their sweet breath, scenting everything around them with their permeating perfume, and so advantageously replacing the former sachets, whose scent becomes insipid and wears out. The Flower Sachet is a marvel, I tell you; it is signed "ORIZA."—[Adv.]

SUPERIOR to Vaseline and Cucumbers, Crème Simon, marvellous for the complexion and light cutaneous affections; it whitens, perfumes, fortifies the skin. J. SIMON, 13 Rue Grange Batelière, Paris; Druggists, Perfumers, Fancy-goods stores.—[Adv.]

IF health be wealth, they are "healthy, wealthy, and wise" who use Abbott's, The Original Angostura Bitters.—[Adv.]

LADIES are greatly benefited by the use of the tonic DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS.—[Adv.]

USE BROWN'S Camphorated Saponaceous DENTIFRICE for the TEETH. 25 cents a jar.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

One Reason that so many men are now smoking

Van Bibber Little Cigars

is, that they are the most satisfactory short smoke for all times and all places. For this reason they are economical and appeal to every smoker's common sense—through his pocket!

They are little cigars:

made with all the expert care and of the very highest grade of imported whole leaf tobacco that is used for the most expensive cigars.

Try one bundle of 10

You will find many uses for them when you know them. At all dealers—or trial package of 10 will be sent in souvenir pocket pouch on receipt of 25 cents in stamps.

H. ELLIS & Co., Baltimore, Md.

The American Tobacco Co., Successor

JUST FUN to shave with

Williams' Shaving Soaps.

The great, creamy lather—the softening action upon the beard—the delightfully soothed, refreshed feelings—make a man look forward to his "morning shave" with genuine pleasure.

Williams' Shaving Soaps are sold everywhere, but sent by mail if your dealer does not supply you.

Williams' Shaving Stick, 25 cents. Luxury Shaving Tablet, 25 cents.
Genuine Yankee Shaving Soap, 10 cents. Swiss Violet Shaving Cream, 50 cents.
Williams' Shaving Soap (Barbers') 6 round cakes, 1 lb., 40 cts. Exquisite also for toilet.
Williams' Glycerated Tar Soap, 15 cents.

THE J. B. WILLIAMS CO., Glastonbury, Conn.
LONDON, 64 Great Russell St., W. C. SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA, 161 Clarence Street.

An Ounce of Prevention

What is better than a SMITH & WESSON—the revolver that is never out of order? All calibers.

Write for descriptive catalogue.

SMITH & WESSON,
15 Stockbridge St., Springfield, Mass.

BOKER'S BITTERS

The oldest and best Specific against dyspepsia; an appetizer and a promoter of digestion.

Ask your Grocer, Liquor Dealer, or Druggist.

PATENT secured or money all returned. Search free. Collamer & Co., 1036 F St., Wash., D. C.

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,

BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

THE CELEBRATED

SOHMER

Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.

Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade. Our name spells—

S—O—H—M—E—R

New York Warerooms — SOHMER BUILDING Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google uvres, e vast ry, the charm s along nces of it come were ring to lock at rats of e under o miles burban ith now nestled pleasing rushed, solitary igh and bumped ub high.

ss these tened by drivers, the road

a short ls, which ransverse which is n toward es in the guns, and west, and ity of San ceedingly

s of engi-over it.
to Coamo, essions of ing to us.
ant leaves air waved on ruins of h soldiers.
us around red forests il, but the after bend escription.
tle valleys,

cut by the mountain streams and walled by steep ridges, covered to their very crests with the green of growing things, lay partially veiled in darkness, or lightly masked by the white, diaphanous clouds of vapor which seemed gently to caress each blade of green as they slowly floated upward toward the now sunlit and tinted peaks above.

We climbed the steep ascents of the backbone of the mountain just a few miles from Aybonito. The road doubled and twisted on itself in half a dozen places until it looked like a gigantic snake winding away in the distance. A great wall had been built at one point where the road scaled the steep side of a cone-topped mountain, and the advance carriage could be seen from below laboring onward a hundred feet above us. In the wall embrasures gaped empty where recently the Spanish guns swept the road below. It was this stretch of road that the Spanish soldiers commanded from an impregnable position on the mountains. It would have proved a fearful trap had our men marched into it, since from the trenches which crowned the high hills the artillery and small-arms could have annihilated an army of 10,000 men as easily as the 3000 men who were preparing to advance when the messenger arrived with the news of peace. On the side toward the enemy was a steep and precipitous mountain which fell into a narrow valley below; on the other, the rock rose bare and forbidding for fifty feet, and then, green-covered, at an angle of forty-five degrees for two hundred feet more. For over a mile extended this bare road, from which there would have been no escape except a retreat along its way, and the Spanish fire could have raked it with shrapnel and shell at perfectly known ranges. Our military men who have seen this deadly and picturesque position agree that it would have involved great loss of life, if not utter rout, if the assault had been ordered.

As the carriages passed over the highest point of the road, some seventeen hundred feet above the sea-level, a double vista revealed itself, that already viewed in the rear, and a new one to the front, even more impressive in its varied beauties of nature than the one behind us.

Down the mountain we rushed toward Aybonito for three miles. Aybonito came into view as a dream of fairy-land, with castles floating in the clouds. Unfortunately, all its beauty lay in the artistic touch of nature. In reality it was a dirty, squalid little town, one of the few where no evidence of progress is observable.

Between Aybonito and Cayey we began to notice the coffee-bushes, covered with berries turning red, and in the early morning troops of women and children trudged by us, swinging closely woven baskets in which they gather the coffee-beans. The coffee-plantations lie under the shade of forests, which are necessary to protect them from the fierce heat of the noonday sun, and the uninitiated would never dream that he was passing anything more than a jungle-thick virgin forest. On every mountain-side clearings, almost hanging in the air, dot the landscape and tell a story of renewed vigor in the native breast, and the planting of his little crop of sweet-potatoes, plantains, beans, and bananas. Away down in the valleys, lining the banks of the mountain streams, are the sugar-cane fields, and on the larger plantations the high chimneys of the sugar-boiling houses rise far above the plain. It is a scene of quiet, indolent life in which man works one hour and nature the rest of the day.

Cayey is the great tobacco centre and the place of manufacture of the finest cigars on the island. It is also a hotbed of Spanish sympathizers, who make cigars for a living, and have worked under the patronage of the Spanish government.

Between Cayey and Caguas we saw stretches of waving sugar-cane, interspersed with small fields of corn. No great tobacco-fields were seen, and it is said that the best tobacco is raised on the hill-sides towards the east and away from the main road. For miles along this section the road is lined with the beautiful tree-fern, whose delicately traced fronds look like filigree-work, and here and there patches of high, slender bamboo wave their heads to and fro.

Oranges, limes, bananas, alligator-pears, nisperos, and gourd-trees fringe the road at every step, and their heavy burden of ripening fruit is a constant source of surprise and delight to the novice in tropical climes. It is a veritable Garden of Eden, where one has only to ask and receive, and the tall, stately cocoanut and royal-palm trees are scattered amid all this luxuriance, suggesting one's childhood ideal of Paradise.

A second smaller mountain range is passed over between Caguas and Rio Piedras, though the topography is less rough in character than that previously traversed, and the valleys have widened out into broad level fields, filled with tasselling sugar-cane, which in January will be taken to some of the dozens of tile-roofed sugar-houses now visible everywhere.

Rio Piedras is the suburban town of San Juan, and a narrow-gauge railroad connects it with the capital.

Little road-houses, typically Southern, are found every few miles along the road-side from Caguas to San Juan. Each one is a little store, with the counter opening on the road; and the drivers of the heavy-yoked and lumbering oxen stop often to drink a cup of café negro, or nibble some dulce cake.

As we approached San Juan fierce-looking walls along the road-side guarded the way to the city's entrance, and the great forts of San Cristóbal and Morro showed their heads above the rest of the city.

The Spanish Guardia Civil, always courteous, even in defeat, saluted us as we passed opposite the flashing lights which filtered out of the store doors.

This ride should be taken by every American who visits the island. As a cycling trip it is unexcelled; as a coaching trip, with fine animals, it would be superb; and even with poor, badly treated little ponies, driven by men with no feeling for animal suffering, it is a trip always to be remembered.

WILLIAM DINWIDDIE.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pepsalt...

is the best of table salt, into every grain of which is incorporated digestive substances natural to the stomach. Fill your salt-cellar with Pepsalt and use it in place of salt at your meals. If you have indigestion your stomach does not supply the necessary amount of the dissolving or digestive juices. Pepsalt taken in place of salt at your meals makes good this deficiency, as you take with every mouthful of your food a similar substance to that which is required and at the right time, and your indigestion is a thing of the past. Send for sample in salt-shaker bottle and try it.

Price 25 cents, postpaid.

THE VAUPEL SAMARITAN CO., 45 Sheriff St., Cleveland, Ohio.

Indigestion Has No Terrors For Him
That salt-shaker is filled with Pepsalt

PEPSALT CURES AND PREVENTS INDIGESTION

MR. WILLIAM D. HOWELL
America's most distinguish man of letters, will contribute short humorous story, entitled "T Watermelon Patch," to the first the five December issues of ...

The YOUTH'S COMPANION

THE remaining four numbers will contain Hon. Thomas B. Reed's article on " gressional Oratory"; the Marquis of Lo account of "How the Queen Spends C mas"; Mme. Lillian Nordica's suggestive p
"Incidents in a Singer's Life"; and a sket wanderings in the South of Europe, en
"Troublesome Travel in Italy," by I. Zang

A full description of the principal fe already engaged for the 1899 volume is con in the beautiful illustrated announcement with sample copies of the paper free address.

Our December Offer.

As a special inducement to subscribe no
Companion makes the following offer:

NEW SUBSCRIBERS who send $1.75 cutting out and enclosing this slip receive:
FREE - The remaining issues of 18 cluding the beautiful Double H Numbers.
FREE - The COMPANION CALE for 1899 - the most beautiful calen the century.
AND THE COMPANION, for fif weeks, a full year, to January 1, 1
Library in itself. LM178

THE YOUTH'S COMPANI
BOSTON, MASS.

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak.

Holidays are Kodak Days

Catalogues free at the dealers or by mail.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

E INESTIMABLE BLESSING OF SIGHT. NOTHING
ORE USEFUL OR SUITABLE FOR A PRESENT.

THE IDEAL SIGHT RESTORER

AVOID HEADACHE OR SURGICAL OPERATION. READ "ILLUSTRATED TREATISE ON THE EYE. IMPAIRED VISION, WEAK, WATERY, SORE OR INFLAMED EYES, ASTIGMA-SM, PRESBYOPIA, MYOPIA, CATARACT, AND THE ORST DISORDERS OF THE EYE." MAILED FREE.
E IDEAL COMPANY, 239 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Harper's Catalogue

oroughly revised and classified, will e sent by mail to any address on eceipt of ten cents.

MAGIC LANTERNS WANTED AND FOR SALE OR EXCHANGE. HARBACH & CO. 809 Filbert St. Phila. Pa.

SO SIMPLE A CHILD CAN USE THEM.

28 Styles from $5.00 to $100.00
All Cameras Sold under a Positive Guarantee
Send 2c. stamp for Catalogue. SUNART PHOTO CO. 92 Aqueduct St., Rochester, N.Y.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE FOURTEENTH ANNUAL HORSE SHOW OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

BY CASPAR WHITNEY.

IT is one of those little surprises of life—the querulous call them ironies—that this year, when the vulgar parade outside the ring in the Garden was less violent than usual, the exhibit inside the ring should be the finest in the history of the Association. And my only excuse for the comment is the fact that in the early days of the Association the "parade" outside the ring gave the show its first firm lease of life, and has been perhaps its greatest money-making feature.

It is one of the weaknesses of human nature to enjoy, and oftentimes to court, admiration of its possessions, whether they be adornments of the mind or of the body. It is equally human to give generously of the admiration sought. The annual horse show has provided unrivalled opportunities for the indulgence of both failings.

It was entirely to be expected that fashion, both by subscription and by attendance, should stamp the show with its unqualified approval. And as every second mortal is at heart a snob, it was quite as expected that more people should be attracted by the display in the boxes and on the walk around the ring than by the horses. Therefore the projectors of the Association made the most of the occasion. The occupants of the boxes were catalogued, so to say, and diagrams published, that the curious in the gaping, staring multitude that thronged the walk might distinguish one member from another of the mystic "400." There is no denying that the crowd secured its money's worth.

As each show has come and gone, the same programme has been provided and the same performance repeated; newspaper reporters have exploited the social features, and a popular impression has been created, no doubt, that the annual fixture in Madison Square Garden was in reality an exhibition of gowns and bonnets, with a side show of horses. Meantime those who sought the stalls knew better. This year some one predicted that "fashion" would withdraw its patronage from the Garden, to the irremediable damage of the show's prosperity; and the prophecy, widely circulated because the sale of boxes failed to realize the abnormal figures of other years, eventuated most happily. Not in its fulfilment, but rather in its effect upon the character of the attendance, for it served to keep at home a percentage of the gaping multitude, and made room for those others whom the magnificent quality of the horses attracted. By all means let us have an annual prophet attached to the impedimenta of the horse show.

What really did happen was the final suspension of that altogether obnoxious diagram, which, like the catalogue with its "names and numbers of all the horses," substantially revealed the names and seat numbers of the socially prominent New-Yorkers, and the retirement from boxes to seats less conspicuous, in the Garden, of a great many of those who have sustained the ill-bred stares and discussions of the passing throng throughout so many horse-show weeks. Contrary to viewing this as a sign of approaching disaster, I should be inclined to regard it as indicative of more abiding interest in the motives of the exhibition. At all events, it greatly pleases sports men and women that there is the evidence of more serious concern in the show. After all, perhaps it is as well there was something to attract the "gaping multitude"; a certain percentage is sure to carry away some little knowledge of how a trap looks properly turned out.

"I HAVE HALF A DOZEN ENTRIES."

Crowds will seek out the Garden as sure as the annual show opens its gates; the majority will attach themselves to the human merry-go-round which revolves about the judging-ring, but more each year will seek a place at the rails, or climb into the gallery for a less obstructed view of the horses. The moments I enjoyed most at the London shows were those spent among the spectators at the ring-side, noting their intelligent interest in the horses and listening to their pertinent and quaint comment. A corresponding class of onlookers at our New York ring-side is so little in evidence as to make no impression. We see more of it at the other horse shows throughout America, and especially at those in the smaller cities. But the average man in an amusement-seeking American crowd has neither the knowledge of nor the regard for the horse that the man of the average English crowd entertains. Nowhere is the dissimilar disposition towards horses exhibited more clearly than at the race-track: if you mix in the crowd about the paddocks in England you will find it discussing the horses; around American paddocks the talk turns to odds for or against. So the more the crowd comes to Madison Square, the better we shall be pleased.

In the light of what has been accomplished in the last dozen years for the betterment of the horse and diffusion of knowledge concerning him, there is no limiting what may be achieved in similar directions during the coming dozen. After feasting on the equine display at the Garden last week, it is hard to realize that the magnificent quality of the horses and the perfect appointment of the harness classes generally have been acquired during even the last eight years. The average best of '90 would in all probability get nothing better than the gate in '98. I distinctly remember the incongruities of livery, the confusion over the equipment respectively of Park and Road fours, the agitation incident to turning out a tandem, the indistinction concerning classes, and the vague ideas regarding form. A dozen years ago there were not more than a dozen men showing who, unaided, could turn out a perfectly appointed equipage. And the same comment applies to the average skill of driving in those days. It was formerly really a rare treat to see a four handled properly in the ring or out of it, while the difficulties into which the average tandem-driver got himself six or eight years ago were complex and frequent.

HORSE-LOVERS.

After a period of characteristic American enterprise, and with equally characteristic intolerance of mediocrity, the week in '98 at the Madison Square Garden reveals horses of a quality as high as any for like purpose in the world, appointments as perfect, and half a dozen, where formerly there was one, amateur whips of finished skill. Neither in the shows in London nor in Paris (certainly not in Berlin, where they are just beginning to know what first-class appointments mean) have I seen fours, or tandems, or road-wagons, or horses and traps, in any of the harness classes turned out on an average of excellence so high. The harness horses over there do not have the style and action of our trotter-bred carriage-horse, nor, with few exceptions, do Englishmen or Frenchmen spend as much money in appointments. At the same time, in my judgment, a better taste is shown in the plainer harness used in England. I shall always remember my satisfaction in viewing the simplicity of the harness on the horses of the Princess of Wales's brougham, which drove into a building where the spring hunter show was being held. It was totally without jangling chains or buckles, or the numerous crested flaps one sees so often hung on at various vantage-points most likely to catch the passing eye.

And the major part of this improvement has been brought about by the very element which unthinking people are prone to ridicule. It matters not whether the impelling force has come from genuine interest in horse-flesh or from the mere fulfilment of one's destiny in the social world, the fact remains that to the money and to the taste and the enterprise of these men we are indebted for the present high standard of the American harness horse. Let us, moreover, not forget the men who have guided this development by their annual judgment in the ring. The Coaching Club was the first, I think, to lend a helping hand to the movement making for better form, and members of that club have ever since been closely identified with its progression. It is not too great a tribute to the judges—usually the same from year to year—of the harness classes to say that their consistent and impartial judgment is largely responsible for the handsome results.

This is the more satisfactory when we realize that New York sets the standard in these classes for the shows which, one after another, and successful almost without variation, have become annual institutions in Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, and at San Francisco, St. Louis, Kansas City, Detroit, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Buffalo, not to mention the innumerable country fairs where horse, and a thoroughly good type, is the chief object of interest, even though he be turned out with less style. It is eminently fitting, therefore, that the national character of the New York show should be recognized throughout the land, and more carefully nourished at home. It has seemed to me the directors of the Association have fallen short of requirements in this direction at times, and again have overlooked the fact that it is the breeders whose best interests ought never to be neglected.

There were many pleasing features in this year's show, chief of which was the evidence of an effort to separate the saddle from the harness classes. But there is much left to do yet. That the Association should permit of any mixing of these two classes is incomprehensible. If it were a country fair or a small city show, I could understand the hesitation to make unequivocal rules—but in the New York—the national show—and at this stage of our improvement, the appearance of the same horse in both harness and saddle classes is shocking. If the gentlemen who own these serviceable hacks must be appeased, why not provide a special class in which the entries shall perform under the saddle and immediately thereafter before a cart, the award to made on their work in both.

This all-round animal is most valued in the family whose purse is not long enough to satisfy the several ambitions of the various members of the household—but that is no type for the National Association to put forward. Occasionally—so seldom as to leave scarcely an impression—we see a horse that is equally good under the saddle and in harness, but never have I seen one that was an ideal of both types. It is absurd to allow the confounding of the two at a show which pretends to establish standards. The gaits are so entirely different—the high knee and hock action of the harness animal being undesirable in the saddle-horse. Of course, so long as the Association directors, with whom the remedy rests, for the judges are powerless, fail to make definite ruling on the subject, so long will there be men to enter their horses in as many different classes as inclination prompts and the prize invites.

The same is true of the hunter and saddle classes, though to a minor degree. There is less difference between a hunter and a saddle type than between the latter and a harness type, but there is a distinction, and a most decided one.

HER FIRST HORSE SHOW.

Altogether too decided to have it slighted in such fashion by a National Horse Show Association whose direction is so excellent in some quarters, it seems a pity it should be so slovenly in others. They do not make the mistake in England of confusing the hunter and saddle types. Why do we, who make so much pretence? At least one much-needed amendment has been made in the hunter classes by the provision that "no horse having taken a first prize in the hunter or jumping classes at any of the Association's previous shows can be entered in the hunter classes, but it may compete in the Corinthian, jumping, and champion classes."

A rule of similar purport might prove of value in all the classes of the show. If winners of one year were barred from the open classes of the succeeding year, and confined to a championship class, it would tend to encourage entries in the open events and heighten interest

JUST FROM DINNER.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

in the finals. But repeated winners were in no other instance the pressing question they were in the conduct of the hunter classes. Another excellent improvement in the conduct of the hunter classes is holding in the daytime trials for the jumping contest of the night. By so doing the sport of the jumping is distributed over two periods, to the satisfaction of those who enjoy this feature of the week, and at the same time it weeds out the indifferent and assures a smooth, undelayed performance in the finals.

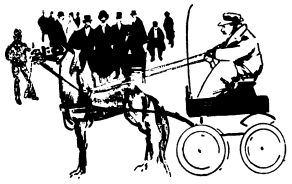
But the most impressive feature of the week, and I have no doubt the most pleasing one to all, with a very few exceptions, was the brilliant triumph of the American standard-bred trotter type in the harness classes. When the hackney was imported, several years ago, in considerable numbers, and at lavish individual and aggregate expense, much was predicted, by those directly interested, of the influence for the better the type was destined to have upon our carriage-horse. We waited through the first two or three years of the experimental stage expectantly and patiently, but nothing resulted to fulfil the confidently repeated promises. We are still waiting for any substantial evidence to justify the claims advanced for this type five years ago.

The fact is that, so far as appreciable influence on our carriage-horse is concerned, the hackney appears to have been an emphatic disappointment, if not a failure. Such, at least, is the conclusion, judged by his appearance at the various horse shows. As good blood has been imported as England breeds, and money distributed with unstinted hand, but our only view of its accomplishment has been an annual stately parade of dams and foals, or the ring-trotting of a sire with yelling groom hanging on to his head-stall line, and rival claques of heelers raising offensive chorus at each turn of the stable end of the show ring. Very seldom have we seen a hackney in harness, and on no occasion had he any claims to distinction. In the New York show the hackney, half or full bred, has rarely remained with the best in the harness classes, and then to be beaten by the standard-bred trotter type. Last year Mr. Widener, who took up hackneys a few years ago and spent a great deal of money in their development, sought a Maine-bred horse in Von Harbinger, and won the Waldorf-Astoria Challenge Cup. If there was a hackney this year in the harness classes—nobody knew it.

It was unquestionably a week of triumph for the trotter-bred animal and for the harness classes, which more and more each year have been attaining predominance. How richly they deserved the eminence may be judged by the statement that those two great steppers of two years ago, Walsingham and Rockingham, failed last week to get even H. C. Horses that only last year, or the year before, stirred spectators to frankest enthusiasm received scarcely a hand-clap last week—not that they failed of showing the form of their winning days, but there were new-comers that raised the standard beyond the reach of '96 and '97 winners. Even the great Coxey, champion of '96, and perhaps accredited with more blue ribbons than any other harness-horse living, had to yield honors to the new-comers; and Coxey is a magnificent piece of horseflesh, moving or standing. The absence of Von Harbinger was a source of great disappointment to sportsmen; his defence of the Cup against Lady Ursula would have made a superb competition and a difficult one for the judges.

The saddle classes, although they have not enjoyed the consistently excellent judging of the harness classes, have yet made, and especially show it this year, a very considerable advance on the standard of several years ago. And New York, I think, is not the most favorable point of observation on the actual development of the saddle-horse. A larger number of the highest type are more likely to be seen around Philadelphia and Boston, and almost anywhere in Tennessee, Kentucky, and the Virginias. The classes in New York have usually shown satisfactory conformation and style, and this year is no exception in that respect, while in the matter of manners and gait, the weakest point of the New York classes, there is this year much improvement. The judging seems, too, to have grown more intelligent; too often gait and manners appeared to count for little in the estimation of the judges, whereas they are the two essentials to a first-class saddle animal. It seems to me the New York judges have always leaned too much on the side of stockiness; while substance is absolutely necessary, it should stop short of dray-horse proportions. If a class calls for a horse up to carrying 160 pounds, one built on the lines of a Clydesdale is not the desired ideal, though he may excel in the requirements of weight-carrying. A generous supply of bone and substance is always desirable in the hunter, but in the Park back enough is as good as a feast. And therein lies another reason why the saddle and hunter classes should not be confused.

But the class which suffers now, and has from the beginning, the greatest injustice from confusion of types is the one officially catalogued for roadsters. This class is entirely monopolized by trotters; the same animal competes and wins in the roadster and in the trotter classes—the judges are trotter men. If a roadster is a nervous, highly strung, light-boned, delicately fashioned trotter, whose utility begins and ends with ability to accomplish bursts of a 2.30 gait on the macadamized driveway—then the New York horse show reveals ideals of the type; but if a roadster is an animal of good blood and bone, well set up, well mannered, with stylish, easy, all-round action, and sufficient speed to haul a cart over the country at the rate of ten miles an hour, and stamina enough to keep up the pace—then the roadster is unknown to the New York horse show, and apparently to the Association's directors.



The breeding classes, except those for trotters and ponies, were disappointing—the thoroughbred exhibition particularly so. Fancy only two entries in the class for running thoroughbreds! The confusion of hunter and saddle animals made the judging ridiculous in the class for "stallions for getting hunters and saddle-horses." To make such a class was evidence of no sympathetic or intelligent comprehension of the types; and the result was in keeping with the conception of the class, first prize going to Applegate, who had rightly taken the blue in the Class No. 1, where breeding and racing qualities counted heaviest, but who looks hardly up to the requirements of a hunter sire.

Another distinguishing feature of the '98 show—and one, were I a director of the Association, I should view with alarm—was the predominance of the professional horse-dealer. It might not inappropriately be called a dealers' show. I sounded a note of warning to indifferent directors on this subject so long ago as '93, and the expected has come. The number of absentees from the former list of amateurs is long and startling. It means that the amateur and the professional cannot thrive check by jowl. The professional should be encouraged, certainly one who gets together such superb animals and turns out his traps so perfectly appointed as Mr. Bates—he is needed—but so is the amateur. If the amateur loses interest, who buys the professional's wares? Separate classes should be established for the professional—that the annual exhibition retain the character of an owners' show, and not take on so much that of the dealers.

In the trotter-breeding classes the Hamlins swept the field, with six blue and four red ribbons; Lawrence Kip had his usual success in the driving classes, which means he took all the important ones. Theodore Cuyler Patterson's triumph in the pony-breeding classes was as marked, Maritje and Kasim proving unbeatable. W. T. L. Wall did as much in the Shetland-pony classes. Of the carriage horses most prominent during the week were Whirl of the Town, Sporting Life, Coxey, Sigsbee, Sampson, Uncle Sam, Blucher, Western Star, Duke, Egbert, Encore, Lady Ursula, Lady Flavia, Lord Brilliant, Hi, High Tide, and Lord Chesterfield. Whirl of the Town, singly, captured the championship and three blue ribbons, and with Sporting Life the double championship and four firsts, and with Coxey the double championship and four firsts, and with Coxey first in a tandem class, Coxey and Whirl taking second in the same class. The Park fours were a good lot, Bostwick's $10,000 team winning. Bates saved the road-four class from mediocrity. His appointments were perfect.

Fayette McCord and Oriflamme won the championship in their respective saddle classes, Lady of Quality and Magnet receiving the reserve ribbon. Other noticeable ones were American Boy, Vinco, Compeer, Gaven Baby, Canadian Belle, Con Amore, Saxon Spark, Edna West, and His Nibs.

The complexion of the hunter classes has changed much, but there were some very good ones, notably Samoset, Welcome, and Fellowship, winners of the heavy, middle, and light weight qualified championships. Other good ones were Richmond, Miss Dark, Fritz, First Choice, Delay, Blue Rock, Burford, Red Rover, King Crow, King Pin, Lady Elgin, and American Beauty.

(Continued from page 1162.)

Young the quarter-back keeps the team moving well, fumbles a little, but is a sure tackler, despite his weight of 135 pounds. He is particularly good on the defensive.

In the back field, Captain Whiting is the most consistent ground-gainer, added to which he runs the team well, and his men have confidence in him.

While the form Cornell has shown seems hardly good enough to warrant hope of defeating Pennsylvania, yet the latter's fumbling, which is always most apparent when opposed to a team strong enough to hinder the smooth working of the guards-back play, may lead to Cornell's scoring. The chances are, however, that Cornell has not had enough play against first-class teams to give either the needed endurance or alertness to defeat Pennsylvania.

WHATEVER THE REAL REASON entertained by the Secretaries of War and of the Navy for withholding permission from the cadets for annual football games, at least it is shameful that the cause alleged, of "bad blood" and "ill feeling aroused by the last match," is allowed to be handed from newspaper to newspaper without correction. I suppose, however, Mr. Alger is not looking into newspapers these days. Those who have viewed the sportsmanly conduct of games at West Point and at Annapolis know the statement to be utterly false. Those who were fortunate enough to see the games between the two national academies must be astonished to read of a cause so suppositious now put forth to keep them apart. Having had the good luck to see all the games between the two—to have been with the elevens and their respective supporters on and off the playing-field, before and after the game, in and out of the mess—my word may be accepted when I say that I never beheld any deviation from that strong, wholesome, sportsmanly sentiment which, since first I knew them, has been paramount in sport at Annapolis and West Point. Perhaps some one in the Metropolitan or in the Army and Navy Club waxed patriotic, but as for "bad blood"—the honorable Secretaries at Washington should become better acquainted with army and navy men.

HARVARD DEFEATED YALE 17–0 at New Haven on Saturday. And there never was a match that gave the critic less excuse for explanatory writing. Harvard won because she outplayed Yale in every department of the game, because of the physical superiority of her team, and her exhibition of higher-class football. From first to last Harvard showed the abler generalship, overwhelmed Yale in rushing the ball, altogether outclassed her in the kicking game, and made fewer and less costly fumbles. Only twice in the game did a Yale runner show prominently, and both times it was Ely, who made thirty yards in the first half on a caught punt, and about fifteen in the second around the end. Twice—once on her fifteen-yard line, and again on her ten-yard line, and both in the second half—Yale secured the ball by a furious defence, when on each occasion a touch-down was impending. Twice, both times in the second half, Yale's attack resulted in substantial and continuous gains; once when steady line-bucking secured twenty yards, and again when line-bucking for seventeen yards was supplemented by Ely's fifteen-yard end run. At all other times Yale was on the defensive, and forced to most desperate work to keep Harvard from gaining her distance even on the second down. Considering the rain and the mud, the handling of the ball was surprisingly clean, especially so by Harvard, while Yale in this respect bettered her work against Princeton, when the day was clear and the field comparatively dry. Although the muffing of Yale's backs on punts frequently gave the ball to Harvard, it was a source of gratification that none of these directly resulted in the scoring of the winner. On the other hand, a fumble on Yale's five-yard line by Harvard lost her the ball when a touch-down seemed imminent. It is true that Yale's crippled condition in the back field made Harvard's large score possible, but, in my judgment, it made no difference in the final decision. Even with McBride in his best form and De Saulles fit and playing, Harvard must have won the day.

THE PLAY OF THE HARVARD ELEVEN was certainly the strongest and most skilful exhibition of all-round football a Harvard team has ever made, and at least equal to that of the best teams the most advanced school of the game has produced. Its work against Yale was a considerable improvement over its work against Pennsylvania, and showed what telling use the Harvard coaches had made of those two intervening weeks. The slow-starting, straggling attack had been changed to an offence that, though not getting off with the lightning speed we have seen emphasized by some of the Yale teams, yet got under way promptly, and moved forward, gathering strength that appeared to be irresistible. Time and again the runner seemed to be hurled through the opposing mass by the very impetus the support had imparted. It was not star play, although there was much of that too, that gave Harvard her strength, but the completeness with which individual effort had been merged into one harmoniously working and powerful whole. Taking it all in all, the '98 Harvard eleven is the most perfectly rounded out team I have ever seen. And that is saying a great deal. With no man in her rush-line, Haughton excepted, because of his remarkable punting, who may be said to possess unusual natural ability, or to have acquired skill beyond that many first-class players develop annually, Harvard, none the less, showed such strength of forwards as one might expect were every man a star of the first magnitude. It was the science of team-work made possible by indefatigable drilling, and reflects great credit on Cameron Forbes and his assistant coaches, and upon Captain Dibblee, and upon the individual members of the team. The splendid physical condition of the men made possible their continuously aggressive play. And the consummate generalship of Daly used it to the very best possible advantage.

FROM THE VERY OPENING OF THE GAME Harvard's strength, and, most unusual, her confidence in it, were apparent. Captain Dibblee won the toss—in itself an upset of tradition—and chose the goal from which a fair breeze was blowing. Chamberlin kicked off to Daly, who returned the ball to Yale's fifty-yard line, where Ely was thrown. Yale tried to rush, and lost the ball on downs, to regain it immediately, however, by Harvard's fumble. Another futile attempt at rushing by Yale, and Chamberlin and Haughton exchanged kicks, to the latter's advantage. Yale could not gain by rushing, and again punted, Dibblee running the ball back to Yale's forty-five-yard line. And now Harvard set in motion that accumulative fierce attack; using Dibblee and Reid chiefly, by plays around the tackles, and through the centre and through and over the guards and tackles, Harvard, without losing the ball, pushed Yale, desperate but impotent, down the field, and Reid made the first touch-down (Haughton failing the goal) twelve minutes after the game had been called. The second score, ten minutes later, with play most of the time in Yale territory, was hastened by Yale's poor judgment in not kicking when on her fifteen-yard line instead of trying to run, thereby losing the ball on downs, and Harvard forthwith forcing Dibblee over, Haughton kicking goal. Play remained in Yale's territory the balance of the half, Haughton trying place-kick from forty-five-yard line, and failing just before time was called.

Yale braced, materially at the beginning of the second half, carrying the ball for one spurt of twenty yards, and immediately thereafter successfully defending her goal at the fifteen-yard line against Harvard's, to that point, steady advance. Again, on the ten-yard line, Yale saved a touch-down. But for the rest, the battle was all with Harvard, the third touch-down after steady rushing from Yale's five-yard line being made by Reid. The game ended with Chamberlin's poor try for place-goal from twenty-five yard line.

Throughout the game Harvard's ends outclassed Yale's in getting down under the ball, and her backs in handling the ball and in supporting the forwards on the defensive.

AS FOR THE KICKING, all of Chamberlin's were poor, and the few good ones of McBride were run back half-way by Harvard. Harvard gained tremendously on her ability to run back Yale's punts, and on Yale's muffing and inability to run even when not muffing, because of Harvard's ends. Yale's end formations were weak. Ely's individual work was brilliant in running, but, like the other Yale back, he muffed.

Daly's work was above criticism; he is the best quarter of the year; Dibblee's runs through broken fields were brilliant, as was his and Reid's line-bucking. Warren's line-bucking also was first class. In the line, Harvard was the stronger on the ends, at right tackle, left guard, and centre, a bit the weaker at left tackle, and about even at right guard, though the work of Donald and Burden was first class, the former especially shining on occasion.

No match was ever won and lost more strictly on the merits of the contestants.

It is the second time Harvard has defeated Yale since '76, and the only time Yale has failed to score.

Next week I will publish some statistics which space does not permit of this week. CASPAR WHITNEY.

"HOW TO GET STRONG, AND HOW TO STAY SO."—By William Blaikie.—New and Enlarged Edition.—Illustrated.—$1 75.—Harper & Brothers, Publishers.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LIEUTENANT HOBSON

IN THE DECEMBER CENTURY, ready everywhere Thursday, December 1st, begins one of the most interesting series of articles that have ever appeared in an American magazine. It is Lieutenant Hobson's own narrative of the sinking of the "Merrimac" in Santiago harbor. It will appear in three numbers of THE CENTURY. The first part, in December, contains the story of the inception of the idea, the stripping of the "Merrimac," and the manœuvers up to the time of the recall.

CAPTAIN SIGSBEE'S narrative of the explosion of the "Maine" is also contained in the Christmas number of THE CENTURY. In the November CENTURY Captain Sigsbee told the story of the arrival of the ship in the harbor of Havana. In the December number he describes the explosion, the act which precipitated the Spanish War, and he tells the story most graphically. The destruction of Cervera's fleet will be described later by Rear-Admiral Sampson and others who took part in the engagement.

The Sinking of the "Merrimac"

DESCRIBED EXCLUSIVELY IN

The DECEMBER CENTURY is the most entertaining and beautiful Christmas number of THE CENTURY MAGAZINE ever issued. The cover is designed by Tissot, the great French painter, and the number contains a beautiful double frontispiece by Maxfield Parrish, Christmas poems, Christmas stories, Christmas pictures, a portrait of the original Alice of "Alice in Wonderland," etc., etc. Buy it on any news-stand for 35 cents, or — better yet — subscribe for a year, sending $4.00 to the publishers or to any dealer.

THE CENTURY CO., Union Square, New York.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE

THE HAIR 27th Ed., 25c. (or stamps). Why it Falls Off, Turns Grey, and the Remedy. By Prof. HARLEY PARKER. A. N. LONG & CO., 1013 Arch St., Phila., Pa. "Every one should read this little book."—Athenæum.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

MAGAZINE, $4 00 a year. BAZAR, - - - $4 00 a year
WEEKLY, $4 00 a year. LITERATURE, $4 00 a year
ROUND TABLE, $1 00 a year.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

TEMPTED.

A MORALIZER.—"How weak one is, and how easily one yields to temptation!"

A HUSBAND. "I should say so. My wife went to an auction last week to buy a stove and she bought a refrigerator."

A delicious drink sold at all soda fountains and cafes.

Vigoral

"Concentrated Beef"

Represents all the nutriment and flavor of prime roast beef in a condensed form. It builds up the invalid. Strengthens the convalescent.

Our Chafing Dish Recipe Book sent upon request. At all Grocers and Druggists.

ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

1831 Sixty-Ninth Year. 1899

THE

Country Gentleman

The ONLY Agricultural NEWSpaper,

AND ADMITTEDLY THE

Leading Agricultural Journal of the World.

Every department written by specialists, the highest authorities in their respective lines.

No other paper pretends to compete with it in qualifications of editorial staff.

Gives the agricultural news with a degree of fulness and completeness not even attempted by others.

Best Reviews of the Crops,
Best Market Reports,
Best Mechanical Execution,
Best Everything.

INDISPENSABLE TO

ALL COUNTRY RESIDENTS

WHO WISH TO

KEEP UP WITH THE TIMES.

Single Subscription, $2;
Two Subscriptions, $3.50;
Four Subscriptions, $6.

SPECIAL INDUCEMENTS TO RAISERS OF LARGER CLUBS.

Write for Particulars on this Point.

Free till Jan. 1 to New Subscribers for 1899.

SEND FOR SPECIMEN COPIES,

Which will be mailed Free, and compare them with any other rural weekly; it will not take long to see the difference. Address

LUTHER TUCKER & SON,
ALBANY, N. Y.

The Improved

BOSTON GARTER

Is the recognized

STANDARD for MEN'S WEAR.

Keeps the Stocki
Free from Wrink
DOES NOT BIND

THE Velvet Grip CUSHI BUTTO CLASI

Lies flat to the
Does not tear the s ing, and will not unf accidentally.

SOLD EVERYWHE

Sample Pair { Silk. Cotton by Mail

GEORGE FROST
BOSTON, MA

"A PERFECT FOOD—as Wholesome as it is Delicious."

Walter Baker & Co.'s

Breakfast

Cocoa

Trade-Mark.

The Standard for Purity and Excellence....

Costs less than one cent a cup.

Our Trade-Mark on Every Package.

Walter Baker & Co. Ltd.
DORCHESTER, MASS.
ESTABLISHED 1780.

IT ONLY WEIGHS 10 POUNDS

Makes a small package when deflated, and can be carried anywhere by anybody.

"PERFECTION" Air Mattresses

are a modern invention for Campers and Yachtsmen—they are waterproof, never become musty—and make a most comfortable and luxurious bed. Made to fit any irregular shape of bunks or cockpits.

Send for our illustrated catalogue.

MECHANICAL FABRIC CO.
Air Goods Department, Providence, R. I.

CHEW

Beeman's

The Original

Pepsin Gum

Cures Indigestion and Sea-sickness.

All Others Are Imitations.

Arnold Constable & Co

Cloaks and Suits

Ladies' French Gowns,
Dinner, Ball and Street Dress
Tailor-made Costumes, Opera W

Rich Furs.

Russian Sables, Seal, Otter, M
Chinchilla and Persian Lam
Trimming Furs. Fur Capes, Ja
Collarettes and Muffs.

Broadway & 19th

NEW YORK.

The New Pennsylvania Railroad Cab Service at Washington, D. C.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company has just put into operation in connection with its Sixth Street Station, Washington, D. C., a complete and efficient cab service similar to that in operation at Broad Street Station, Philadelphia, and West Twenty-third Street Station, New York. The service is performed by brand-new rubber-tired coupés, victorias, and omnibuses at very reasonable rates, and in the same prompt and satisfactory manner that has characterized the service in other cities. The vehicles will be found at the cab-stand at the B Street entrance to the Washington Station, and may be engaged by the trip or by the hour.

Archarena Combination Boards for THANKSGIVING PARLOR GAMES.

(ELEGANT CHERRY FINISH)

No. 2 has CROKINOLE, TEN PINS, and CARROM GAMES, 10 in all, for $3.50, express paid east of Omaha. No. 1 board, 4 games, $2.50. If not at your dealer's write for rules to

ARCHARENA CO.
Manufacturers,
Peoria, Ill.

TRADE C&W MARK

EARL & WILSON'S LINEN COLLARS & CUFFS BEST IN THE WORLD

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,

BANKERS.

ESTABLISHED 1873.

2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.

Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.

Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.

A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.

Correspondence solicited.

Joseph Gillott's

STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

Harper & Brothers'

Descriptive list of their publications, with portraits of authors, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

By RICHARD HARDING DAVI

A Year from a Reporter's Note-Book

Illustrated by R. CATON WOODVILLE, T. DE THULSTRUP, and FREE REMINGTON, and from Photographs taken by the Author. $1

In this volume Mr. Davis treats the Cuban Rebellion, and other ma of equal import, with his characteristic accuracy and skill, and the res a volume of inestimable value to the student of current events.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR:

Three Gringos in Venezuela and Central America. Illustrated. $
About Paris. Illustrated by C. D. GIBSON. $1 25.
The Princess Aline. Illustrated by C. D. GIBSON. $1 25.
The Exiles, and Other Stories. Illustrated. $1 50.
Van Bibber, and Others. Illustrated by C. D. GIBSON. $1 00; Paper,
The West from a Car-Window. Ill'd by FREDERIC REMINGTON.
Our English Cousins. Illustrated. $1 25.
The Rulers of the Mediterranean. Illustrated. $1 25.

Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York and Lo

Best Line to Cincinnati and St. Louis—THE NEW YORK CENTR

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—NO. 2189.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS.
All Rights Reserved.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1898.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

A MARKET SCENE IN PONCE.

DRAWN BY F. LUIS MORA AFTER A PHOTOGRAPH BY WILLIAM DINWIDDIE, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, DECEMBER 3, 1898

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4 00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, and Mexico

Subscriptions may begin with any Number

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

London: 45 Albemarle Street, W.

Also for sale at Brentano's, 37 Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris

IT should not be forgotten that Governor TANNER is still at the head of the government of Illinois, and that he continues to neglect to enforce the laws and to protect the colored miners who have come from Alabama to work within the borders of his State. Riots have occurred at Pana within the week, and all that the Governor has seen fit to do has been to order the disarmament of all parties. Now it is clearly right for him to order the disarmament of the rioters, but it is not right for him to order the negroes to disarm, because they are simply defending themselves from the attacks which have been encouraged by his own attitude. It is a fact that nothing has been suggested in the way of Federal interference. Practically the Constitution of the United States, so far as it guarantees protection to citizens of the State of Alabama within the State of Illinois, is a dead letter.

TRUE bills of indictment have been found against Senator QUAY, his son RICHARD R. QUAY, former State-Treasurer BENJAMIN J. HAYWOOD, JOHN S. HOPKINS, and others, for what practically amounts to embezzlement of the funds of the State of Pennsylvania. The case against Senator QUAY has been set forth in these columns, and it is a very strong one presumptively. It is a disgrace to the State that such a man as he should be a Senator. Whether or not he is technically guilty of a crime which will land him in the penitentiary, he is in fact guilty of an offence against morality and propriety which would prevent a sensitive community from intrusting him with high office. But QUAY seems to own the Republican party of the State of Pennsylvania, and the Republican party owns the commonwealth. Those who are ashamed of a person like QUAY are in the minority; and if QUAY goes to prison as a just end to his public career, it will be the State of Pennsylvania, more than he, that ought to feel shame.

THERE is a newspaper rumor to the effect that Admiral SCHLEY is to have command of the European squadron which is said to be about to sail for the other side of the Atlantic for exhibition purposes. In other words, if the rumor be true, Admiral SCHLEY is to be presented to Europe as the naval hero of our war. Now, if the official reports of the Santiago campaign are true, Admiral SCHLEY is very far from being such a hero. Instead of being honored he should be punished. That the Navy Department believes that the official reports are true has been demonstrated by the fact that it published them in the newspapers, thus making Admiral SAMPSON'S presentation of the case its own. Nevertheless, in the face of this, President MCKINLEY and Secretary LONG have recommended Admiral SCHLEY for promotion, and it is now reported that they are going to further honor him by giving him this exhibition command. Will they kindly tell the country what they really believe in this matter with respect to Admiral SCHLEY? Have they misrepresented him in their official reports? or are they giving him unmerited honors, at the expense of other and better men, because they are afraid of public opinion—that is, the opinion of the yellow journals and the politicians of Maryland?

IT is evidently the intention of the Republican leaders of the State of New York to do their utmost to still further reduce the amount of home-rule of which the city of New York is possessed. This is not much, it is true, but what there is of it should be maintained, and we trust that Governor ROOSEVELT will not be led away, by his honest and strong desire for good government, to imagine that this end can be accomplished through the rule of the Republicans of the rural districts of New York. They have produced PLATT, ELLSWORTH, COGGESHALL, LOU PAYN, GEORGE ALDRIDGE, and all that crowd, and they have traded legislation with CROKER for mutual benefit and profit. They are no more to be trusted than are the Democrats of New York city; and the police should be left under the charge of the latter, because the citizens of New York who are injured by bad police government can punish Tammany Hall, but never the Republican party of the rural districts. If it had not been for the power of the citizens of the metropolis to punish a local government on account of police wrongs and police scandals, Mayor STRONG would not have been at the head of the city government, and Mr. ROOSEVELT would not have been on the police commission. It was the revolt of the city that gave us decent police administration under him; but no revolt of the city will ever be able to improve police matters if the force is ruled from Albany.

THE race difficulties in the South and in Illinois continue to be discussed in the newspapers, but there are signs of a gradual loss of public interest in the question, which is so characteristic of the American people, and upon which Mr. MCKINLEY is said to have relied as the best defence that Mr. ALGER had. The negroes in New York have held a mass-meeting, and this meeting has been followed by others in different parts of the country. The negroes, at all events, are not losing interest in the matter, because their welfare, and even their lives, depend upon a proper settlement of the question. Notwithstanding the fact that the government owes it to itself and to its citizens to enforce the law, we do not see how the question can be finally settled without the aid of the negroes themselves; and upon this point Mr. BOOKER T. WASHINGTON and Mr. JOHN C. DARCY have given their race excellent advice. It is, in effect, that they refrain from pushing forward into politics, and from demanding public positions—in other words, from doing those things which alone seem to arouse the enmity of the whites, who are determined that this shall be a "white man's government." The negroes, by refusing to become spoils politicians, will not be guilty of an act of cowardice, but will be doing an act of tactfulness, which is demanded of them in view of the great blessing which the whites have given them—that is, the blessing of freedom. It is well for them also to remember that the part they play in politics is not important to the development of their race, but that it is imposed upon them for the advantage of white politicians whose success and position in politics depend upon the negro vote. Let them consult their own interests, and they will grow gradually, until the race is competent to fill that position in the community which the laws contemplate that it should hold. We are not advocating any laxness upon the part of the government in the execution of the laws for the protection of its citizens; but we are sure that the negro race itself can be greatly benefited by the self-restraint which is recommended by Mr. WASHINGTON and Mr. DARCY.

THE investigation by the commission appointed by the President to inquire into army administration is of a peculiar character. Now that the commission is in New York, it is evident that most of its members consider themselves as counsel for the defendant—that is, for the army administration. Governor WOODBURY of Vermont and Commander SEXTON are the chief offenders in this respect. Instead of trying to discover the truth, they cross-examine witnesses in the interests of the particular branch of the service attacked. They are especially fond of annoying women witnesses who are evidently telling the truth about the horrors they saw at Montauk. They are described in the newspapers as "ironical" and "sarcastic" and "insinuating." Why were these gentlemen appointed? Was it for the purpose of defending the administration, or for the purpose of ascertaining the truth? Notwithstanding their efforts to conceal the truth, however, facts are coming to light that bear out the newspaper reports of the horrible condition of affairs at Santiago and at Montauk. General BRECKINRIDGE, General GREENE, General SANGER, and other witnesses among them good women who worked at Montauk—have testified to facts that seriously reflect upon army administration, and, among other things, make it apparent that the Santiago campaign was badly managed from the beginning. It is clear now that General SHAFTER should not have commanded even a division or a brigade in that campaign, and that much of the suffering was due to his indifference and general incompetency. It is clear that the administration broke up the staff corps, taking away from them their experienced officers; that the quartermaster's department was incompetent; that the medical department was insufficient; and that every staff corps, from highest to lowest, was a failure. Some of the reports of the heads of departments are confirming all that has been said about the mismanagement of affairs. Surgeon-General STERNBERG'S report, for example, excuses the medical department for the evils the existence of which the investigating commission seems eager to deny.

MR. ROOSEVELT has once more earned the gratitude of the country, this time by his testimony before the war-investigating committee. His is really the first testimony of the first importance, when the character and official position of the witness are considered, which bears the mark of absolute frankness and thorough information. Was there ever such a picture of imbecility and incompetency as that presented in Mr. ROOSEVELT'S testimony? Troops without proper equipments; a congested state of affairs on the railroad to Tampa; the utter chaos at that noxious camp; lack of transportation and lack of proper food; utter confusion at Port Tampa; the Rough Riders seizing a transport and holding it, in consequence of the failure of the commanding general or his quartermaster to designate the steamers for the various regiments; total disregard of the comfort of the soldiers; a wicked lack of medical supplies and attendance on the field of battle; Lieutenant-Colonel ROOSEVELT buying necessary food for his men; regulations which permitted officers to have fresh vegetables and refused them to the rank and file; lack of discipline on board the transports; entire absence of military command over the same transports; and the failure to land half the supplies that were on the ships—all these and much more were related by Mr. ROOSEVELT in detail, and probably to the confusion of the attorneys for the defendant who are masquerading as investigators. When to these is added the lack of proper weapons and smokeless powder—the smoke from the black powder resulting in an undue loss of life by our troops, who exposed their position every time they fired at the enemy—we have a state of affairs which proves beyond peradventure that the expedition from Tampa was badly organized, incompetently commanded, and that under the conditions which prevailed it should not have gone to Cuba at that time. All this is not useless scolding over things of the past. The condition of affairs that prevailed in this expedition should be known, and the responsibility for it should be fixed, for the sake of the country in the future. And now let General MILES speak on this subject with the frankness and the fairness which characterize the testimony of Mr. ROOSEVELT. He is the soldier at the head of the army. The country has confidence in his military capacity, and it ought to have the benefit of his experience and his opinions as to the character of the expedition, of which we know he did not approve.

THE DECISION AT PARIS.

THE settlement of the Philippine question rests with the Senate. The administration has done its part, and its commissioners in Paris have insisted that the archipelago shall be ceded to the United States, we, in turn, agreeing to pay $20,000,000 to Spain for these possessions. A year ago we would not have taken them as a gift. A year ago, practically the whole nation would have resented the suggestion that we should imperil our own institutions and should plunge into the midst of the dangers of war which becloud the Asiatic horizon, because of some fancied duties owing to alien and savage peoples. No one in the full possession of his reasoning faculties can believe in this bathos if he looks at the question calmly and is free from the moral and sentimental fog with which the subject has been surrounded by those who are bent on expansion for the mere sake of expansion, and those with whom sentimental considerations are more controlling than we think they ought to be when the welfare of the country is in issue. And yet it is probably true that the fustian about our duties to the Tagals, Negritos, Malays, and Filipinos will carry the day if it is be carried at all. We, the people at home, are not to be considered. The fact that we are to be in danger from this increase in our alien population is be of no account in the minds and fancies of the politicians. No expansionist has undertaken to answer the real question involved. In other words, the administration is prepared to take the fearful chance Victory, in its view, has imposed upon us a fearful burden and immense responsibilities, which Mr. MCKINLEY has not only smilingly assumed, but for the bearing of which he has "generously" agreed to pay to Spain $20,000,000 of the money of the tax-payers. This duty that we owe the sufferages is said to arise from the cruelty of Spain

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

rule. We are to relieve them from that rule, although it is perfectly well known that not one-tenth of the people of the Philippines, outside of Luzon and perhaps Mindanao, ever felt the weight of Spain's little finger or even knew of her existence. Why is not the administration frank in dealing with the country? Surely it is not so unintelligent as to believe in this poor delusion about duties, which would not have existed if DEWEY had properly sailed away from Manila after he had performed his task of destroying Spanish naval power in the Pacific. Surely it knows that a victor cannot be forced, morally or otherwise, to assume dangerous burdens in consequence of his victories. Is there not statesmanship enough within the range of the President's political friendships to settle this question without throwing over the Declaration of Independence, and without acting the untruth that popular government is in its dotage? But we are face to face with the treaty. The administration has in this treaty begun the most dangerous assault upon free institutions that has ever been made in the country, more dangerous than the assault of the slave power, because if it succeeds it is likely to be more enduring in its consequences than the earlier attack could have been. That it will not itself succeed eventually will be due to the vitality of democratic institutions, which will struggle against and finally overcome this attempt to transform the republic into an absolute and necessarily an unjust, ruler over alien and unwilling peoples. But the virtue of democratic institutions does not rob this attack upon them of its character.

We must depend now upon the Senate, and we are sure, from what we know of the real sentiments of the best Republicans in that body, that a treaty containing a provision to assume the Philippines would not be ratified if the vote were taken to-day. It is to be hoped, in the interest of the whole country, whose domestic problems demand all its attention, and all its political sense and courage, that this attitude of the Senate will not change, and to this end we hope that the petitions prepared by the Anti-Imperialist Society, of which ex-Secretary of the Treasury GEORGE S. BOUTWELL is president, will be signed by the hundreds of thousands.

Coupled with the demand for the islands which was made by the commissioners is a certain ambiguous promise that we shall maintain the "open door" in the Philippines. We are inclined to think that the promise means nothing, especially in view of the limitations of the demand itself. From that proposition we judge that the commission's idea of the "open door" is that it will be maintained by the admission of Spanish ships to the islands on the same terms on which American ships are admitted, and this only for a definite term of years. This may be a promise of an "open door," but it would be better described as a promise to keep the door ajar. What does the "open door" mean? It means that trade with the islands shall be absolutely free, and that the merchants of all countries shall have the same trade privileges in the Philippines as the Americans enjoy. This, however, is absolutely impossible with our present tariff system. If the treaty that is contemplated by the administration be ratified, the Philippines will be part of the United States. The Constitution provides that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." If there is to be an "open door" maintained in the Philippines, therefore, the protective policy must be abandoned for the whole country. We must have free trade everywhere. We cannot protect the cotton and woollen manufacturers of New England and Georgia, the iron and steel masters of Pennsylvania and Alabama, the sugar-growers of Hawaii, Louisiana, and Nebraska, the tobacco of Puerto Rico, Connecticut, and Virginia, and refuse all protection to the Philippines. For ourselves, we are not alarmed by the prospect; but the protected manufacturers of New England evidently are alarmed, and the Home Market Club has made its protest, and has called upon the working-man, its traditional favorite, whose succor is always in demand when the manufacturer is in danger, to lift up his voice against the prospective inroads of cheap labor from Asia.

We are inclined, however, to think that the administration has no idea of opening the door in the sense that the open door is understood in England, and it has shown this by its action with reference to trade with Puerto Rico. It believes in the maintenance of its mediæval policy on this side of the water. While the American and Canadian commissioners are discussing reciprocity in Washington, Mr. MCKINLEY violently slams the door of Puerto Rico in the face of the world by declaring that our barbarous navigation laws apply to the island; that between us and it trade must be carried on in American bottoms; that foreign vessels can only touch at one point in the island during a voyage—and all the rest of it. Mr. MCKINLEY and those who agree with him have learned nothing from the colonial histories of the world. They seem not to know that this policy of theirs cost England the United States; that it makes the colonies of France and Germany enormous burdens on the mother-country; that it has finally stripped Spain of all her valuable possessions. These navigation laws applied to Puerto Rico are especially injurious to Canada and England, and some of our ill-informed English friends are now learning that we are not likely to have at once an enlightened colonial policy, or one that will be of immediate advantage to British commerce. Eventually, of course, expansion will compel free trade. Protection and colonial government do not go together. The history of the world has proved this to the intelligent economist, but we are likely to be obliged to learn the lesson over again by hard and bitter experience. In the mean time, however, there can be no "open door" in the Philippines after the islands are annexed. That cannot be until we are prepared to open the door everywhere, for the Constitution forbids.

A POLICY OF "NAGGING."

IN his London letter this week, Mr. ARNOLD WHITE gives a very clear view of the straits to which the French Republic has been reduced by pursuing towards England a policy of nagging. In respect to Germany, the policy of the French republic may be said to have been continuously a policy of pouting. The latest and most striking illustration of this policy was given when France, heavily burdened, as she confessedly is by her armament, refused to consider, even at the request of the Czar, the expediency of lightening it while the status quo prevailed in Alsace and Lorraine, and openly grumbled at the avowed indisposition of her great and good friend to maintain his crushing armament for the sake of redressing her grievances. But Germany is so near, so imminent, that France has not ventured to convert her policy of passive pouting into a policy of active nagging in respect to Germany. She has taken a vicarious revenge upon the hereditary foe, and has nagged perfidious Albion with increasing frequency and point ever since England went in alone, after France had declined to go in with her, to do some very needful house-cleaning in Egypt.

The house-cleaning has been done, to use a slang phrase of particular applicability, "to the Queen's taste." Egypt has never been anything like so well governed as it is now since the exodus of Moses. But France, by at least her noisiest organs, refuses to recognize, in the great and beneficent work that has been done, anything of greatness, anything of beneficence, anything but a new grievance and a new illustration of the perfidy and greed of a greedy and perfidious race. The force of nagging could not go much further than the planting of a party of "nine or ten fortuitous Frenchmen," as the London Times calls MARCHAND'S party, across the line of the conquering and civilizing British army, with the pretension of arresting its advance.

This has been too much for the British apathy, upon which the naggers have thus far successfully relied. That apathy has been so completely dispelled that Great Britain seems to have determined that the state of preparedness—at first forced upon her by the attitude of France over the trivial affair of Fashoda—shall be maintained until not only that question, but all other outstanding questions are settled. She is determined, it seems, that they shall be settled in such a way as shall put a stop, once for all, to French nagging in every quarter of the globe.

Whoever has watched the course of European politics for the last decade will not be inclined to blame England for this situation. She has pursued her own ends with energy, no doubt, but they were real and important ends. Her objects, as Lord SALISBURY said when KITCHENER'S expedition was despatched, "are strictly business." It cannot be said that her policy has in any particular been shaped by a desire to annoy any other nation. On the other hand, it has been truly said that the policy of France has not only been shaped in many particulars for the purpose of annoying England, but that the fact that a given line of policy would annoy England has sufficed to make it, if not popular in France, at least acceptable to a large and vocal number of Frenchmen. England has now been wrought up to the point of challenging France, if she has any grievances, to come out and redress them. That is, in effect, what Lord SALISBURY has said in his very guarded and diplomatic way. That is what Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, the enfant terrible of the British cabinet, has blurted out in his entirely undiplomatic way. France, thus challenged, contents herself with pointing out what harm Russia could do to England in the event of war. This is not a very dignified posture for a nation which, once, and for centuries, held the leadership of Europe. But it is a natural enough consequence of the policy of persistently nagging a foreign power in order to avert attention from domestic scandals. Meanwhile it will be interesting to watch Great Britain's conduct in case the French undertake to re-enforce their colonies in the East.

THE JUBILEE OF FRANCIS JOSEPH.

FEW monarchs have been so sorely smitten as FRANCIS JOSEPH. Since he came to the throne, fifty years ago, a mere boy of eighteen, there has hardly been a year without its public or private sorrow. His brother MAXIMILIAN found an untimely grave in Mexico, murdered by the men whom he had hoped to rule. His only son died a tragical and mysterious death less than ten years ago. His wife was assassinated last September by an Italian anarchist. Little but misfortune has marked the outward history of the Dual Monarchy under his charge. The Hungarian revolt was a fitting prelude to a reign of continued disturbance. Twice the Emperor has been forced at the sword's point into a humiliating peace. Solferino and Sadowa destroyed, so far as one can see, forever the Austrian dominion in Italy and the German Confederation. Hardly less disastrous to the stability of the realm of the HABSBURGS have been the ceaseless jars of race with race—the vicious conflicts of German, Czech, and Magyar—which seem now to have passed beyond the healing stage, and to threaten the disruption of the empire possibly even in the lifetime of its patient and persuasive ruler.

It is the rarest kind of tribute to personal worth that FRANCIS JOSEPH should stand out after these fifty troublous years as the one point of agreement that is common to all his peoples. Much of his authority is due to the great tragedies of his life; much also to the racial wranglings and cliques that by a process of exhaustion have lifted the monarchy above party politics into a position of determinating influence; but more to the character of the Emperor himself. It was many years before the real nature of that character could make itself known. Education and surroundings had made FRANCIS JOSEPH a bigot and an autocrat. The collapse of the Hungarian revolt was followed by ten years of pitiless reaction. The Church and the army were summoned to make German authority, the German language, and the German bureaucracy paramount among 30,000,000 aliens of Slav, Ural-Altaic, and Latin extraction. Such an attempt spelt absolutism in its crudest form. The Austrian Empire of forty years ago was in all its essentials a mediæval state.

The change came when, as a result of the French and Prussian wars, constitutionalism took the place of autocracy and the "principle of nationality" was partly admitted. Her old rights of self-government were restored to Hungary, and the Austrian Empire converted into the Dual Monarchy. The great sacrifice once made, other reforms came more easily. Austria has grown towards liberalism since 1860 with a rapidity that no other country has equalled. True, its liberalism is oftentimes somewhat specious, but at least the fundamental liberties have been secured. The ideas and policy of METTERNICH are dead and gone. The serf is no longer subject to the lord, and the lord no longer exempt from taxation and military service. Freedom of speech and pen and public meeting is now the possession of every Austrian. The guilds that oppressed and restricted commerce have been removed. Trial by jury has become the law of the land. The suffrage is all but universal, though the system of "representation by classes" really keeps the power in the hands of the nobility, landed gentry, and merchants. For all these reforms, even though racial antagonisms have made some of them practically worthless in operation, the Emperor must be credited. It is he who suggests legislation, makes and unmakes ministries, and directs their policy.

One change the Emperor has not been able to effect. The struggle of the Czechs for home-rule in Bohemia is possibly more bitter to-day than it ever has been. It is a counterpart of the Irish struggle, accentuated by a difference not only of race, but of language. The fever for autonomy has spread over the whole of the Austrian half of the monarchy, and Czechs, Poles, Slovenes, and Italians are each pulling away from German ascendency, and clamoring for such independence as Hungary won in 1860. The dangers of the situation are enormous, and even the Emperor's patient wisdom and conspicuous straightforwardness have been unable to remove them.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

FROM "TRELAWNY OF THE WELLS," NOW PLAYING AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE, NEW YORK.

THE production of "The Merchant of Venice," with which Mr. Augustin Daly opens the thirtieth season of his management in New York and the twentieth season at his present theatre, may be regarded as the chief Shaksperean event of the year. Mr. Daly is the most scholarly of American managers—the only one of any real scholarship; and "The Merchant," one of the best three or four of Shakspere's comedies, has not heretofore been acted on his stage. The production is especially notable for the fact that it has given Miss Ada Rehan an opportunity to add an important character to the brilliant series of her triumphs as an interpreter of our ancient comedies. One may be permitted to question whether the spirit of Miss Rehan's impersonation is in full sympathy with the distinct yet impalpable sweetness that is always a part of Shakspere's more charming heroines. It is certain that she has succeeded best in such parts as lie in the range between Peggy Thrift and Katherine. I confess that I had a doubt as to whether—mirthful or commanding as she has always been at will—she was capable of the gracious dignity of Portia's spirit; but I mention the doubt merely to confess its complete solution. Mr. Daly's admirable schooling has made her first of all a master of the technique of expression. Throughout, Miss Rehan was mistress of the part. She passed from the lighter to the graver shadings with a certainty of effect that left little to be desired; and she uttered her lines, noble and charming at times as few others in Shakspere, with the correctness, flexibility, and justness of rhythm that have always marked her delivery. Her great triumph was, as it should have been, in her most difficult passage—the "quality of mercy" lines, that are capable of being so wretchedly and so magnificently read. Miss Rehan was more than magnificent. The climax of the description of mercy—"It is an attribute to God himself"—had a reverential majesty that has never, to my knowledge, been given it on the stage. The effect was doubtless the consummation of intelligent reading; but for the moment it was as if some majestic priest were speaking from the chancel of a cathedral.

Miss Ada Rehan's first appearance as Portia.

In attempting Shylock an actor has to cope with a problem as to æsthetic values that has not as yet been more than half answered. The history of the old plot to which Shakspere gave enduring form in "The Merchant," together with the known literary and social influences of Elizabethan England, make it little short of certain that Shylock was not in Shakspere's time, as he is now often regarded, the venerable martyr of a hated and downtrodden race. The attitude of Elizabethan England toward the Jew was not unlike the attitude of modern Russia; and indication is not lacking that Shylock's fate in the trial scene was regarded as highly satisfactory and delightful. The earliest performance of the part of which we have adequate record—Lansdowne's version (1701–1741)—makes it almost purely comic. That Shakspere and his company represented the part as comic is not likely; yet it is much more likely that they presented it in a spirit of nineteenth-century humanity. It is probable that, like Caliban, Shylock was conceived in that mingling of comic and tragic moods, so incomprehensible to-day, which is to be seen most obviously in mediæval grotesques.

Old Comedy and Modern Tragedy.

What, then, is the problem that confronted Mr. Daly and Mr. Sidney Herbert? Manifestly to preserve as much of the Shaksperean element as a modern audience will approve. Traditionally the part has had many touches of the grotesque. "I believe," writes Edwin Booth, "that Burbage, Macklin, Cooke, and Kean (as did my father) made Shylock what is technically termed a 'character part'—grotesque in 'make-up' and general treatment." The sentimentally humane construction of this part, making Shylock an avenging and a martyred prophet, which was originated I believe by Macready, Mr. Booth attempted, and discarded in favor of an interpretation in which the grotesque attributes were consciously more pronounced, he says, than in the renderings of the predecessors he names. Among later actors, Irving and Mansfield have dealt freely in the grotesque: for example, when Shylock returns to find his house plundered and his daughter flown, they make the crowd of masquers rush upon the stage and surround him, jeering. The tragedy of his anguish is thus expressed to the audience by means of a truly Elizabethan delight in the trick that has been played on him. Mr. Daly's production discards this "business" of the masquers. Again, when Shylock says of Leah's ring, "I would not have given it for a wilderness of monkeys," Irving and Mansfield suit their delivery to the grotesqueness of the phrase, and provoke laughter, as no doubt Burbage and the rest did before them. Mr. Herbert carefully avoids the laugh. In the trial scene, where Shylock whets his knife on the sole of his shoe, even Booth tried to make the passage serious; but he acknowledged that it was almost impossible to carry out the spirit of the lines and do so, and there are plenty of indications that Shakspere meant the passage as an out-and-out grotesque, the least important of which is Gratiano's pun about Shylock's soul. Throughout the trial scene Gratiano is used, in a manner familiar to any playwright, to point out to the audience the most delightful strokes of the Jew's fate. Mr. Herbert is so chary of his sole-leather that the effect of the business is quite lost, and the reserve with which he renders the whole scene throws the fat of Gratiano's part into the fire. Finally, where Shylock totters from the stage, after having been forced to become a Christian, Mr. Mansfield has added (I believe the credit is his) a very striking bit of grotesque business. He makes Shylock appeal for physical support to a bunch of tribesmen with Jewish beards and false noses, and makes the tribesmen shrink from him with groans and jeers. Mr. Daly has discarded this, as he did the similar business of the masquers in the second act. In a word, Mr. Herbert's Shylock is the predominantly tragic Shylock of Macready's sentimental whitewashing. Remote as this is from Shakspere's comedy of "The Merchant," it is capable, I suppose, of being made highly dignified and appealing before an audience sympathetic to the Jewish race. In Mr. Herbert's rendering I could not see that it was so made; it was overacted and under-vitalized. The only glimpse I had of an artistic intention was in the shadings of expression in his face. These were always interesting, and sometimes effective. Once or twice there was a touch of true tragedy.

Mr. Sidney Herbert as Shylock.

Copyright 1898, by A. Dupont.

MAY IRWIN,
Now playing in "Kate Kip, Buyer," at the Bijou Theatre, New York.

A curious result of this nineteenth-century conception of the play is that it redoubles the difficulty of adapting it to the requirements of our stage. The stage of our ancestors, to begin with, had the meres suggestions of scenery; the slightest hint of external locality, sometimes perhaps even a sign-board, served to indicate the surroundings; the details were filled in by the imaginations of the auditors, aided by the descriptive passages in the dialogue. It followed that the scene could be changed at will, and without the loss of an instant. When the settings are as elaborate as Mr. Daly's, it follows that in order to avoid inordinate expense, and especially in order to avoid the chilling delays caused by shifting the setting the action has to be digested into a few vital scenes. The much we are used to in all Shakspere adaptations; but when Shylock is made to dominate "The Merchant" as purely tragic figure, the interest in the play as a drama ceases at the end of the fourth act, when Shylock leaves the stage. We are nevertheless asked to wait and while the elaborate setting of Portia's garden is prepared and when the curtain rings up, nothing transpires except the little farce-comedy of the rings, and the lines describing Portia's garden. The farce-comedy is neither necessary to the action of the tragedy of "The Merchant," is it particularly amusing. The descriptive passages

A Problem in Staging Shakspere.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google redundant, because their purport has already been presented at a glance by the scene-painter.

> How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank!...
> Sit, Jessica: Look how the floor of heaven
> Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold.
> There's not the smallest orb, that thou beholdest,
> But in his motion like an angel sings.

The moon is necessarily at the back of the stage, and Heaven itself could not say how its rays fall on the bench around the corner upon which Jessica sits. As for the choiring of the "patines of bright gold," one thinks only of the stars pricked in the canvas heaven. Those wonderful lines have about as much pertinence to the scene as the childish inscription, "This is a horse"; and any sensible man would put on his coat at the end of the fourth act and go home to read them unhampered in his study.

The solution of the problem of stagecraft here presented is one of the innumerable triumphs of the Burgtheater of Vienna. The fifth act is there mainly composed of the trial scene; when this is over, a quick change of setting shows an unobtrusive presentation of Portia's garden, and the brief three hundred lines that compose all of Mr. Daly's last act afford a striking and exquisite close. In this way, and in this way only, the scene at Belmont may be given the semblance of constructive pertinence to what is nowadays made the main action of the play.

I mean no indignity to Mr. Daly's setting; it is all too beautiful. Mr. Hoyt's scene before Shylock's house is wonderfully splendid and real. The black cat is very real—the harmless but perhaps not necessary cat that scurries along a coping at the back of the stage. Or perhaps the cat is a necessary cat, and an omen of Shylock's coming fate! That would be tragic indeed. Mr. L. W. Seavey's Judgment Hall is very sombre and beautiful, and Mr. Walter Hann's "gardens of Portia" are good enough to distract attention from Shakspere's lines. In short, they are all too good to be Shakspere. And let us say the same of the actors in Mr. Daly's company. I except only Mr. William Owen, who was as Shaksperean as his inconsiderable part of Gobbo permitted. JOHN CORBIN.

MUSIC

VOLTAIRE, in his "Candide," that sprightly satire not for the Young Person, permits his hero's mentor to remark during a lull in their misfortunes: "Take all this, my boy,

Of Cause and Effect.

as a friendly chain of events in the best of all possible worlds! For, if you hadn't been kicked out of your fine castle for loving Mademoiselle Kunegund—hadn't been thrown into the Inquisition—hadn't run the Baron through the body, and hadn't lost all your precious El Dorado sheep—why, you wouldn't be here eating preserved citron and pistache-nuts." To which Candide answers with exceeding wisdom: "Excellently reasoned out! But all the same, let us take good care of our fruit-garden."

More than average insight into the balance between active and passive would be required to decide what has been the most robust throb of good luck or ill luck, the sharpest change in affairs, in the tale of what a month ago was "The New York Orchestra," to-day "The Paur Orchestra." Earlier circumstances bringing to town its conductor were complex, and not all either cheerful or wise. Atop of them came a début of the new symphony-band to fix the notice of the city's connoisseurs on it.

Exit "The New York Orchestra."

LEO SCHULZ,
Violoncellist of "The Paur Orchestra."

Next ensued the total shipwreck of its manager, the abandonment of the Astoria Concerts, the Orchestra's consequent peril, a swift search for a new manager and private support, the finding of both, then a new name and new outset. Such goings on mean a wonderful knack at making history for itself on the part of even the most alert and enterprising orchestra existing.

The main and best sequel, however, is that, Mr. Victor Thrane having courageously undertaken the new orchestra's further career, it makes a fresh start, and seems to have a fair chance of getting out of the Forest of Sorrowful Haps, despite its manager's ominous surname. It played again twice last week, at its first public "rehearsal" and concert (reckoning by the Carnegie Hall series) as "The Paur Orchestra." And it played so superbly as to make one believe that a sweet rose can smell even sweeter when classed by a straightforward managerial botany. The programme offered Goldmark's "Sakuntala" Overture, Saint-Saëns's G minor piano-forte concerto, Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." The same general description that was given of the band's work on the occasion preceding its difficulties holds more than good now. It is the finest orchestra of the city in quality and drilling, and ought to be a peculiar source of pride and gratitude. It would be ranked a fine one anywhere. It is pleasant to observe such a wide critical consensus as has honored its merit. I repeat it—only from two symphonic bands, each foreign to our city, have such concerts come. They are the result of authority, of instruction, and of pains. The rich Orientalism and fancifulness of Goldmark's tone-poem, and the alternated vivacity, romance, and pompous dignity of Wagner's programme-overture are fine tests. Both were delivered by this Paur Orchestra with a firm, precise sonority, and with touches of elegance, especially in the ensemble passages, for which we have grown used to look toward Boston and Chicago and Paris. Mr. Paur already has developed his string array well on toward a solid, smooth, and yet highly vitalized element of his band, with that tone indispensable to refined and well-balanced symphony-playing. This choir includes principals of indisputable value, as Messrs. Nahan Franko and Leo Schulz. The quality of such work at either concert was shown not only in enjoyable music, but in the ugly Tschaikovsky symphony. I am glad to see Mr. Paur introduce here at last the familiar foreign practice of having the violinists and violists play standing, at least during the symphonies. It is a custom of specially good results if the string band be rather scanty in proportion to the rest of the forces. Perhaps, in consequence, his Orchestra will be called "the stand-up orchestra" instead of the Paur one. But, in any sense, it is a band to rise to the occasion. Mr. Leopold Godowsky, of the Chicago Conservatory, was the soloist at afternoon and evening concerts. He has not played here in several seasons. He is of the younger foreign pianists of the first class as to execution, and while hardly a distinctive player of expression, is by no means lacking in that trait, when the work has anything particular to express—a thing not common in the compositions of Saint-Saëns, that greatly overestimated music-maker. The next set of concerts by the Paur Orchestra occur December 9 and 10.

Enter "The Paur Orchestra."

NAHAN FRANKO,
Concert-Master of "The Paur Orchestra."

The country at large may decide to remember this year as that of the accession of Puerto Rico, or of Mr. Roosevelt's election, or of many other notable incidents. Musical New-Yorkers will be justified in remembering it as the year in which so surprisingly large a number of our comic operas and musical plays proved to be really good things, that we might expect a positive regeneration of ideas as to such jocund creations. The Casino has fallen into the good line with "A Dangerous Maid." The Viennese original, "Heisses Blut," has been "adapted," whatever that may mean, by Sydney Rosenfeld, with the musical or other co-operation of Messrs. Leopold Schenck, Frederick J. Eustis, and Louis Harrison. Some of their additions are brilliant excrescences on the original German structure. Others are excrescences without being brilliant. For one matter, the Imperial Hofburg Theater, the most serious and dignified stage in Europe, except the Théâtre Français, is turned into a playhouse like the Theater an der Wien, the Carl, or the Ronacher establishment! A really graceful, simple story is the piece's foundation; incidentally a story with a wholesome moral that shows itself behind all the blaze of feminine stage pictures and riot of costumes, in good taste and bad taste, and that vaudevillism in general that gives the piece its Casino quality. The silly English title merely labels the heroine, Ilona, a young Hungarian girl whom jealousy tempts on the very evening of her wedding to desert her humble lover and to run away with a Viennese Lothario. Ilona fancies that she does so. She also fancies that she leads a risky life in Vienna as an actress of wild vogue, that she nearly disgraces her good village-relatives by her very successes, that she is deserted by her lover, fights a duel with a stage rival, is wounded dangerously, and so on; while never actually crossing the Rubicon that makes her a creature of dishonor. And then, all at once, Ilona wakes up. She is safe on the stair of her father's rural home, just where she fell asleep. Her whole escapade has been a night's dreaming, her wedding morning is shining in her eyes, and her lover and father and innocent girl friends all come running in to clasp the frightened penitent to their arms. This is certainly pretty as a motive, if not wholly new. The seven tableaux make a distinctly enjoyable music play, with much comedy, and just a bit of pathos in them. "A Dangerous Maid" is exceedingly well acted, and not ill sung. Miss Lessing (Ilona) and Miss Laura Burt (Fanchette) are extremely faithful in that sound stage technique that makes of emotional light rôles all the serious success that can be made of them when intelligence is thrown into the effort. A spirited duel with rapiers is a mutual and novel climax to their effective work. Mr. Sam Bernard is genuinely comic as a wig-maker (Schmalz), and discreet in his foolery. Mr. William Norris succeeds, perhaps as well as any one could, with that especially tiresome stage type, an old beau (Panagl), of the low-comedian order of exploiting. The musical numbers in the original piece are pretty, and the present Casino chorus has good material, needing rather more drilling. The "quick changes" in the piece are well handled, the handsome scenery looks considerably like Vienna, and an excellent Hungarian band sounds exceedingly like it.

"A Dangerous Maid," at the Casino.

In a famous bon mot Sheridan declared that easy writing is curst hard reading. Piano-forte concerts, of late years, called by the polite "recitals," are well enough as musical elucidations, or even pleasures when good, and given under those suitable conditions now grown rarer and rarer in this part of the world. But their reporting is flat and unprofitable to the average reader of musical reviews. I am sure that those of us who avoid in print the intricacies of our topic are loved for such reticence. Mr. Rosenthal has just finished his first series of such afternoons for the present. Miss Adele aus der Ohe, limiting herself to a couple, has completed this week that modest stint. The next series of general fame probably will be from Mr. Emil Sauer when he comes in January, unless Madame Madeline Schiller will not break the pious custom. Presently I shall be grateful for the musical veteran's privilege of speaking some plain truths about this whole question of piano-forte recitals considered as business or as art. As now offered, the species could be dispensed with almost altogether. Their value and interest are growing more and more legendary.

Of Piano-forte Recitals.

Last week the Castle Square Opera Company undertook Planquette's graceful opera-comique, "The Chimes of Normandy." It was not a happy effort; and those of us who are old opera-goers have such clear remembrances of how well the "Chimes" can be sung and acted, that the performance of last week seemed sweet bells jangled out of tune. One vivid picture of the past—Peakes as Gaspard, the village miser—has not been approached by later singing comedians of our stage. It is not in imagination either that the Castle Square Company's work lately has sounded as if the principals were oversinging, and were tired. Especially is new tenor aid desirable. Cannot some useful new-comers be found here or wooed over from the Carl Rosa contingent or from the Savoy? In any state of activity to the contrary, it will be better to let alone Planquette, Gilbert and Sullivan, or to send the hard-working ladies and gentlemen now at the American on a little educational visit to London, to be brought to a knowledge of how such things as "Iolanthe" and "The Pirates" and "The Chimes" should be said and sung. This week the experiment of doing Puccini's "La Bohème" will be tried. E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

LEOPOLD GODOWSKY,
Pianist, of the Chicago Conservatory.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HE MARKET, PONCE.

vicker side-panniers, from which valiant chanticleers hrust forth their heads and lift their strident voices in lefiant challenge.

It is not to be supposed that game-bird fighting is followed by the entire population as a means of recreation, for the wealthier and commercial classes, while not eschewing the amusement of watching a main now and then, take no active part in the pit. The followers of the gaff are, however, not numbered entirely, as in our own country, among the tougher element, but it has as its devotees most of the poorer element, laborers, or peons, who work on the large plantations for hire, and have little garden plots of their own to supply their family needs. They are quiet, hard-working people, when work is to be had, who enjoy intensely their few simple pleasures, and go into ecstasies over their great sport of cock-maining.

Around the cockpit are gathered two hundred jabbering peasants, in cotton clothes and loose blouses, with a sprinkling of the better dressed and more opulent townsmen clad in immaculate white duck, set off with starched bosoms, collars, and small flowing ties. The ring is crowded with men carrying their pet prize-cocks under their arms, all striving to secure wagers, and vociferously proclaiming the virtues of their respective birds as fighters.

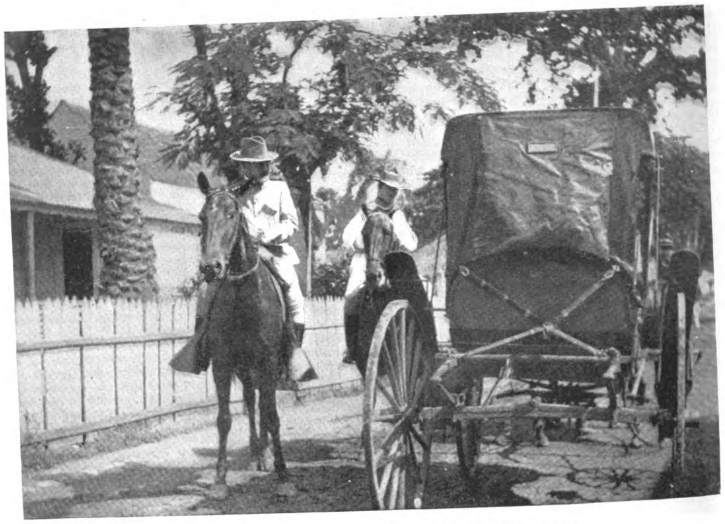
The first fight has been arranged, and the referee claps his hands as a signal for all gathered in the ring to move outside, as only the "handlers" are allowed within the enclosure. The birds are fought with their own gaffs, instead of with the metal razor-edged blade which is strapped to the legs of cocks in the United States, and a great deal of preparatory scraping and polishing of the bone gaffs takes place, until they become needlelike in sharpness. Then all the crest or neck feathers are cut off with scissors, and sometimes the comb is trimmed low—but not often, as all the minor details of handling, so rigorously observed among our own gambling fraternity, seem here to be dispensed with.

The birds are teased into fighting humor while held in the hand, and viciously pluck at each other's head; and now they are dropped on the ground with a quick movement, and at the order of the referee they are at it. High up in the air they strike the first few plunges, and one dodges under, and the uppermost bird lands over his enemy with a surprised look, but whirls and grabs his opponent on the red comb with a strong beak, and plants his gaff fairly on the side of the other's head. A roar of approval goes up from the crowd who have backed this bird, and a counter set of suppressed hi's of fear rises from those wishing for the success of the other favorite. The fight is fast and furious.

Time is called. In the centre of the ring lies a small square outlined with sunken wooden sticks, and on its opposite edges the birds are set. The mongrel spotted bird goes for his game colored enemy immediately, and strikes him three times to the other's once. Poor fellow! his fight is over; he turns and runs away, followed by his fierce tantalizer. Once more they are rubbed into shape. One vicious gaff as they come together, and the red bird sinks dead, the bone lance going deep into his eye and brain.

The crowd surges into the ring and the money changes hands, while the owner of the dead bird gathers up the bundle of bloody feathers with some show of tenderness.

On and on it goes for hours, until the hundred contestants have been reduced by half, and the once bright-plumaged bragging birds, who dared each other on as they struggled at the end of their restraining bark thongs from the balcony, have changed to bedraggled bruised fellows with hanging heads and bent legs, and whose drooping eyelids tell the story of the desperate fight.



They are only birds, but there is something very pathetic in witnessing their fight for life—fighting to kill, if you prefer—surrounded by a concourse of howling human beings, who cheer on each stroke that draws another drop of vital blood. It is a brutal sport, this baiting of birds against one another, who fight with blinded bloody eyes, not seeing their enemy at the finish, but striking wildly, unflinchingly, at the superior force as they die; but it is the one, the only, amusement which these people could afford, the only one offered them by a nation which has crushed out human hearts and dwarfed human minds by three centuries of malicious officialism.

There was no drinking, no carousing, among the spectators; no ugly swearing, no bad feeling engendered, and no taint of rowdyism, such as we see in our own country at such gatherings. Instead, with one accord, the people were out to enjoy their holiday in gay good-humor, and while excitement rose to a tremendous pitch, no harsh word was spoken and threatening looks were unknown. That the amusement was brutal and of low order seemed not to occur to any one. They had been taught this form of pastime, and conscience did not trouble them.

Through the little entrance-gate, built from the wood of the royal palm, the crowd moved from a cock-fight to a solemn Catholic ceremony to be held in the near-by cemetery, and in the lead strode a little black young ster in one of our soldiers' cast-off campaign hats, his bare black chest shining through the front of a dirty cotton coat. What cared he that it had cost him a silve piece hardly gained by blacking the army's shoes? H was happy in the possession of a handful of copper cen tavos, which did credit to his acumen as a bird-backer and made him envied by his youthful playmates. Hi twinkling eyes and merry laughs sobered quickly to awe stricken glance and solemn expression as the black-garbe priest strode by.

Verily only such a mercurial race could have stood th blighting abuses of a despotic government with com placence.

WILLIAM DINWIDDIE.

GENERAL GRANT ON HORSEBACK AT ARROYO, PUERTO RICO.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LONDON.

November 12, 1898.

LORD SALISBURY'S speech at the Guildhall was remarkable for its omissions. China, Bahr-el-Ghazal, Morocco, were not named, although the seizure of Niu-chwang by Russian troops is now practically confirmed by Lord Charles Beresford. It was the speech of a wise but a tired old man who knows of danger he cannot reveal. The Premier's references to Egypt were complementary to Sir Michael Hicks-Beach's declaration, earlier in the year, that we are "not going to be worried out of Egypt." Lord Salisbury says, in effect, that "we are not going to be worried in Egypt," and that if the British Empire is to be treated as a French pin-cushion, "occupation will be succeeded by a protectorate." Apart from the Bahr-el-Ghazal, of which I speak later, a test case will shortly arise which will determine the question as to whether the French continue or abandon their habit of inserting unexpected pins in John Bull's ample corporation. The present mandate for the Mixed Tribunals in Egypt expires early next year. Revision of these Mixed Tribunals is inevitable, and the decision that will be arrived at by England will be determined beforehand by the previous settlement of outstanding points still in dispute in the Bahr-el-Ghazal.

Lord Salisbury is severely taken to task by hot-blooded amateurs for not having seized the opportunity, on the 9th of November, for declaring a protectorate over Egyptian territory. To have done so prior to the final settlement of French pretensions to Egyptian soil would be futile, would deprive Great Britain of her impregnable legal position, would supply French Anglophobes with inflammable and explosive material for their campaign of passion, besides creating a precedent that would certainly be followed elsewhere. Much, perhaps far too much, is made of the language of the Anglophobist press in France. Probably books of geography and history used in French national schools reveal the real sentiments of successive French governments towards England more accurately than anything that appears in an ephemeral press. School-books commonly used in the lycées contain the most extraordinary evidence of envenomed and revengeful enmity against England, as does the atlas or cartes croquis used at St. Cyr. Niox's Expansion Européenne is a work of a very high class, and is regarded as a great and esteemed authority on geography. All the misfortunes of France during the present century are attributed in this work to England—unjustly as a matter of fact; not unnaturally as a matter of sentiment. In meeting these French accusations the defects of the English character are reflected in our press. Want of imagination is one of them. The attitude of English journalists towards France is one of pained surprise. "England," says the great British organs of public opinion, "only asks to be let alone. We wish neither to injure France, nor to curb her colonial aspirations, nor even to challenge her legitimate efforts to compensate herself in Asia and in Africa for the loss of Alsace and Lorraine." This attitude of the English press is short-sighted and slightly silly if we only look at the facts.

Since the Norman Conquest, twenty-two times have England and France been locked in a death-struggle. Of the past one hundred and fifty years the two nations have fought each other during thirty-seven, always for the same thing, and France has invariably gone to the wall. Our last five wars with France were one prolonged struggle for sea power—that is, for trade, territory, and wealth. During this period of struggle the population of England and Wales never exceeded nine millions, and never during this period were the people of France fewer than twenty-seven millions. In the year of Waterloo there were twenty-nine millions of French, and only eleven million English in England. Now all is changed. The French have increased by ten million in ninety-four years. The English have increased by more than twenty. Ireland, which was seething in rebellion in 1798, is now not only impotent, but quiet and partially contented. The numbers of the Irish people are reduced by half since General Hoche entered Bantry Bay. Today the United Kingdom is solid against French aggression, with the exception of a handful of Irish agitators and their followers. Are not these galling facts to thoughtful Frenchmen? It was from France that England snatched Canada, India, Egypt, and the command of the sea. A new Clive of Africa is to-day building an empire which, many think, may rival India itself, while at Fashoda an expedition conceived to solace French pride has resulted in a fresh and incurable wound upon Gallic susceptibilities. The hatred of France to England, however inconvenient, is natural. Lord Salisbury's sagacious and massive mind now apparently accepts with reluctance the truth, long since recognized by the majority of his fellow-subjects, that the conditions for an enduring friendship with the Latin races do not exist. Hence the immense efforts made by the Premier to bring the English-speaking peoples into sympathy with each other. French decay seems to be the only visible alternative to a renewal of the old struggle with this country.

Notwithstanding Lord Salisbury's speech, public opinion is still puzzled. Great events are looming on the horizon. The whole strength of the British Empire is not being exerted merely to illustrate the connection between one "unfriendly act" and its consequences after the surrender of France. Other difficulties exist, scarcely hinted at. For the first time, however, at all events in this century, the country watches the approach of war without panic or flurry. So far as France is concerned, King George the Third's flamboyant declaration before the outbreak of the last naval war with our neighbors, in May, 1803, might be used to-day. Here is a bit of it:

"It was universally allowed that the uniform system of hostile aggression and insult exercised by the French government for the last twelve months had been carried to such an extent that England was degraded and her honor forever lost if she did not again appeal to . . . . the spirit of the British nation, to the energies that form the proud characteristic of a free people, and, above all, to that overruling Providence under whose guidance she had so often asserted triumphantly her own cause."

Much water has flowed under London bridges since May 18, 1803. Popular hatred of the French has gradually ceased, and is replaced by liking diluted with contempt. The international situation is simple, but is, however, little understood.

Two central facts stand out like twin peaks against the setting sun—firstly, for sixteen years France has deliberately elected to wound English self-respect in all parts of the world; secondly, the despatch of the word "mobilize," from Whitehall would effectually stop these "unfriendly acts" forthwith, and for at least two generations would prevent their repetition. The accumulation of injury caused by the encroaching spirit of France has struck the popular imagination. The masses are not angry, but they are determined. Hence English opinion attaches little importance to Fashoda. In France, Fashoda is looked on as the supreme situation of the drama. To get the French out of Fashoda is a trifle. It settles nothing. Tail-twisting must cease. To get the French out of Fashoda without putting an end to the causes that took them in would be childish. It is therefore the policy of the government, with the consent of the British people, to arrange outstanding differences between the two countries, peacefully if possible, but to arrange them. No precautions are relaxed, no cessation of armaments will be thought of. The immediate cause of rupture, if peace is broken, may be over places occupied by the French in the Bahr-el-Ghazal, to which they have exactly the same title as they have to Fashoda—that is, none at all. Or it may be over Newfoundland, Morocco, China, or interference with the United States in the Philippines. The English people are bent on a solid peace—if necessary they will fight like devils to get it.

Five French settlements on or near the Nile are in dispute. I learn that the French are willing to surrender three, but they still refuse to surrender the remaining two. As a matter of fact, they are manœuvring to gain time. For them winter is an unfortunate period of the year for a naval war, and the chapter of accidents may bring allies. They are being sought diligently. Only twelve thousand French men-o'-war's men are habitually afloat in the winter season. Rough water suits the Anglo-Saxon temperament. The Latin Celt does not like high winds and steep swells. One immediate point of danger I learn to be the contingency of serious attempts on the part of the French to re-enforce the French colonies, as their seizure in war-time would form the only leverage for the arrangement of peace. Madagascar, Miquelon, St.-Pierre, and Algeria are being carefully watched. The time for a conflict is now opportune for England; it may not remain so long. The German Emperor has ostentatiously assumed the protection of a section of the Catholics, both in the Far and Near East, and he has as openly rejected the corner-stone of the Bismarckian foreign policy—i. e., the conciliation of Russia. He is apparently bent on annoying the United States—our best friend. French influence in the East has for years been growing weaker, and the Sultan has suddenly discovered a friend in the ruler of the strongest military state in Europe. Turkey is in a sense another Egypt, and German protection of the Turk is necessarily antagonistic to the influence of Russia. Russia's aim has been to keep Turkey in a state of weakness and decay. Germany's aim is the regeneration of the Ottoman Empire. In the sphere of European politics, therefore, Germany and Russia are at last more or less open antagonists. Events are pushing the United States and Great Britain nearer together, but whether the cause of peace or the real welfare of America is served by the new imperialism on your side of the water is a question on which the prophets differ. On the field of prophecy we are all equal. The Kaiser's proposed visit to a Spanish port, when Gibraltar coal was nearer and better, does not make him more popular in England. The visit would not have been construed as "a friendly act" towards the United States. Something is in the air about Morocco.

From the Far East trustworthy information reaches me which shows that Japan believes her opportunity is coming. Should Russia move, she will find Japan at her throat. Russia, therefore, with her internal troubles of famine, poverty, and widespread corruption, is naturally unwilling to pull hot chestnuts out of the Egyptian fire for the sake of France. Without Russia, Austria, Abyssinia, or her Dervish friends, France will have to face the English music single-handed; and as the Foreign Ministers of France, who flit through the palace on the Quai d'Orsay as transient figures in a biograph, do not seem to believe England's word, it is possible that they will be more reasonable after being confronted with the spectacle of England's sword. There is, as I have hinted, a great deal under the surface which is not publicly known. The Egyptian authorities have in their possession a letter from a French officer to the Khalifa, together with two French flags sent to the leader of the Dervishes. The messenger who conveyed these interesting mementos of the emissaries of civilization is also in the hands of the Egyptian government. It is to be presumed that our rulers are withholding the publication of these facts, for diplomatic reasons, but they are true. If I were able to give my authority for stating them, the civilized world would wonder. It is not the opinion of ministers that there will be war this year, but the question of peace or war rests in the hands of French or Spanish politicians whose record of levity in the conduct of foreign affairs is not encouraging for the prospects of peace.

Lord Kitchener, of course, is the hero of the hour. He is the darling of the ladies, the idol of the crowd, and the hero of the nation. Since his arrival at Dover he has won golden opinions from every one. The crowd at Victoria Station on his arrival was one of the most extraordinary sights I ever saw in England. The crowd was like the Jubilee crowd last year, but was charged with electricity. Admiration and respect for the man who does as apart from the man who talks is a feature common to all the English-speaking people. But poor Lord Kitchener was nearly killed by the ardor of his admirers, and he was heard to say that the struggle on the platform at Victoria Station was worse than Omdurman. At the Mansion House dinner he spoke without notes, in a clear resonant voice, and embodied in his modest and business-like statement the qualities which Englishmen like and understand. At the Guildhall in the afternoon he was apparently unable to read the oath administered to him, the words being repeated to him by an aide-de-camp. A member of the ministry, however, tells me that Lord Kitchener's eyesight has not failed him, for the reading of print in the form of accounts in papers connected with Egypt is performed by the Sirdar at the War Office almost daily. His eyes are affected, but not incurably.

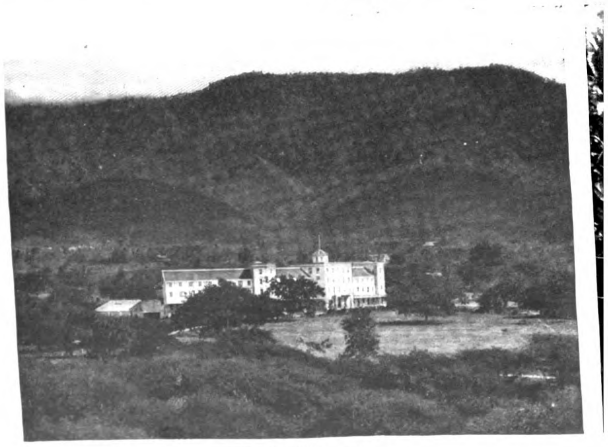
With reference to Lord Kitchener's character, a most interesting study, it appears that there is an essential difference between him and his predecessors on the English roll of military fame. The average British general is governed more or less, and more rather than less, by tradition, by personal considerations, by regimental, social, and racial sympathies or antipathies, and especially by esprit de corps. Lord Kitchener is influenced but little by these things. Fitness, and fitness alone, is the avenue to his regard. Two or three scions of the royal and the ducal houses were, it is true, accepted for service by him on the Upper Nile, and he brought them all back safely. Perhaps the Sirdar may have shown a little human weakness in accepting some of these lads, but in Lord Edward Cecil, the son of the Prime Minister, he gained the support of an able soldier and keen intellect. Other names might be mentioned with which the inexorable condition of fitness is not so easily associated. Lord Salisbury, who is not a hero-worshipper, is said to have formed an unbounded admiration for Kitchener. He has publicly referred to him as a financier, a diplomatist, and a soldier in language descriptive of an Admirable Crichton.

It is interesting to note that in the whole of the speeches delivered at the Kitchener banquet on the 4th of November, and the Lord Mayor's annual dinner to ministers on the 9th, the word "duty" occurs five times, while the word "glory" was only used twice, in both instances by Lord Salisbury, and then, first, in connection with the native Egyptian, as opposed to the British, army, and second, in reference to "that peace which is the glory and sustenance of our empire." The distinctive note of empires that endure is that of duty rather than empire.

The great interest felt in England at the prospect of a transfer of sovereignty over the Philippines from the Spanish monarchy to the United States, as I have more than once stated, is partly due to national self-interest. The Philippines in American hands, administered by United States officers, would not only present an object-lesson to the world of American capacity for administering distant dependencies, but would add great moral weight to England's efforts in the Far East to maintain the open door, and to her system of controlling the tropics. Knowing that General Merritt's opinions on the subject carry great weight with the readers of the WEEKLY, I am able to say that the following is an accurate reflection of his views. There is no doubt that whatever may be the result of the commission now sitting in Paris (which, by-the-way, I hear is not unlikely, in certain events, to transfer its sittings to London), the bulk of the inhabitants of the Philippines agree in desiring a change of government, and would eagerly welcome the American flag. If the annexation of the islands should become an accomplished fact, the long period of Spanish misrule will necessitate, for some time to come, military administration. The native leaders, Aguinaldo included, have little capacity for rule, and if one of them were set in authority, rivals would conspire to undermine it, and the anarchy would ensue which is inevitable when power is intrusted to incapable hands. Whatever changes may otherwise become necessary, a reformation of Roman Catholic Church predominance is essential. General Merritt tells me a fact which will go right home to all Americans and Englishmen with relations in the Far East. In the Philippines no Protestant can be married or baptized. Protestants desirous of entering into holy matrimony are obliged to go to Hong-kong to find a spot where liberty is combined with order and religions are unfettered. No missionaries or services are permitted outside the pale of that type of Romanism prevalent in the Philippines. I remember Cardinal Manning once telling me, with tears in his voice, that the Romanism prevalent in some of the South American republics and in the Philippines was of the unreformed character that disgraced the Middle Ages in European history. General Merritt confines himself, of course, in expressing this view, to the palpable necessity for the establishment of law and order, with such liberty of the subject as is accorded to the inhabitants of British tropical dependencies. Too much interference with the native is inexpedient, but all must be taught to obey the law which prevents liberty-lovers from interfering with the liberty of others. Above all, an honest and capable administration is essential, and therefore political interference from home with the officers appointed to govern the Philippines would be fatal to the administrative reputation of the United States in the Far East. Cuba is, of course, too near to be treated as a colony, but as regards the Philippines the experience of British rule in India, Ceylon, Singapore, and Hong-kong suggests to General Merritt that permanent and well-chosen American civil-service administration is the only alternative to military control when the islands are ready for the change.

General Merritt was naturally reticent about the course of events before the commission in Paris, but he expressed opinions upon the Anglo-French dispute now raging which are of value as emanating from a dispassionate friend of both nations, and a soldier and administrator of great distinction. The general thinks that the French army is better than it was three and a half years ago, that the men are bigger and better set up, that the discipline is improved, and that as a fighting-machine it is stronger than at any previous period. Upon the French navy he refrained from expressing an opinion, but entertained no doubt as to the result of a naval struggle between France and England. The capture of the French West India Islands by the English would be one of the early results of the war, and the transfer of the French West Indian possessions to the United States is a question that might possibly enter the arena of practical politics a few weeks after war breaks out. General Merritt is of the opinion that there is much behind of which the public know nothing, and that great events are looming in the near future.

ARNOLD WHITE.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

TYPICAL NATIVE HALF-BREED (NEGRO AND COO

BARRACKS AT NEWCASTLE—4000 FEET AB

CONSTANT SPRING HOTEL.

JAMAICA—SCENES IN ENGLAND'S CHIEF

PHOTOGRAPHS FROM PHIL. ROBINSON, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

NEW BUILDING FOR THE JEFFERSON MEDICAL COLLEGE, WALNUT AND TENTH STREETS, PHILADELPHIA.
J. H. WINDRAM, ARCHITECT.
The building is now in course of construction, and will be completed by June 28, 1899.

THE CHINAMAN AND THE EXCLUSION LAWS.

FEW laws can be enforced absolutely. For instance, there is a law against breaking into houses, yet, in spite of the police, burglaries sometimes occur. This much, however, the burglary law does do: it prevents the crime from becoming very common. So it is in the case of the Chinese-exclusion laws. Though they may not keep out of the country every Chinaman not legally entitled to enter the United States, yet if they prevent Chinamen from becoming numerous enough to do us harm, their main purpose is accomplished.

A few Chinamen scattered through our population are not a great injury. The laundrymen found in our villages and small cities are certainly inoffensive, the Chinese colonies in Boston, Philadelphia, and New York are not too large to be under strict police control. It is only San Francisco, with its Chinatown of 70,000 people, that suffers from the contact of the Chinese coolie.

If Chinamen were being smuggled into the country by the thousands the danger would indeed be great, but experience proves that stories of Chinese smuggling are almost always exaggerated, and are often created merely to furnish a sensational newspaper article. Figures—which can be made to lie so easily—are especially misleading when dealing with our Chinese population. Owing to the peculiar character of the Chinese immigrant, his timid, suspicious, and secretive habits, it is impossible to obtain a reliable census. But even a cursory examination will show that Chinamen in the United States are not rapidly becoming more numerous, are not increasing as rapidly as the non-Mongolian population. A government official, an expert in Chinese matters and a man of conservative judgment, gives it as his opinion that we now have few more Chinamen in this country than we had in 1886. Taking into account the rapid increase of the non-Mongolian population, it can readily be seen that, as the exclusion laws are now enforced, there is no danger of our being overrun by the Chinese coolie.

An examination of the records of the New York Custom House shows how few Chinamen attempt entry at that port. During the eleven weeks beginning October 18, 1897, and ending December 31, 1897, there were admitted through the port of New York thirty-nine Chinamen of the exempt or merchant class. Twelve of these were actors in a Chinese play, who left New York, and after acting a week or two in England, returned, so that these twelve were not original entries. During that same period eight alleged merchants, not having the necessary certificates, were refused admission. Some Chinese have been entering through Burlington, Vermont, by means of the "boy and father" scheme. The efficient work of Chinese inspectors is rapidly making this attempted fraud too costly for the Chinamen and their lawyers.

On the Pacific coast, where the character of the Chinese immigrant is understood, public sentiment upholds the exclusion laws. This is not so in the East, and here the people's indifference or open hostility is one of the greatest difficulties encountered by the Chinese inspectors. It is this which makes it impossible to strictly enforce the laws, which gives United States commissioners and judges an excuse for favoring the Chinamen brought before them, which enables corrupt officials, undetected and unpunished, to grow rich through Chinese bribes.

The widespread sentiment in the East in favor of "poor John Chinaman" originates largely with those good people who teach in Chinese missions and Sunday-schools. It is unfair to deny results to their unselfish labor, they say; and it may be so that there are Chinese converts whose Christian virtues outshine those of the church-going descendants of the Puritan. There doubtless are many cases where Chinamen go to Sunday-school for other reasons than to learn English and to be petted by American women. But if the instance of the sincere convert is cited, it is only too easily offset by occasions when the people of San Francisco have been shocked by the ill deeds of Chinatown—brutal assaults, disgusting exhibitions of vice, and cold-blooded murders.

Putting aside as exceptions both the convert and the murderer, it remains to examine the traits of the ordinary Chinese immigrant, and to determine if he be a desirable acquisition.

At first sight it seems almost incomprehensible that any government should wish to exclude a race so peaceable and industrious—apparently such desirable material for future citizens. "A people," exclaim their advocates, "who might be the schoolmasters of the Western World; who delight us with their learning and their moral precepts; who have behind them centuries and centuries of civilization; who were scholars and statesmen when we were barbarians!" These admirers of the Chinese overlook the fact that it is precisely in the old Mongolian civilization that the danger lies. The Chinaman, be he mandarin or coolie, cannot, if he would, escape from this civilization; he feels its momentum pressing him on in the paths trod by his ancestors. Unless there should be an upheaval and change in China itself, he will continue in these paths, uninfluenced by the mushroom civilization of the West. The Chinaman's theory of life is absolutely opposed to ours; the two cannot combine; one theory must destroy the other. Will the law of self-preservation allow us to admit vast numbers of immigrants bitterly hostile in their ideas and frankly intending to remain so?—immigrants who covet our dollars and scorn us as barbarians? Have we not the right, and is it not our duty, to demand that those coming here to enjoy the advantages which our fathers bought with toil and war should in some measure accept our fathers' ideas? A slight knowledge of the Chinese immigrant is enough to convince one that he does not mean to learn from us, does not want to be like us. For generations he has been taught to scorn everything not Chinese. Every superstition he holds sacred teaches him to cling to the beliefs and prejudices—the old civilization—of his own country.

When a barbarian comes among civilized people, it is not long before he begins to adopt their ideas. He brings a fresh, strong soil in which civilization can work. New ideas are eagerly seized by his awakening intelligence. This happened when the Goth came in contact with Roman civilization; so it was when the African savage was brought to America; so it is when the semicivilized peasant comes to us from Europe. The most ignorant immigrant from Russia or Germany or Italy assimilates our American ideas; he seizes on them eagerly and gratefully, and in a generation or two he is one of us.

How different is the case of the Chinaman! Our ideas make no impression on his complacent mind. The most debased coolie thinks himself fully civilized. Unhealthy and dwarfed in body and in morals, made foul by ancient vices, his blood often tainted by leprosy, the Chinese coolie is the natural product of an old, worn-out, rotten civilization. The barbarian furnishes a strong, fresh material on which to work; the Chinaman is clay that has been kneaded and kneaded, over and over, by what we of the West consider a false and vicious civilization, until the clay has become soiled and offensive. Is it too much to say that the ordinary coolie immigrant—polluted by too long and intimate and confined a relationship with his kind—is like a sickly puppy, made sickly by too much handling.

Should a society already engaged in a struggle to assimilate its many and discordant elements be burdened by an influx of thousands of these Chinese coolies?

A new era seems to be dawning for China—an era when she will be forced at the bayonet's point to admit European ideas. It is a harsh method of teaching, but, owing to his peculiar characteristics, it is the only way in which the Chinaman can be taught. Force him to realize how antiquated and irrational and impotent are his ideas of life, and he may shake off his complacency and be ready to learn. The war with Japan has already had a most salutary effect. Shortly before it broke out, Li Hung-Chang is reported to have called the Japanese a race of monkeys, beneath the notice of his all-potent Emperor. That war gave a rude blow to China's senile complacency, and now it is likely to be again disturbed by the guns of European war-ships. When the Chinaman is less complacent and scornful, when he is ready to throw aside the superstition and pseudo-civilization of his ancestors, and comes to us wishing to adopt Western ideas, we can afford to welcome him.

Until then the exclusion laws are a necessity; they should be upheld and enforced, and not only by a few government officials. Public sentiment in the East, as well as on the Pacific coast, should be glad to give them its support. However, in spite of all difficulties, the exclusion laws are enforced so as to accomplish their main purpose. The United States are not being overrun by Chinese coolies.

FRANCIS STERNE PALMER,
Acting Deputy Collector representing the Collector of Customs in the Chinese Bureau, Port of New York.

THE NEW STATE CAPITOL, HELENA, MONTANA.—BELL & KENT, ARCHITECTS.
Now in course of construction.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE AWKWARD AGE.*

A Novel.

BY HENRY JAMES,

AUTHOR OF "DAISY MILLER," "AN INTERNATIONAL EPISODE," ETC.

XXIII.

MRS. BROOKENHAM'S visitors had been gone half an hour, but she was still in the drawing-room when Nanda came back. The girl found her, on the sofa, in a posture that might have represented restful oblivion, but that, after a glance, our young lady appeared to interpret as mere intensity of thought. It was a condition from which, at all events, Mrs. Brook was quickly roused by her daughter's presence; she opened her eyes and put down her feet, so that the two were confronted as closely as persons may be when it is only one of them who looks at the other. Nanda, gazing vaguely about and not seeking a seat, slowly drew off her gloves while her mother's sad eyes considered her from top to toe. "Tea's gone," Mrs. Brook then said as if there were something in the loss peculiarly irretrievable. "But I suppose," she added, "he gave you all you want."

"Oh dear yes, thank you—I've had lots."

Nanda hovered there slim and charming, feathered and ribboned, dressed in thin, fresh fabrics and faint colors, with something to the effect of it all to which the sweeter, deeper melancholy in her mother's eyes seemed happily to testify. "Just turn round, dear." The girl immediately obeyed, and Mrs. Brook once more took everything in. "The back's best—only she didn't do what she said she would. How they do lie!" she gently quavered.

"Yes, but we lie so to them." Nanda had swung round again, producing evidently on her mother's part, by the admirable "hang" of her light skirts, a still deeper pence. "Do you mean the middle fold?—I knew she wouldn't. I don't want my back to be best—I don't walk backward."

"Yes." Mrs. Brook resignedly mused; "you dress for yourself."

"Oh, how can you say that," the girl asked, "when I never stick in a pin but what I think of you?"

"Well," Mrs. Brook moralized, "one must always, I consider, think, as a sort of point de repère, of some one good person. Only it's best if it's a person one's afraid of. You do very well, but I'm not enough. What one really requires is a kind of salutary terror. I never stick in a pin without thinking of your cousin Jane. What is it that some one quotes somewhere about some one's having said that 'Our antagonist is our helper—he prevents us from being superficial'? The extent to which, with my poor clothes, the Duchess prevents me—!" It was a measure Mrs. Brook could give only by the general soft wail of her submission to fate.

"Yes, the Duchess isn't a woman, is she? She's a standard."

The speech had for Nanda's companion, however, no effect of humor or of irony, and it was a mark of the special intercourse of these good friends that though they had for each other, in manner and tone, such a fund of consideration as might almost have given it the stamp of diplomacy, there was yet in it also something of that economy of expression which is the result of a common experience. The recurrence of opportunity to observe them together would have taught a spectator that—on Mrs. Brook's side, doubtless, more particularly—their relation was governed by two or three remarkably established and, as might have been said, refined laws, the spirit of which was to guard against the vulgarity so often coming to the surface between parent and child. That they were as good friends as if Nanda had not been her daughter was a truth that no passage between them might fail in one way or another to illustrate. Nanda had gathered up, for that matter, early in life, a flower of maternal wisdom: "People talk about the conscience, but it seems to me one must just bring it up to a certain point and leave it there. You can let your conscience alone if you're nice to the second house-maid." Mrs. Brook was as "nice" to Nanda as she was to Sarah Curd—which involved, as may easily be imagined, the happiest conditions for Sarah. "Well," she resumed, reverting to the Duchess on a final appraisement of the girl's air, "I really think I do well by you and that Jane wouldn't have anything to say to-day. You look awfully like mamma," she then threw off as if for the first time of mentioning it.

"Oh, Cousin Jane doesn't care for that," Nanda returned. "What I don't look like is Aggie, for all I try."

"Ah, you shouldn't try—you can do nothing with it. One must be what one is."

Mrs. Brook was almost sententious, but Nanda, with civility, let it pass. "No one in London touches her. She's quite by herself. When one sees her one feels her to be the real thing."

Mrs. Brook, without harshness, wondered. "What do you mean by the real thing?"

Even Nanda, however, had to think a moment. "Well, the real young one. That's what Lord Petherton calls her," she mildly joked—"the young 'un."

Her mother's echo was not for the joke, but for something else. "I know what you mean. What's the use of being good?"

"Oh, I didn't mean that," said Nanda. "Besides, isn't Aggie of a goodness—"

"I wasn't talking of her. I was asking myself what's the use of my being."

"Well, you can't help it, any more than the Duchess can help—"

"Ah, but she could if she would!" Mrs. Brook broke in with a sharper ring than she had yet given. "We can't help being good perhaps, if that burden is laid on us—but there are lengths, in other directions, we're not absolutely obliged to go. And what I think of when I stick in the pins," she went on, "is that Jane seems to me really never to have had to pay." She appeared, for a minute, to brood on this till she could no longer bear it; after which she jerked out: "Why, she has never had to pay for anything!"

Nanda had by this time seated herself, taking her place, under the interest of their talk, on her mother's sofa, where, except for the removal of her long, soft gloves, which one of her hands, again and again, drew caressingly through the other, she remained very much as if she were some friendly yet circumspect young visitor to whom Mrs. Brook had on some occasion dropped "Do come." But there was something perhaps more expressly conciliatory in the way she had kept everything on: as if, in the way she had kept everything on: as if, in particular serenity and to confirm kindly Mrs. Brook's sense of what had been done for her, she had neither taken off her great feathered hat nor laid down her parasol of pale green silk, the "match" of hat and ribbons and which had an expensive, precious knob. Our speculator would possibly have found too much earnestness in the whole thing would have been striking as another touch in the picture of the odd want, on the part of each, of any sense of levity in the other. Whatever escape, when together, mother or daughter might ever seek would never be the humorous one—a circumstance, however, that might by no means, on occasion, have failed to make their interviews droll for a third person. It would always indeed, for such a person, have produced an impression of tension beneath the surface. "I could have done much better at the start and have lost less time," the girl at last said, "if I hadn't had the drawback of not really remembering Granny."

"Oh well, I remember her!" Mrs. Brook moaned with an accent that evidently struck her the next moment as so much out of place that she slightly deflected. She took Nanda's parasol and held it as if—a more delicate thing much than any one of hers—she simply liked to have it. "Her clothes—at your age at least—must have been hideous. Was it at the place he took you to that he gave you tea?" she then went on.

"Yes, at the Museum. We had an orgy in the refreshment-room. But he took me afterwards to Tisby's, where we had another."

"He went in with you?" Mrs. Brook had suddenly flashed into eagerness.

"Oh yes—I made him."

"He didn't want to?"

"On the contrary—very much. But he doesn't do everything he wants," said Nanda.

Mrs. Brook seemed to wonder. "You mean you've also to want it?"

"Oh no—that isn't enough. What I suppose I mean," Nanda continued, "is that he doesn't do anything he doesn't want to. But he does quite enough," she added.

"And who then was at Tisby's?"

"Oh, poor Tish herself, naturally, and Carrie Donner."

"And no one else?"

The girl just waited. "Yes, Mr. Cashmore came in."

Her mother gave a groan of impatience. "Ah, again?" Nanda thought an instant. "How do you mean, 'again'? He just lives there, as much as he ever did, and Tishy can't prevent him."

"I was thinking of Mr. Longdon—of their meeting. When he met him here that time he liked it so little. Did he like it any more to-day?" Mrs. Brook quavered.

"Oh no, he hated it."

"But hadn't he—if he should go in—known he would?"

"Yes, perfectly—but he wanted to see."

"To see—?" Mrs. Brook just threw out.

"Well, where I go so much. And he knew I wished it."

"I don't quite see why," Mrs. Brook mildly observed. And then as her daughter said nothing to help her: "At any rate he did loathe it?"

Nanda, for a reply, simply after an instant put a question. "Well, how can he understand?"

"You mean, like me, why you do go there so much? How can he indeed?"

"I don't mean that," the girl returned—"it's just that he understands perfectly, because he saw them all, in such an extraordinary way—well, what can I ever call it?—clutch me and cling to me."

Mrs. Brook with full gravity, considered this picture. "And was Mr. Cashmore, to-day, so ridiculous?"

"Ah, he's not ridiculous, mamma—he's very unhappy. He thinks now Lady Fanny probably won't go, but he feels that may be, after all, only the worse for him."

"She will go," Mrs. Brook answered with one of her roundabout approaches to decision. "He is too great an idiot. She was here an hour ago, and if ever a woman was packed—!"

"Well," Nanda objected, "but doesn't she spend her time in packing and unpacking?"

This inquiry, however, scarce pulled up her mother. "No—though she has, no doubt, hitherto, wasted plenty of labor. She has now a dozen boxes—I could see them there in her wonderful eyes—just waiting to be called for. So if you're counting on her not going, my dear—!" Mrs. Brook gave a head-shake that was the warning of wisdom.

"Oh, I don't care what she does!" Nanda replied. "What I meant just now was that Mr. Longdon couldn't understand why, with so much to make them so, they couldn't be decently happy."

"And did he wish you to explain?"

"I tried to, but I didn't make it any better. He doesn't like them. He doesn't even care for Tish."

"He told you so—right out?"

"Oh," Nanda said, "of course I asked him. I didn't press him, because I never do—!"

"You never do?" Mrs. Brook broke in as with the glimpse of a new light.

The girl showed an indulgence for this interest that was for a moment almost elderly. "I enjoy awfully, with him, seeing just how to take him."

Her tone and her face evidently put forth, for her companion, at this juncture, something freshly, even quite supremely, suggestive; and yet the effect of them on Mrs. Brook's part was only a question so off-hand that it might already often have been asked. The mother's eyes, to ask it, we may none the less add, attached themselves closely to the daughter's and her own face just glowed. "You like him so very awfully?"

It was as if the next instant Nanda felt herself on her guard. Yet she spoke with a certain surrender. "Well, it's rather intoxicating to be one's self—" She had only a drop over the choice of her term.

"So tremendously made up to, you mean—even by a little fussy, ancient man? But doesn't he, my dear," Mrs. Brook continued, with encouragement, "make up to you!"

A supposititious spectator would certainly, on this, have imagined in the girl's face the delicate dawn of a sense that her mother had suddenly become vulgar, together with a general consciousness that the way to meet vulgarity was always to be frank and simple. "He makes one enjoy being liked so much—liked better, I do think, than I've ever been liked by any one."

If Mrs. Brook hesitated it was, however, clearly not because she had noticed. "Not better, surely, than by dear Mitchy? Or even, if you come to that, by Tishy herself."

Nanda's simplicity maintained itself. "Oh, Mr. Longdon's different from Tishy."

Her mother again hesitated. "You mean, of course, he knows more."

The girl considered it. "He doesn't know more. But he knows other things—and he's pleasanter than Mitchy."

"You mean because he doesn't want to marry you?"

It was as if she had not heard that Nanda continued: "Well, he's more beautiful."

"O-oh!" cried Mrs. Brook, with a drawn-out extravagance of comment that amounted to an impugnment even by herself of her taste.

It contributed to Nanda's quietness. "He's one of the most beautiful people in the world."

Her companion at this, with a quick wonder, fixed her. "Does he, my dear, want to marry you?"

"Yes—to all sorts of ridiculous people."

"But I mean, would you take him?"

Nanda, rising, met the question with a short ironic "Yes!" that showed her first impatience. "It's so charming being liked," she went on, "without being approved."

But Mrs. Brook only wanted to know. "He doesn't approve—?"

"No, but it makes no difference. It's all exactly right, all the same."

Mrs. Brook seemed to wonder, however, exactly how it could be. "He doesn't want you to give up anything?" She looked as if she were rapidly thinking what Nanda might give up.

"Oh yes, everything."

It was as if, for an instant, she found her daughter inscrutable; then she had a strange smile. "Me?"

The girl was perfectly prompt. "Everything. But he wouldn't like me nearly so much if I really did."

Her mother had a further pause. "Does he want to adopt you?" Then more quickly and sadly, though also a little as if lacking courage to push the inquiry: "We couldn't give you up, Nanda."

"Thank you so much, mamma. But we sha'n't be very much tried," Nanda said, "because what it comes to seems to be that I'm really what you may call adopting him. I mean I'm little by little changing him—gradually showing him that, as I couldn't possibly have been different, and as also, of course, one can't keep giving up, the only way is for him not to mind and to take me just as I am. That, don't you see? is what he would never have expected to do."

Mrs. Brook recognized, in a manner, the explanation, but still had her wistfulness. "But—a—to take you, 'as you are,' where?"

"Well, to the South Kensington Museum."

"Oh!" said Mrs. Brook. Then, however, in a more exemplary tone: "Do you enjoy so very much long hours with him?"

Nanda appeared for an instant to think how to express it. "Well, we're great friends."

"And always talking about Granny?"

"Oh no—really almost never now."

"He doesn't think so awfully much of her?" There was an oddity of eagerness in the question—a hope, a kind of dash, for something that might have been in Nanda's interest.

The girl met these things only with obliging gravity. "I think he's losing any sense of my likeness. He's too used to it, or too many things that are too different now cover it up."

"Well," said Mrs. Brook, as she took this in, "I think it's awfully clever of you to get only the good of him and have none of the worry."

Nanda wondered. "The worry?"

"You leave that all to me," her mother went on, but quite forgivingly. "I hope, at any rate, that the good, for you, will be real."

"Real?" the girl, remaining vague, again echoed.

Mrs. Brook, at this, showed though not an irritation, a flicker of austerity. "You must remember that we've a great many things to think about. There are things we must take for granted in each other—we must all help, in our way, to pull the coach. That's what I mean by worry, and if you don't have any, so much the better for you—for me it's in the day's work. Your father and I have most to think about, always, at this time, as you perfectly know—when we have to turn things round and manage somehow or other to get out of town, have to provide and pinch, to meet all the necessities, with money, money, money, at every turn, running away like water. The children, this year, seem to fit into nothing, into nowhere, and Harold's more dreadful than he has ever been.

* Began in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2139.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

doing nothing at all for himself and requiring everything to be done for him. He talks about his American girl, with millions, who's so awfully taken with him, but I can't find out anything about her; the only one, just now, that people seem to have heard of is the one Bobby Manger's engaged to. The Mangers literally snap up everything," Mrs. Brook quite wallingly now continued: "the Jew man, so gigantically rich—who is he? Baron Schack or Schmack—who has just taken Cumberland House and who has the awful stammer—or what is it? no roof to his mouth—is to give that horrid little Algie, to do his conversation for him, four hundred a year, which Harold pretended to me that, of all the rush of young men—dozens!—he was most in the running for. Your father's settled gloom is terrible, and I bear all the brunt of it; we get literally nothing, this year, for the Hovel, yet have to spend on it heaven knows what; and everybody, for the next three months, in Scotland and everywhere, has asked us for the wrong time, and nobody for the right: so that I assure you I don't know where to turn—which doesn't, however, in the least prevent every one coming to me with their own selfish troubles." It was as if Mrs. Brook had found the cup of her secret sorrows suddenly jostled by some touch of which the perversity, though not completely noted at the moment, proved, as she a little let herself go, sufficient to make it flow over; but she drew, the next thing, from her daughter's stillness, a reflection of the vanity of her flurry, and speedily recovered herself as if in order, with more dignity, to point the moral. "I can carry my burden and shall do so to the end; but we must each remember that we shall fall to pieces if we don't manage to keep hold of some little idea of responsibility. I positively can't arrange without knowing when it is you go to him."

"To Mr. Longdon? Oh, whenever I like," Nanda replied, very gently and simply.

"And when shall you be so good as to like?"

"Well, he goes himself on Saturday, and if I want I can go a few days later."

"And what day can you go if I want?" Mrs. Brook spoke as with a small sharpness—just softened indeed in time—produced by the sight of a freedom on her daughter's part that suddenly loomed larger than any freedom of her own. It was still a part of the unsteadiness of the vessel of her anxieties; but she never, after all, remained publicly long subject to the influence that she often comprehensively designated to others, as well as to herself, as "nastiness." "What I mean is that you might go the same day, mightn't you?"

"With him—in the train? I should think so, if you wish it."

"But would he wish it? I mean would he hate it?"

"I don't think so at all, but I can easily ask him."

Mrs. Brook's head inclined to the chimney and her eyes to the window. "Easily?"

Nanda looked for a moment mystified by her mother's insistence. "I can at any rate perfectly try it."

"Remembering even that mamma would never have pushed so?"

Nanda's face seemed to concede even that condition. "Well," she at all events serenely replied, "I really think we're good friends enough for anything."

It might have been, for the light it quickly produced, exactly what her mother had been working to make her say. "What do you call that then, I should like to know, but his adopting you?"

"Ah, I don't know that it matters much what it's called."

"So long as it brings with it, you mean," Mrs. Brook asked, "all the advantages?"

"Well yes," said Nanda, who had now begun dimly to smile—"call them advantages."

Mrs. Brook had a pause. "One would be quite ready to do that if one only knew a little more exactly what you're to get by them."

"Oh, the great advantage, I feel, is doing something for him."

Nanda's companion, at this, hesitated afresh. "But doesn't that, my dear, put the extravagance of your surrender to him on rather an odd footing? Charity, love, begins at home, and if it's a question of merely giving, you've objects enough for your bounty without going so far."

The girl, as her stare showed, was held a moment by her surprise, which presently broke out. "Why, I thought you wanted me so to be nice to him!"

"Well, I hope you won't think me very vulgar," said Mrs. Brook, "if I tell you that I want you still more to have some idea of what you'll get by it. I've no wish," she added, "to keep on boring you with Mitchy—"

"Don't, don't!" Nanda pleaded.

Her mother stopped short, as if there were something in her tone that set the limit all the more utterly for being unstudied. Yet poor Mrs. Brook couldn't leave it there. "Then what do you get instead?"

"Instead of Mitchy? Oh," said Nanda, "I shall never marry."

Mrs. Brook, at this, turned away, moving over to the window with quickened weariness. Nanda, on her side, as if their talk had ended, went across to the sofa to take up her parasol before leaving the room, an impulse rather than arrested by the arrival of her brother Harold, favored who came in at the moment both his relatives had turned a back to the door, and who gave his sister, as she faced him, a greeting that made their mother look round. "Hallo, Nan—you are lovely! Ain't she lovely, mother?"

"No!" Mrs. Brook answered, not, however, otherwise noticing him. Her domestic despair centred at this instant all in her daughter. "Well then, we shall consider—your father and I—that he must take the consequence."

Nanda had now her hand on the door, while Harold had dropped on the sofa. "'He'?" she just sounded.

"I mean Mr. Longdon."

"And what do you mean by the consequence?"

"Well, it will do for the beginning of it that you'll please go down with him."

"On Saturday then? Thanks, mamma," the girl returned.

She was instantly gone, on which Mrs. Brook had more attention for her son. This, after an instant, as she approached the sofa and raised her eyes from the little table beside it, came straight out. "Where in the world is that five-pound note?"

Harold looked vacantly about him. "What five-pound note?"

XXIV.

Mr. Longdon's garden took in three acres and, full of charming features, had for its greatest wonder the extent and color of its old brick wall, of which the pink and purple surface was the fruit of the mild ages, and the protective function, for a visitor strolling, sitting, talking, reading, that of a sort of nurse of reverie. The air of the place, in the August time, thrilled all the while with the bliss of birds, the hum of little lives unseen, and the flicker of white butterflies. It was on the large, flat enclosed lawn that Nanda spoke to Vanderbank of the three weeks that she would have completed there on the morrow, and that had been—she made no secret of it—the happiest she had yet spent anywhere. The grayish day was soft and still and the sky faintly marbled, while the more newly arrived of the visitors from London, who had come late on the Friday afternoon, lounged away the morning in an attitude of which every relaxed line referred to the holiday he had, as it were—at first merely looking about and victualling—sat down in front of as a captain before a city. There were sitting-places out of the full light, cushioned benches, just there, in the thick wide spread, of old mulberry boughs, and a large book of facts lay in the young man's lap. Nanda had come out to him, half an hour before luncheon, somewhat as Beatrice came out to Benedick: not to call him immediately, indeed, to the meal, but mentioning promptly that she had come at a bidding. Mr. Longdon had rebuked her, it appeared, for her want of attention to their guest, showing her in this way, to her pleasure, how far he had gone toward taking her, as he called it, into the house.

"You've been thinking of yourself," Vanderbank asked, "as a mere clerk at a salary, and you now find that you're a partner and have a share in the concern?"

"It seems to be something like that. But doesn't a partner put in something? What have I put in?"

"Well—me, for one thing. Isn't it your being here that has brought me down?"

"Do you mean you wouldn't have come for him alone? Then don't you make anything of his attraction? You ought to," said Nanda, "when he likes you so."

Vanderbank, longing for a river, was in white flannels, and he took her question with a happy laugh, a handsome face of good-humor, that completed the effect of his long, cool fairness. "Do you mind my just sitting still, and letting me smoke, and staying with me awhile? Perhaps after a little we'll walk about—sha'n't we? But face to face with this dear old house, in this delicious nook, one is too contented to move, lest raising a finger even should break the spell. What will be perfect will be your just sitting down—do sit down—and scolding me a little. That, my dear Nanda, will deepen the peace." Some minutes later, while, near him but in another chair, she fingered the impossible book, as she pronounced it, that she had taken from him, he came back to what she had last said. "Has he talked to you much about his 'liking' me?"

Nanda waited a minute, turning over the book. "No."

"Then how are you just now so struck with it?"

"I'm not struck only with what I'm talked to about. I don't only know," she went on, "what people tell me."

"Ah no—you're too much your mother's daughter for that." Vanderbank leaned back and smoked, and though all his air seemed to say that when one was so at ease for gossip almost any subject would do, he kept jogging his foot with the same small nervous motion as during the half-hour at Mertle that this record has commemorated. "You're too much one of us all," he continued. "We've tremendous perceptions," he laughed. "Of course I should have come for him. But after all," he added as if all sorts of nonsense would equally serve, "he mightn't, except for you, you know, have asked me."

Nanda so far accepted this view as to reply: "That's awfully weak. He's so modest that he might have been afraid of your boring yourself."

"That's just what I mean."

"Well, if you do," Nanda returned, "the explanation's a little conceited."

"Oh, I only made it," Vanderbank said, "in reference to his modesty." Beyond the lawn the house was before him, old, square, red-roofed, well assured of its right to the place it took up in the world. This was a considerable space—in the little world, at least, of Beccles—and the look of possession had everywhere mixed with it, in the form of old windows and doors, the tone of old red surfaces, the style of old white facings, the age of old high creepers, the long confirmation of time. Suggestive of panelled rooms, of precious mahogany, of portraits of women dead, of colored china glimmering through glass doors, and delicate silver reflected on bared tables, the thing was one of those impressions of a particular period that it takes two centuries to produce. "Fancy," the young man incoherently exclaimed, "his caring to leave anything so lovable as all this to come up and live with us!"

The girl, for a little, also lost herself. "Oh, you don't know what it is—the charm comes out so as one stays. Little by little it grows and grows. There are old things everywhere that are too delightful. He lets me explore so—he lets me rummage and rifle; and every day I make discoveries."

Vanderbank wondered as he smoked. "You mean he lets you take things—?"

"Oh yes—up to my room, to study or to copy. There are old patterns that are too dear for anything. It's when you live with them, you see, that you know. Everything in the place is such good company."

"Your mother ought to be here," Vanderbank presently suggested. "She's so fond of good company." Then as Nanda answered nothing he went on: "Was your grandmother ever?"

"Never," the girl promptly said. "Never," she repeated in a tone quite different. After which she added: "I'm the only one."

"Oh, and I. 'Me and you,' as they say," her companion amended.

"Yes, and Mr. Mitchy, who's to come down—please don't forget—this afternoon."

Vanderbank had another of his contemplative pauses. "Thank you for reminding me. I shall spread myself as much as possible before he comes—try to produce so much of my effect that I shall be safe. But what did Mr. Longdon ask him for?"

"Ah," said Nanda gayly, "what did he ask you for?"

"Why, for the reason you just now mentioned—that his interest in me is so uncontrollable."

"Then isn't his interest in Mitchy—"

"Of the same general order?" Vanderbank broke in. "Not in the least." He seemed to look for a way to express the distinction, which suddenly occurred to him. "He wasn't in love with Mitchy's mother."

"No"—Nanda turned it over. "Mitchy's mother, it appears, was awful. Mr. Cashmore knew her."

Vanderbank's smoke-puffs were profuse and his pauses frequent. "Awful to Mr. Cashmore? I'm glad to hear it—he must have deserved it. But I believe in her, all the same. Mitchy's often awful himself," the young man rambled on. "Just so I believe in him."

"So do I," said Nanda—"and that's why I asked him."

"You asked him, my dear child? Have you the inviting?"

"Oh yes."

The eyes he turned on her seemed really to ask if she jested or were serious. "So you arranged for me too?"

She turned over again a few leaves of his book and, closing it with something of a clap, transferred it to the bench beside him—a movement in which, as if through a drop into thought, he rendered her no assistance. "What I mean is that I proposed it to Mr. Longdon, I suggested he should be asked. I've a reason for seeing him—I want to talk to him. And do you know," the girl went on, "what Mr. Longdon said?"

"Something splendid, of course."

"He asked if you wouldn't perhaps dislike his being here with you."

Vanderbank, throwing back his head, laughed, smoked, jogged his foot more than ever. "Awfully nice. Dear old Mitch! How little afraid of him you are!"

Nanda wondered. "Of Mitch?"

"Yes, of the tremendous pull he really has. It's all very well to talk—he has it. But of course I don't mean I don't know"—and, as with the effect of his nervous sociability, he shifted his position. "I perfectly see that you're not afraid. I perfectly know what you have in your head. I should never in the least dream of accusing you—as far as he is concerned—of the least disposition to flirt; any more indeed," Vanderbank pleasantly pursued, "than even of any general tendency of that sort. No, my dear Nanda"—he kindly kept it up—"I will say for you that, though a girl, thank heaven, and awfully much a girl, you're really not, on the whole, more of a flirt than a respectable social ideal permits."

"Thank you most tremendously," his companion quietly replied.

Something in the tone of it made him laugh out, and the particular sound went well with all the rest of it, with the August day and the charming spot and the young man's lounging figure and Nanda's own little hovering hospitality. "Of course I strike you as patronizing you with unconscious sublimity. Well, that's all right, for what's the most natural thing to do in these conditions but the most luxurious? Won't Mitchy be wonderful for feeling and enjoying them? I assure you I'm delighted he's coming." Then, in a different tone, a moment later, "Do you expect to be here long?" he asked.

It took Nanda some time to say. "As long as Mr. Longdon will keep me, I suppose—if that doesn't sound very horrible."

"Oh, he'll keep you! Only, won't he himself," Vanderbank went on, "be coming up to town in the course of the autumn?"

"Well, in that case I would perfectly stay here without him."

"And leave him in London without you? Ah, that's not what we want, he wouldn't be at all the same thing without you. Least of all for himself!" Vanderbank declared.

Nanda again thought. "Yes, that's what makes him funny, I suppose—his curious infatuation. I set him off—what do you call it?—show him off: by his going round and round me as the acrobat on the horse, in the circus, goes round the clown. He has said a great deal to me of your mother," she irrelevantly added.

"Oh, everything that's kind, of course — or you wouldn't mention it."

"That's what I mean," said Nanda.

"I see, I see—most charming of him." Vanderbank kept his high head thrown back, as if for the view, with a bright, equal, general interest, of everything that was before them, whether talked of or seen. "Who do you think I yesterday had a letter from? An extraordinary funny one from Harold. He gave me all the family news."

"And what is the family news?" the girl after a minute inquired.

"Well, the first great item is that he himself—"

"Wanted," Nanda broke in, "to borrow five pounds of you? I say that," she added, "because if he wrote to you—"

"It couldn't have been, in such a case, for the simple pleasure of the intercourse?" Vanderbank hesitated, but continued not to look at her. "What do you know, pray, of poor Harold's borrowings?"

"Oh, I know as I know other things. Don't I know everything?"

"Do you, I should rather ask," the young man gayly enough replied.

"Why should I not? How should I not? You know what I know." Then, as if to explain herself and attenuate a little the sudden emphasis with which she had spoken· "I remember your once telling me that I must take in things at my pores."

Her companion stared, but, with his laugh, again changed his posture. "That you 'must'—?"

"That I do—and you were quite right."

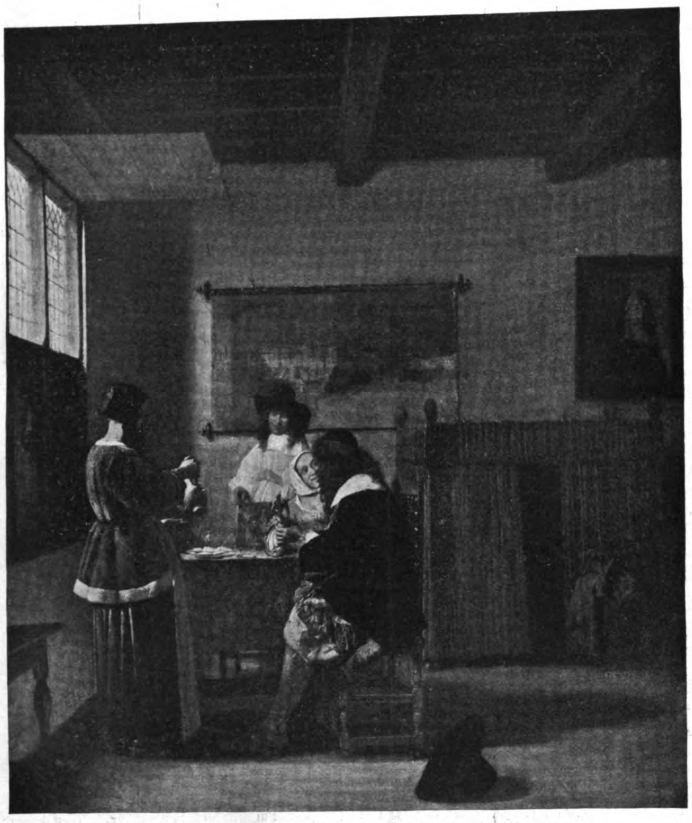
"And when did I make this extraordinary charge?"

"Ah then," said Nanda, "you admit it is a charge. It was a long time ago—when I was a little girl. Which made it worse!" she dropped.



It made it, at all events, now, for Vanderbank, more amusing. "Ah, not worse—better!"

She thought a moment. "Because in that case I mightn't have understood? But that I do understand is just what you've always meant."

"'Always,' my dear Nanda? I feel somehow," he rejoined very kindly, "as if you overwhelmed me!"

"You 'feel' as if I did—but the reality is just that I don't. The day I overwhelm you, Mr. Van—!" She let it pass, however; there was too much to say about it, and

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"INTÉRIEUR HOLLANDAIS."—PIETER DE HOOGHE.—BY COURTESY OF H. O. HAVEMEYER, OWNER.

"SAN DIEGO OF ALCALA SURPRISED BY THE GUARDIAN OF HIS CONVENT—THE MIRACLE OF THE FLOWERS."—MURILLO.—OWNED BY CHARLES B. CURTIS.

JAMES STUART, DUKE OF RICHMOND AND LENNOX
Hu

ART TREASURES IN NEW YOR OWNED
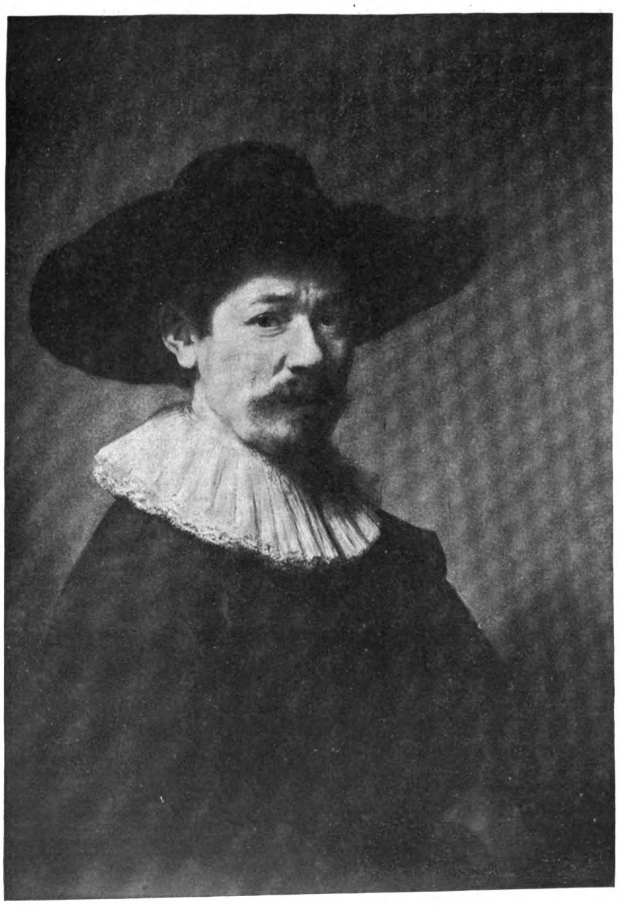
[S



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

X.—Antony Vandyck.—Presented to the Metropolitan Museum of Art by Henry G. Marquand.

"Danse des Amours."—Corot.—Owned by George J. Gould.

"The Gilder."—Rembrandt.—Owned by H. O. Havemeyer.

K—SOME OF THE FAMOUS PAINTINGS IN THIS CITY.

E Page 1183.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

there was something else much simpler. "Girls understand now. It has got to be faced, as Tishy says."

"Oh well," Vanderbank laughed, "we don't require Tishy to point that out to us. What are we all doing, most of the time, but trying to face it?"

"Doing? Aren't you doing rather something very different? You're just trying to dodge it. You're trying to make believe—not perhaps to yourselves, but to us—that it isn't so."

"But surely you don't want us to be any worse!"

She shook her head with brisk gravity. "We don't care really, what you are."

His amusement now dropped to her straighter. "Your 'we' is awfully beautiful. It's charming to hear you speak for the whole lovely lot. Only you speak, you know, as if you were just the class apart that you yet complain of our—by our scruples—implying you to be."

She considered this objection with her eyes on his face. "Well then, we do care. Only—"

"Only it's a big subject."

"Oh, yes—no doubt; it's a big subject." She appeared to wish to meet him on everything reasonable. "Even Mr. Longdon admits that."

Vanderbank wondered. "You mean you talk over with him—"

"The subject of girls? Why, we scarcely discuss anything else."

"Oh, no wonder, then, you're not bored. But you mean," Vanderbank asked, "that he recognizes the inevitable change—?"

"He can't shut his eyes to the facts. He sees we're quite a different thing."

"I dare say"—her friend was fully appreciative. "Yet the old thing—what do you know of it?"

"I personally? Well, I've seen some change even in my short life. And aren't the old books full of us? Then Mr. Longdon himself has told me."

Vanderbank smoked and smoked. "You've gone into it with him?"

"As far as a man and a woman can together."

As he took her in at this, with a turn of his eye, he might have had in his ears the echo of all the times it had been dropped in Buckingham Crescent that Nanda was "wonderful." She was indeed. "Oh, he's of course, on certain sides, shy."

"Awfully—too beautifully. And then there's Aggie," the girl pursued. "I mean for the real old thing."

"Yes, no doubt—if she be the real old thing. But what the deuce, really, is Aggie?"

"Well," said Nanda with the frankest interest, "she's a miracle. If one could be her exactly, absolutely, without the least little mite of change, one would probably do the best thing to close with it. Otherwise—except for anything but that—I'd rather brazen it out as myself."

There fell between them, on this, a silence of some minutes, after which it would probably not have been possible for either to say if their eyes had met while it lasted. This was, at any rate, not the case as Vanderbank at last exclaimed: "Your brass, my dear young lady, is pure gold!"

"Then it's of me, I think, that Harold ought to borrow."

"You mean therefore that mine isn't?" Vanderbank inquired.

"Well, you really haven't any natural 'cheek'—not like some of them. You're, in yourself, as uneasy, if anything's said and every one giggles or makes some face, as Mr. Longdon, and if Lord Petherton hadn't once told me that a man hates almost as much to be called modest as a woman does, I would say that, very often, in London now, you must pass some bad moments."

The present might precisely have been one of them, we should doubtless have gathered, had we seen fully recorded in Vanderbank's face the degree to which this prompt response embarrassed, or at least stupefied him. But he could always laugh. "I like your 'in London now'!"

"It's the tone and the current and the effect of all the others that push you along," she went on as if she had not heard him. "If such things are contagious, as every one says, you prove it perhaps as much as any one. But you don't begin"—she continued, blandly enough, to work it out for him; "or you can't, at least, originally have begun. Any one would know that now—from the terrific effect I see I produce on you by talking this way. There it is—it's all out before one knows it, isn't it, and I can't help it any more than you can, can I?" So she appeared to put it to him, with something in her lucidity that would have been infinitely touching; a strange, grave, calm consciousness of their common doom and of what, in especial, in it, would be worst for herself. He sprang up indeed, after an instant, as if he had been infinitely touched; he turned away, taking, just near her, a few steps to and fro, gazed about the place again, but this time without the air of particularly seeing it, and then came back to her as if from a greater distance. An observer at all initiated would, at the juncture, fairly have hung on his lips, and there was in fact on Vanderbank's part quite the look of the man—though it lasted but just while we seize it—in suspense about himself. The most initiated observer of all would have been poor Mr. Longdon, who would now have been destined, however, to be also the most defeated, and the sign of whose tension would have been a smothered "Ah, if he doesn't do it now!" Well, Vanderbank didn't do it "now," and the long, odd, irrelevant sigh that he gave out might have sufficed as the record of his recovery from a peril lasting just long enough to be measured. Had there been any measure of it, meanwhile, for Nanda? There was nothing at least to show either the presence or the relief of anxiety in the way in which, by a prompt transition, she left her last appeal to him simply to take care of itself. "You haven't denied that Harold does borrow."

Vanderbank gave a note as of cheer for this luckily firmer ground. "My dear child, I never lent the silly boy five pounds in my life. In fact, I like the way you talk of that. I don't know, quite, for what you take me, but the number of persons to whom I have lent five pounds—"

"Is so awfully small"—she took him up on it—"as not to look so very well for you?" She held him an instant as with the fine intelligence of his meaning in this, and then, though not with sharpness, she broke out: "Why are you trying to make out that you're nasty and stingy? Why do you misrepresent—?"

"My natural generosity? I don't misrepresent anything, but I take, I think, rather markedly good care of money." She had remained in her place and he was before her on the grass, his hands in his pockets and his manner perhaps a little awkward. "The way you young things talk of it!"

"Harold talks of it—but I don't think I do. I'm not a bit expensive—ask mother, or even ask father. I do with awfully little—for clothes and things, and I could easily do with still less. Harold's a born consumer, as Mitchy says; he says also he's one of those people who will never really want."

"Ah, for that, Mitchy himself will never let him."

"Well then, with every one helping us, all round, aren't we a lovely family? I don't speak of it to tell tales, but when you mention hearing from Harold all sorts of things immediately come over me. We seem to be all living more or less on other people, all immensely 'beholden.' You can easily say, of course, that I'm the worst of all. The children and their people, at Bognor, are in borrowed quarters—mother got them lent her—as to which, no doubt, I'm perfectly aware that I ought to be there sharing them, taking care of my little brother and sister, instead of sitting here, at Mr. Longdon's expense, to expose everything and criticise. Father and mother, in Scotland, are on a programme of places—! Well"—she pulled herself up—"I'm not in that, at any rate. Say you've lent Harold only five shillings," she went on. Vanderbank stood smiling. "Well, say I have. I never lend any one whatever more."

"It only adds to my conviction," Nanda explained, "that he writes to Mr. Longdon."

"But if Mr. Longdon doesn't say so—?" Vanderbank objected.

"Oh, that proves nothing." She got up as she spoke. "Harold also works Granny." He only laughed out, at first, at this, while she went on: "You'll think I make myself out fearfully deep—I mean in the way of knowing everything without having to be told. That is, as you say, mamma's great accomplishment, so it must be hereditary. Besides, there seem to me only too many things one is told. Only Mr. Longdon has in fact said nothing."

She had looked about responsibly, as if not to leave in disorder the garden nook they had occupied, picking up a newspaper and changing the place of a cushion. "I do think that with him you're remarkable," Vanderbank observed—"putting on one side all you seem to know and on the other all he holds his tongue about. What then does he say?" the young man asked after a slight pause and perhaps even with a slight irritation.

Nanda glanced round again—she was folding, rather carefully, her paper. Presently her glance met their friend, who, having come out of one of the long windows that opened to the lawn, had stopped there to watch them. "He says just now that luncheon's ready."

XXV.

"I've made him," Nanda said, in the drawing-room, to Mitchy, "make Mr. Van go with him."

Mr. Longdon, in the rain, which had come on since the morning, had betaken himself to church, and his other guest, with sufficiently marked good-humor, had borne him company. The windows of the drawing-room looked at the wet garden, all vivid and rich in the summer shower, and Mitchy, after seeing Vanderbank turn up his trousers and fling back a last answer to the not quite sincere chaff his submission had engendered, adopted freely and familiarly the prospect not only of a grateful, freshened lawn, but of a good hour in the very pick, as he called it, of his actual happy conditions. The favoring rain, the dear old place, the charming, serious house, the large inimitable room the absence of the others, the present vision of what his young friend had given him to count on—the sense of these delights was expressed in his fixed, generous glare. He was at first too pleased even to sit down; he measured the great space from end to end, admiring again everything he had admired before and protesting afresh that no modern ingenuity—not even his own, to which he did justice—could create effects of such purity. The final touch in all the picture before them was just the painter's ignorance. Mr. Longdon had not made his house, he had simply lived it, and the "taste" of the place—Mitchy in certain connections abominated the word—was nothing more than the beauty of his life. Everything, on every side, had dropped straight from heaven, with nowhere a bargaining thumb-mark, a single sign of the shop. All this would have been a wonderful theme for discourse in Buckingham Crescent—so happy an exercise for the votaries of that temple of analysis that he repeatedly spoke of their experience of it as crying aloud for Mrs. Brook. The questions it set in motion for the perceptive mind were exactly those that, as he said, most made them feel themselves. Vanderbank's plea for his morning had been a pile of letters to work off, and Mitchy—then coming down, as he announced from the first, ready for anything—had gone to church with Mr. Longdon and Nanda in the finest spirit of curiosity. He now—after the girl's remark—turned away from his view of the rain, which he found different somehow from other rain, as everything else was different, and replied that he knew well enough what she could make Mr. Longdon do, but only wondered at Mr. Longdon's secret for acting on their friend. He was there before her with his hands in his pockets and appreciation winking from every yellow spot of his red neck-tie. "Afternoon service, of a wet Sunday in a small country town, is a large order. Does Van do everything the proprietor wants?"

"He may perhaps have had a suspicion of what I want," Nanda explained. "If I want particularly to talk to you—"

"He has got out of the way to give me a chance? Well then, he's, as usual, simply magnificent. How can I express the bliss of finding myself enclosed with you in this sweet old security, this really unimagined sanctity? Nothing is more charming than suddenly to come across something sharp and fresh after we've thought there was nothing more that could draw from us a groan. We've supposed we've had it all, have squeezed the last impression out of the last disappointment, penetrated to the last familiarity in the last surprise; then some fine day we find that we haven't done justice to life. There are little things that pop up and make us feel again. What may happen is after all incalculable. There's just a little chuck of the dice, and for three minutes we win. These, my dear young lady, are my three minutes. You wouldn't believe the amusement I get from them, and how can I possibly tell you? There's a faint, divine old fragrance here in the room—or doesn't it perhaps reach you? I sha'n't have lived without it, but I see now I had been afraid I should. You, on your side, won't have lived without some touch of greatness. This moment is great, and you've produced it. You were great when you felt all you could produce. Therefore," Mitchy went on, pausing once more, as he walked, before a picture, "I won't pull the whole thing down by the vulgarity of wishing that I too had a first-rate Cotman."

"Have you given up some very big thing to come?" Nanda inquired.

"What in the world is very big, my child, but the beauty of this hour? I haven't the least idea what, when I got Mr. Longdon's note, I gave up. Don't ask me for an account of anything; everything went—became imperceptible. I will say that for myself: I shed my badness, I do forget people, with a facility that makes me, for bits, for little patches, so far as they are concerned, cease to be; so that my life is spotted all over with momentary states in which I'm as the dead of whom nothing is said but good." He had strolled toward her again while she smiled at him. "I've died for this, Nanda."

"The only difficulty I see," she presently replied, "is that you ought to marry a woman really clever, and that I'm not quite sure what there may be of that in Aggie."

"In Aggie?" her friend echoed very gently. "Is that what you've sent for me for—to talk about Aggie?"

"Didn't it occur to you it might be?"

"That it couldn't possibly, you mean, be anything else?" He looked about for the place in which it would express the deepest surrender to the scene to sit, then sank down with a beautiful prompt submission. "I've no idea of what occurred to me—nothing at least but the sense that I had occurred to you. The occurrence is clay in the hands of the potter. Do with me what you will."

"You appreciate everything so wonderfully," Nanda said, "that it oughtn't to be hard for you to appreciate her. I do dream so that you may save her; and that's why I haven't waited."

"The only thing that remains to me in life," he answered, "is a certain accessibility to the thought of what I may still do to figure a little in your eye; but that's precisely a thought you may assist to become clearer. You may for instance give me some pledge or sign that if I do figure—prance and caracole and sufficiently kick up the dust—your eye won't suffer itself to be distracted from me. I think there's no adventure I'm not ready to undertake for you; yet my passion—chastened, through all this, purified, austere—is still enough of this world not wholly to have renounced the fancy of some small reward."

"How small?" the girl asked.

She spoke as if feeling that she must take from him, in common kindness, at least as much as she would make him take, and the serious, anxious patience such a consciousness gave to her tone was met by Mitchy with a charmed reasonableness that his habit of hyperbole did nothing to misrepresent. He glowed at her with the fullest recognition that there was something he was there to discuss with her, but with the assurance in every soft sound of him that no height to which she might lift the discussion would be too great for him to reach. His every cadence and every motion was an implication, as from one to the other, of the exquisite. Oh, he could sustain it! "Well, I mean the establishment of something between us. I mean your arranging somehow that we shall be drawn more together—know together something nobody else knows. I should like so terrifically to have a secret with you."

"Oh, if that's all you want, you can be easily gratified. Rien de plus facile, as mamma says. I'm full of secrets—I think I'm really most secretive. I'll share almost any one of them with you—that is if it's a good one."

Mitchy hesitated. "You mean you'll choose it yourself? You won't let it be one of mine?"

Nanda wondered. "But what's the difference?"

Her companion jumped up again, and for a moment pervaded the place. "When you say such things as that, you're of a beauty—! May it," he asked as he stopped before her, "be one of mine—a perfectly awful one?"

She showed her clearest interest. "As I suppose the most awful secrets are the best—yes, certainly."

"I'm hideously tempted." But he hung fire; then dropping into his chair again: "It would be too bad. I'm afraid I can't."

"Then why won't this do, just as it is?"

"'This'?" He looked over the big bland room. "Which?"

"Why, what you're here for."

"My dear child, I'm here—most of all—to love you more than ever; and there's an absence of favoring mystery about that—"

She looked at him as if seeing what he meant and only asking to remedy it. "There's a certain amount of mystery we can now make—that it strikes me in fact we must make. Dear Mitchy," she continued almost with eagerness, "I don't think we can really tell."

He had fallen back in his chair, not looking at her now, and with his hands, from his supported elbows, clasped to keep himself more quiet. "Are you still talking about Aggie?"

"Why, I've scarcely begun!"

"Oh!" It was not irritation he appeared to express, but the slight strain of an effort to get into relation with the subject. Better to focus the image he closed his eyes awhile.

"You speak of something that may draw us together, and I simply reply that if you don't feel how near together we are in this I shouldn't imagine you ever would. You must have wonderful notions," she presently went on, "of the ideal state of union. I pack every one off for you—I banish everything that can interfere, and I don't in the least mind your knowing that I find the consequence delightful. You may talk, if you like, of what will have passed between us, but I shall never mention it to a soul; literally not to a living creature. What do you want more than that?" He opened his eyes in deference to the question, but replied only with a gaze as unassisted as if it had come through a hole in a curtain. "You say you're ready for an adventure, and it's just an adventure that I propose. If I can make you feel for yourself as I feel for you, the beauty of your chance to go in and save her—"

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Well, if you can?"—Mitchy at last broke in. "I don't think, you know," he said after a moment, "you'll find it easy to make your two ends meet."

She thought a little longer. "One of the ends is yours, so that you'll act with me. If I wind you up so that you go—"

"You'll just happily sit and watch me? That will be my reward?"

Nanda, on this, rose from her chair as with the impulse of protest. "Sha'n't you care for my gratitude, my admiration?"

"Oh yes"—Mitchy seemed to muse. "I shall care for them. But I don't quite see, you know, what you owe to Aggie. It isn't as if—" But with this he faltered.

"As if she cared particularly for me? Ah, that has nothing to do with it; that's a thing without which, surely, it's but too possible to be exquisite. There are beautiful, quite beautiful people who don't care for me. The thing that's important to one is the thing one sees one's self, and it's quite enough if I see what can be made of that child. Marry her, Mitchy, and you'll see who she'll care for!"

Mitchy kept his position; he was for the moment—his image of shortly before reversed—the one who appeared to sit happily and watch. "It's too delicious your asking me anything whatever!"

"Well then, as I say, beautifully, grandly save her."

"As you say, yes"—he sympathetically inclined his head. "But without making me feel exactly what you mean by it."

"Keep her," Nanda returned, "from becoming like the Duchess."

"But she isn't a bit like the Duchess in any of her elements. She's a totally different thing."

It was only for an instant, however, that this objection seemed to count. "That's exactly why she'll be so perfect for you. You'll get her away—take her out of her aunt's life?"

Mitchy met it all now in a sort of spellbound stillness. "What do you know about her aunt's life?"

"Oh, I know everything!" She spoke with her first faint shade of impatience.

It produced for a little a hush between them, at the end of which her companion said with extraordinary gentleness and tenderness: "Dear old Nanda!" Her own silence appeared consciously to continue, and the suggestion of it might have been that for intelligent ears there was nothing to add to the declaration she had just made and which Mitchy sat there taking in as with a new light. What he drew from it indeed he presently went on to show. "You're too awfully interesting. Of course—you know a lot. How shouldn't you—and why?"

"Why? Oh, that's another affair! But you don't imagine what I know; I'm sure it's much more than you've a notion of. That's the kind of thing, now, one is—just except the little marvel of Aggie. What on earth," the girl pursued, "do you take us for?"

"Oh, it's all right!" breathed Mitchy, divinely pacific. "I'm sure I don't know whether it is; I shouldn't wonder if it were in fact all wrong. But what at least is certainly right is for one not to pretend anything else. There I am for you, at any rate. Now the beauty of Aggie is that she knows nothing—but absolutely, utterly: not the least little tittle of anything."

It was barely visible that Mitchy hesitated, and he spoke quite gravely. "Have you tried her?"

"Oh yes. And Tishy has." His gravity had been less than Nanda's. "Nothing, nothing." The memory of some scene or some passage might have come back to her with a charm. "Ah, say what you will—it is the way we ought to be!"

Mitchy, after a minute of much intensity, had stopped watching her; changing his posture and with his elbows on his knees, he dropped for a while his face into his hands. Then he jerked himself to his feet. "There's something I wish awfully I could say to you. But I can't."

Nanda with a slow head-shake, covered him with one of the dimmest of her smiles. "You needn't say it. I know perfectly which it is." She held him an instant, after which she went on: "It's simply that you wish me fully to understand that you're one who, in perfect sincerity, doesn't mind one straw how awful—"

"Yes, how awful?" He had kindled, as she paused, with his new eagerness.

"Well, one's knowledge may be. It doesn't shock in you a single hereditary prejudice."

"Oh, 'hereditary'—!" Mitchy ecstatically murmured.

"You even rather like me the better for it; so that one of the reasons why you couldn't have told me—though not, of course, I know, the only one—is that you would have been literally almost ashamed. Because, you know," she went on, "it is strange."

"My lack of hereditary—?"

"Yes, discomfort in the presence of the fact I speak of. There's a kind of sense you don't possess."

His appreciation again fairly goggled at her. "Oh, you do know everything!"

"You're so good that nothing shocks you," she lucidly persisted. "There's a kind of delicacy you haven't got."

He was more and more struck. "I've only that—as it were—of the skin and the fingers?" he appealed.

"Oh, and that of the mind. And that of the soul. And some other kinds, certainly. But not the kind."

"Yes"—he wondered—"I suppose that's the only way one can name it." It appeared to rise there before him. "The kind!"

"The kind that would make me painful to you. Or rather not me perhaps," she added as if to create between them the fullest possible light; "but my situation, my exposure—all the results of them that I show. Doesn't one become a sort of a little drain-pipe with everything flowing through?"

"Why don't you call it more gracefully," Mitchy asked, freshly struck, "a little æolian-harp set in the drawing-room window and vibrating in the breeze of conversation?"

"Oh, because the harp gives out a sound, and we—at least we try to—give out none."

"What you take, you mean, you keep?"

"Well, it sticks to us. And that's what you don't mind!"

Their eyes met long on it. "Yes—I see. I don't mind. I've the most extraordinary lacuna."

"Oh, I don't know about others," Nanda replied; "I haven't noticed them. But you've that one, and it's enough."

He continued to face her with his queer mixture of assent and speculation. "Enough, my dear, for what? To have made me impossible for you because the only man you could, as they say, have 'respected' would be a man who would have minded?" Then as under the cool, soft pressure of the question she looked at last away from him: "The man with 'the kind,' as you call it, happens to be just the type you can love? But what's the use," he persisted as she answered nothing, "in loving a person with the prejudice—hereditary or other—to which you're precisely obnoxious? Do you positively like to love in vain?"

It was a question, the way she turned back to him seemed to say, that deserved a responsible answer. "Yes."

But she had moved off after speaking, and Mitchy's eyes followed her to different parts of the room as, with small pretexts of present attention to it, small touches for symmetry, she slowly measured it. "What's extraordinary then is your idea of my finding any charm in Aggie's ignorance."

She immediately put down an old snuff-box. "Why, it's the one sort of thing you don't know. You can't imagine," she said as she returned to him, "the effect it will produce on you. You must get really near it and see it all come out to feel all its beauty. You'll like it, Mitchy"—and Nanda's gravity was wonderful—"better than anything you have known."

The clear sincerity of this, even had there been nothing else, imposed a consideration that Mitchy now flagrantly could give, and the deference of his suggestion of difficulty only grew more deep. "I'm to do then, with this happy condition of hers, what you say you've done—to try it?" And then as her assent, so directly challenged, failed an instant: "But won't my approach to it, however cautious, be just what will break it up and spoil it?"

Nanda thought. "Why so—if mine wasn't?"

"Oh, you're not me!"

"But I'm just as bad."

"Thank you, my dear!" Mitchy rang out.

"Without," Nanda pursued, "being as good." She had, on this, in a different key, her own sudden explosion. "Don't you see, Mitchy dear—for the very heart of it all—how good I believe you?"

She had spoken as with a flare of impatience at some justice he failed to do her, and this brought him, after a startled instant, close enough to her to take up her hand. She let him have it, and, in mute, solemn reassurance, he raised it to his lips, saying to her thus more things than he could say in any other way; which yet, just after, when he had released it and a motionless pause had ensued, didn't prevent him from adding three words. "Oh, Nanda, Nanda!"

The tone of them made her again extraordinarily gentle. "Don't 'try' anything then. Take everything for granted."

He had turned away from her and walked mechanically, with his air of blind emotion, to the window, where, for a minute, he looked out. "It has stopped raining," he said at last; "it's going to brighten."

The place had three windows, and Nanda went to the next. "Not quite yet—but I think it will."

Mitchy soon faced back into the room, where, after a brief hesitation, he moved, as quietly—almost as cautiously—as if on tiptoe, to the seat occupied by his companion at the beginning of their talk. Here he sank down, watching the girl, who stood awhile longer with her eyes on the garden. "You want me, you say, to take her out of the Duchess's life; but where am I myself, if we come to that, but even more in the Duchess's life than Aggie is? I'm in it by my contacts, my associations, my indifferences—all my acceptances, knowledges, amusements. I'm in it by my cynicisms—those that circumstances somehow from the first, when I began, for myself, to look at life and the world, committed me to and steeped me in; I'm in it by a kind of desperation that I shouldn't have felt perhaps if you had got hold of me sooner with just this touch with which you've got hold of me to-day; and I'm in it, more than all—you'll yourself admit—by the very fact that her aunt desires, as you know, much more even than you do, to bring the thing about. Then we should be—the Duchess and I—shoulder to shoulder!"

Nanda heard him, motionless, to the end, taking also another minute to turn over what he had said. "What is it you like so in Lord Petherton?" she asked as she came to him.

"My dear child, if you could only tell me! It would be, wouldn't it?—it must have been—the subject of some fairy-tale, if fairy-tales were made now, or, better still, of some Christmas pantomime: 'The Gnome and the Giant.'"

Nanda appeared to try—not with much success—to see it. "Do you find Lord Petherton a Gnome?"

Mitchy at first, for all reward, only glared at her. "Charming, Nanda—charming!"

"A man's giant enough for Lord Petherton," she went on, "when his fortune's gigantic. He preys upon you."

His hands in his pockets and his legs much apart, Mitchy sat there as in a posture adapted to her simplicity. "You're adorable. You don't. But it is rather horrid, isn't it?" he presently went on.

Her momentary silence would have been by itself enough of an answer. "Nothing—of all you speak of," she nevertheless returned, "will matter then. She'll so simplify your life." He remained just as he was, only with his eyes on her; and meanwhile she had turned again to her window, through which a faint sun-streak began to glimmer and play. At the sight of it she opened the casement to let in the warm freshness. "The rain has stopped."

"You say you want me to save her. But what you really mean," Mitchy resumed from the sofa, "isn't at all exactly that."

Nanda, without heeding the remark, took in the sunshine. "It will be charming now in the garden."

Her friend got up, found his wonderful crossbarred cap, after a glance, on a neighboring chair, and with it came toward her. "Your hope is that—as I'm good enough to be worth it—she'll save me."

Nanda looked at him now. "She will, Mitchy—she will."

They stood a moment in the recovered brightness; after which he mechanically—as with the pressure of quite another consciousness—put on his cap. "Well then, shall that hope, between us, be the thing—?"

"The thing?"—she just wondered.

"Why, that will have drawn us together—to hold us so, you know—this afternoon. I mean the secret we spoke of."

She put out to him, on this, the hand he had taken a few minutes before, and he clasped it now, only, with the firmness it seemed to give and to ask for. "Oh, it will do for that!" she said as they went out together.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

ART TREASURES IN NEW YORK.

LEAVING out of the comparison the great public galleries and museums of Europe established by kings and princes and nurtured by centuries of governmental assistance, New York ranks high as an art centre. London and Paris alone surpass her accumulation of works of art in private hands. In the last fifteen years the increase in both quantity and quality has been enormous. In 1885, Mr. S. P. Avery, the best authority on the subject, listed eighty collections of pictures, averaging $100,000 in value. To-day there are doubtless three times as many, and half a dozen are of the first importance in merit and value, two, at least, being worth a million or more. Up to 1885 public sales of pictures in this city had netted about a million and a half, while since that time the American Art Association alone has disposed of over seven million dollars' worth, sixty to sixty-five per cent. of which, it is estimated, remained in the city. For ten years past the insurance upon the pictures shown at the winter art exhibitions of the Union League Club has averaged nearly a million dollars annually.

In the limits of this article it is impossible to do justice to the public galleries of pictures. They are of far too great importance; and only such works as great merit, association, or cost makes especially interesting can be referred to. These pictures are easy of access by the public, and it seems more interesting to discuss the treasures of art principally in private hands, and which may be seen but by a limited circle.

The portrait of the artists' friend, Domer, commonly called "The Gilder," which heads Mr. H. O. Havemeyer's collection of eleven Rembrandts, is perhaps the most valuable picture in the city, $100,000 having been offered for it and refused prior to its present ownership. The collection of Rembrandts to which it belongs has no superior, if any equal, outside the public galleries of the Old World. Their owner has hung them with such nice appreciation of their quality and close attention to light, position, and general effect as to draw commendation from the highest quarters. "The Gilder" was sold to Mr. Havemeyer by the late William Schaus, who purchased it at the sale of the Duc de Morny, in Paris, for $62,500. The duke paid 165,000 francs for it in 1860.

Another splendid Rembrandt is "The Standard Bearer," recently purchased by Mr. George J. Gould for $75,000. This picture, which is known as "The Sir Joshua" Rembrandt, was reproduced and described in HARPER'S WEEKLY at the time it came into Mr. Gould's possession.

Two noteworthy portraits by Rembrandt have been presented to the Metropolitan Museum by Mr. Marquand. One, which cost $40,000, came from the collection of Sir William Knighton, physician to George IV. It is a portrait of a man wearing a black slouched hat, and is signed and dated 1665. The other, a portrait of a burgomaster, was, according to von Bode, painted about 1640. It was purchased in 1883 from the Marquis of Lansdowne for $25,000.

The portrait of the "Duke of Richmond" by Vandyck, also presented to the Museum by Mr. Marquand, probably approaches if not equals "The Gilder" in value, although, owing to the fortunate time of its purchase, the price paid was less. The picture, which had been in the family of Lord Methuen, the owner, for nearly two hundred years, had an established place among the art treasures of England in the last century, and was listed in the art publications of that day. In 1886 it was offered to the National Gallery, but that institution had overdrawn its resources to buy Rafael's "Ansidei Madonna," from the Duke of Marlborough, for £72,000, and could not purchase. No other purchaser was at hand, and Mr. Marquand secured it for something over $40,000—a figure thought to represent not half its present value.

Another very costly picture in the Museum is "Honorable Henry Fane and his Guardians," by Sir Joshua Reynolds, which was presented by Mr. Junius S. Morgan, of London, who paid the Earl of Westmoreland $72,000 for it in 1887.

Another interesting Reynolds hangs in the Lenox Library. It is a full-length portrait of Mrs. Billington, a celebrated singer of the day, and represents her as St. Cecilia listening to the music of angels. Haydn, the composer, who was a friend of the lady, was shown this picture by Sir Joshua in his studio. "Yes," he said, after examining it, "it is very good, but you have made a mistake: you have painted Mrs. Billington listening to the angels, whereas they should be listening to her." It was exhibited in the Royal Academy in 1790, and sold to Colonel Lenox in 1848.

Meissonier's famous "1807" attracted national attention when it was presented to the Museum, by ex-Judge Hilton ten years ago. It is universally conceded to be the painter's masterpiece, and its price at the Stewart sale, $66,000, has never been surpassed at public auction in this city. In the Vanderbilt gallery is another Meissonier, for which Mr. W. H. Vanderbilt paid $50,000, under interesting circumstances. Mr. Vanderbilt, so runs the generally accepted story, once asked the painter which he considered his best work. In reply, Meissonier named one called "Information, or the Captured Peasant before General Desaix," and bewailed the fact that it was in German hands. He thought it too good for such association. Mr. Vanderbilt, to gratify the artist's patriotism, opened negotiations with the owner, Mr. Meyer, a banker of Dresden, who asked and received the sum named. The subject is an incident in one of Napoleon's campaigns. Mr. C. P. Huntington has a Meissonier, "The Lost Game," for which he paid $26,300, at the James H. Stebbins sale in 1889.

"An absolute masterpiece," is the comment of Albert Wolff, the great French critic, upon "A Dutch Interior," by Pieter de Hooghe, now owned by Mr. H. O. Havemeyer.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

This picture brought $55,200 at the Secretan sale, in Paris, in 1889—a figure only surpassed at that sale by the $110,000 paid for the "Angelus" by the French government. Art authorities list and describe this work as one of the best, if not the very best, of the artist. At the Delessert sale (Paris, 1869) this picture brought 150,000 francs, and 160,000 francs were paid for it at the Narischine sale (Paris, 1883). It measures 26¼×22⅝ inches.

An especially interesting picture is Mr. William H. Fuller's splendid Gainsborough, "The Blue Boy." About this work the storm of controversy raged in England for a score or more years, until the critics reached an agreement that it was a genuine work of the master, and only differed as to whether it or its twin, now in the gallery of the Duke of Westminster, was painted first. Tradition, perhaps history, has associated this picture with the quarrels of Gainsborough and Sir Joshua Reynolds. By this authority, it is said to have been painted to disprove Sir Joshua's dictum that no picture could be successful in which the cold tints prevailed over the warm ones. It certainly overthrows this contention, for the full-length figure in blue satin against a warm-tinted landscape gives just the conditions Sir Joshua condemned, and yet it is an acknowledged masterpiece. When Mr. Fuller's collection was sold last winter, he placed an upset price of $50,000 upon this picture. No offer of this amount was received, and it still remains in his hands, one of the most interesting and precious of the city's art treasures. It was reproduced in HARPER'S WEEKLY during the present year.

Rosa Bonheur's "Horse Fair," presented to the Museum by Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt, long enjoyed the popular reputation of being, next to "1807," the most expensive picture in the city, $53,500 having been paid for it at the Stewart sale. It is the artist's masterpiece. She once offered it for sale for $2400.

The writer has been favored with a view of a number of important additions to a private collection which have helped to place it in the front rank. He is at liberty to mention but three of the pictures, a Correggio, a Rembrandt, and a Hals. The Correggio is "The Mystic Marriage of St. Catherine," one of the two unquestioned replicas of the famous picture of the same name now in the Louvre. The other is in the Naples Gallery. This striking picture is universally recognized as one of the masterpieces of the great Italian colorist. It shows the infant Saviour, seated on the Virgin's knee, in the act of placing upon the finger of St. Catherine, who kneels before Him, the ring which typifies her spiritual marriage with the Church. Its size is 8×11 inches. The Rembrandt, "The Death of Lucretia," is one of the notable works of the master. It was painted in 1664, and was probably one of the artist's last works. The figure of the Roman heroine is displayed life size at half-length. The face is turned a trifle to the right, and the right arm, dagger in hand, is fully extended to give force to the blow which is to heal her injured honor. The record of the prices obtained for this picture shows the rapid advance in value of important works of art during the past seventy years. In 1825 it was sold for £52; 1826, for £190; 1828, for £110; 1859, for £399; and in 1889, for £3937. Since then it changed hands again, coming to its present owner at a figure undoubtedly far in advance of that last named. The Frans Hals is a small but fine portrait of Casper Sebillius. The work is in the best style, minute and delicately finished in detail, and masterly in the merry twinkle given to the eyes. The canvas is small, about 9×11 inches. Two other noted portraits by Frans Hals are those of Scriverius and his wife, owned by Mr. Havemeyer, which are even smaller than the Sebillius, 8½×6½ inches. They were purchased at the Secretan sale for $18,200. Frans Hals's portrait of his wife, Mr. Marquand's gift to the Museum, is also a very fine specimen.

"St. Diego of Alcala surprised by the Guardian," the largest and most important Murillo in this country, and one of the most notable in private hands anywhere, is owned by Mr. Charles B. Curtis, who is an expert on the works of this master and Velasquez and the author of an exhaustive and authoritative catalogue of their works. It is one of the historic eleven pictures painted by the artist for the Convent of San Francisco in Seville, a labor which at once made him famous.

An old legend was that St. Diego, the almoner of the convent, had been reproved by the guardian for too great liberality to the poor. He continued, however, to listen to the prayers of the needy, and one day as he was distributing food to a crowd of beggars the guardian suddenly appeared; but before he could administer a rebuke the bread in the fold of St. Diego's robe was miraculously changed into roses as an evidence of Heaven's approval of his charity. This miracle is the subject of the picture, which is nearly eight feet square, the figures being life size. Genuine Murillos are exceedingly rare and valuable. In 1852, his "Immaculate Conception," now in the Louvre, brought 615,300 francs at the sale of Marshal Soult's collection.

"A Peasant Boy eating Soup," by Velasquez, is also owned by Mr. Curtis. This picture was in the royal galleries at Madrid, and was given by Queen Maria Louisa to the painter Goya.

In the over-crowded gallery of the Historical Society hangs "The Martyrdom of St. Lawrence," by Titian, of which the catalogue says, "This painting is signed, and shows evidences of being the first of this subject which Titian painted; the second, ordered by King Philip II. of Spain, remains at the Escurial, and the third is in the Jesuits' church at Venice."

A further note adds that the picture, which is 97×90 inches, was valued by a former owner, Gideon Nye, Jr., at sixteen thousand guineas. Henry Peters Gray, who was a close student and copyist of Titian's methods and works, was particularly fond of this picture, and regarded it as one of the master's great works which bore strong evidences of his individuality. It was in the Durr collection, and with its fellows, to the number of one hundred and fifty-seven, was bequeathed to the society in 1882.

In the far corner of a small room at the other end of the gallery hang two pictures attributed to Rafael. They are small, about 8×20 inches, and are set in a panel frame of dark wood rudely carved. The subjects are the "Resurrection" and "Birth of Christ," which are treated in the "dry style" of Rafael's first period. These pictures were among the three hundred and eighty in the Gallery of Christian Art, collected by the late Thomas J. Bryan, which in 1867 he gave to the Historical Society. He was an earnest partisan of these pictures in particular, and says of them, in a note in the catalogue:

> The donor wishes it understood that in his opinion, and in that of some of the accomplished and practical experts of Europe, there is not the slightest doubt of the authenticity of these pictures.

Mr. Bryan was a man of large means and much taste, who spent many years abroad in the search of art treasures. His opinion is entitled to much respect, as no one of equal knowledge has attributed the pictures to any other painter, criticisms having been entirely negative.

Colonel O. H. Payne owns "Juliet and Nurse," by Turner, for which he is said to have paid $50,000. This picture has an interest and importance entirely apart from its merits or demerits. According to Monkhouse, one of Turner's biographers, it was the bitter criticism of this picture which first aroused Ruskin to write the letter to Blackwood's Magazine which grew into Modern Painters. Turner's "The Grand Canal in Venice, from the Madonna della Salute," now owned by Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt, was exhibited in 1835, in the Munro collection. It was sold in 1860 for £2520, and again in 1875 for £7350. "Saltash," a view on the River Tamar, painted about 1812, by the same artist, is interesting because Ruskin says of it, in a private letter in 1852: "I bid it up to £300 once, but it went higher, and I had no more to give." It was given by Mr. Marquand to the Museum.

A truly superb picture is Constable's "Hadleigh Castle," owned by Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt. The composition, a ruined castle with a receding storm-cloud and the sea in the distance, is admirably suited to display the painter's special ability. The subject was in Constable's mind, and sketches were made, more than fifteen years before the picture was painted, in 1829. It has attracted much attention from connoisseurs, and is ranked second to none of Constable's productions. The terms upon which Mr. Vanderbilt bought it in England were private, but if it were for sale it would probably bring from $40,000 to $50,000. Two of Constable's pictures of his favorite subject, "The Valley Farm," are in the city, a small one in the Lenox Library and a larger canvas in the Museum.

The well-known "Defence of Champigny," by Detaille, which was presented to the Museum by ex-Judge Hilton in 1887, was exhibited in the Paris Salon in 1879. Detaille described it as his "most important work." The price paid for it was understood to have been $50,000. "Champigny" and "The Defence of Le Bourget," by de Neuville, now in the Vanderbilt gallery, share the honor of being the most notable battle pictures produced through the influence of the Franco-Prussian war. In both of these masterpieces the artists, themselves soldiers, have paid lasting tributes to their comrades in arms.

"The Approaching Storm," painted by Troyon in 1855, is one of his chief works, many critics regarding it as his greatest effort. It was in the collection of Count Daupias, and at the sale in 1890 brought 130,000 francs. After passing through several hands, it came into the possession of its present owner, Mr. M. C. D. Borden, a few years ago.

"The Missionary's Story," by Vibert, now owned by Mr. C. P. Huntington, attracted much attention at the Morgan sale, and brought $25,500, the next highest price to that paid at the same sale for the "Communicants" of Jules Breton—$45,000.

An interesting picture is "Les Singes Experts," by Deschamps, which shows a group of monkeys wisely examining a picture. The artist intended it as a satire upon the critics who had attacked him. It was in the collection of M. Secretan, and at the sale brought 70,000 francs. It is now owned by Mr. H. O. Havemeyer.

Sir Thomas Lawrence's "Nature," which was exhibited in the Royal Academy in 1824, is now owned by Mr. C. P. Huntington. It is a picture of the children of C. B. Calmady, Esq., and was first engraved in 1829. Since that time it has been reproduced by nearly every known process, becoming almost as popular a type of childish beauty as Rafael's "Cherubs." There is a record of an English sale of this picture in 1886 for £1890.

Pictures of the Barbizon school are plenty; indeed, it is generally conceded that a large proportion of the best works of the artists of that prolific period are in America, and most of them in New York. Rousseau's "Edge of the Woods," in the Catherine Wolfe collection, is a chef-d'œuvre. It was bought two years ago at the Schaus sale for $24,200. Mr George J. Gould's "Hut of the Charcoal Burners" represented Rousseau in the Exhibition of One Hundred Masterpieces, in Paris, in 1883. It brought $15,700 at the Secretan sale. It was purchased for Mr. Gould at the sale of Mr. William H. Fuller's collection in February of this year for $36,500. The "Setting Sun" was purchased by Mr. Calvin S. Brice at the Morgan sale. "The Oven," owned by Mr. William Rockefeller, was once sold for 47,000 francs at a sale in France. "The Entrance to Fontainebleau" is owned by Mr. I. T. Fletcher. Millet's famous picture, "The Sower," has been made very familiar by many engravings and etchings. It is in the Vanderbilt gallery, and notwithstanding the great price brought by "The Angelus," is considered by many critics a finer work.

Corot's pictures are very numerous, by far the most important being "La Danse des Amours," now owned by Mr. George J. Gould. This picture was for many years the gem of the small but elegant collection of the late Charles A. Dana. It was purchased for Mr. Gould at the sale of the Dana pictures, early this year, for $36,000. Other notable works by Corot are "Woodland Scene," Jay Gould collection; "Les Sorciers," Mr. I. T. Fletcher; "Dance of Nymphs," Mrs. James A. Bostwick; "Les Pécheurs," Mr. Calvin S. Brice; and "The Bathers," Mrs. James A. Bostwick. A notable Diaz is "La Promenade," owned by Mr. J. P. Morgan, and the forest scenes by the same artist, owned by Mr. Calvin S. Brice, are important pictures. "The Banks of the Oise," one of Daubigny's best works, is owned Mr. I. T. Fletcher. It was in the collection of Count Daupias, and was purchased at the sale in 1890.

Fromentin's "Horse Dealers," owned by Mr. C. P. Huntington, is a fine and very valuable picture, as is "The Halt," by the same artist, owned by Mr. Calvin S. Brice.

Mr. H. G. Marquand, who has generously stripped himself of his art treasures for the benefit of the Museum, still retains Alma-Tadema's "Reading Homer," which reproduction has made so familiar. This picture was exhibited in the Loan Collection of Masterpieces at the World's Fair.

"The return from Egypt," a large picture by Rubens, now in the Museum, is one of his well-authenticated and acknowledged chief works. It was the product of his best period, being a contemporary of his famous "Descent from the Cross," in the Antwerp Cathedral, and was painted for the church of the Jesuits in the same city. It was first sold in 1777, with other works of art from similar sources, under the decree of the Emperor Francis II. suppressing the Jesuits. This picture has figured in every important Rubens catalogue and art encyclopædia for a hundred years, and passed with others into the possession of the Museum in 1871 on advantageous terms.

Two pictures by Rigaud, called the French Vandyck, are owned by Mr. W. D. du Casse, whose family traces descent from the great portrait-painter. One is a portrait study of the artist's brother and his wife and son, and the other is a portrait of the artist himself and his own wife and child. Both were painted between 1690 and 1695 and are in excellent condition. So far as is known, these are the only examples of this artist in the country, except the one owned by the Historical Society. These are exceptional pictures, and display well the artist's genius.

A very beautiful picture and veritable "art treasure" is Fortuny's "Choice of a Model," which brought the sensational price of $42,000 at the W. H. Stewart sale last winter. The purchaser, Mr. W. A. Clarke, added it to a collection of works of art already known to connoisseurs as one of the best selected and most valuable in the city.

Lack of space prevents the mention of scores of other paintings of the highest merit, interest, and cost, and of a host of still others that excel in one of these qualifications. The effort has been to mention only pictures which excel in all the points named.

LOUIS T. GOLDING.

"CONCERT AT AN OUTPOST."—ALPHONSE DE NEUVILLE.—OWNED, F. W. VANDERBILT.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AMATEUR SPORT

HOWEVER THE FOOTBALL SCHEDULE may be arranged for next year, it may, I feel sure, at least be put down for a certainty that there will be no "three-cornered league" formed by Harvard, Yale, and Princeton. It is not at all improbable, though by no means definitely determined upon, that, having played Univ. of Penn. for four years to the exclusion of Princeton, Harvard may now wish to play Princeton one year, possibly two. Princeton may reject Harvard's overture for a single game or for two games, in her desire for a three-year arrangement or nothing—in which case there will more than likely be no Harvard-Princeton game in '99.

Leagues, in my opinion, are unnecessary and cumbersome, and I think Harvard is of the same mind. Indeed, unless I am greatly mistaken, I believe I see in the wholesome, sportsmanly attitude of Harvard for the last three years an aversion to entering upon agreements and joining leagues. I expect Harvard's captains to choose their opponents, but to treat all fairly. At all events, I very much doubt if we shall see a league, of either the three or four cornered variety. We have no need for them.

The chase of a championship is harmful to the wholesomeness of the sport and a worry to every one. We have put aside the youthful methods of our adolescent sporting days. Colleges arrange games nowadays in accordance with natural, healthful rivalries, irrespective of whether they do or do not decide the strongest team in America.

THE ADJUSTMENT OF RIVALRIES among Harvard, Yale, Princeton, and Univ. of Penn. has always been a favorite theme for the space-writer, but it seems a simple question, after all, if only we accept certain facts without prejudice. For instance, nothing, of course, can come between the Harvard-Yale annual game—that is paramount to each. The friendliness between Yale and Princeton is of such warmth, and the tradition of their annual game so long standing, that I question if the consent of either could be secured for an arrangement which would disturb their annual fixture. New arrangements cannot be made without considering those already in existence—which are, to

C. D. DALY,
Harvard's Quarter-back.

B. H. DIBBLEE,
Harvard's Captain and Half-back.

wit, Yale, with her schedule of big games complete, for the day of more than two such in one season has, I believe, passed; Harvard and Princeton each with one big game scheduled, which cannot be disturbed; and Univ. of Penn. with her Cornell game.

MANY "IFS" HAVE BEEN EMPLOYED to relieve the situation of its embarrassments, and many suggestions offered; but the only practical solution to the meeting of Harvard, Yale, Princeton, and Univ. of Penn., I can see is for Harvard to play Princeton and Univ. of Penn. alternate years, and Princeton to play Univ. of Penn. in the year she does not play Harvard.

For instance, on that basis—in '99 Yale would play Harvard and Princeton, Harvard would play Yale and Princeton, Princeton would play Harvard and Yale, and Univ. of Penn. play Cornell and—Chicago (let me suggest). In 1900, Yale's opponents would be unchanged, but Harvard would play Yale and Univ. of Penn., Princeton play Yale and Univ. of Penn., and Univ. of Penn. play Princeton, Harvard, and Cornell. Thus of these universities, each, save Univ. of Penn., would have its two games every year among the four great university teams.

That old and oft-repeated plan which prescribed annual Harvard-Yale and Princeton-Univ. of Penn. games, the winners and losers to meet subsequently in a "championship" contest is a dead issue.

Such an arrangement would be acceptable neither to at least three of the universities concerned nor to sportsmen. Harvard and Yale would reject it because their game would thereby be made of secondary importance in the college season; Yale and Princeton would reject it because of a possible interruption of their annual meeting; sportsmen would deplore such an arrangement because of the implied exaltation of that "championship" idea.

At the same time it is to be desired meetings between these four be as frequent as may be, but the development of the game makes annual all-round contests impossible. The plan suggested seems the only feasible one.

And so perhaps—if the tendency to get players full-fledged out of the West, and to be over-generous with privileges to athletes, can be checked—we may all be happy yet.

DIBBLEE OF HARVARD GOING AROUND YALE'S END FOR THIRTY-FIVE YARDS.

THERE WERE THREE MEN in the Harvard-Yale game—Ely, Hubbell, and Jaffray—whose work was peculiarly commendable—and I say now that for which I had no space last week. To have continued in the game as did Ely, with a splintered rib, required an amount of pluck entirely incomprehensible to the average man. In the light of this, his work behind the line, especially his run, becomes remarkable. It was brave work, Quixotic work, and I hope the lad will suffer none of the consequences of so reckless a performance.

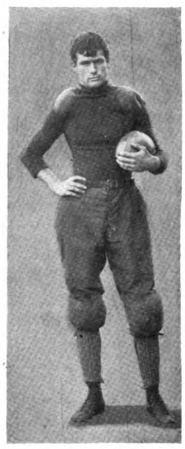
Hubbell was Yale's left end, and perhaps more plays were sent his way than any other, on account of left tackle being the weak place in the line. Many gains were made at these places, too, but had not Hubbell done the work of a Trojan that end of the line would have crumbled before the vigorous Harvard assault. Time and again and repeatedly he dived into Harvard's interference as it swept down upon him, and while he rarely completely broke it up, at least he materially checked the runners' gains.

Jaffray's work at centre was thoroughly first-class, and remarkable, therefore, because of his height, six feet five inches, and the very ordinary natural aptitude for the game he revealed when first he came out to try for the position. I remember him two or three years ago, a young giant, whose physical strength was enormous, but who, as a prospective centre, seemed hopeless even as a possibility. That he developed the class of football he played this year is due to his diligent endeavors and to the coaching ability and painstaking of W. H. Lewis, Harvard's old and cleverest centre. Despite his six feet five inches, his vis-à-vis did not get "under him" in either the Univ. of Penn. or Harvard game.

A FEW SECOND THOUGHTS.—The present rule, which permits the captain to call a substitute into the game whenever a player is tiring, is an excellent one and a great improvement on the old rule, which required that a regular player be physically incapacitated before retiring. Under the present system no dishonest faking is necessary, and the health of the sport is the better subserved.

It is a curious coincidence that the most sensational four runs American football has developed each brought victory, and all were made against Yale.

The greatest and the first was in 1885, by Lamar, the Princeton back, who ran very nearly the entire length of the field for a touch-down. The next two, made in the same game, when Harvard defeated Yale in 1890 at Springfield, were by Dudley Dean, who ran about forty yards to a touch-down, and Lee, who covered about thirty yards to Yale's goal-line.



MALCOLM DONALD,
Harvard's Tackle.

W. A. BOAL,
Harvard's Guard.

B. C. CHAMBERLIN,
Yale's Captain and Tackle.

F. G. BROWN,
Yale's Guard.

Arthur Poe's run this year was the fourth, and covered ninety yards, and gave Princeton victory over Yale.

ALTHOUGH WISCONSIN'S MANNER of bringing charges against Chicago University was deplorable, and cannot be excused, there appears to be sufficient ground for charging Chicago with at least lax enforcement of some rules pertaining to the eligibility of several members of her eleven. At all events, there is cause for suspicion, not perhaps of Chicago's honesty but of her vigilance.

We must have convincing evidence that Cavanaugh and Henry's playing was in compliance with the scholarship standard rule, and whether or not Henry did not play on Michigan last year, and thereby become ineligible to Chicago this year. We must have complete exoneration of the Chicago men charged of professionalism by Wisconsin, or their dismissal from Chicago teams. We must hear from Chicago why these men were permitted to represent that university, if their playing was in defiance of accepted rules. We—by which I mean the world of amateur sport generally—have believed in Chicago's good intentions, in her vigilance and honesty, and we cannot withdraw our confidence without good cause. But the exigencies of the case demand that Chicago must clear herself of these charges, and show cause why we should not withdraw that confidence.

BESIDES THE CHICAGO ATHLETIC ASSOCIATION there is only one club that in the past year has manifested any interest whatever in track and field athletics in the Middle West; and that one is the Milwaukee Athletic Society, whose members have given a field day and an in-door meet, and sent one or two representatives on different occasions to games held in Chicago.

The Chicago A.A., however, is practically the whole thing in that section, and has drawn into its lists all the really high-class material that can be induced to enter club athletics. This has stifled competition. The Detroit Athletic Club intended last summer to once more enter the field, but all its active athletes of prominence went

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

to war, either with the naval reserves of the Michigan brigade or with the army. The D.A.C. has now, perhaps, the cleanest athletic spirit of any club west of the Boston A.A. This year it has maintained two and three teams in baseball, betrayed a little indication of waking up again in tennis (George H. Sheldon is in the city), and has been more active in football than ever before, with a local interest correspondingly higher. Its teams have been clean and honest, and, in the main, composed of sports-men, though there have been a few exceptions. There is no suggestion of the money taint here, however.

HAVING HAD NO SPACE PREVIOUSLY, the following summaries are printed as a matter of record, and for the interest of alumni throughout the country:

HARVARD–UNIV. OF PENN. GAME—CAMBRIDGE, NOVEMBER 5, '98.

| Harvard. | Positions. | Pennsylvania. |
|---|---|---|
| Cochrane | Left end | Folwell |
| Farley | Left tackle | Goodman |
| Donald | Left guard | Hare |
| Boal | Centre | Overfield |
| Burnett | Right guard | McCracken |
| Burden | Right tackle | Garnett |
| Haughton | Right end | Hedges |
| Hallowell | Quarter-back | Gardiner |
| Daly | Left half-back | Harrison |
| Dibblee | Right half-back | Coombs |
| Warren | Right half-back | McMahon |
| Reid | Full-back | Outland |

Score—Harvard, 10; Pennsylvania, 0. Touch-downs—Boal. Missed goal from field—Cochrane, Outland. Goal from placed kick—Burnett. Referee—Matthew McClung, Jr., of Lehigh. Umpire—Paul Dashiel of Annapolis. Linesmen—Holden of Harvard and De Silver of Pennsylvania. Time-keeper—Wood, Boston A. A. Time of halves—35 minutes. Attendance, 20,000.

Average weight—rush-line, Harvard, 184 lbs.; Pennsylvania, 192 lbs. Average weight—centre and guards, Harvard, 204 lbs; Pennsylvania, 190 lbs. Average weight—three backs, Harvard, 167 lbs.; Pennsylvania, 166 lbs. Average weight—team, Harvard, 175 lbs.; Pennsylvania, 174¾. Average age eleven—Harvard, 20¾ years; Pennsylvania, 21¾ years.

RECORD HARVARD–PENNSYLVANIA GAMES.

| | |
|---|---|
| 1896—Harvard, 28; Penn., 0. | 1894—Penn., 18; Harvard, 4. |
| 1897—Harvard, 42; Penn., 0. | 1895—Penn., 17; Harvard, 14. |
| 1898—Harvard, 28; Penn., 0. | 1896—Penn., 8; Harvard, 6. |
| 1899—Harvard, 35; Penn., 0. | 1897—Penn., 15; Harvard, 6 |
| 1893—Harvard, 26; Penn., 4. | 1898—Harvard, 10; Penn., 0. |

YALE–PRINCETON GAME—PRINCETON, NOVEMBER 12, '98.

| Princeton. | Positions. | Yale. |
|---|---|---|
| Palmer | Left end | Eddy |
| Geer | Left tackle | Stillman |
| Crowdle | Left guard | Brown |
| Mills | Centre | Cutten |
| Booth | Right guard | Marshall |
| Edwards | Right tackle | Chamberlin |
| Hillebrand | Right end | Coy |
| Poe | Quarter-back | De Saulles |
| Duncan | Left half-back | Ely |
| Hutchinson | Left half-back | Daruton |
| Beardsley | Left half-back | Townsend |
| Black | Right half-back | Benjamin |
| Kafor | Right half-back | Corwin |
| Wheeler | Full-back | McBride |
| Ayres | Full-back | |

Score—Princeton, 6; Yale, 0. Touch-down—Poe. Goal from touch-down—Ayres Missed goal from place—Chamberlin, Wheeler. Referee—Wrightington of Harvard. Umpire—Dashiel of Lehigh. Linesmen—Francis of Yale, and Bovaird of Princeton. Time of halves—35 minutes. Attendance—15,000.

Average weight—rush-line, Princeton, 188 lbs.; Yale, 182 lbs. Average weight—centre and guards, Princeton, 221 lbs.; Yale, 189 lbs. Average weight—three backs, Princeton, 169 lbs.; Yale, 177 lbs. Average weight—eleven, Princeton, 178 lbs.; Yale, 178 lbs. Average age—Princeton, 22 years; Yale, 21 years.

Twenty-one games have been played since 1877, Princeton winning the championship seven times, and Yale eleven times. Three times the games were ties; detailed summaries follow.

RECORD YALE–PRINCKTON GAMES.

1877—Neither side scored.
1878—Princeton, 1 goal; Yale, none.
1879—Game resulted in a tie, but Princeton won the championship by defeating Harvard.
1880—Game was a tie, Princeton holding the championship.
1881—Game was a tie, but Yale won the championship by defeating Harvard.
1882—Yale, 2 goals; Princeton, none.
1883—Yale, 6; Princeton, 0.
1884—Game was unfinished on account of darkness, and no championship was awarded.
1885—Princeton, 6; Yale, 5.
1886—Game was unfinished on account of darkness. No championship awarded.

| | |
|---|---|
| 1887—Yale, 12; Princeton, 0. | 1893—Princeton, 6; Yale, 0. |
| 1888—Yale, 10; Princeton, 0. | 1894—Yale, 24; Princeton, 0. |
| 1889—Princeton, 10; Yale, 0. | 1895—Yale, 20; Princeton, 10. |
| 1890—Yale, 33; Princeton, 0 | 1896—Princeton, 24; Yale, 6. |
| 1891—Yale, 19; Princeton, 0 | 1897—Yale, 6; Princeton, 0. |
| 1892—Yale, 12; Princeton, 0 | 1898—Princeton, 6; Yale, 0. |

HARVARD–YALE GAME—NEW HAVEN, NOVEMBER 19, '98.

| Harvard. | Positions. | Yale. |
|---|---|---|
| Cochrane | Left end | Hubbell |
| Farley | Left tackle | Stillman |
| Donald | Left guard | Brown |
| Eaton | Centre | Cutten |
| Boal | Right guard | Marshall |
| Jaffray | Right tackle | Chamberlin, Capt. |
| Burnett | Right end | Eddy |
| Haughton | Quarter-back | Schweppe |
| Hallowell | Left half-back | Ely |
| Daly | Left half-back | Dibblee |
| Dibblee | Right half-back | Dudley |
| Warren | Right half-back | Eddy |
| Reid | Full-back | Townsend |
| | | McBride |

Score—Harvard, 17; Yale, 0. Touch-downs—Reid (2), Dibblee. Goals from touch-down—Haughton (2). Missed goal from touch-down—Haughton. Missed goal from place—Haughton, Chamberlin. Referee—McClung of Lehigh. Umpire—Dashiel of Annapolis. Linesmen—Thompson of Harvard, and Francis of Yale. Time-keeper—Wood, B.A.A. Time of halves—30 minutes. Attendance—17,000.

Average weight—rush-line, Harvard, 184 lbs.; Yale, 182 lbs. Average weight—centre and guards, Harvard, 204 lbs.; Yale, 189 lbs. Average weight—three backs, Harvard, 167 lbs.; Yale, 177 lbs. Average weight—team, Harvard, 175 lbs.; Yale, 178 lbs. Average age eleven—Harvard, 20¾ years; Yale, 21 years.

IN THE HARVARD–YALE FOOTBALL SERIES, begun in 1875, New Haven, November 13, fifteen men on a side, Harvard won in 1875 (Yale being greatly handicapped by playing under rules to which she was unaccustomed), in '90, Arthur Cumnock captain, and in '98, B. H. Dibblee captain. In '76 teams were composed of eleven men for the first time. In '77 Yale wished to play eleven, and Harvard fifteen, and no game resulted; in '78 and '79 Yale yielded the point, and fifteen were played, the game of '79 yielding a draw. In '80 elevens were definitely adopted. In '85 football was forbidden at Harvard; in '88 Harvard forfeited the game, because her faculty restricted play to New England subsequent to an agreement with Yale to play in New York. In '95 and '96, athletic relations being severed between the two universities, there were no games. In '97 the game was a tie, at Cambridge, neither side scoring.

RECORD HARVARD–YALE GAMES.

| | |
|---|---|
| 1883—Yale, 23; Harvard, 2 | 1891—Yale, 10; Harvard, 0. |
| 1884—Yale, 53; Harvard, 0. | 1892—Yale, 6; Harvard, 0. |
| 1885—No game. | 1893—Yale, 6; Harvard, 0. |
| 1886—Yale, 29; Harvard, 4. | 1894—Yale, 12; Harvard, 4. |
| 1887—Yale, 17; Harvard, 8. | 1895—No game. |
| 1888—No game. | 1896—No game. |
| 1889—Yale, 6; Harvard, 0 | 1897—Yale, 0; Harvard, 0. |
| 1890—Harvard, 12; Yale, 6. | 1898—Harvard, 17; Yale, 0. |

ALTHOUGH THE UNIV. OF PENN.–CORNELL GAME in Philadelphia, Thanksgiving day, may scarcely be taken as criterion of either team's '98 football development, none the less the score (12–6) serves fairly well as an indicator of the comparative strength of the two elevens, though I really think yet another touch-down, making a score of say 18–6, would more truly represent Univ. of Penn.'s superiority.

And the course of the game and the manner of the scoring served also to emphasize the unevenness of Univ. of Penn. that this year has so neutralized work of the team which was excellent. There is no escaping the judgment that this year's Univ. of Penn. eleven is the poorest one I have seen from that university since '93, and one of the most unevenly developed ones Univ. of Penn. has turned out since '90. It is utterly surprising a team so skilled in other departments should be so miserably weak in the kicking department. Not alone in punting, but particularly and disastrously so in the handling of opponents' kicks.

CORNELL GAINED YARDS AND YARDS because Univ. of Penn.'s backs were rarely under the ball. Three times out of four the ball struck the ground, bounced, and rolled along before the Univ. of Penn.'s back secured it, and usually was thereupon tackled. Univ. of Penn.'s success against the Indians, who are particularly weak in the open-field game, and against other teams not so strong, in running Outland back on these occasions, appears to have made a habit of this manner of receiving punted balls. If so, it was acquired curiously and in defiance of the teachings of up-to-date football. Were this criticism applicable only to Univ. of Penn.'s work on Thanksgiving day, when rain and snow made the worst playing-field of the season, explanations would be easily forth-coming, but the same weakness was apparent against Harvard at Cambridge, when the day was clear and the field in excellent condition. Only, at Cambridge it told more seriously because the speed of the Harvard ends never gave the Univ. of Penn. back a chance to run after he had fallen on the rolling ball.

PENNSYLVANIA'S POOR HANDLING of opponents' punts has been surprising enough, but her weakness in actual kicking is even more so. It is truly astonishing that the uninterrupted practice of a long season should not have developed a more dependable and more skilful punter than Hare. To continually employ a player so unfitted for the work was misuse of one of the best guards and most trustworthy line-buckers we have ever seen. It is difficult to understand why another man or several others were not drilled and drilled and drilled, until the team had one whose kicking would be helpful, at least in a degree, rather than so often actually menacing. How very weak Pennsylvania was in this department may be judged by use of Hare in the Cornell game, when a bad ankle really incapacitated him from doing even the little of his best. That more scoring by Cornell did not result on that account is a tribute to Hare as a game and determined player. Outland's efforts at punting were some improvement, and suggested possibilities under persistent coaching and long practice, but at present his best endeavors do not raise the standard of Pennsylvania's kicking to mediocrity. It looks very much as though Pennsylvania had entered upon her season's work in deliberate acceptance of this weakness as an irremediable evil, and in the confidence that her attacking power would more than counterbalance. But no season ever so clearly demonstrated the fatality of depending on unusual strength in one direction to make amends for actual weakness in another. The triumph of the evenly developed team has been complete, and amply illustrated in Harvard's brilliant successes and in Princeton's victory over Yale. Had Univ. of Penn.'s kicking department—by which I mean handling of opponents' kicks as well as own punting—been even passably fair, instead of inexcusably poor, confidence in that attacking power might have been somewhat justified by a better showing in the Chicago, and again, later, in the Harvard games. The same comment would perhaps be pertinent to the Cornell game, except that it seems hardly fair to look closely into the work of any team playing in driving snow and over the sea of mud and water which covered Franklin Field.

CONSIDERING THE CONDITIONS OF FIELD AND DAY, each eleven played as near its best form as could be expected. It was a slow game, made doubly trying to the players by the cold wind which blew down the field, and small wonder fumbling changed possession of the ball so frequently. As I have said, however, there was ample opportunity to judge the comparative merits of the teams. It was very loose football, as might be expected, sharp starting and prompt seizure of opportunities being, of course, out of all question. The runner who kept on his feet at all was lucky. On occasions when the play resolved itself into one of mere push, success was as apt to go to one side as to the other. In plays, however, where more of football knowing and skilful execution were possible, success much more frequently went to Univ. of Penn. Wherever the condition of the field at all permitted of it, Univ. of Penn. invariably got the "jump" on Cornell, and excelled her in the character, variety, and execution of plays. Though not having the actual figures before me, I should yet venture to say Univ. of Penn. must have made during the game three times as many yards rushing the ball as Cornell.

THE GUARDS-BACK FORMATION was employed, and proved an occasionally successful method of advancing the ball through the mud, but Pennsylvania showed good generalship by making Cornell's weak ends her frequent point of attack, and by opening her general play more than usual. It is due Cornell to say that her defence against the guards-back formation was very strong and effective, and particularly creditable considering the impossibility of getting a firm foothold. Cornell's defensive work most of the time was good, and on one or two occasions incomparable, as, for instance, in the last of the second half, when Univ. of Penn. had the ball on Cornell's one-yard line and lost it on downs. In attacking power Cornell was not so strong as Univ. of Penn., neither in conception of play nor in its execution. She appeared to rely too much on a few centre plays. She needs more frequent contact with teams showing a higher grade of offensive work than those usually met during the practice season—teams that will teach her faster, more adroitly planned attack, and the need of giving runners more vigorous and timely support. Cornell would find something of this kind in a game with West Point or Chicago University; and she needs such work between her early-season game with Princeton, when the latter has hardly got together, and her final contest with Univ. of Penn.

THE LINES WERE WELL MATCHED on the defensive, except for the ends, where Cornell was weaker, but on the offensive Univ. of Penn.'s forwards were into the game more than Cornell's. At quarter, G. Young handled the ball the more cleanly, and was of the greater service in the back field. He made one costly blunder in not dropping on the ball that time near Pennsylvania's goal-line, when there was some dispute as to its being in play, and Univ. of Penn. got it. Gardiner passed the ball poorly, and Overfield considerably increased the punting troubles of both Hare and Outland. In punting Cornell had considerably the better of it (her kicking must have gained twice as many yards as did Univ. of Penn.'s), and in handling kicks showed more judgment and skill than Univ. of Penn. Cornell's ends were not called upon for a great deal of work under Univ. of Penn's kicks. Hare, McCracken, Outland, and Coombs did the ground-gaining for Univ. of Penn., not forgetting a fifteen-yard end run by Carnett, and Lueder, Starbuck, and C. Young did the major portion of it for Cornell, with Reed and Sweetland showing prominently in the line.

Cornell had the wind and storm on her back in the first half, and made the most of her opportunity, punting repeatedly, and gaining ground because of Univ. of Penn.'s weakness already alluded to. When Cornell tried Univ. of Penn.'s line, she found the small and uncertain gains not worth the outlay, so after a time in the first half she kicked almost invariably. Univ. of Penn tried to counterbalance the weakness in kicking by rushing, and though her success was not continuous, it was frequent. It might perhaps have counterbalanced weak handling of kicks alone, but the added fumbling was too great a handicap. Having worked the ball along for a way, she was sure to lose it on a fumble, and to have Cornell kick it back.

SO IT CAME ABOUT that most of the play in the first half was in Penn.'s territory, or the middle of the field. There came a time, after about twenty minutes of play, when one of those kicks which had been allowed to bounce and roll was fumbled by Penn., and straightway Cornell secured the ball on Penn.'s 5-yard line. G. Young's failure to drop on the ball when it came back from the centre gave the ball to Penn., whose short low kick gave it to Cornell again on Penn.'s 20-yard line. Here Lueder and Starbuck made two of the cleanest gains Cornell scored in the game, and the ball was again on Penn.'s 3-yard line, where Cornell lost it on downs. Hare punted low and straight into Cornell, and Sweetland fell on the ball for Cornell's only touch-down. G. Young beautifully kicked a difficult goal.

Univ. of Penn. had the wind at her back in the second half, and proceeded to rush the ball down the field to Cornell's twenty-yard line, from where Outland, by a pretty end run, carried it for a touch-down and goal. Not many minutes later, when Cornell had been driven to her fifteen-yard line—a short punt was caught by Hedges, who made the second touch-down. For the balance of the half, possession of the ball kept almost constantly changing, Univ. of Penn. rushing, and Cornell kicking. And thus the game ended, fittingly, a fumble giving Univ. of Penn. the ball on Cornell's ten-yard line.

UNIV. OF PENN.–CORNELL GAME, PHILADELPHIA, NOV. 24, 1898.

| Pennsylvania. | Positions. | Cornell. |
|---|---|---|
| McMahon | Left end | Duval |
| Reugenberg | Left tackle | Wilson |
| Hare | Left guard | Wyvell |
| Overfield | Centre | Reed |
| McCloskey | Centre | Dorner |
| McCracken | Right guard | Lueder |
| Carnett | Right tackle | Sweetland |
| Hedges | Right end | Crose |
| Gardiner | Quarter-back | Grimshaw |
| Outland | Left half-back | G. Young |
| Coombs | Right half-back | Short |
| Folwell | Full-back | Whiting |
| | | C. Young |
| | | Starbuck |
| | | Perkins |

Score—Pennsylvania, 12; Cornell, 6. Touch-downs—Outland, Hedges, Sweetland. Goals from touch-downs—Outland (2), G. Young. Referee—W. A. McClung, Lehigh. Umpire—P. J. Dashiel, Annapolis. Linesmen—Harrison of Pennsylvania, and Morrison of Cornell. Timer—W. H. Lewis, Harvard. Time of halves—35 minutes. Attendance—16,000.

Average weight—rush-line, Univ. of Penn., 192 lbs.; Cornell, 176 lbs. Average weight—centre and guards, Univ. of Penn., 190 lbs.; Cornell, 188 lbs. Average weight—three backs, Univ. of Penn., 166 lb.; Cornell, 168 lbs. Average weight—team, Univ. of Penn., 174 lbs.; Cornell, 170 lbs. Average age eleven—Univ. of Penn., 21¾ years; Cornell, 20¾ years.

The frightful condition of the field, the benumbing atmosphere, and the storm combined to make it a day of utmost severity on the players, the hardest in my recollection. Any individual error was excusable, and both teams are to be congratulated on their determined, plucky work under such conditions. Despite the strain to which the tempers of the men must have been subjected, the game was clean and the players sportsmanly from the beginning to the ending. Such a record on such a field reflects great credit upon the elevens. CASPAR WHITNEY.

"RIDERS OF MANY LANDS."—By General Theodore Ayrault Dodge.—With Drawings by Remington.—8vo, Cloth, $4 00.—Harper & Brothers.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"À BAYARD."

SUCH honor won he by such simple art,—
Only to be brave, and kind, and true;
So did the right; until his whole soul grew
Wise, with that wisest wisdom of the heart.
For his whole land he stood—not for a part,
Nor to a party his high service due;
So builded ever better than they knew
Who made their statecraft but a party's chart.
So led his country on that higher plane
Of peace, that is the future of the world,
That Saxon freemen saw in him again,
Where'er America her flag unfurled,
Humanity, that marks the gentleman,
And kinship claimed with this American.

F. J. S.

EMILIO AGUINALDO.

AN INTERVIEW WITH THE PRESIDENT OF THE PHILIPPINE REPUBLIC IN HIS RESIDENCE AT MALOLOS, PROVINCE OF BULACAN.

Sunday, September 18, 1898.

WHEN I alighted from the train, which leaves Manila at 6 o'clock A.M., I made straight for the palace for my appointed interview with Emilio Aguinaldo, elected President by the Filipinos. I was received with all possible courtesies by an Indian interpreter, and was told that Don Emilio was just dressing to receive me. After a half-hour's more or less interesting conversation with the interpreter Aguinaldo appeared on the scene, without any ceremonies, and I was presented to him by his polite private secretary, who speaks English fluently and pleasantly. Having exchanged the common civilities of the day, a lively conversation started, and I learned the following facts:

Aguinaldo was born on the 22d day of March, 1869, at Cavité Viejo, and his education was such as the schools of the little country town were able to provide, and his life was spent in business to his twenty-fifth year, when he was elected Mayor of Cavité. On the 20th of August, 1896, the Governor of the province of Cavité reported to Manila that everything was quiet in Cavité, and no insurgents to be found anywhere. Aguinaldo, on his way home on the day after, the 21st of August, 1896, heard that a warrant had been issued for his own arrest on the charge of siding with the insurrectionists. Instead of going home he gathered twenty of his friends around him and waited for the arrival of the warrant. On the 22d a captain of the civil guard and two sergeants appeared to arrest him, and were promptly killed by Aguinaldo and his friends. This started the revolution. Aguinaldo asserts that before his arrest had been ordered—that is, before the 21st of August, 1896—he never had even dreamed about joining the insurgents; but in view of the unjust accusation he made up his mind to be one, and even to accept the leadership of the movement to free his native country from Spanish tyranny and injustice. On the 26th of August the news of his adventure was over all the islands, and beacon lights on top of all the hills and mountains of the country gave proof that the Filipinos were ready to join Aguinaldo and accept him as a leader of the insurrection. On the 1st of September, 1896, the first success of the Filipinos was the taking of the little town of Jmoz, with a few rifles and 2000 rounds of ammunition, against thirty-seven Spanish civil guards.

He gave the following three reasons for the outbreak of the insurrection:

1. The misdemeanor of the priests. (Spanish, of course.)
2. Spanish laws giving all the liberties to Spanish subjects and restraining the Filipinos in every possible way.
3. The occupation of civilian offices by Spanish officers instead of natives.

As an illustration of the first reason, he related this story:

A priest had an eye on the good-looking daughter of a native. He put himself in correspondence with the civil guards, whom he bribed, and had the father of the girl arrested on political charges. He then took possession of the girl, the house, and the fortune of her parents; in other words, he had them confiscated, and divided the spoils with the civil guards. The prisoner was put on board of a transport and exiled to some Spanish island in the Atlantic, where he was put at hard labor, and where he soon after died.

Doctors, lawyers, educated men of all descriptions, even women, have been similarly dealt with, and Aguinaldo asserts that even now Spain holds over 3000 such prisoners. In revenge the insurgents have locked up all the Spanish priests in the country, and hold them ready for exchange. Eight thousand prisoners, soldiers and priests, are kept by the Filipinos to-day, scattered through twenty-two provinces of the islands.

On the 24th of December, 1897, a peace was established between Aguinaldo and the Spanish, under the conditions that the priests leave the country, that civil offices be given to the natives, and that Aguinaldo should receive $800,000 and leave the country with forty of his followers. Aguinaldo got $400,000 in Hong-kong, but the rest of the conditions were never carried out, so the trouble started again, until the Spanish-American war broke out and Dewey took Cavité.

The feelings of the insurgents towards the Americans are often misrepresented. To-day there is a strong friendly current for us all over the country, and Aguinaldo hopes that not American protection but annexation may be the fate of the Philippine Islands, and that there may be no more Filipinos but Americans. He thinks it may not be possible to achieve this result immediately, but after a certain lapse of time, say two years; his heart is for an absolute Filipino government, without any foreign influences, but his better judgment, he says, favors annexation. So at least his private secretary expressed himself, but he does not like to be referred to thus in his official quality.

As an incident of interest, I will tell this in conclusion: Last Friday four Spanish prisoners, whom Aguinaldo has in his service, tried to poison him by putting arsenic in his food. They were caught in the act, and only escaped lynching through Aguinaldo's prompt protection and pardon. This story practically ended our interview. Aguinaldo was kind enough to present me with his photograph and autograph, and gave me in charge of his private secretary, who took me to his own home and entertained me delightfully. Aguinaldo begged me to excuse him for not himself asking me to lunch, but explained that he was too poor to indulge in even so slight a hospitality, and asked me to accept his secretary's invitation.

When I left the place I noticed an immense crowd of peasants gathered in the court-yard and in front of the palace. My host explained to me that this was a daily occurrence, through the desire of the people to see their new president.

W. A. HARPER,
Captain and Quartermaster, 2d Brigade, 2d Division, 8th Army Corps.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

RAISED TO HEALTH.
MORE infants have been nourished with Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk than by all other so-called infant foods combined. Thousands of mothers testify to its merit.—[Adv.]

FUNKIA OF JAPAN.
OH, the odd, gracefully confused, luxurious, and beaming flowers of Japanese Flora! and the perfumes, so strangely subtle, exhaled from their golden heart! Where is the fashionable lady, anxious for a rare essence, who did not dream of these perfumes scattered under too-distant climes? The subtle inventor, L. LEGRAND, of the "ORIZA" Perfumery has just realized the problem in creating for your delicate taste the "FUNKIA OF JAPAN" perfumes, extracted from the exotic flower, and whose untold scent joins to an exquisite sweetness the permeation of extreme fragrancy. —[Adv.]

BITTERS that benefit mind and body: ABBOTT'S—The ORIGINAL ANGOSTURA—build up wasted tissue, brighten up the mental, and make new men and women.—[Adv.]

DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS make health, rosy cheeks, and happiness.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pears'

To keep the skin clean is to wash the excretions from it off; the skin takes care of itself inside, if not blocked outside.

To wash it often and clean, without doing any sort of violence to it, requires a most gentle soap, a soap with no free alkali in it.

Pears', the soap that clears but not excoriates.

All sorts of stores sell it, especially druggists; all sorts of people use it.

(For a CHRISTMAS PRESENT what would be more acceptable than a)

Poco Camera

Picture-taking is a most delightful pastime, Winter or Summer. Made doubly so by using a perfect camera.
POCOS ARE PERFECT. Ask your dealer to show you the POCO, or write for descriptive catalogue.
ROCHESTER CAMERA & SUPPLY CO., 43 Elizabeth St., Rochester, N. Y.

Yale MIXTURE FOR Christmas

Ladies, this jar, containing a pound of Yale Mixture, will prove as acceptable a Christmas present as anything you can make or buy for a man who smokes. It is really a very attractive and permanently useful ornament—for the library—den—or student's room. The cover is made to hold sponge (or apple), to keep the tobacco always moist and in perfect smoking condition. Every one knows how good Yale Mixture is. There is nothing better—it smokes cool, sweet, does not bite the tongue, and is fragrant and pleasant in the house.

Ladies should encourage Pipe-smoking—as it is economical! You can buy this jar (400 pipefuls in it) at any first-class Tobacco store for $2.00. 400 cigars would cost $60.00. Pure, natural tobacco like "Yale," smoked in a pipe, is the best smoke of all, and never fails to satisfy!

Make A Memo
When you need a pencil be sure and get a Dixon.
Dixon's
American Graphite
Pencils
are made for every use mentionable—over 700 styles; 30,000,000 made yearly. Acknowledged as best the world over.
Joseph Dixon Crucible Co., Jersey City, N. J.

Every Owner of a Suburban Place needs
THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN
Published Weekly. $2 to Jan. 1, 1900.
Send for Samples.
LUTHER TUCKER & SON, Albany, N. Y.

THE CELEBRATED
SOHMER
Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.
Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade.
Our name spells—
S—O—H—M—E—R
New York Warerooms SOHMER BUILDING Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

THE HAIR 27th Ed., 25c. (or stamps.) Why it Falls Off, Turns Grey, and the Remedy. By Prof. HARLEY PARKER. A. N. LONG & CO., 1013 Arch St., Phila., Pa. "Every one should read this little book."—Athenæum.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

REAR-ADMIRAL SAMPSON,
Who describes the operations of the fleet under his command.

"We have often had occasion to point out the value, as records, of articles in the magazines, but the latest enterprise of 'The Century' throws into the shade nearly everything that has been done in the past.

The naval battles in the Spanish-American War are to be described by some of those who took part in them. Sampson, Schley, Evans, Taylor, Wainwright, Sigsbee, and Hobson are the principal contributors to the series. As an historical collection these papers ought to be invaluable. . . . Add to all these the immense resources of modern illustration."

—New York Tribune.

REAR-ADMIRAL SCHLEY,
Who writes of the operations of the Flying Squadron, and the part taken by the Brooklyn.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE

is now beginning a series of papers relating to the Spanish War that will rival even the famous papers in that magazine on the Civil War. The series begins with

CAPTAIN SIGSBEE'S PERSONAL NARRATIVE OF THE "MAINE."

The December (Christmas) number of THE CENTURY contains his account of the destruction of the ship in Havana harbor, including much that is new. In the same number begins to be complete in three numbers of THE CENTURY,— the only full and authoritative narrative of Lieut. Hobson's thrilling adventures in connection with the sinking of the Merrimac. This will be published in three parts: first, the origin of the plan and the preparations for its execution, down to the recall from the first attempt; second, a thrilling account of the manœuver, the explosion of the collier, and the capture of the party by Admiral Cervera; third, the interesting story of the captivity of the Merrimac survivors.

LIEUT. HOBSON'S STORY OF THE "MERRIMAC,"

Captain Sigsbee and Lieutenant Hobson Will Write for No Other Magazine.

CAPTAIN SIGSBEE,
Who tells the full story of the destruction of the Maine in the harbor of Havana.

LIEUTENANT HOBSON,
Who contributes, in three articles, a graphic narrative of the sinking of the Merrimac.

CAPTAIN TAYLOR,
Who tells of the fight with Cervera's ships from the point of view of the Indiana.

COMMODORE PHILIP,
Who narrates the experiences of the Texas, of which he was in command.

THE DESTRUCTION OF CERVERA'S FLEET

Will be described by

Rear-Admiral Sampson,
Rear-Admiral Schley,
Commodore Philip,
Captain Evans, Captain Taylor,
Lieut.-Com. Wainwright.

GENERAL NAVAL OPERATIONS

Will be described by

Captain A. T. Mahan, Captain Crowninshield, and others.

"THE WORK OF THE ARMY," By GENERAL WHEELER

and others, will be announced later.

This series is only one of a great number of striking features which THE CENTURY will print in the new volume just beginning.

CAPTAIN EVANS,
Who describes the part taken in the Santiago battle by the Iowa.

LIEUT.-COM. WAINWRIGHT,
Who presents the picturesque operations of the Gloucester.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS who begin a year's subscription with the December (Christmas) number—the most brilliant Christmas number ever issued—will receive a copy of the November number free, and so begin the volume and all the serials, if they will mention this paper on subscribing. Remit $4.00 by check, money-order, or express-order to

THE CENTURY CO., UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE WEST INDIES.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

WHAT IS THE MATTER WITH JAMAICA?

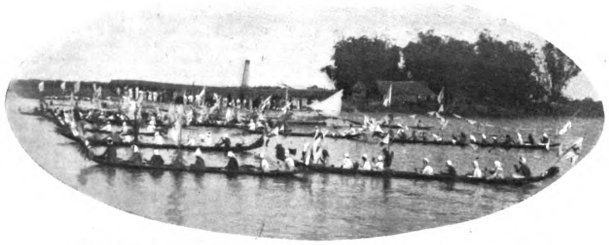
IT is very hard to say. Nobody who has written about Jamaica tells us. No commission has ever been able to find out. Every one is ready to deplore in general terms the prevailing "depression," but not a soul will specify a reasonable cause for woe. They complain of "neglect" by England and of the stupidity of the local government, and ask for impossible privileges from the one and seek an impossible perfection in the other. As a matter of fact, no colony has received, in proportion to what it has given, so much as Jamaica from the mother-country, while its records are dignified by the names of as many able and successful Governors as any other dependency of Britain can show. What class is it that is suffering? Not the black agricultural population. This island is their paradise. Nor the wage-earning blacks. They are admittedly a prosperous and contented class. Nor is it the small commercial community, nor the large traders, for every one acknowledges, and trade returns affirm it, that business is thriving. Is it, then, the large white estate-owners who are in such distress? Assuredly not, for their exports are this year as high as they were fifteen years ago.

The trouble, I am myself inclined to think, is mainly sentimental. Jamaica has kept on repeating to the world for years that England "neglects" her, England has got tired of being grumbled at without reason, and Englishmen have given up coming out here.

There is not much in the history of Jamaica to commend it to British sympathy, or to invite popular affection.

Of course it is easy enough for a special advocate to appeal to sentiment and "romanticism" by calling up the pictures of the aged Columbus's triumph and suffering; of Port Royal crowded with the victorious fleets of Penn, Venables, Camperdown, and Jarvis, and their French and Spanish prizes. Nor is it difficult to arouse admiration for the natural charms of so exquisitely beautiful an island —the "summer isle of Eden in its purple sphere of sea."

But when the sentimentalist has said all this and more, what does it all amount to, and when laid side by side with the lurid realities of Jamaican history, how the colors in his rosy pictures sicken and pale! In the records of the Gem of the Antilles, though glittering at times with guilty gold, and sumptuously illuminated with the trophies and triumphs of piratical atrocities, are records of blood and fire, of human wickedness and natural catastrophe.

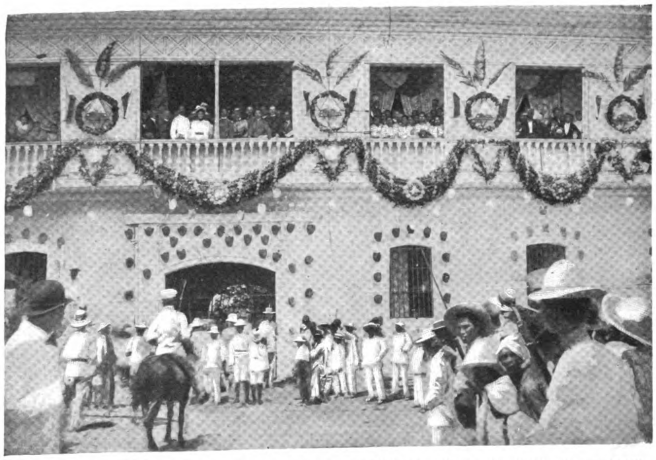


English history connects not only the glories of Rodney with Jamaica, but also the reverses of Benbow. Popular knowledge "at home" does not extend so far as the beauties and resources of this wonderful island, but only to its misfortunes and its troubles with slaves. Tradition preserves nothing much to its credit, but the stories of Paul Jones and Three-fingered Jack, of wicked Mrs. Palmer and the hunting of maroons with blood-hounds, are vaguely current as Jamaican legends, more or less authentic.

But though not bound to the "mother-country"—a phrase pathetically inappropriate to a colony that has only one European in it to every hundred and odd colored inhabitants—by any ties that call forth affectionate admiration, Jamaica has a claim upon England for its compassion and its special protection. None of our colonies has been struck so hard and so often by the "slings and arrows of outrageous fortune," nor more undeservedly.

In 1834 slavery was abolished "by act of Parliament," and widespread ruin enveloped Jamaica. The six millions sterling paid to the slave-owners, many of them living in princely style, as compensation for the destruction of their slave property and total loss of income, only accentuated the misery.

In times of prosperity money had been easily borrowed and the interest as easily paid, but now ruin overshadowed the planters, the borrowed capital had to be repaid, mortgages cleared, and very little of the six millions remained with those for whose benefit it had been voted, for it only sufficed to meet the liabilities incurred in the earlier days of improvident luxury. Immense estates lapsed into waste-land—"ruinate," as the pathetic technical term is—and wild vegetation re-entered into possession of the broad acres which a century of slave labor had conquered from it. It had been hoped that the freed negro would continue to work, but unfortunately the "nobility" which other races see in "work for work's sake" does not come within the scope of negro vision. He only works for others under compulsion. So, having obtained his freedom, he squatted on his late master's estate and was idle. Food was in abundance around him, and he needed little more. And so it is to-day. The curse of a great nomadic negro population refusing to undertake regular agricultural labor lies like a black cloud-blight upon the beautiful island, and until that curse is raised by strong and well-enforced vagrancy acts the prosperity which is Jamaica's natural right is impossible. The population to-day is about 800,000, and out of these only one in a hundred is white. Five hundred thousand are pure blacks, and in some inland districts they are, at this very day, morally retrograding towards aboriginal savagery. The obeah-man is a power in the land, and voudooism a religion. Matrimony as an institution has been abandoned, nearly every black being of "illegitimate" birth, and except that he has acquired some of the "peculiarities of civilization," the freed negro is to-day very little better than the African of the Congo.



Without abundant manual labor agriculture (the basis of West-Indian prosperity) is impossible. In the smaller islands of Trinidad and in Demerara, the planters made good the devastation that followed the hurricane of emancipation by importing abundant coolie labor from India. But in Jamaica many of the best of the sugar-estates have reverted so far into wilderness as to make the cost of their recovery equal to that of breaking new ground altogether. For close upon the heels of emancipation came free trade, and Jamaica sugar, hitherto protected by the duties on the foreign product, received a second blow while staggering under the first; and almost simultaneously with free trade, beet-root sugar appeared upon the scene. Combination might have saved the situation, but the opportunity was allowed to go by; and now, without substantial practical assistance from Great Britain, either in the donation of differential duties, state-aided coolie immigration, or some other violation of Brit-

AGUINALDO'S LAUNCH ON THE RIVER, SURROUNDED BY NATIVE CRAFT.

THE LATEST PORTRAIT OF PRESIDENT AGUINALDO.

FEAST GIVEN BY THE TOWN OF FERNANDO TO AGUINALDO, WHO IS SEEN IN THE WINDOW BETWEEN TWO AMERICAN LADIES.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE PHILIPPINE REPUBLIC.—[SEE PAGE 1187.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ish trade principles and "political economy," coalition upon such a scale as to make the sugar industry of the island what it ought to be seems to have slipped "out of the question."

But putting sugar on one side, what is the matter with Jamaica? As a matter of fact, very little; and Dr. Morris, the leading authority on the British West Indies, wrote, only last year, "Notwithstanding the immense depression in the value of its staple products, and in spite of the series of economic changes of exceptional severity through which it has passed, Jamaica is still in a comparatively prosperous condition as compared with 100 years ago." If anything is the matter with the island, it is the lack in late years of fresh English blood and the steady increase of the "colored whites." The "Jamaican" is of a listless and spiritless disposition as compared with the pure-bred Englishman, and that energy is wanting. Given some large scheme for encouraging the class of men who go so readily to Canada, the Cape, or Ceylon, I believe Jamaica would forge ahead again and the palmy days of slavery return. But with free labor, as I have said, the negro will not, and very naturally, do more manual labor than he need. Moreover, there is the rampant evil of a very large vagrant class, who wander about the island, doing no sort of work whatever, but subsisting by theft from the plantations of the industrious. And in addition there has to be taken into consideration the fact that some 80,000 black men are small land-owners, and therefore unwilling to absent themselves from their own holdings in order to perform for others' crops the operations of sowing, transplanting, or picking just at the critical times when their own little crops require precisely the same attention. Now these three causes combine to reduce the amount of labor available for the larger estates. But in spite of all this, there is no complaint among white planters as to the scarcity of hands, and if an effective vagrancy act were passed, compelling the vagabond to earn his living, there would, with the imported coolies from India, be always an abundance of labor.

Given, therefore, sufficient labor and a prodigious fertility of soil, there is no reason whatever why, with English and American energy and enterprise, we should hear in the future any more about "the matter with Jamaica." Meanwhile there are many openings for the investment of capital, and if the misconception as to Jamaica's "bankruptcy" could be corrected, there is no reason why this exquisite island should not become in a very few years the winter home of thousands of Americans and English, a pleasure resort of exceptional popularity, and a perpetual gold-mine to the investors in Jamaica.

A NERVY CORRESPONDENT.

The readers of HARPER'S WEEKLY who have been following the accounts of the campaign in the Philippines as contributed by our special war correspondents may be interested in this description of the methods adopted by one of them, Mr. John F. Bass, to secure the first and best news for this journal. It is a quotation from a letter written by General Hale, U. S. V., formerly Colonel of the First Colorado Regiment, to Governor Adams of Colorado, giving a summary of the work of the troops of that State in the operations against Manila:

"Several of the correspondents followed the attack quite closely, but the only one, so far as I know, who was actually in the first line of the assault, at least in our brigade, was Mr. Bass of HARPER'S WEEKLY, who was very enterprising and nervy, accompanying us on the first firing-line, and taking snap-shots with his kodak—'on the run,' so to speak. In fact, he became so enthusiastic after we forded the river and were advancing by alternate rushes up the beach, that he, in company with Major Bell of the Information Department, unconsciously got out in front of our firing-line, and I had to order them back."

JOHN F. BASS,
Special Correspondent of "HARPER'S WEEKLY" in the Philippines.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Hints to the Ambitious

The boy or girl seeking opportunities to achieve honorable success in life will find much that is suggestive, inspiring and helpful in the articles by successful men and women written for the 1899 volume of

JAMES BRYCE.

The Youth's Companion

THE following five contributions to the new volume serve to indicate the character and value of The Companion from week to week. They are but a handful out of more than 200 articles and stories by the most distinguished of living writers to appear in the 52 issues of 1899.

Hints on Reading, Rt. Hon. James Bryce, M. P.
The Boy with a Voice, David Bispham.
Art Students in New York, Editor and Contributors,
G. W. Breck. James Payn.
Opportunities for Young Explorers, Sir Clements Markham.

OUR OFFER FOR 1899

NEW SUBSCRIBERS who cut out and send this slip with $1.75 at once, will receive The Companion every week from the date of subscription until January, 1900. This offer includes the exquisite Companion Calendar, lithographed in twelve colors, suitable for the prettiest corner in the house. With the beautiful Double Holiday Numbers this makes one of the most delightful of Christmas or New Year's gifts. DC178

Illustrated Announcement and Sample Copies sent on request.

The Youth's Companion, Boston, Mass.

The Purest Type
OF THE Purest Whiskey,

Hunter Baltimore Rye.

10 YEARS OLD.
RICH, FINE FLAVOR.

THE "ONEITA"
PAT. APL 25TH 1893.

Elastic-Ribbed UNION SUITS

are complete undergarments, covering the entire body like an additional skin. Perfectly elastic, fitting like a glove, but softly and without pressure. No buttons down the front. Made for Men, Women, and Young People. Most convenient to put on or off, being entered at the top and drawn on like trousers. With no other kind of underwear can ladies obtain such perfect fit for dresses or wear so comfortably so small a corset.

ONEITA KNITTING MILLS, Office: No. 1 Greene St., N. Y.
Send for Illustrated Booklet. Address Dept. 7.

Financial

Letters of Credit. Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,
BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

No. 4711. WHITE ROSE GLYCERINE SOAP.

Transparent as crystal. The perfect cleansing properties and absolute purity, as well as the refined and delicate perfume of this toilet soap, have placed it at the apex of all.

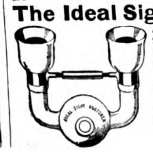
SOLD UNIVERSALLY. SAMPLE CAKE 15 CENTS.
MÜLHENS & KROPFF, U. S. AGENTS, NEW YORK

EDUCATION BY MAIL

our system of instruction Buildings erected ex... pressly for this pur... pose at a cost of $225,000 Courses ... Steam, Electrical ... Mechanical or Civil E... gineering; Chemistry, Minin... Mechanical and Architectur... Architecture, Mec... Drawing, Surveying; Plumbing; Bookkeeping; Shor... Pattern Drafting; Prospecting; ... hand; English Branches.

$2 A MONTH pays for a College Education at Hom... 40,000 Students and Graduates.
Circular FREE. State subject you wish to study.
THE INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL...
Box 1159, Scranton, Pa., U. S. A.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE
thoroughly revised and classified, will be s... by mail to any address on receipt of ten ce...



CHICKEN
NOVEL MEXICAN DELICACY.

Minced chicken, highly seasoned with Mexican spices, and wrapped in corn husks. Unique, delightful. At grocers, or ½ pound can mailed for 15 in stamps. Booklet sent on request.

TAMALE
ARMOUR PACKING CO.
DEPARTMENT H KANSAS CITY, MO. U.S.A.

The Ideal Sight Restorer.

A MOST VALUABLE AND SUITABLE PRESENT. THE INESTIMABLE BLESSING OF SIGHT. AVOID SPECTACLES, HEADACHE AND SURGICAL OPERATION. READ ILLUSTRATED TREATISE ON THE EYE. PAMPHLET MAILED FREE.
THE IDEAL COMPANY,
239 BROADWAY, N. Y.

THE DECKER

Established 50 Years. Catalogue Free.
Decker's Lightning Cushion. Billiard, Pool, Bagatelle Tables. All Supplies—Repairing.
105 East 9th Street, New York City.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Registered by U. S. Patent Office.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

Nerve Tonic, Anti-Dyspeptic, and Restorative.

Hunter McGuire, M.D., LL.D., President and Professor of Clinical Surgery, University College of Medicine, Richmond, Va., says:

"BUFFALO LITHIA WATER has very marked adaptation in diseases of the Digestive organs. In that condition especially known as Nervous Dyspepsia, frequently caused by over mental labor, it will be found highly efficacious. It has never failed me as a powerful nerve tonic when I have prescribed it as such, producing a decided calming effect in men and women whose broken down nervous system had kept them in perpetual motion, who could not sleep and who could not rest. I sometimes think it must contain hypophosphites of lime and soda. It acts as that compound does—as a tonic and alterative."

Dr. Harvey L. Byrd, of Baltimore, President and Professor of Obstetrics and Diseases of Women and Children in the Baltimore Medical College, formerly Professor of Practical Medicine, etc.:

"BUFFALO LITHIA WATER is an admirable general tonic and restorative, increasing the appetite, promoting digestion, and invigorating the general health. It is powerfully anti-acid and especially efficacious in acid dyspepsia. It is strongly commended to a very large class of sufferers by a peculiar power as a nerve tonic and exhilarant, which makes it exceedingly valuable where there is nothing to contra-indicate its use, in all cases where nervous depression is a symptom."

Dr. J. Allison Hodges, Professor of Anatomy and Clinical Professor of Nervous and Mental Diseases, University College of Medicine, Richmond, Va.

"BUFFALO LITHIA WATER possesses decided nerve tonic and restorative properties, and is an efficient remedy in a wide range of Nervous Disorders. In all of the many cases of Nervous Indigestion and Neurasthenia in which I have prescribed it, it has proved highly beneficial.

"I would especially mention the case of a sufferer from Nervous Indigestion, who after visiting most of the noted health resorts, both in this country and Europe, without material benefit from any, received decided and permanent benefit from this water."

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER is sold by Druggists and Grocers generally. It is an undoubted, positive remedy for many of the most serious and most common ills that afflict mankind. An illustrated book can be procured on request, containing the testimony of the most famous physicians of this country and Europe, as to the wonderful power of BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in Gout, Rheumatism, Bright's Disease, Gravel, Indigestion, Nervous Dyspepsia, Nervous Exhaustion, Malaria, Alcoholism, Eczema and Blood Disorders, Diseases of Women, etc. Send for the book and judge for yourself. Address

PROPRIETOR, BUFFALO LITHIA SPRINGS, VIRGINIA.

THE TRIUMPH OF AMERICAN INDUSTRY

Europe offers nothing finer, no more desirable contents or handsomer bottle, than is found in

EAGLE LIQUEURS

An American product that excels all foreign makes in true excellence, purity and healthfulness. Connoisseurs admit its superiority. Has no equal in perfect distillation, fruity flavor, deliciousness.

Digestive, Nutritive, Sedative.

The EAGLE BRAND is to be found at the best cafes, clubs and private sideboards, everywhere.

A case of twelve assorted bottles of EAGLE LIQUEURS makes an elegant Christmas Gift. If your dealer cannot supply you write to us for Illustrated Booklet and Prices.

Eagle Liqueur Distilleries,

Rheinstrom Bros., Distillers and Exporters, 933-955 Martin St. and 934-954 E. Front St., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Highest Awards. Established 1878.

CRÈME DE MENTHE — MARASCHINO — ANISETTE CVRAÇAO MARASCHINO ABSINTHE — KVMMEL CRÈME DE MENTHE CRÈME DE CACAO CRÈME DE CELERI

WHITE LABEL SOUPS

An Exquisite blending of flavor with strength. The best that money and experience can produce. At Grocers, 20 varieties ready for use without dilution. 5 varieties concentrated. Our Booklet explains. Free.

ARMOUR PACKING CO.
DEPARTMENT H
KANSAS CITY, U.S.A.

STANDS A WORLD Remington Standard Typewriter OF WEAR AND TEAR

WYCKOFF, SEAMANS & BENEDICT,
327 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

THE BEST HOME GAME.

Adapted for either Children or Adults.

PRICES: Paper Bound, $1; Cloth Bound, $2.

PARCHEESI

THE ROYAL GAME OF INDIA.

No household complete, No home happy without it.

No Parlor Table Game has ever been published which has had so great a sale. For twenty years the best families have had it in their homes, and so enjoyed it that now it is always called for when the question arises, "What shall we play?"

Sold by all leading Book, Stationery, Toy, and Department Stores. Postpaid, by

SELCHOW & RIGHTER,
390 Broadway, N. Y.

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak.

Holidays are Kodak Days

The long evenings of Christmas-tide are made doubly delightful by taking flash-light pictures of one's friends.

Picture taking by daylight or flash-light is easy with a Kodak.

Kodaks $5.00 to $35.00.

Catalogues free of dealers or by mail.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

7,000 Guns in Stock

WE SELL GUNS of every reputable American and foreign make, and give wholesale prices to everybody. We carry in stock

Fishing Tackle and Sporting Goods amounting to a quarter of a million dollars. We can please the fancy of millionaires, or meet the demands of the poorest sportsman and angler. Write for prices, or ask us to send you our Sporting Goods Catalogue. We load and sell over

1,000,000 Hand Loaded Shells a Year Ask us to send you our price card of hand and machine loaded shells. We have

The largest Gun Repair Shop in America We make guns, re-bore, re-stock, repair—in fact, alter a gun to suit the owner, and guarantee satisfaction. Write for prices.

MONTGOMERY WARD & CO.

Originators of the Catalogue Business 111 to 120 Michigan Ave, cor. Madison St., Chicago

MENTION THIS PUBLICATION WHEN WRITING

Are You Interested in Electricity?

Do you intend experimenting with Electricity? One of my Electrical Novelties will make a useful Christmas present and also delight the young. We are headquarters for Electrical Novelties, Experimental Apparatus, and Electrical Supplies of all kinds. Send 2c. stamp for catalogues.

MUELLER ELEC. CO. (Dept. A), 118-115 Burling St., Chicago.

Blakemore Whiskey 7 years Old.

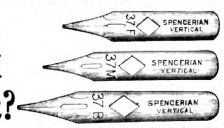
NOTHING BETTER MADE OR SOLD.

Matured in wood and bottled in bond under Governmental Supervision.



If your dealer hasn't it, send us TWELVE DOLLARS, and we will have sent to your address by express prepaid a sample case containing TWELVE BOTTLES.

Freiberg & Workum,
Cincinnati, O.

Spencerian Pens

New Series No. 37.

See That Hole?

That is for inserting a pointed instrument to eject the pen from the holder, and to prevent the ink from flowing back on the pen and soiling the fingers.

Samples on receipt of return postage. Ask for Vertical No. 37.

Spencerian Pen Company
450 Broome Street, New York.

Picturesque Sicily

By WILLIAM AGNEW PATON. Illustrated from Photographs. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, Uncut Edges and Gilt Top, $2 50. Édition de Luxe on special paper, Uncut Edges and Gilt Top, bound in Gray Paper with Cloth back and paper label. Only 100 copies printed, of which 50 are for sale. $15 00.

"Picturesque Sicily," can be pronounced one of the most acceptable of recent books of travel.—Philadelphia Telegraph.

NEW YORK AND LONDON
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers

1899 Calendar.

A handsome 1899 Calendar, in colors, is being issued by the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Ry. This calendar has thirteen printings and is made by the patent transparency process, producing a beautiful color effect, especially when hung in the light.

Design embraces a government mail pouch suspended from a mail crane, finished with a pleasing color sketch at bottom of hanger. Size of calendar, 14 x 20 inches.

Sent to any address on receipt of eight cents in postage. Ready for distribution December 15th. To insure getting a copy send in your order now to

A. J. SMITH, Gen. Pass. and Ticket Agent, Cleveland, O.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

TRAINING FOR THE EVENT.

"Why, Professor, I wasn't aware that you went in for athletics to this extent?"
"I don't ordinarily, but [biff] I've got to [bing] discharge our cook next week [bang]."

WHITE:—Just as soon as cold weather sets in, my hands roughen and crack. I buy the best and most expensive soap my druggist has, but the result is just the same; sore hands every winter.

BROWN:—I had just the same experience until I read one of the Ivory Soap advertisements about too much alkali in some soaps, which draws the natural oil from the skin and leaves it dry and liable to crack, so I sent out and got a cake of Ivory Soap, and found it all the advertisement promised; my hands are soft and smooth the year round.

A WORD OF WARNING.—There are many white soaps, each represented to be "just as good as the 'Ivory';" they ARE NOT, but like all counterfeits, lack the peculiar and remarkable qualities of the genuine. Ask for "Ivory" Soap and insist upon getting it.

Copyright, 1898, by The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati.

"Perfection" Yacht Mattresses and Cushions. Every yachtsman knows what it is to have our bedding on a yacht. "Perfection" Mattresses are moisture resisting, non-absorbent, and vermin proof. We make to order any size or shape of mattresses and cushions. Write for catalogue. Send measurements for estimates.
MECHANICAL FABRIC CO., Providence, R.I., U.S.A.

BRASS BAND
Instruments, Drums, Uniforms, Equipments for Bands and Drum Corps. Lowest prices ever quoted. Fine Catalog, 400 Illustrations, mailed free; it gives Band Music & Instructions for Amateur Bands.
LYON & HEALY 17 Adams St., Chicago.

TRADE E&W MARK
EARL & WILSON'S LINEN COLLARS & CUFFS BEST IN THE WORLD.

Armour's Extract of Beef
"has that rich, beefy flavor."
For preparing soups, sauces, gravies, etc. "Culinary Wrinkles" gives many ways of using Extract. It's mailed free for the asking.

ARMOUR'S CONCENTRATED TABLETS of BEEF EXTRACT and VEGETABLES—condensed food—for home use or travelers—Sample Box containing sufficient for three meals, free, for a two cent stamp and your dealer's name.

Actual size of Tablet.

Address ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

"An honest tale speeds best being plainly told."

VICTOR BICYCLES.

Better Victor Bicycles than ever have been made.

Better bicycles than are made anywhere at any price.

The bicycle which we have been twenty years building.

The bicycle which falls heir to all the good points of its predecessors.

The product of the best bicycle factory in the world.

One model only—the best model.

One price only—the popular price.

We have always made bicycles to ride.

We have resisted the temptation to make them only to sell.

The '99 Victor is the most ridable machine we have ever seen in any country.

Price $50.

Overman Wheel Co., Chicopee Falls, Mass.

W. & J. Sloane

Are now showing a great variety of choice Foreign and American
WILTON CARPETINGS,
in designs and colorings prepared under their direction, to suit the high-class decorations and furnishings of the several important periods.
Their well-selected and varied stock of
ORIENTAL RUGS
is replete with rare and beautiful specimens of the Eastern hand-looms.
INTERIOR DECORATIONS
Imported Wall Papers; Special-Design Furniture of best French and American manufacture.

Broadway & 19th St.
NEW YORK.

PIANOS
Recent improvement in the construction of our upright and grand pianos render them absolutely unequalled. Send for new descriptive catalogue with prices and terms.

ORGANS
For fifty years the Standard of the World. New styles of parlor and church organs just introduced. Also large assortment of slightly used pianos and organs.
SOLD ON INSTALMENTS, Rented and Exchanged.

Mason & Hamlin Co.
146 BOYLSTON ST., BOSTON.
8 AND 5 WEST 18th STREET, NEW YORK.

Arnold Constable & Co.

Underwear.
Men's, Women's, and Children's Underwear of Cartwright & Warner's Celebrated Make, in Wool, Merino, Camel Hair, and Silk and Wool.

Hosiery.
Ladies' and Children's Hose and Half Hose.
Men's Hosiery, Golf and Bicycle Hos

Broadway & 19th St
NEW YORK.

Nathan B. Goodnow & C
BANKERS.
ESTABLISHED 1873.
2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.
Transact a General Banking Business, including Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain Investment or on Margin.
Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.
Books containing Four-Year Range of Pr Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.
A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO H DRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUS DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security fo persons having business with us.
Correspondence solicited.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE, a descriptive list of over 2 umes, will be sent to any address on receipt of Tw in stamps.

NIAGARA FALLS only 9 HOURS from NEW YORK by the NEW YORK CENTRA

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

NEXT WEEK, CHRISTMAS NUMBER, COLORED ILLUSTRATIONS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—No. 2190.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS.
All Rights Reserved.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1898.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE PERILS OF THE DEEP.

RESCUING THE CREW OF THE STEAMER "IRON CLIFF," WRECKED OFF THE GOVERNMENT BREAKWATER, CHICAGO HARBOR.

DRAWN BY H. REUTERDAHL.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, DECEMBER 10, 1898

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4 00 a Year, in Advance
Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, and Mexico
Subscriptions may begin with any Number

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
New York City: Franklin Square
London: 45 Albemarle Street, W.

Also for sale at Brentano's, 37 Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris

IT is reported that the President intends to appoint Mr. JOSEPH H. CHOATE as ambassador to England. Whether it is Mr. CHOATE or Mr. ROOT who is finally selected, the appointment will be in every way worthy of the recent traditions of the office. We are quite sure that the prestige of our English mission, established so brilliantly by Mr. LOWELL, Mr. PHELPS, Mr. BAYARD, and Mr. HAY, will not be diminished in the slightest degree by either of the gentlemen, whose appointment, it is said, would be agreeable both to the Republicans of the State and to the President.

SECRETARY LONG'S report referring to the conduct of Admiral SCHLEY at Santiago contains a despatch which was naturally not part of Admiral SAMPSON'S report, but which is nevertheless of great interest. It is a despatch from Admiral SCHLEY himself, announcing that he was sorry that he would not be able to obey the order of the department and remain at Santiago, and that he was about to go to Key West for coal. Subsequently it has turned out that Admiral SCHLEY'S defence is that he did not go to Santiago, and did not maintain the blockade after he got there, because he was short of coal, and was afraid that he would fail if he attempted to supply his deficiency by coaling from his collier. In other words, he was going to leave CERVERA at liberty to escape from Santiago and to go where he would—that is, where he could do the most damage to us—because he was afraid he could not do what afterwards he actually did succeed in accomplishing.

WE have insisted, it appears, upon the cession of the Sulu Islands in addition to the group properly known as the Philippines, and Spain has agreed. Technically, no doubt, we were entitled to make the demand, and it was one about which no great reluctance was to be apprehended on the part of Spain. She had formally included them by proclamation in the adjoining group years ago, and although neither geography nor convenience endorsed the step, it was no hardship to compel her to abide by her own action. She could also well afford it, unless she intended to sell the islands to somebody else, for to her at least they were absolutely useless. No islands in all the oceans have quite so bad a name as the Sulu group. Occupied by savage tribes, and the chief haunt of the very worst class of pirates produced even by the Eastern Archipelago, they have long been a menace to shipping, and a regular cruising-ground for British men-of-war engaged in the protection of commerce. That duty will no doubt now devolve upon our own war ships on the Philippine station, which are likely to find their duties no sinecure for a good while to come. After all it was perhaps well that if we were to become owners of a Philippine empire we should add the Sulus to our new possessions. Financially, and it may be otherwise also, we shall probably have cause to regret our policy, but it may be some satisfaction to know that our nearest neighbors will be the British in Borneo, and that the whole of southern China will be ringed by the island possessions of kindred peoples, who are agreed in the main features of their policy.

THE pamphlet containing Admiral CERVERA'S letters is in many respects a valuable contribution to the history of the late war. No more convincing illustration of the truth of the old proverb, "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad," could be supplied than may be found in the Admiral's letters. Absence of foresight, carelessness of warnings, unhesitating subscription to the policy of "mañana" in everything, are the characteristics of those in authority in Spain, and against these the unfortunate Admiral struggles in vain through a correspondence extending over years. The warning is not such as we can afford to disregard in this moment of the success to which these things so greatly contributed. The age moves quickly, and alertness of preparation is the condition of safety and success; and so long as warlike armaments are a necessity at all, it is necessary that they should be maintained in a state of efficiency. For us there is perhaps the additional warning not to think too highly of our overwhelming success against an enemy so helplessly unprepared for war as our late antagonists. We have heard much of heroes, perhaps somewhat overmuch, during the war now happily ended, it may be no bad thing to allow a little of our natural tendency to hero-worship to go out in the direction of the writer of the CERVERA letters, who, in the guise of a straightforward and unpretentious sailor, showed a quiet heroism in the performance of a duty which he knew to be a hopeless one when he undertook it. The heroes of the romantic history of old Spain have nothing to show more worthy of admiration than this.

SECRETARY LONG'S report asks for the construction of fifteen new vessels. This is the first instalment of expense since the beginning of the war with Spain necessitated by the policy of expansion, and if we go on it will be far from being the last. If we are to enter the lists of warlike and military nations, no one can object to the construction of fifteen vessels, and patriots who have the real interests of their country at heart will be eager for the completion of a big, fleet as soon as possible. But why Monitors should have been recommended is a question which is puzzling all naval experts who have any knowledge of what happened during the last war, when the uselessness of these vessels was clearly demonstrated. They are of absolutely no value except for harbor defence, and there are better methods of harbor defence than they offer. In fact, we should say that when a harbor actually needs defensive vessels to supplement its fortifications, the battle-ships of the navy would be on hand, unless the command of the fleet was in less competent hands than those which have just won our victories for us in the Pacific and in the Caribbean Sea. Every one who knows the navy and its needs will join heartily with Secretary LONG in urging upon Congress the passage of the personnel bill, and also the provision for rewarding officers who distinguish themselves in some other way than at the cost of their fellow-officers.

THE DREYFUS case came up during the week in a new way. A crowd of Dreyfusites, who seem now to be able to show themselves without danger of having their heads broken, visited the prison of the Cherche-Midi, where Colonel PICQUART is incarcerated, and consoled themselves and the victim of French military injustice by cheering to their hearts' content. Even the Chamber of Deputies broke out against the anti-Dreyfusites. M. POINCARÉ, a former Minister of Public Instruction in the government in which General MERCIER was Minister of War, announced that the first that he had heard of the conviction of DREYFUS was through the newspapers. This was confirmed by another Deputy, M. BARTHOU, who was Minister of Public Works in the same government. On the whole, it would seem as though France is awakening to the fact that a grave injustice has been done, and that the nation cannot stand up and confront its accusers, who charge that the army is punishing a man in the most cruel and inhuman way for a crime of which he has not been proved guilty. M. DE FREYCINET announced that the government would show the Cour de Cassation everything that did not relate to the national defence. This means that those who insist upon upholding the conviction of DREYFUS, without regard to HENRY'S confession and his forgery, are driven to the point of saying that they cannot make public the case against DREYFUS without disclosing the plans made for the defence of the frontier. But the answer to this is clear. If DREYFUS was guilty of revealing secrets of national defence either to Germany or to Russia, those secrets are already known, and no good can be obtained by concealing them, while much evil will always result from national injustice. In other words, the talk about national defence seems to be simply dissimulation and a way to avoid doing justice, just as the persecution of Colonel PICQUART is evidently a method of distracting public attention from the real offenders, who are now the government and the army.

TWO captains of the Seventy-first Regiment, New York State Volunteers, have made a statement concerning the conduct of some of the field-officers of the regiment at the battle of San Juan. The report is a severe reflection upon Colonel DOWNS and Major WHITTLE. Colonel DOWNS is said to have been in the rear of the regiment during the fight, and Major WHITTLE is practically charged with hiding behind shelter while his battalion—the first—went into action. Colonel DOWNS, it is said, even after the fight, had to be ordered to come to the hill and take command of his men. This report, which is published in the newspapers, is entirely contrary to military regulations, and the captains who signed it ought to be punished. The fact remains, however, that what they say of the conduct of their officers agrees with reports that have reached us from various sources; and there is no doubt that a general court of inquiry should be held, and, if necessary, courts martial should follow. This is an important matter. If we are to have militia in the active service of the United States in time of war, if the lives of troops and the welfare of the country are to depend upon the action of officers of the National Guard, discipline should be established and maintained, and cowards and incompetents should be cashiered. Such an example is essential for the good of the whole, and lest these things, if they happened at all, should be repeated in the future. We are not prejudging the case against Colonel DOWNS and Major WHITTLE, but we have ample reason for believing that the investigation should be had. We are sorry that it was not had by the United States before the regiment was mustered out of the service, for we believe that the general government's investigation would have been more thorough than any that the State will undertake, and that the punishment meted out to the guilty officers, if they are guilty, would be more nearly commensurate with the nature of their offence. The war has shown us, among other things, that the punishment inflicted by militia courts martial for serious military offences was nearly always inadequate. But although the regiment is no longer in the service of the Federal government, and therefore Federal discipline cannot be enforced, the State owes it to itself, to its Guard, and to the country that the charges made against the Seventy-first Regiment should be investigated, and that if Colonel DOWNS and Major WHITTLE, or any others, are guilty, they should be adequately punished.

AS was inevitable, Spain has yielded to the demands of the United States, and has surrendered the Philippines and the Sulu Islands. The Spanish commissioners protested that they yielded to superior force, which was treating an enemy unjustly and contrary to the spirit, at least, of the protocol. Certain as we are that the annexation of the Philippines is a mistake, we do not think that the United States has demanded any more than it had a right to insist upon by reason of its conquests. If we were a European power frankly engaged in the business of extension and colonization, the demand made by the administration would not have been objected to by any European power. We have never believed that there was any question for the United States to consider in this matter but its own good. The people of this country went into the war for the sake of humanity and after having long borne an intolerable nuisance at their very doors. At different times during the whole century the country has shown great patience, forbearance, and great kindliness towards Spain, and the Spanish government should not have made the late war possible. It is true that the Paris commissioners did not negotiate and had no power to negotiate, and that they simply insisted with the strong power behind them which made their insistence irresistible. Spain has no cause for complaint, Europe no cause for protest, and if anybody is injured it is the United States. The criticism that is indulged in by some of the European newspapers—the Spanish newspapers can be forgiven, on account of the losses their country has suffered—is intolerable. It is not true that we were dishonest or disingenuous in declaring that this was not a war of aggression. So far as the people of the United States were concerned, and so far as the politicians themselves who passed the Congressional resolution declaring that there was not a war of aggression were concerned, there was no idea, at the outbreak of the war, of adding to our territory or even of demanding an indemnity. We do not think ourselves that it was wise to take our new possessions, but the statement made in the Continental press of Europe, that we took the territories because we are land-grabbers and that we were not ingenuous in making the pretext originally, is untrue. We are convinced that the administration took its final position in regard to the annexation of the Philippines because it thought that the best public sentiment, and especially the public sentiment of the churches, demanded that we take the Philippines, and, above all, that we should not give them back to Spanish tyranny and misrule. Whether the change was justified or not, the public mind had changed on this sub-

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and the annexation of the Philippines was as honest an expression of humane sentiment on the part of the American people as the war itself.

THE CONSTITUTION AND OUR COLONIES.

IN the issue of HARPER'S WEEKLY dated June 25 we commented upon the decisions of the United States Supreme Court on the subject of the powers of Congress over Territories. In the course of the article we quoted from the opinion of Mr. Justice BRADLEY, in a case involving the validity of the EDMUNDS anti-polygamy law, the following: "Doubtless Congress in legislating for the Territories would be subject to those fundamental limitations in favor of personal rights which are formulated in the Constitution and its amendments; but these limitations would exist rather by inference and the general spirit of the Constitution, from which Congress derives all its powers, than by express and direct application of its provisions." We added: "Justice BRADLEY moved forward a little along a line pointed out by MARSHALL, going beyond any decision that had theretofore been made by the Supreme Court; and while it may be that the Court will always find a reason for keeping Congress within the constitutional limitations, its recent history shows that it is equal to bold departures. It may therefore some day reach the point of declaring that there is no limitation upon the powers of Congress in its government of territories."

This prediction seems likely to be realized, if we are to suppose that Attorney-General GRIGGS represents any considerable body of legal opinion, or, for that matter, of popular opinion. He, at all events, is quite sure that the Constitution will have no application to the territories of the United States acquired by the war, beyond the grant to Congress to make only needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States. In making those rules and regulations, according to Attorney-General GRIGGS, Congress is not bound by any of the limitations imposed by the Constitution upon the exercise of its power over the States. It is true that Congress has, in general, although not always, obeyed the Constitution in legislating for territory acquired from the original States, by conquest, or by purchase, and it has never attempted to deprive the citizens of our Territories of any of the fundamental personal rights which seem to be guaranteed by the Constitution. But the time is evidently at hand when a strong party in the nation will make a point of insisting that territories may be ruled by Congress outside of the Constitution, and even against the instrument which Mr. GLADSTONE declared to be the most perfect of human political institutions made at a single moment. It is not so long ago that this great instrument, for it is very great, was established and ordained. In the life of a nation the time that has elapsed between the days of the fathers and our own days is but an instant. Times have not so changed, men have not so developed, conditions are not so revolutionized, that the essential truths of the eighteenth century have lost their character in the nineteenth. What was true as a political institution in 1789 is true to-day, and this is recognized even by those who are contending that the Constitution will not apply to the Philippines, or to Puerto Rico, or to Hawaii, although it is impossible to believe that they still recognize the truths of the Declaration of Independence. The theory that all governments ought to exist by the consent of the governed has been dropped, but the belief holds that the Constitution did not establish a government capable of ruling over distant territories and alien peoples. Therefore it is that Attorney-General GRIGGS and other expansionists take the ground that the new colonies lie outside of the Constitution, and may be ruled without regard to its provisions, whether these limit the powers of Congress, define the jurisdiction of the courts, grant power to the President, or guard the rights of the individual.

The denial of the benefits of the Constitution to these distant islands is essential to the easy establishment of a new government for them, while preserving our domestic system. In no other way, for instance, can protection be maintained for the United States and free trade extended to the Philippines. Our official representatives at Paris have promised that the United States shall maintain the "open door" in the Philippines. There is only one meaning to this term. It does not mean, and cannot be made to mean, that the United States will collect in the archipelago, on importations from the home country, the same rates of duties charged on like goods coming from other countries to our home ports. That would simply mean not an "open door" at all, but the extension of the closed door, which is maintained here against foreigners, to the manufacturers and producers of the United States so far as the Philippines are concerned. No, the "open door" means free trade, and free trade, under the Constitution, must prevail everywhere throughout the United States if it prevail anywhere. Even the attempt to make matters equal in the Philippines by charging duties on goods entered from the United States could not succeed under the Constitution, for it would be a taxation of United States citizens in the Philippines not imposed on other citizens of the country, and the framers of the Constitution intended that the burdens of the United States government should fall uniformly on all its citizens; that no tax should be levied on the people of one part of its domain that was not levied on the people of every other part of its domain.

It seems to us to be beyond doubt that the policy of expansion will immediately be followed by the adoption of the policy of free trade, that expansion and colonization, if the laws of nature are to be overcome and the American white man is really to colonize the tropics, cannot possibly exist together. Even expansion alone, without colonization, must end in beating down the barriers which we have erected against commerce—barriers which have only been lately partially overcome by reason of the very abundance of our resources. In the mean time, however, we cannot rule these colonies under the Constitution, nor can we continue to rule them as conquered territory, under the military power, after they have once been annexed to the United States by the treaty which we may assume will be entered into with Spain—the treaty which has already been agreed to by her commissioners, but which has not yet been ratified either by our Senate or by the Spanish Cortes. Therefore, so far as they are concerned, we must shut the door everywhere, or open it everywhere, or else govern the new possessions without reference to the Constitution, the very instrument from which Congress derives its powers and its existence. It is to this last determination that the intelligent advocates of expansion have arrived. They declare that Congress is omnipotent; that it may do what it will in the Philippines, in the West Indies, and in Hawaii. Indeed, it has already enacted tariff legislation for Hawaii, which is invalid unless the Supreme Court sustains the point that the Constitution does not rule in these territories.

If the Constitution does not apply or does not rule, what power is the last resort? Congress, undoubtedly. If Congress possess the necessary two-thirds vote to override the President, it may establish governments for these distant islands in which the executive and judicial powers of the Federal authority will have no place. Even without such a vote, its will, perhaps, must be law, for to it alone is given the power to rule and regulate territory, and Attorney-General GRIGGS, and those who think as he does, may successfully contend that the President has not the power to veto an act establishing a fundamental government or legislation of any sort for a Territory. If they are right, then it follows that taxes and imposts collected in the Philippines and in other colonies need not be uniform with those collected at home. A despotic form of government may be established within the law. Even a king may be set up if Congress thinks well of kings for distant savages. The blessings of the writ of habeas corpus may not be extended to our subjects. The right to trial by jury may not be granted to them. Their houses may be searched at the will of any United States official, important and petty. They may be legally arrested without warrant, their liberty and property may be taken away from them without due process of law or without just compensation. They may be denied the right to bear arms. The forms of justice common to civilized lands may be refused them, and judicial functions may be lodged in the hands of the executive. We do not contend that the rights which Anglo-Saxons wrung from the king at Runnymede, and which are preserved as sacred in every American constitution, Federal and State, are to be bestowed carelessly upon barbarians, but we are simply pointing out that when our government was formed certain rights were regarded as fundamental and essential, and an equal as well as just rule was to be the central idea of the new republic. It is now discovered that the Constitution is incompatible with the government of colonies of savages, and naturally the effort is being made to evade or to destroy it, and to place absolute power in the hands of Congress. Practically, the question, as presented by Mr. GRIGGS, is, shall we beat the Constitution by interpretation, or shall we amend it frankly, if we can, and remain a constitutional power a little longer?

"FANCY" COLONIZATION.

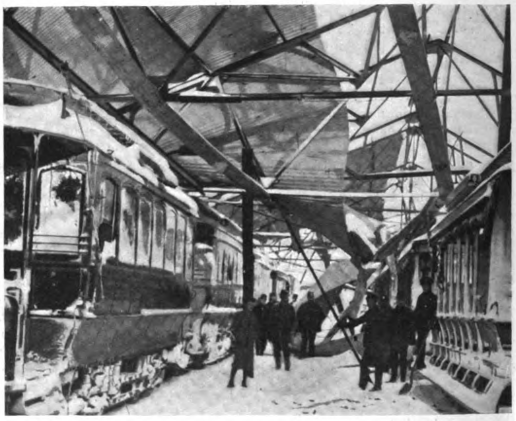
A SURVEY of the existing European situation, and more specifically a survey of the existing Anglo-French situation, ought to be full of edification and reproof for sane and sober Americans. The reflection of such Americans must be, what a pity that we should have intruded ourselves into this maze of rivalry and intrigue! Particularly it is a pity that we should have thrust ourselves into it with so inadequate an equipment. It is not only that we have neither any legislative nor any administrative apparatus for maintaining "crown colonies," and that in making provisional preparations for their management the President is perforce acting much more like a Roman dictator, "seeing," in his own way, "that the commonwealth shall take no detriment," than like a magistrate whose powers are strictly defined and limited in one article of the Constitution of the United States. This defect might be overcome by the enactment of a matured scheme for the government of distant dependencies, coupled with a bill of indemnity for usurpation which was well meaning, however blundering. It might be thus overcome, that is to say, provided we had anybody competent to devise such a frame of government, and a national legislature sincerely intent upon enacting it when it was produced, with a single eye to the good of the annexed subjects and the annexing sovereign. Will anybody say that either of these requirements is fulfilled? And after a frame of government has been duly meditated and deliberately adopted, the crucial difficulty arises in the discovery and selection of the men who are to put it into practice. The very first requisite for this is the honest and single desire to find and to employ such fit men on account of their fitness.

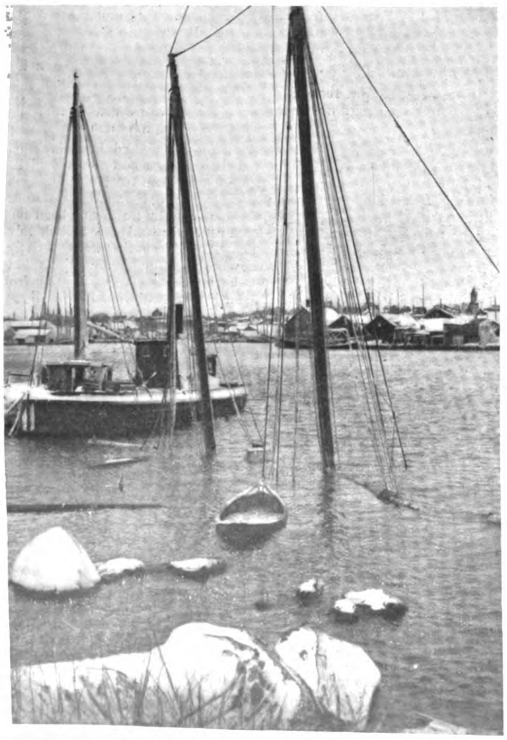
The conclusion suggested by such a survey is thus the same which was suggested by Lord SALISBURY'S grave and anxious and much-discussed speech at the Lord Mayor's banquet. It is that to embark upon a "colonial policy" is a very serious matter, and for a nation that is not driven to it, like Great Britain, by hard necessity, is apt to be a foolhardy enterprise. It is out of the hard necessity of an expansion which to her has been a matter of self-preservation that England has plucked her colonial triumphs. A like national necessity has impelled the slow, glacial advance of Russia over Asia eastward, as it has impelled our own swifter advance over this continent westward. "The rest," one is inclined to say with BURKE, looking at the recent tentatives of France and Germany in colonial acquisition—"the rest is vanity; the rest is crime."

But there is a more specific lesson to be learned from the colonial attempts and the colonial failures of France. It is that in this field mere sentiment is fatal and destructive—much more if it be a malevolent sentiment. More than a hundred years ago, and under a monarchy, which is a much more advantageous instrument than a republic for foreign acquisition, France had been fairly beaten out of the colonial field. She had been beaten out of India, she had been beaten out of Canada, and, later, NAPOLEON never had a wiser perception than that France "had no business" in Louisiana. Her colonial experiments under the present republic have by no means been made, as Lord SALISBURY truly said the British advances had been made, for objects that were "strictly business." They have been made for objects that were strictly not business—to divert attention from domestic difficulties by achievements in distant regions, and largely for the purpose of annoying perfidious Albion. Hence it is that not one of the recent colonial enterprises of France has approached a business success. If a merchant whose objects were "strictly business" had carried the accounts of these colonies on his books, he would close them all by selling or giving away the subject-matter.

All this may seem to concern France alone. It really concerns us as much. The morals lie upon the surface, plain for us to read, and we are happy in not having paid by our own experience for the privilege of reading them. One of them is, not to take colonies unless you "can use them in your business." Another is to, administer them with a strict eye to business, and if you cannot make them pay, to get rid of them. A third and most important is, never for a moment to make them an occasion of distraction from domestic questions, nor the subject of "a play to the gallery." A strict attention to business is compatible with the colonial aggrandizement of England, with the continental expansion of Russia, with the continental expansion of the United States. But it is not compatible with the fantastic acquisition and retention, as a matter of national vanity, of remote islands or mainlands, by the French or by any other republic.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



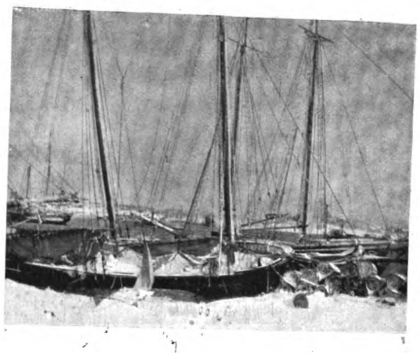
BLOWING GREAT GUNS ON LAKE SUPERIOR.—Drawn by H. Reuterdahl.

SNOW-PLOUGH AND TROLLEY-CARS STALLED IN BOSTON.
Copyright, 1898, by T. E. Marr.

INTERIOR OF STREET-CAR-HOUSE IN GLOUCESTER AFTER THE STORM.

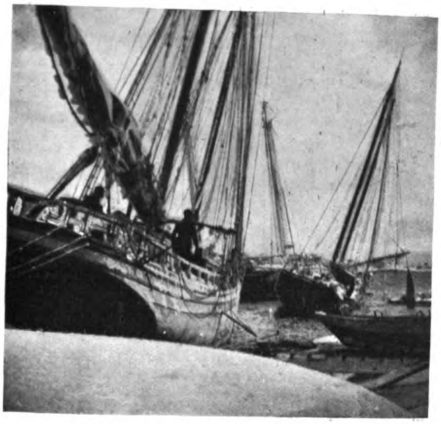
SCHOONER "JAMES DRINAN," WRECKED OFF ROCKY NECK, MASSACHUSETTS.

TREES UPROOTED BY THE STORM.
Copyright, 1898, by T. E. Marr.

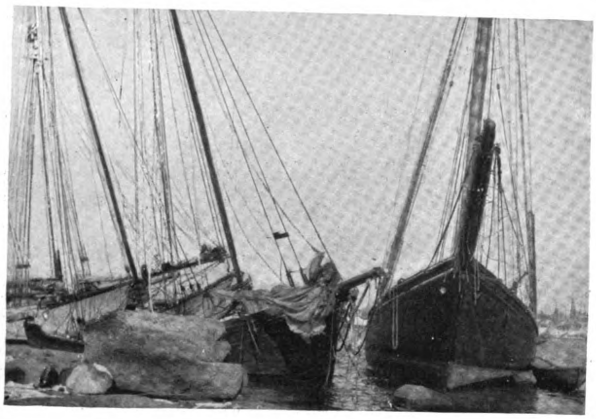


WRECKS ON TEN POUND ISLAND, GLOUCESTER.

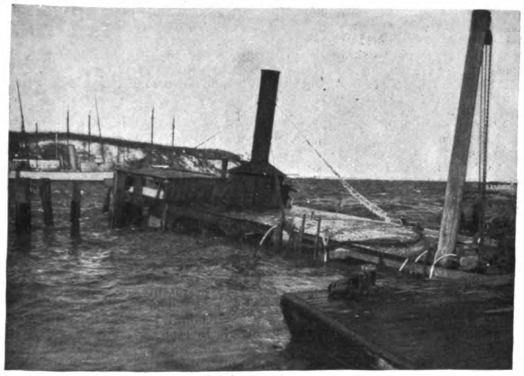
THE GREAT STORM OF NOVEMBER 26 AND 27—SCENES ALONG ITS PATH OF DESTRUCTION.—[See Page 1198.]



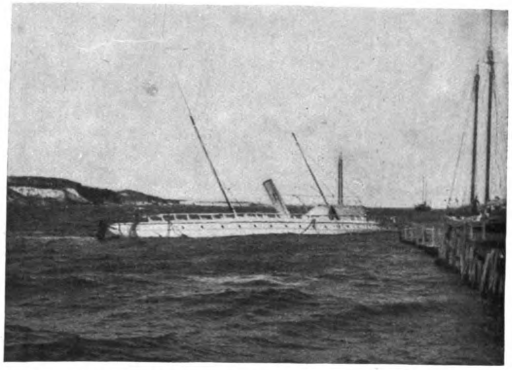
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



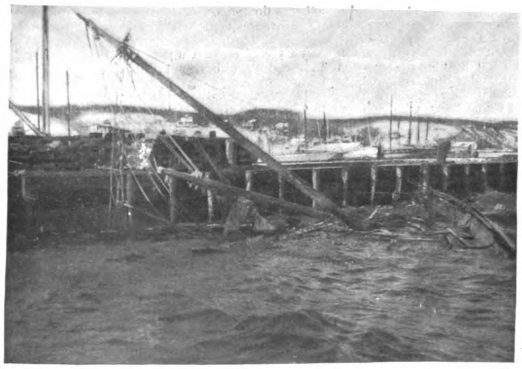
WRECKS AT EAST GLOUCESTER, MASSACHUSETTS.



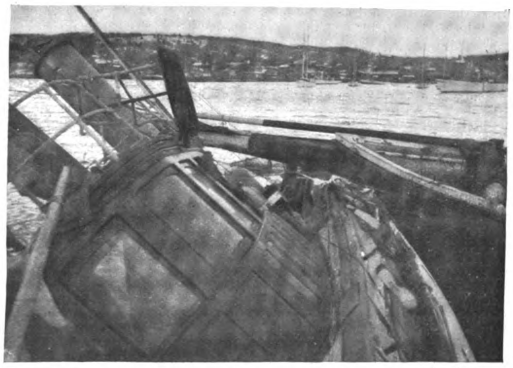
WRECKS AT GLOUCESTER, MASSACHUSETTS.



WRECKS AT GLOUCESTER, MASSACHUSETTS.



WRECKS ON TEN POUND ISLAND, GLOUCESTER.



SCOTT'S MUD-DIGGER, SUNK OFF PORT JEFFERSON, LONG ISLAND.

STEAM-YACHT "RIVAL," SUNK OFF PORT JEFFERSON, LONG ISLAND.

SCHOONER "OLIVE LEAF," SUNK OFF PORT JEFFERSON, LONG ISLAND.

STEAM-YACHT "HALCYON," WRECKED IN COLLISION WITH SCHOONER "MARY E. CUFF," AT PORT JEFFERSON, LONG ISLAND.

THE GREAT STORM OF NOVEMBER 26 AND 27—MEMENTOS OF ITS HAVOC ALONG THE ATLANTIC COAST.—[SEE PAGE 1198.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

It is well established as matter of history that ninety-nine-year leases do eventually run out. An occurrence of this sort threatens to disturb the status of the Plains of Abraham, at Quebec. The Plains were held by the government under a ninety-nine-year lease, which being now very near its end, there is an imminent prospect of the return of the property to the Hôtel Dieu (a convent), and the partition and sale of the land. What ought to happen is that the Dominion government should buy the Plains outright and keep them as they are. We Americans have an interest in their preservation, for they include the spot where Montgomery fell, as well as the spot where Benedict Arnold was wounded in the leg, and missed the greatest opportunity of his lifetime by not being killed in honest battle.

A good many colleges are fighting off taxes nowadays, but none, so far as heard from, with so much reason or so much method as Stanford University. At present the State of California gobbles up one-fourth of the university's annual income. Stanford feels that it ought to be exempt, but the only way to secure exemption is by procuring an amendment to the Constitution of the State. That is a troublesome matter in California, as in New York, and takes at least two years. Each branch of the State Legislature must pass the amendment by a two-thirds majority, and after that it must be ratified by the people at the polls. To accomplish this labor a tax-exemption club has been organized, which includes the students and alumni of Stanford, and all sympathizers with the movement. The club has a central executive committee which will carry on the work very much as a political campaign is carried on. It has already sent two emissaries through the State to interest legislators in behalf of the university, while a literary bureau works through the press of the State. The University of California, which is doubtless itself exempt from State taxation, is represented to be heartily in favor of the exemption of Stanford.

There has come to be a national pride and interest in the two great Californian universities, and thousands of Eastern readers who follow their rise and development with attention will rejoice to see Stanford get the reasonable relief for which she asks.

It may be recalled that at a certain stage of the battle of Manila, Admiral Dewey withdrew his fleet for breakfast. Breakfast at least has usually been held accountable for that pause in the fight. It is stated now that the real cause for drawing off was that the Olympia had only fifteen projectiles left for her big guns, and that as soon as the fleet got around the point, a new apportionment of ammunition was made, and then the fight went on. It is also stated that when the fight was over there were only thirty big-gun projectiles left. With these, and no more to fall back on, Admiral Dewey sat down and waited, the German Admiral, kind man, keeping him company, from the 1st of May until June 28, when the Baltimore arrived with fresh ammunition. A long strain on the nerves that!

Boston has lost a notable citizen in Colonel Henry Lee, late senior member of the banking firm of Lee, Higginson, & Co., who died on November 24. He was eighty-one years old, and in his long and active life had fully met the expectations of his somewhat critical fellow-townsmen. His family is one of high distinction in Massachusetts. He was graduated from Harvard in 1836, was a merchant trading with Calcutta until 1853, and after that a banker. When the civil war broke out he became a colonel on the staff of Governor Andrew, whose patriotic labors he earnestly supplemented and upheld. He was for several terms an overseer of Harvard College, was the originator of important business enterprises, and in particular was singularly blessed in being one of the original instigators and proprietors of the Bell Telephone Company. The Boston newspapers speak of him as Boston's grand old man, and say that in his appearance, as well as in the vigor of his old age, he reminded observers of Gladstone.

The Boston Transcript of November 19 has an obituary notice of a woman who must have been so interesting and unusual a person that it seems a matter of public obligation that some competent delineator of New England life should put her into a book. She was Miss Amanda Peavy, born in 1827 in New Hampshire, and employed for over forty years in one of the great dry-goods stores of Boston. Before that she had travelled abroad as companion to a lady who belonged to a well-known Boston family, and it came about, naturally enough, that she got to know more or less intimately all the Boston folks whose acquaintance was a social distinction. At Stearn's, where she was employed, she seems to have become an institution. Being in daily communication with a great number of acquaintances who liked and trusted her, she took counsel of St. Paul, and did her best to be all things to all women and some men. She took thought for old gentlemen who were her customers, and selected and sent home to them the sort of under-clothes that they ought to have; she met the sudden calls for mourning clothes, in the provision of which afflicted families so often need the intervention of a true friend; she was a high authority on bridal trousseaux, and was invited to all the fashionable weddings. Naturally she had early information about much that was going on, and it is amusing to read that her good offices were often enlisted to disclose engagements and other bits of social news which it was desired should leak informally into the public ear. It helps one to place her when we are told that she was of Scotch-Irish Puritan descent, that her great-grandfather was killed at Bunker Hill, and that her mother survives her at the age of 103.

Dr. Lyman Abbott, who has been doing two or three men's work these many years, announced in Plymouth Church on November 26 that he had been warned to moderate his labors, and had determined to resign the pastorate of Plymouth Church and consecrate his strength on the work of editing the Outlook. It is eleven years since Dr. Abbott became the successor of Henry Ward Beecher. The ties between him and the Brooklyn church have grown very strong, and the announcement of his resignation was received with lamentation and dismay. But when a thoroughly trustworthy doctor tells any man, as Dr. Abbott's doctor told him, that he is using up his vital energies faster than nature supplies them, there is nothing to do but to try to do less. Doctors are fond of telling that story to industrious men, and they tell it with the more emphasis because nearly every successful doctor seems to be doing the same thing himself. It is the practice of successful doctors, as of other successful Americans, to overwork themselves, until they come to grief and have to lay by for repairs.

Dr. Abbott is sixty-three years old. If he could do the work of six men for the next ten years, there would be no difficulty about providing him with six important and remunerative jobs. Men of his quality are scarce, and of those that there are a large proportion manage somehow to elude their obligation to be ministers of the gospel. When a bank president dies, the directors elect another at the next meeting. When a railroad president resigns or dies, there is immediately an active competition for the succession. When noted lawyers or doctors fall out of line, their practice distributes itself without fuss or serious inconvenience. But somehow when an eminent minister or a college president gives up his charge, real trouble follows.

There are some excellent situations vacant in this country just now. President Dwight's impending resignation sends Yale on the quest for a president; Brown and Amherst are already in the same field; we have no ambassador at London; the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church has found no successor as yet to Dr. Hall; and now Plymouth Church is leaderless. Only one of all these places is easy to fill, and as to that one the President seems to have protracted hesitations.

The will of the late venerable Edward Austin, of Boston, leaves half a million dollars to Harvard College, $400,000 to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and divides $90,000 between Radcliffe College, Roanoke College, and the Tuskegee Institute, with the proviso that the income of all these sums shall be paid to "needy and meritorious students and teachers to assist them in the payment of their studies." There have been rumors of a possibility that the will may not stand, but if it does it will be interesting to learn what proportion of the testator's benevolences are applied to the relief of needy students and what to needy teachers. Harvard, for example, which already has very extensive funds for the aid sistance of poor students, could doubtless apply $25,000 a year to excellent advantage in amplifying the salaries of some of her professors.

That is a sorrowful story that Lieutenant Hobson tells, albeit one greatly to his credit, about the $50,000 that was offered him for a lecture course, which he felt obliged to decline. He reasoned that the only thing that made him valuable as a lecturer was the sinking of the Merrimac, a job done in the course of his duty as an officer of the navy, on the renown of which he had no mind to trade.

Undoubtedly he was right about it, though Piper Findlater would have decided differently. It is hard to say whether his case is better or worse than that of Colonel Roosevelt, who contracted last winter, doubtless at a moderate figure, to give eight Lowell lectures in Boston, and then hustled off to the war and back, and in one way or another made himself the most-talked-of man in America, and the most valuable as a lecturer. The colonel's flittings to Boston and back to keep his lecture engagements have abounded in adventure, and have amused the newspaper-reading public.

The Emperor William got home on November 26 from his journey to Palestine. He was in good health, and able to consider public questions, and to talk back on any subject. Various reasons are given for his failure to visit Spain, as at one time he seemed to have planned. It has been stated that he thought the time inopportune, on the whole, for a visit to Madrid; also, that he was constrained to hurry home to settle a matter of domestic statecraft; also, that the Empress was tired, and had had all the junketing that she could stand. Economy is nowhere given as a motive for his return, yet it might have been, if it is true, as one of the German papers states, that the Emperor's trip cost ten million marks.

The Daisy Fields Home and Hospital for Crippled Children, at Englewood, New Jersey, makes an ante-Christmas announcement that its funds were never before so low as now.

At this writing, a week after the great coast storm of November 26, it is still impossible to give an accurate account of lives lost or damage done. By far the greatest single disaster that the storm wrought was the loss of the side-wheel steamer Portland, which left Boston on Saturday night (November 26) for Portland with about 160 persons aboard. It has been stated that she went out contrary to the orders of the company's manager, who sent word to her captain to delay starting until the weather prospects could be definitely predicted. However that may have been, she started at seven o'clock, her usual hour. It is supposed that when the fury of the winter cyclone struck her, a few hours later, she was disabled. At any rate, she was blown to the southward, and sank with all on board, off Highland Light, on the south side of Cape Cod. A number of bodies came ashore, but there was no survivor of the wreck.

The storm strewed the New England shore with wrecks from Cape Ann to Cuttyhunk. Not less than sixty vessels were totally wrecked between those points, and nearly as many more were blown ashore, with small chance of getting off. Certainly 200 lives were lost; probably many more than that.

On shore the heavy snow-storm obstructed travel and caused immense inconvenience. The railroads between Boston and New York were snow-bound for twenty-four hours, and travel all through New England was greatly impeded. Communication failed very generally also on Long Island, many towns of which were still inaccessible on Monday. Luckily for all the railroads, Sunday's business is comparatively light, and there was a chance to open most of the roads in time for Monday's traffic.

In New York city a snowfall of unprecedented amount for the season caught the Street-Cleaning Department totally unprepared, with contracts for removal of snow unlet, and with a force of carts and men quite unequal to the situation. Few of the surface railroads were able to run on Sunday morning, though they all got going again in the course of the day. At this writing the streets are still full of snow banks, which make it difficult for vehicles to get about. Several inches of snow falling on Wednesday morning made conditions somewhat worse; but inconveniences and delays ashore seem of slight moment compared with the terrible havoc on the sea. While, as stated, the coast between Cape Ann and Cuttyhunk got the worst of the cyclone and shows the most direful collection of wreckage, there is scarcely a beach from Penobscot Bay to New Haven that does not show the bones of some craft. In and near Boston Harbor alone thirty-five vessels were driven ashore, and between thirty and forty men were drowned or frozen to death. Boston goes back as far as 1852 to find the record of a storm so destructive.

The death, on November 19, of John E. W. Keely, of Philadelphia, the author, though not the finisher, of the celebrated Keely motor, has caused a considerable sensation of bereavement among us who survive. Much game has been made of Mr. Keely; he has often been reviled as an impostor, and once he was imprisoned for contempt of court because he would not reveal the secret of his machine. Scoffers have railed and gibed at him; even his own stockholders have sometimes grown weak in the faith and pestered him with vain questionings as to whether there was really anything in the motor, and if so, what. But, so far as the world knows, Mr. Keely never either despaired or divulged, nor yielded in any particular to vulgar demands of any sort. He went on with his work, built and rebuilt machines, and astonished an occasional investigator by a great showing of mechanical energy. Finally he has died, but he has done so entirely at his own convenience, casually, comfortably, and at the respectable age of seventy-one; not a great age, to be sure, but one at which no man need apologize for dying. He died of pneumonia. It is reported that he left writings by which it may be possible for a successor to take up his work and perhaps carry his machine through to completion.

Mr. Keely began his industrial career as an upholsterer's apprentice. He became interested in music, and from watching a tuning-fork got the notion of power to be derived from the effect of sound vibrations on metals. He made many machines, and finally one that seemed to develop enormous power from no other cause than sounds made by a fiddle-bow. This machine was the nucleus of the Keely Company, which was started in Philadelphia in 1874, and provided Mr. Keely with funds to perfect his apparatus. Between that year and 1891 he is said to have made one hundred and twenty-nine unsuccessful models. In 1881, the Keely Company's funds running low, he found a stanch patron in Mrs. Bloomfield Moore, of Philadelphia, who built him a laboratory and paid him a weekly salary, on which he continued his experiments until he died. He is described as a hard-working, plain-living person, who earned his salary. His place as a raiser of expectations seems to have been much more than taken by Mr. Nicola Tesla, the eminent electrician, of whom we hear from time to time as predicting extraordinary new applications of electricity which are to turn the world upside down and change most of the conditions of existence.

There is talk of an invasion of Tibet, by the British, with a view to carry the frontier of British India up to the China line. The highlands of the country would make good summer homes for Britishers resident in India, and there may be other motives. The popular notion about the country is that hard knocks abound there more than other produce, and that it is an exceedingly good country to keep out of. More definite ideas about it are obtainable from Dr. Sven Hedin's remarkable book of travels, Through Asia, just issued by the Harpers.

It is, on the whole, something of a relief to learn that the aggregation of Russian peace-at-any-price peasants, called the Dhoukobortsi, whose story was told in a recent paragraph in the WEEKLY, are not to be brought to the United States, but are to test the hospitalities of our Canadian brethren in western Manitoba. The Dominion government, it seems, will give each family 160 acres of land, besides a bonus of six dollars to each person, and will provide shelter for the 4000 persons who are expected to come from Russia during the present winter. That is probably a better arrangement than Uncle Sam could have made for them. Our good uncle is no longer land poor and has few acres left that are worth taking up, and, besides, his attention is so engrossed just now by foreign missionary projects that it is doubtless best that he should not add rashly to his responsibilities at home.

To the suggestion that subscriptions would be welcome from Americans to the fund for establishing a Gordon memorial college at Khartum, response has been made by our Mr. W. W. Astor, of London, with a contribution of £5000. If Mr. Astor desires that his gift should be regarded as representative, no objection is likely to be made on this side of the seas, where General Gordon is very highly honored as a pious man and a heroic soldier. The impression that he has left in the minds of American is that his aims, beyond those of any British soldier of his generation, were for the spread of Christianity and civilization, and that the extension of the British Empire interested him only as an incident of the accomplishment of those greater purposes. As a people of sentiment who wage wars of humanity, the Americans must rejoice to see Gordon's memory honored.

The great November snow-storm and subsequent condition of the streets of New York ought to be a valuable advertisement of the Waring memorial fund. On December 3 the amount of the subscriptions received was $60,053.

E. S. Martin

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

IN "Trelawny of the Wells," with which Mr. Daniel Frohman's stock company opened at the Lyceum, Mr. Arthur W. Pinero gives a picture of London theatrical life in the early sixties. The Bagnigge Wells Theatre, from which Rose Trelawny takes her "addition," is in reality, as the programme intimates, Sadler's Wells, Islington. This theatre is famous for the fact that during those lean years of the drama it was the only home in England for our classics. The leading character in Mr. Pinero's play is one Tom Wrench, who is known to have been studied from Tom Robertson. Wrench is no less a poor devil of an actor than Robertson: one of the parts he is given to play is the part of a dragon in pantomime—"I'll not say which part of the dragon," as Miss Avonia Bunn remarks to him significantly. Like Robertson, Wrench is disgusted with the old convention of play writing and acting, and has set his heart on breaking through it with a play that is "true to life." Wrench's play is called "Life"; Robertson's play was "Society." The realism of "Society," "Caste," and the rest of Robertson's plays is nowadays somewhat faded, but in it is foreshadowed the spirit of the greatest of our modern dramatists. In writing "Trelawny," Mr. Pinero is paying homage to his literary progenitor, and at the same time portraying the men and women of the stage among whom he passed his youth.

Mr. Pinero of the Wells.

The original of Rose Trelawny—though the fact has not, to my knowledge, been pointed out—is without doubt the famous Marie Wilton. From childhood something in Miss Wilton's nature attracted her toward "the legitimate"; and finally, though she was so excellent in burlesque parts—cupids and other bad boys—that Dickens declared her the most intelligent and original actress he had ever seen, she founded the Prince of Wales Theatre, and produced Robertson's "Society." For the purposes of his play, Mr. Pinero has placed Rose Trelawny in somewhat different circumstances. A young gentleman named Gower falls in love with her, and to escape the life of the theatre she becomes engaged to him, and goes to live with his family in Cavendish Square for a period of "probation." Here she is bored and oppressed, and finally, in a rage worthy of Paula Tanqueray, she flies back to the old life. Rose's impulse toward truth and refinement in acting comes, strangely enough, from her brief contact with Cavendish Square. Having seen real ladies and gentlemen, she cannot act her old parts. As the plot thickens, the elder Gower is impressed by the fact that Rose's mother (like Marie Wilton's father) had played with Kean, whom he greatly admired, and is induced to furnish a theatre for the production of Tom Wrench's "Life." Tom Wrench is very deeply and nobly in love with Rose, but in the end she marries young Gower, and, we are to suppose, lives happily ever afterward in the life and the society of Cavendish Square.

The Progenitress of Rose Trelawny.

Mr. Findley. Mr. Woodruff. Miss Mannering. Miss Spong. Miss Tyree.

"TRELAWNY OF THE WELLS" AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE, NEW YORK—TRELAWNY LEAVING THE "WELLS" FOR CAVENDISH SQUARE.

"You 'ave plucked the flower, sir; you 'ave stole our ch'icest blossom."

These facts, interesting as they are as indicating the materials which our master-playwright has handled, have an important bearing on the development of his drama. Some one has remarked—the younger Dumas, if I remember—that every true drama represents the struggle (lutte) of forces in their essence antagonistic, and suggests the natural solution. In his second act Mr. Pinero has shown the struggle between the free, impulsive, untamed nature of an artist and the necessary rigidity of established society. The situation is as dramatic as that in "Mrs. Tanqueray," though on the whole much more sympathetic; the solution in real life could scarcely be less unhappy. Marie Wilton married the actor-manager of her company, the now famous Bancroft, and together they prospered in producing "legitimate" plays. Rose Trelawny ignores the very sincere love of Tom Wrench, and finds happiness, we are to suppose, with the grandson of the vice-chancellor Gower. It need scarcely be said that this solution is essentially untrue to life, and therefore, in the high sense, undramatic. For Mr. Pinero has admitted as much in insisting that his play is a "comedietta"; but this does not insure him against reproach. If we cannot object because the ending is "happy" (God save the mark!), we can object that a comedietta should have so truly dramatic a second act; and we can point out the fact that Mr. Pinero's audiences are too intelligent to believe in any happy reconciliation between that old world of actors and Cavendish Square.

The Tragedy of a "Happy" Ending.

Yet the play has rare merit, and is, fortunately for us all, meeting with the rare success it deserves. Its merit lies partly in its mastery of both the theatrical and the literary capabilities of the stage. The marks of Mr. Pinero's stagecraft are everywhere, but a single instance must suffice. At the farewell dinner given to Rose Trelawny on her first departure for Cavendish Square the dear old stager Telfer, very naturally, if somewhat naïvely, elects himself toast-master, and proposes, "Our Immortal Bard, Shakspere . . . I had meant, myself, to 'ave offered a few remarks in response—" Here the leading juvenile, Gadd, who is piqued at not having been chosen toast-master, interrupts, as the book requires: "[To IMOGEN, bitterly.] Ha!" This Ha! is flat enough in the reading, but as uttered on the stage it becomes a grunt of jealous disgust—hahch—so delightfully expressive that it is repeated at appropriate places five or six times for the once indicated in the book. This feeling for the value of a tone, of a glance, a motion, marks the true playwright; one might almost say that a play is truly a play in proportion as it resists the attempt to put it in black and white.

The Acting and the Literary Play.

Mr. Pinero's sense of the value of words as words is as unfailing. "I swear," says Miss Avonia Bunn, when extorting a secret, "I'll not divulge, let alone tell a living soul!" And again, "I was compelled—nay, forced." Dickens himself could not have expressed more clearly an air of simplicity and absurdity. And when Tom's new School of Comedy has reduced the old-fashioned Telfer to realistic parts, he complains that he has not been given a speech—"not a real speech; nothing to dig your teeth into." And Mrs. Telfer, reduced from her rôle of Queen to the humble station of wardrobe mistress, says, sadly, "If we are set to scrub a floor—and we may come to that yet—let us make up our minds to scrub it legitimately." Nobility, pathos, and exquisite absurdity are all expressed in the old actress's clinging to the idea of "the legitimate." Few English-speaking playwrights equal Mr. Pinero in knowledge of the effects peculiar to the stage; none equal him in power of phrase. And of all the foreign plays we have seen in late years, only one surpasses him in these regards, and that is of a wholly different order—"Cyrano de Bergerac."

The main merit of "Trelawny" lies in the vitality and the truth with which it bodies forth the forms and the spirits of those good people of a generation ago. Those silver beavers and those "weeper" whiskers! Those stocks, those narrow-waisted frocks and peg-top trousers! Those pork-pie hats, those crinolines! Those crinolines that when a body whirls about disclose a pair of—now what does Mr. Pinero call the marvellous things a crinoline exposes? John Leech could have told, and would have! All the people are as 1860 as their belongings. Miss Mannering's Gibson face is an anachronism. She looks the best of fellows, but what does she know about a "Young Lady"? John Leech would have given Rose cherry lips, and would have kissed them beneath the mistletoe. If Rose is alive to-day, as we hope she is, all of the love of freedom she ever felt does not reconcile her to her granddaughter's bicycle or to her going to college. The quaintness of it all, sweetness is the perfume of a long-pressed rose. And ripples through an audience and leaves it breathless; the those Theatrical Folk! We will believe at least that their foibles have vanished. "Don't you teach behavior," says Colpoys, the low-comedian, to Tom Wrench—"don't you teach behavior to a gentleman that plays a superior line of business to yourself!" And Rose, after she has come back from Cavendish Square, has a word to say about her companions: "We are only dolls, partly human, with mechanical limbs that will fall into stagy postures, and heads stuffed with sayings out of rubbishy plays." I wonder if there are still actors like that? But if Mr. Pinero has caught the foibles and jealousies of his world, he has done royal justice to its impulsive generosity. The right of property scarcely exists, and everybody has an honest kiss for everybody else, even when they aren't making up a quarrel. Altogether it is a wonderful world Mr. Pinero has given us—true and fine, full of absurdity so tenderly expressed that it is a sacred duty to laugh and laugh at it.

The Crinoline Girl.

Mr. Harry B. Smith and Mr. Edgar Smith have been to "Trelawny" with several of the people from Weber & Fields. It is to be hoped that these gentlemen will recognize the fact that no burlesque could be as amusing as "Trelawny" itself; but if not—we shall doubtless be told what these wonderful things are called that a crinoline discovers.

"Trelawny" Uncrinolined.

Miss Julia Arthur is presenting for the first time in New York a series of characters which, when played successfully, gives an actress standing in the front rank of her profession. I have seen her Parthenia and her Rosalind with interest, and when Mercedes and Galatea have been given, I shall have something to say of her success in her very laudable ambition. JOHN CORBIN.

Miss Julia Arthur in Classical Rôles.

THE OPENING OF AN OPERA SEASON.

"Studded with stars unutterably bright."—Queen Mab.

WHEN the veteran in musical considerations takes his seat in the Metropolitan on the first evening of such seasons of opera as have recurred there of recent winters—when he finds once again closing about him that radiant, shimmering, pulsating atmosphere special to a stage so majestic and so eloquent, he enters for a few weeks upon the rarest privilege of his profession. It is not quite appreciated even by those who take thoughtful interest in what the critic may think or write. For it is not merely that the reviewer is now to hearken to many noble and lovely voices, such as are nowhere else on earth heard together. It is not that again he shall study acting frequently of superb stature and breadth, even if measured by the best stages of spoken drama. It is not merely that delight is to come to him in the voluptuousness of Gounod, the sombre passion of Wagner, the flash and sparkle of Rossini, the divine melodiousness of Mozart. These all are things exceeding precious to him. But underneath them lies the truth that, here and now, through a magnificent perversion of both music and drama, by which each is declined from its purest estate—the critic in the vaguest of all arts about which to write comes at last in touch with something like human interests! At last he speaks of aspects of his æsthetics that are tolerably concrete, tangible to the many who neither know nor care for more abstract musical forms. He writes here for his wider circle of readers, because he summons them to follow him, yet another time, into a sort of Wood of Broceliande. Gods and heroes, clear shapes of fable or history, tangible comedy and tragedy, are at last in his question.

What Opera kindly permits to Music Critics.

Even the more obvious conditions of such an opera season as that to which Mr. Maurice Grau has now invited New York have shown themselves, within the course of the two representations already given, to be so exceptional that there would be folly in my attempting allusions to all of them in so short an article. Such justice can be done only by making notes from time to time on the singers and the incidents as space in successive articles shall best allow. For such a season must not be considered comparative in mere relation to several of its predecessors, and to New York's opera history at large. It should be measured by the opera companies, and by matters germane to them, in all Europe during at least a quarter-century. The solemn clack of club-room opera talk, and the ardent pronunciamentos of the gifted amateurs of the drawing-room, whose little cups of criticism are ever overflowingly full, become of small value in estimating just where such a season as that of our Metropolitan for 1898–9 is phenomenal, where it is ordinary, where it is shortcoming. With one factor of judgment, however, those New York listeners who know the wide song-world to-day can provide themselves. It is wholly—not relatively, but wholly—a fact that the musical and dramatic splendor of the greater number of Mr. Grau's present representations has never been attained even in the Metropolitan's past, and cannot be near-

The Standards proper to such a Star Season.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Jaques (Mr. Bridgeland). Dukein (Mr. Fortier). Celia (Miss Conron). Duke Oliver (Mr. Brown). Audrey (Miss Bingham). Touchstone (Mr. McWade). Banished Duke (Mr. Holt). Phebe (Miss Mollison). Sylvius (Mr. Fuller). Louis (Mr. Raquet).

MISS JULIA ARTHUR AS ROSALIND, AND MR. W. S. HART AS ORLANDO, IN ACT V. OF "AS YOU LIKE IT," AS PLAYED AT WALLACK'S THEATRE, NEW YORK.

ly approached at any "season" anywhere—except in one operatic theatre enjoying similar good fortune—Covent Garden, over which the same impresario rules. Apart from London's privileges, never were there in any one troupe so many star singers, who are star singers in their prime—not paled, but in their fullest glory of efficiency. Not till now has another single opera-house carried out so expensively the ideal and super-extravagant theory that each opera shall be sung in the original language of its text. Not till now, in short, will our opera-goers' wildest sabianism be made so bewilderingly actual, night by night of this astonishing season. The notices already published have volubly promised this; and the promise will be made good, weather and human frailty permitting.

So far, Wagner's "Tannhäuser" and Rossini's "Il Barbiere di Seviglia" have been sung, with "Roméo et Juliette" and "Marta" coming to conclude the first brilliant week. I cannot extend this notice beyond the two performances first named. And, as to "Tannhäuser," had Mr. Mancinelli led Wagner's work more in its inmost spirit, I could write that the opera has never had as impressive exposition in the United States or on the Continent. Inclining to say as much, I have in my mind one foreign operatic centre after another, appropriate to comparison, as well as all our own "German opera" history. A subtraction must be made, for Mr. Mancinelli often is a sluggish, Italianistic, unauthoritative director of Wagner, and so he was in this "Tannhäuser" directing. But vocally the work had a consummately great presentment. Mr. Van Dyck has not sung better in Paris, Baireuth, or Vienna these ten years, and Mr. Van Dyck is still the supreme Tannhäuser, as he is the best Parsifal. A tenor truly heroic, with a voice which, though not young after a dozen years of work, is still warm and artistically used—always a phraser par excellence, ever an actor of surpassing life and grace—this Belgian from Count Zichy's hall has only one rival of any fairly equal repute in the world. Dramatically, in such rôles as Tannhäuser, Van Dyck suggests what was said of Madame Schroeder-Devrient—"an almost unerring instinct of artistic fitness. . . . a perfection of performance reaching to every detail of by-play." Niemann himself never could sing Tannhäuser as does Van Dyck; and never did Niemann act Tannhäuser, in the Venusberg, or out of it, with such nuances of facial expression, with gestures and poses so artful. Of the new-comers on this same opening night, special honor is due to M. Henri Albers, a barytone (French by birth, but as to the manner born in his German operatic work) of most noble organ, and of rare finish in his acting. Of Madame Emma Eames it needs only to be said that she assumed the part of Elizabeth with that breadth of emotional suggestion which has

Of Van Dyck's "Tannhäuser."

EMMA EAMES,
Soprano, of the Maurice Grau Opera Company.
Copyright, 1896, by A. Dupont.

deepened each season in the Wagnerian work of one of the most lovely-voiced and fair-faced singers America alternately has lent to Europe and recalled to her own shores. She is a radiant Elizabeth when Elizabeth is joyous, and a figure of pathos fit for a missal's pages in the scene where the Virgin of the Wartburg bids adieu to love and to life. As for Madame Nordica, she returns to us, as ever, a veritable Venus in her personal beauty, and of completest individuality in her admirable musical delivery of a rôle strongly depending for its charm upon so gifted a singer and on an actress so impassioned. The Parisian version of the opera was used, a wise custom that we hope will be observed by Mr. Grau henceforward. The opera's major cast also included M. Plançon, who sang for the first time here in German—and sang well—the Landgraf's part. The ensemble effects were rich. The Metropolitan's chorus has been judicially built up, with a vast improvement in the prospect of its work to come. The "Tannhäuser" mounting, too, was largely new. It was beautiful, being either Baireuthian or Parisian in detail, where it was fresh. The last scene, by-the-bye, was given its due autumnal change; and even if the Wartburg was painted from the wrong side of the castle, it was the Wartburg, not a villa. The lights were remarkably well managed. The general effect, in short, of the opening night of a season to be largely Wagnerian was likewise largely a new chapter in the Metropolitan's sincerity to Wagnerism. Certainly it was such in a lavishness of singing and acting, almost without exception of the first rank; and deserving the enthusiasm of a vast and splendid audience.

The performance of Rossini's "Barbiere" of Wednesday, with Madame Sembrich as the Rosina of all Rosinas extant, and with a group of star singers about her proportionately accomplished, rose even higher than the "Tannhäuser—if in lighter wings indeed. It may be recorded as the finest representation ever given in this country of that greatest of Italian comic operas ever composed by an Italian. No preceding record, from Malibran or Mapleson seasons onward, could surpass the brilliancy, the archness, the gayety, the true Rossinian spirit, of such a memorable evening. This memory or printed history invites one to believe; even in admitting that Mr. Campanari has not any of the elegance of physique proper to Figaro, well as he sings and acts him; and that Mr. Salignac, although he has much improved vocally in the part, is a somewhat plebeian Almaviva. Madame Sembrich herself, Mr. Carbone (Bartolo), Mr. Eduard de Reszké (Basilio), Mr. Campanari (Figaro), Mr. Salignac (Almaviva), and the ever-welcome Mlle. Bauermeister (Berta), sang and carried on the fun in its airiest frolic. It was a lesson in the almost lost operatic message of Rossinism. All Italy cannot show a company to sing him now as he was thus sung here last week on Wednesday night. Not in Paris, at the Odéon, is the acting more traditionally charming and droll. The champagne of Beaumarchais and Rossini was in amazing froth. Another great house laughed and applauded the elegant, innocent sparkle as if it were indeed new. To many it was new. To all of us it was delicious. Mr. Eduard de Reszké's Basilio alone would have distinguished the fun and beautiful singing of such a "Barbiere" night, and Mr. de Reszké was but one jewel among the others.

A Famous "Il Barbiere" Night.

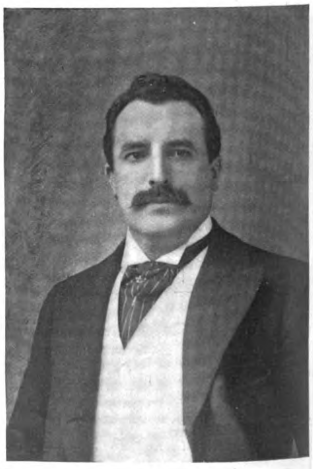
The above chronicle of only two of the reproductions at the Metropolitan must be taken, as record and as comment, with much between the few actual lines. As has been intimated, the natural course of coming things should prove to be not only of similar brilliancy, but a text from which a reviewer can point out many striking æsthetic morals in adorning the season's harmonious tale.



Madame Madeleine Schiller, a pianist of distinction among us some twelve years ago, and for that period engaged abroad, has effected her re-entrance on our concert stage. Madame Schiller has retained all her former brilliancy of technic, and even added to it in her absence. Never an interpretative player of the inner meanings of a grave work, she is artistic in most of what constitutes excellent feminine pianism. She played, on this occasion, Rubinstein's third concerto and Liszt's E flat one and Liszt's transcription of the "Tannhäuser" overture—quite too much of a task for even a Penthesilea of the piano-forte, which Madame Schiller is not.

Madame Madeleine Schiller's Return.

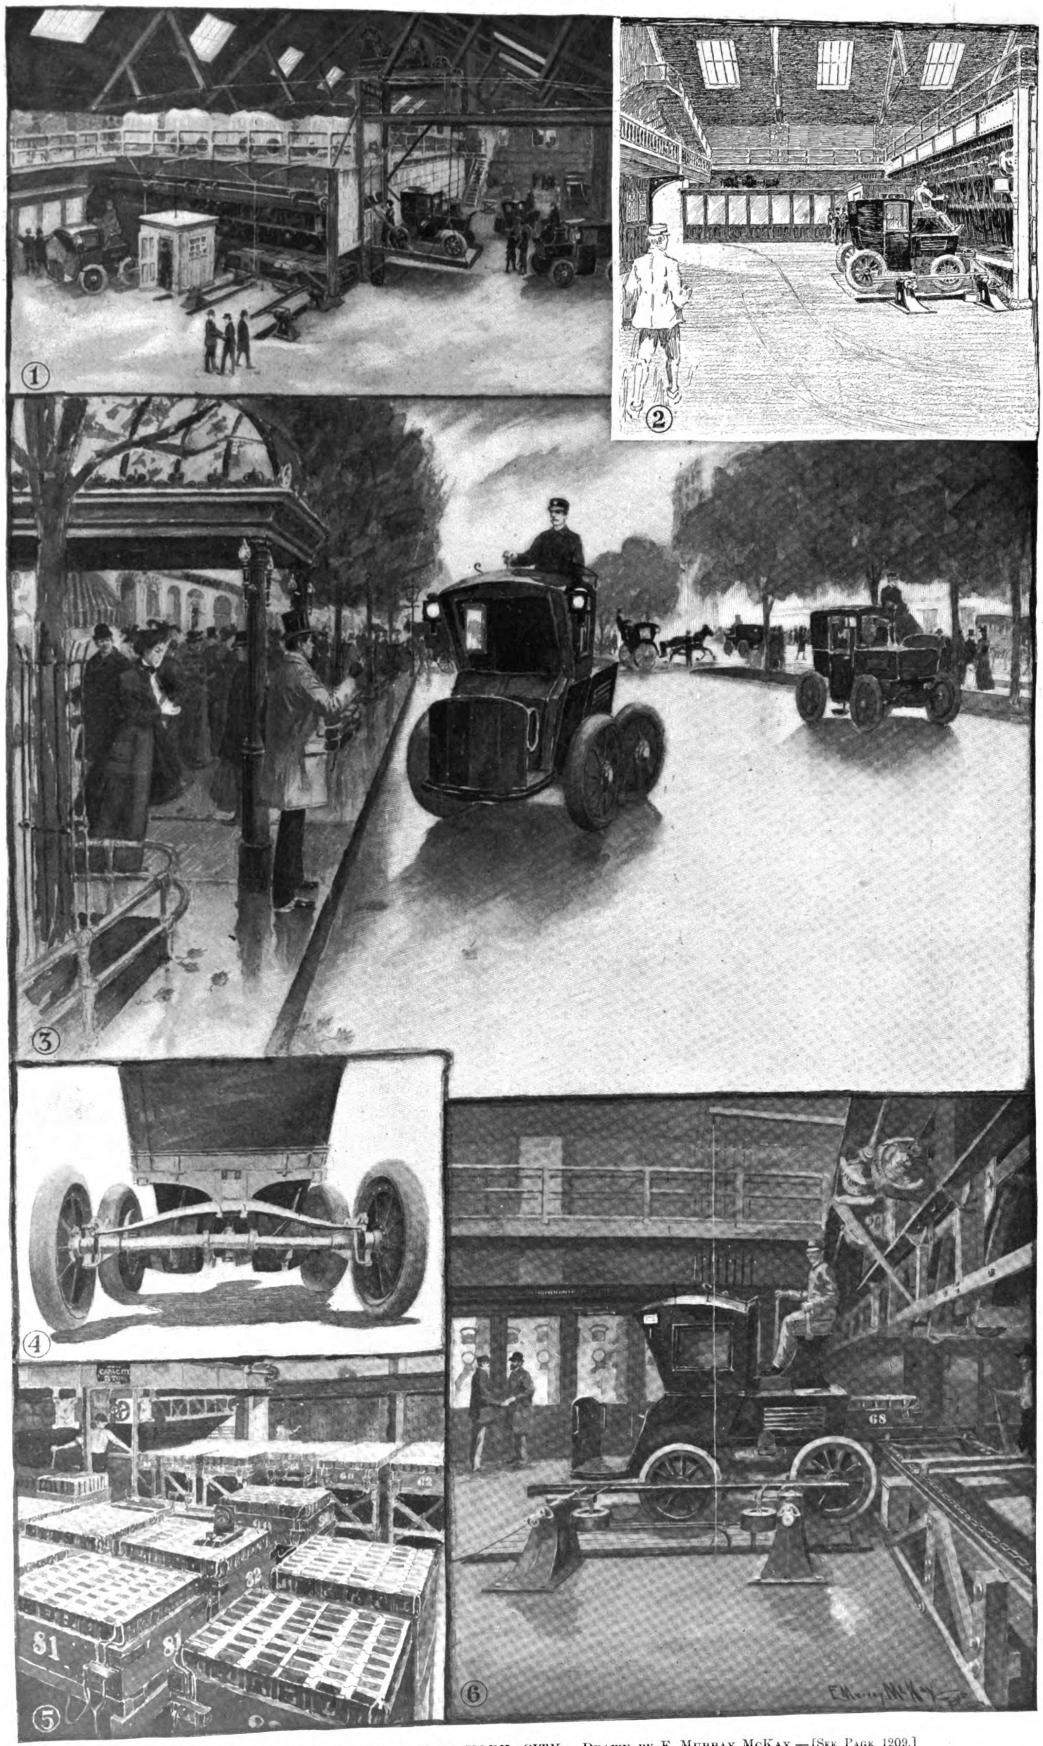
E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.



MAURICE GRAU,
Impresario of the Maurice Grau Opera Company.
Copyright, 1896, by A. Dupont.

HENRI ALBERS,
Barytone, of the Maurice Grau Opera Company.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE ELECTRIC-CAB SERVICE IN NEW YORK CITY.—Drawn by E. Murray McKay.—[See Page 1209.]

1. General View of Cab Station. 2. Switchboard and Loading Platform, Main Entrance. 3. On the Boulevard. 4. The Motor and Steering Gear. 5. The Battery-Room. 6. Loading the Battery.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE AWKWARD AGE.*

A Novel.

BY HENRY JAMES,

AUTHOR OF "DAISY MILLER," "AN INTERNATIONAL EPISODE," ETC.

XXVI.

MITCHY, it had been understood, was to take his leave on the morrow, while Vanderbank was to stay till Tuesday. Mr. Longdon had, for the Sunday dinner, invited three or four of his neighbors to "meet" the two gentlemen from town, so that it was not till the company had departed, or in other words till near bedtime, that our four friends could again have become aware, as between themselves, of that directness of mutual relation which forms the subject of our picture. It had not, however, prevented Nanda's slipping up stairs as soon as the doctor and his wife had gone, and the manner indeed in which, on the stroke of eleven, Mr. Longdon kept up his tradition of appropriating a particular candle was as positive an expression of it as any other. Nothing in him was more amiable than the terms maintained between the rigor of his personal habits and his free imagination of the habits of others. He deprecated, as regards the former, it might have been seen, most signs of resemblance, and no one had ever dared to learn how he would have handled a show of imitation. "The way to flatter him," Mitchy threw off five minutes later, "is not to make him think you're like him, but to let him see how different you perceive he can bear to think you. I mean of course without hating you."

"But what interest have you," Vanderbank asked, "in the way to flatter him?"

"My dear fellow, more than you. I haven't been here all day without arriving at conclusions on the credit he has opened to you—!"

"Do you mean the amount he'll settle?"

"You have it in your power," said Mitchy, "to make it anything you like."

"And is he then—so rich?"

Mitchy was on his feet in the apartment in which their host had left them, and he had at first for this question but an expressive motion of the shoulders in respect to everything in the room. "See, judge, guess, feel!"

But it was as if Vanderbank, before the fire, consciously controlled his attention. "Oh, I don't care a hang!"

This passage took place in the library and as a consequence of their having confessed, as their friend faced them with his bedroom light, that a brief, discreet vigil and a box of cigarettes would fix better than anything else the fine impression of the day. Mitchy might at that moment, on the evidence of the eyes Mr. Longdon turned to them and of which his innocent candle-flame betrayed the secret, have found matter for a measure of the almost extreme allowances he wanted them to want of him. They had only to see that the greater window was fast and to turn out the library lamp. It might really have amused them to stand a moment at the open door that, apart from this, was to testify to his conception of those who were not, in the smaller hours, as he was. He had in fact by his retreat—and but too sensibly—left them there with a deal of midnight company. If one of these presences was the mystery he had himself mixed, the manner of our young men showed a due expectation of the others. Mitchy, on hearing how little Vanderbank "cared," only kept up a while longer that observant revolution in which he had spent much of his day, to which any fresh sense of any exhibition always promptly committed him, and which, had it not been controlled by infinite tact, might have affected the nerves of those in whom enjoyment was less rotary. He was silent long enough to suggest his fearing that almost anything he might say would appear too allusive; then at last, once more, he took his risk. "Awfully jolly old place!"

"It is indeed," Van only said; but his posture in the large chair he had pushed toward the open window was of itself almost an opinion. The August night was hot and the air that came in charged and sweet. Vanderbank smoked with his face turned to the dusky garden and the dim stars; at the end of a few moments more of which he glanced round. "Don't you think it stuffy with that big lamp? As those candles on the chimney are going we might put it out."

"Like this?" The amiable Mitchy had straightway obliged his companion and he as promptly took in the effect of the diminished light on the character of the room, which he commended as if the depth of shadow produced were all this companion had sought. He might freshly have brought home to Vanderbank that a man sensitive to so many different things could never really be incommoded, though that personage presently indeed showed himself occupied with another thought.

"I think I ought to mention to you that I've told him how you and Mrs. Brook now both know. I did so this afternoon on our way back from church—I hadn't done it before. He took me a walk round, to show me more of the place, and that gave me my chance. But he doesn't mind," Vanderbank continued. "The only thing is that I've thought it may possibly make him speak to you, so that it's better you should know he knows. But he told me definitely Nanda doesn't."

Mitchy took this in with an attention that spoke of his already recognizing how the less tempered darkness favored talk. "And is that all that passed between you?"

"Well, practically; except of course that I made him understand, I think, how it happened that I haven't kept my own counsel."

"Oh, but you have—didn't he at least feel?—or perhaps even have done better, when you've two such excellent persons to keep it for you? Can't he easily believe how we feel with you?"

Vanderbank appeared for a minute to leave this appeal unheeded; he continued to stare into the garden while he smoked and swung the long leg he had thrown over the arm of the chair. When he at last spoke, however, it was with some emphasis—perhaps even with some vulgarity. "Oh rot!"

Mitchy hovered without an arrest. "You mean he can't feel?"

"I mean it isn't true. I've no illusions about you. I know how you're both affected, though I of course perfectly trust you."

Mitchy had a short silence. "Trust us not to speak?" If you spoke to others," Vanderbank went on, "they would immediately rush and tell her."

"Not to speak to Nanda herself—though of course, too,

"I've spoken to no one," said Mitchy.

"I'm sure of it. And neither has Mrs. Brook."

"I'm glad you're sure of that also," Mitchy returned, "for it's only doing her justice."

"Oh, I'm quite confident of it," said Vanderbank. "And without asking her?"

"Perfectly."

"And you're equally sure, without asking, that I haven't betrayed you?" After which, while, as if to let the question lie there in its folly, Vanderbank said nothing, his friend pursued: "I came, I must tell you, terribly near it to-day."

"Why must you tell me? Your coming 'near' doesn't concern me, and I take it you don't suppose I'm watching or sounding you. Mrs. Brook will have come terribly near," Vanderbank continued, as if to make the matter free; "but she won't have done it either. She will have been distinctly tempted—"

"But she won't have fallen?" Mitchy broke in. "Exactly—there we are. I was distinctly tempted, and I didn't fall. I think your certainty about Mrs. Brook," he added, "shows you do know her. She's incapable of anything deliberately nasty."

"Oh, of anything nasty in any way," Vanderbank said musingly and kindly.

"Yes; one knows on the whole what she won't do." After which, for a period, Mitchy roamed and reflected. "But in spite of the assurance given you by Mr. Longdon—or perhaps indeed just because of your having taken it—I think I ought to mention to you my belief that Nanda does know of his offer to you. I mean by having guessed it."

"Oh!" said Vanderbank.

"There's in fact more still," his companion pursued, "that I feel I should like to mention to you."

"Oh!" Vanderbank at first only repeated. But after a moment he said: "My dear fellow, I'm much obliged."

"The thing I speak of is something I should at any rate have said, and I should have looked out for some chance if we had not had this one." Mitchy spoke as if his friend's last words were not of consequence, and he continued as Vanderbank got up and, moving rather aimlessly, came and stood with his back to the chimney. "My only hesitation would have been caused by its entailing our going down into things in a way that, face to face—given the private nature of the things—I dare say most men don't particularly enjoy. But if you don't mind—"

"Oh, I don't mind. In fact, as I tell you, I recognize an obligation to you." Vanderbank, with his shoulders against the high mantel, uttered this without a direct look; he smoked and smoked, then looked at the tip of his cigarette. "You feel convinced she knows?" he inquired.

"Well, it's my impression."

"Ah, any impression of yours—of that sort—is sure to be right. If you think I ought to have it from you I'm really grateful. Is that—a—what you wanted to say to me?" Vanderbank with a slight hesitation demanded.

Mitchy, watching him more than he watched Mitchy, shook a mildly decisive head. "No."

Vanderbank, his eyes on his smoke puffs, seemed to wonder. "What you wanted is—something else?"

"Something else."

"Oh!" said Vanderbank for the third time.

The ejaculation had been vague, but the movement that followed it was definite; the young man, turning away, found himself again near the chair he had quitted, and resumed possession of it as a sign of being at his friend's service. This friend, however, not only hung fire, but finally went back to take a shot from a quarter they might have been supposed to have left. "It strikes me as odd his imagining—awfully acute as he is—that she has not guessed. One wouldn't have thought he could live with her here in such an intimacy—seeing her every day and pretty much all day—and make such a mistake."

Vanderbank, his great length all of a lounge again, turned it over. "And yet I do thoroughly feel the mistake's not yours."

Mitchy had a new serenity of affirmation. "Oh, it's not mine."

"Perhaps then"—it occurred to Vanderbank—"he doesn't really believe it."

"And only says so to make you feel more easy?"

"So that one may—in fairness to one's self—keep one's head, as it were, and decide quite on one's own grounds."

"So you have still to decide?"

Van took his time to answer. "I've still to decide." Mitchy became again, on this, in the sociable dusk, a slow-circling, vaguely agitated element, and his friend continued: "Is your idea very generously and handsomely to help that by letting me know—"

"That I do definitely renounce"—Mitchy took him up—"any pretension and any hope? Well, I'm ready with a proof of it. I've passed my word that I'll apply elsewhere."

Vanderbank turned more round to him. "Apply to the Duchess for her niece?"

"It's practically settled."

"But since when?"

Mitchy barely faltered. "Since this afternoon."

"Ah then, not with the Duchess herself."

"With Nanda—whose plan, from the first, you won't have forgotten, the thing has so charmingly been."

Vanderbank could show that his not having in the least forgotten was yet not a bar to his being now mystified. "But, my dear man, what can Nanda 'settle'?"

"My fate," Mitchy said, pausing well before him.

Vanderbank sat now a minute with raised eyes, catching the indistinctness of his friend's strange expression. "You're both beyond me!" he exclaimed at last. "I don't see what you, in particular, gain."

"I didn't either till she made it all out to me. One sees then, in such a matter, for one's self. And as everything's gain that isn't loss, there was nothing I could lose. It gets me," Mitchy further explained, "out of the way."

"Out of the way of what?"

This, Mitchy frankly showed, was more difficult to say, but he in time brought it out. "Well, of appearing to suggest to you that my existence, in a prolonged state of singleness, may ever represent for her any real alternative."

"But alternative to what?"

"Why, to being your wife, damn you!" Mitchy, on these words turned away again, and his companion, in the presence of his renewed dim gyrations, sat for a minute dumb. Before Van had spoken indeed he was back again. "Excuse my violence, but of course you really see."

"I'm not pretending anything," Vanderbank said—"but a man must understand. What I catch hold of is that you offer me—in the fact that you're thus at any rate disposed of—a proof that I, at any rate, sha'n't, if I hesitate to 'go in,' have a pretext for saying to myself that I may deprive her—"

"Yes, precisely"—Mitchy now urbanely assented: "of something, in the shape of a man with my amount of money, that she may live to regret and to languish for. My amount of money, don't you see," he very simply added, "is nothing to her."

"And you want me to be sure that—so far as I may ever have had a scruple—she has had her chance and got rid of it."

"Completely," Mitchy smiled.

"Because"—Vanderbank, with the aid of his cigarette, thoughtfully pieced it out—"that may possibly bring me to the point."

"Possibly!" Mitchy laughed.

He had stood a moment longer, almost as if to see the possibility develop before his eyes, and had even started at the next sound of his friend's voice. What Vanderbank in fact brought out, however, only made him turn his back. "Do you like so very much little Aggie?"

"Well," said Mitchy, "Nanda does. And I like Nanda."

"You're too amazing," Vanderbank mused. His musing had presently the effect of making him rise; reflection indeed possessed him after he was on his feet. "I can't help it's coming over me then that, on such an extraordinary system, you must also rather like me."

"What will you have, my dear Van?" Mitchy frankly asked. "It's the sort of thing you must be most used to, for at the present moment—look!—aren't we all at you at once?"

It was as if Vanderbank had managed to appear to wonder. "'All'?"

"Nanda, Mrs. Brook, Mr. Longdon—"

"And you. I see."

"Names of distinction. And all the others," Mitchy pursued, "that I don't count."

"Oh, you're the best."

"I?"

"You're the best," Vanderbank simply repeated. "It's at all events most extraordinary," he declared. "But I make you out on the whole better than I do Mr. Longdon."

"Ah, aren't we very much the same—simple lovers of life? That is, of that finer essence of it which appeals to the consciousness—"

"The consciousness?"—his companion took up his hesitation.

"Well, enlarged and improved."

The words had made, on Mitchy's lips, an image by which his friend seemed for a moment to be held. "One doesn't really know quite what to say or to do."

"Oh, you must take it all quietly. You're of a special class; one of those who, as we said the other day—don't you remember?—are a source of the sacred terror. People made in such a way must take the consequences; just as people must take them," Mitchy went on, "who are made as I am. So cheer up!"

Mitchy, uttering this incitement, had moved to the empty chair by the window, in which he presently was sunk; and it might have been in emulation of his previous strolling and straying that Vanderbank himself now began to revolve. The meditation he next threw out, however, showed a certain resistance to Mitchy's advice. "I'm glad at any rate I don't deprive her of a fortune."

"You don't deprive her of mine, of course," Mitchy answered from his chair; "but isn't her enjoyment of Mr. Longdon's, at least, a good deal staked, after all, on your action?"

Vanderbank stopped short. "It's his idea to settle it all?"

Mitchy gave out his glare. "I thought you didn't 'care a hang.' I haven't been here so long," he went on as his companion at first retorted nothing, "without making up my mind, for myself, about his means. He is distinctly rich."

It sent Vanderbank off again. "Oh well, she'll no more get all in the one event than she'll get nothing in the other. She'll only get a sort of a provision. But she'll get that whatever happens."

"Oh, if you're sure—!" Mitchy simply commented.

"I'm not sure, confound it!" Then—for his voice had been irritated—Van spoke more quietly. "Only I see her here—though on his wish of course—handling things so much as if they were her own and paying him a visit without, apparently, any calculated end. What's that, on his part, but a pledge?"

Oh, Mitchy could show off-hand that he knew what it was. "It's a pledge, quite as much, to you. He shows you the whole thing. He likes you not a whit less than he likes her."

* Began in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2180.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Oh, thunder!" Van impatiently sighed.

"It's as 'rum' as you please, but there it is," said the inexorable Mitchy.

"Then does he think I'll do it for this?"

"For 'this'?"

"For the place, the whole thing, as you call it, that he shows me."

Mitchy had a short silence that might have represented a change of color. "It isn't good enough?" But he instantly took himself up. "Of course he wants—as I do—to treat you with a tact!"

"Oh, it's all right," Vanderbank immediately said. "Your 'tact'—yours and his—is marvellous, and Nanda's is greatest of all."

Mitchy's momentary renewal of stillness was addressed, he managed, somehow, not obscurely to convey, to the last clause of his friend's speech. "If you're not sure," he presently resumed, "why can't you frankly ask him?"

Vanderbank again, as the phrase is, "mooned" about a little. "Because I don't know that it would do."

"What do you mean by 'do'?"

"Well, that it would be exactly—what do you call it?—'square.' Or even quite delicate or decent. To take from him, in the way of an assurance so handsomely offered, so much, and then to ask for more: I don't feel I can do it. Besides, I have my little conviction. To the question itself he might easily reply that it's none of my business."

"I see," Mitchy dropped. "Such an inquiry might suggest to him moreover that you're hesitating more than you perhaps really are."

"Oh, as to that," said Vanderbank, "I think he practically knows how much."

"And how little?" He met this, however, with no more form than if it had been a poor joke; so that Mitchy also smoked for a moment in silence. "It's your coming down here, you mean, for these three or four days, that will have fixed it?"

The question this time was one to which the speaker might have expected an answer, but Vanderbank's only immediate answer was to walk and walk. "I want so awfully to be kind to her," he at last said.

"I should think so!" Then, with irrelevance, Mitchy barked back. "Shall I inquire?"

But Vanderbank, with another thought, had lost the thread. "Inquire what?"

"Why, if she does get anything—"

"If I'm not kind enough?"—Van had caught up again. "Dear no; I'd rather you wouldn't speak unless first spoken to."

"Well, he may speak—since he knows we know."

"It isn't likely, for he can't make out why I told you."

"You didn't tell me, you know," said Mitchy. "You told Mrs. Brook."

"Well, she told you, and her talking about it is the unpleasant idea. He does dislike her so."

"Poor Mrs. Brook!" Mitchy meditated.

"Poor Mrs. Brook!" his companion echoed.

"But I thought you said," he went on, "that he doesn't mind."

"Your knowing? Well, I dare say he doesn't. But he doesn't want a lot of gossip and chatter."

"Oh!" said Mitchy with meekness.

"I may absolutely take it from you then," Vanderbank presently resumed, "that Nanda has her idea?"

"Oh, she didn't tell me so. But it's none the less my belief."

"Well," Vanderbank at last threw off, "I feel it for myself. If only because she knows everything," he pursued without looking at Mitchy. "She knows everything, everything."

"Everything, everything." Mitchy got up.

"She told me so herself yesterday," said Van.

"And she told me so to-day."

Vanderbank's hesitation might have shown he was struck with this. "Well, I don't think it's information that either of us required. But of course she can't help it," he added. "Everything, literally everything, in London, in the world she lives in, is in the air she breathes—so that the longer she's in it, the more she'll know."

"The more she'll know, certainly," Mitchy acknowledged. "But she isn't in it, you see, down here."

"No. Only she appears to have come down with such accumulations. And she won't be here forever," Vanderbank hastened to subjoin.

"Certainly not if you marry her."

"But isn't that, at the same time," Vanderbank asked, "just the difficulty?"

Mitchy looked vague. "The difficulty?"

"Why, as a married woman she'll be steeped in it again."

"Surely"—oh, Mitchy could be candid. "But the difference will be that for a married woman it won't matter. It only matters for girls," he plausibly continued—"and then only for those on whom no one takes pity."

"The trouble is," said Vanderbank—but quite as if uttering only a general truth—"that it's just a thing that may sometimes operate as a bar to pity. Isn't it for the non-marrying girls that it doesn't particularly matter? For the others it's such an odd preparation."

"Oh, I don't mind it!" Mitchy declared.

Vanderbank visibly demurred. "Ah, but your choice—"

"Is such a different sort of thing?" Mitchy, for the half-hour, in the ambiguous dusk, had never looked more droll. "The young lady I named isn't my choice."

"Well then, that's only a sign the more that you do these things more easily."

"Oh, 'easily'!" Mitchy murmured.

"We oughtn't, at any rate, to keep it up," said Vanderbank, who had looked at his watch. "Twelve twenty-five—good-night. Shall I blow out the candles?"

"Do, please. I'll close the window"—and Mitchy went to it. "I'll follow you—good-night." The candles, after a minute, were out, and his friend had gone, but Mitchy, left in darkness, face to face with the vague, quiet garden, still stood there.

XXVII.

The footman, opening the door, mumbled his name without sincerity, and Vanderbank, passing in, found in fact—for he had caught the symptom—the chairs and tables, the lighted lamps and the flowers alone in possession. He looked at his watch, which exactly marked eight, then turned to speak again to the servant, who had, however, without another sound, and as if blushing for the house, already closed him in. There was nothing indeed but Mrs. Grendon's want of promptness that failed of a welcome: her drawing-room, on the January night, showed its elegance through a suffusion of pink electricity which melted, at the end of the vista, into the faintly golden glow of a retreat still more sacred. Vanderbank walked, after a moment, into the second room, which also proved empty, and which had its little globes of white fire—discreetly limited in number—coated with lemon-colored silk. The walls, covered with delicate French mouldings, were so fair that they seemed vaguely silvered; the low French chimney had a French fire. There was a lemon-colored stuff on the sofa and chairs, a wonderful polish on the floor that was largely exposed, and a copy of a French novel in blue paper on one of the spindle-legged tables. Vanderbank looked about him an instant, as if generally struck, then gave himself to something that had particularly caught his eye. This was simply his own name written rather large on the cover of the French book and endowed, after he had taken the volume up, with the power to hold his attention the more closely the longer he looked at it. He uttered, for a private satisfaction, before letting the matter pass, a low, confused sound; after which, flinging the book down with some emphasis in another place, he moved to the chimney-piece, where his eyes, for a little, intently fixed the small ashy wood fire. When he raised them again it was, on the observation that the beautiful clock on the mantel was wrong, to consult once more his watch, and then give a glance, in the chimney glass, at the state of his mustache, of which he twisted, for a moment, with due care, the ends. While so engaged he became aware of something else and, quickly facing about, recognized in the doorway of the room the other figure the glass had just reflected.

"Oh you!" he said, with a quick hand-shake. "Mrs. Grendon's down?" But he had already passed with Nanda, on their greeting, back into the first room, which contained only themselves, and she had mentioned that she believed Tishy to have said 8.15, which meant of course anything people liked.

"Oh then, there'll be nobody till nine. I didn't, I suppose, sufficiently study my note; which didn't mention to me, by-the-way," Vanderbank added, "that you were to be here."

"Ah, but why should it?" the girl candidly inquired. She spoke again, however, before he could reply. "I dare say that when she wrote to you she didn't know."

"Know you would come up to meet me?" Vanderbank laughed. "Jolly, at any rate, thanks to my mistake, to have in this way a quiet moment with you. You came on ahead of your mother?"

"Oh no—I'm staying here."

"Oh!" said Vanderbank.

"Mr. Longdon came up with me—I came here, Friday last, straight."

"You parted at the door?" he asked, with marked gayety.

She thought a moment—she was more serious. "Yes—but only for a day or two. He's coming to-night."

"Good. How delightful!"

"He'll be glad to see you," Nanda said, looking at the flowers.

"Awfully kind of him, when I've been such a brute."

"How—a brute?"

"Well, I mean not writing—nor going back."

"Oh, I see," Nanda simply returned.

It was a simplicity that, clearly enough, made her friend a little awkward. "Has he—a-minded? But he can't have complained!" he quickly added.

"Oh, he never complains."

"No, no—it isn't in him. But it's just that," said Vanderbank, "that makes one feel so base. I've been ferociously busy."

"He knows that—he likes it," Nanda returned. "He delights in your work. And I've done what I can for him."

"Ah," said her companion, "you've evidently brought him round. I mean to this lady."

"To Tishy? Oh, of course I can't leave her—with nobody."

"No"—Vanderbank became gay again—"that's a London necessity. You can't leave anybody with nobody—exposed to everybody."

Mild as it was, however, Nanda missed the joke. "Mr. Grendon's not here."

"Ah, where is he?"

"Yachting—but she doesn't know."

"Then she and you are just doing this together?"

"Well," said Nanda, "she's dreadfully frightened."

"Oh, she mustn't allow herself," he returned, "to be too much carried away by it. But we're to have your mother?"

"Yes, and papa. It's really for Mitchy and Aggie," the girl went on—"before they go abroad."

"Oh then, I see what you've come up for! Tishy and I are not in it. It's all for Mitchy."

"If you mean there's nothing I wouldn't do for him, you're quite right. He has always been of a kindness to me—"

"That culminated in marrying your friend?" Vanderbank asked. "It was charming, certainly, and I don't mean to diminish the merit of it. But Aggie herself, I gather, is of a charm now—!"

"Isn't she?"—Nanda was eager. "Hasn't she come out?"

"With a bound—into the arena. But when a young person's out with Mitchy—!"

"Oh, you mustn't say anything against that. I've been out with him myself."

"Ah, but my dear child—!" Van frankly argued.

It was not, however, a thing to notice. "I knew it would be just so. It always is when they've been like that."

"Do you mean as she apparently was? But doesn't it make one wonder a little if she was?"

"Oh, she was—I know she was. And we're also to have Harold," Nanda continued—"another of Mitchy's beneficiaries. It would be a banquet, wouldn't it? if we were to have them all."

Vanderbank hesitated, and the look he fixed on the door might have suggested a certain open attention to the arrival of their hostess or the announcement of other guests.

"If you haven't got them all, you've got, in having me, I should suppose, about the biggest."

"Ah, what has he done for you?" Nanda asked.

Again her friend hung fire. "Do you remember something you said to me, down there, in August?"

She looked vague, but quite unembarrassed. "I remember but too well that I chattered."

"You declared to me that you knew everything."

"Oh yes—and I said so to Mitchy too."

"Well, my dear child, you don't."

"Because I don't know—?"

"Yes, what makes me the victim of his insatiable benevolence."

"Ah, well, if you've no doubt of it yourself, that's all that's required. I'm quite glad to hear of something I don't know," Nanda pursued. "And we're to have Harold too," she promptly added.

"As a beneficiary? Then we shall fill up! Harold will give us a stamp."

"Won't he? I hear of nothing but his success. Mother wrote me that people are frantic for him; and," said the girl after an instant, "do you know what Cousin Jane wrote me?"

"What would she now? I'm trying to think."

Nanda relieved him of this effort. "Why, that mother has transferred to him all the scruples that she felt—'even to excess'—in my time, about what we might pick up among you all that wouldn't be good for us."

"That's a neat one for me!" Vanderbank declared. "And I like your talk about your antediluvian 'time.'"

"Oh, it's all over."

"What exactly is it," Vanderbank presently demanded, "that you describe in that manner?"

"Well, my little hour. And the danger of picking up."

"There's none of it here?"

Nanda appeared frankly to judge. "No—because, really, Tishy, don't you see? is natural. We just talk."

Vanderbank showed his interest. "Whereas at your mother's—?"

"Well, you were all afraid."

Vanderbank laughed straight out. "Do you mind my telling her that?"

"Oh, she knows it. I've heard her say herself you were."

"Ah, I was," he concurred. "You know we've spoken of that before."

"I'm speaking now of all of you," said Nanda. "But it was she who was most so, for she tried—I know she did, she told me so—to control you. And it was when you were most controlled—"

Van's amusement took it up. "That we were most deleterious?"

"Yes, because, of course, what's so awfully unutterable is just what we most notice. Tishy knows that," Nanda wonderfully observed.

As the reflection of her tone might have been caught by an observer in Vanderbank's face, it was in all probability caught by his interlocutress, who, superficially, however, need have recognized there—what was all she showed—but the right manner of waiting for dinner. "The better way then is to dash right in? That's what our friend here does?"

"Oh, you know what she does!" the girl replied as if with a sudden drop of interest in the question. She also turned to the opening of the door.

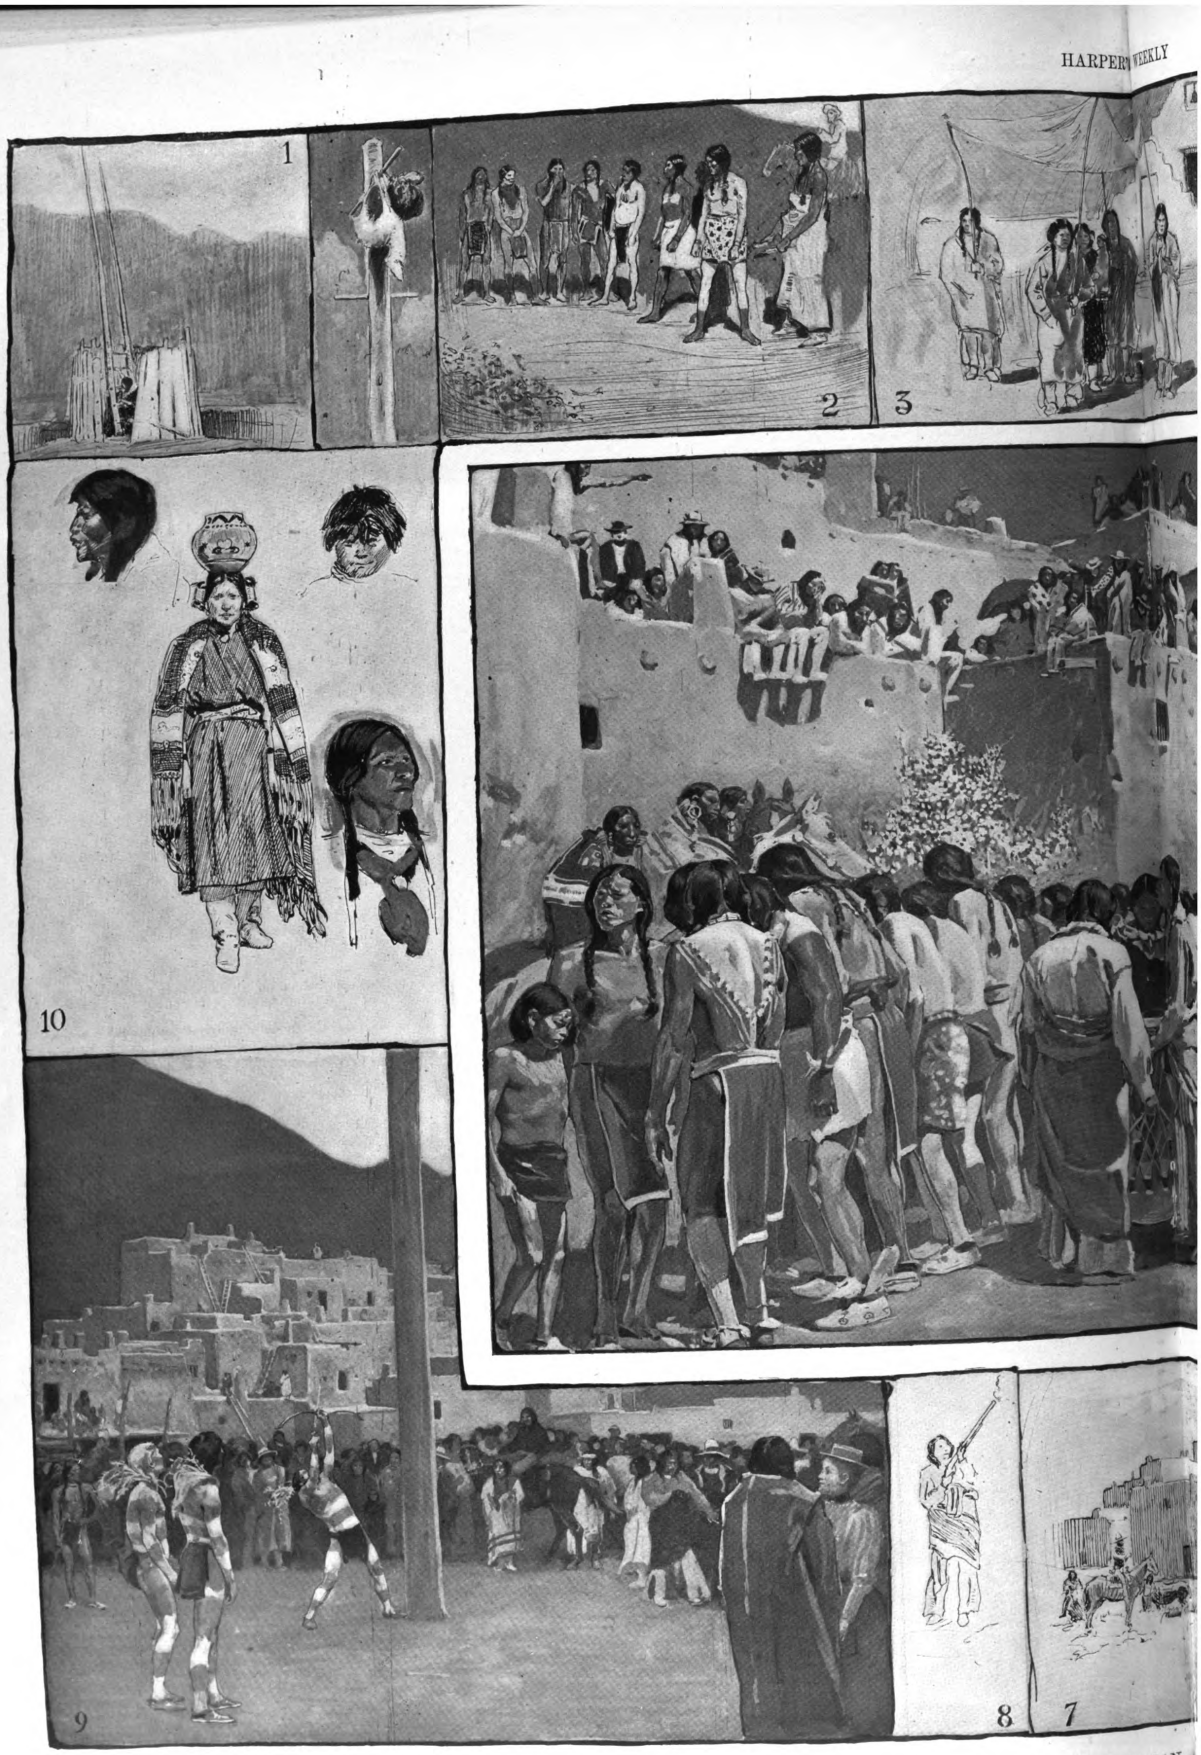
It was Tishy who at last appeared, and her guest had his greeting ready. "We're talking of the delicate matters as to which you think it's better to dash right in; but I'm bound to say your inviting a hungry man to dinner doesn't appear to be one of them."

The sign of Tishy Grendon—as it had been often called in a society in which variety of reference had brought to high perfection, for usual safety, the sense of signs—was a retarded facial glimmer that, in respect to any subject, closed up the rear of the procession. It had been said of her indeed that when processions were at all rapid she was usually to be found, on a false impression of her whereabouts, mixed up with the next; so that now, for instance, by the time she had reached the point of saying to Vanderbank, "Are you really hungry?" Nanda had begun to appeal to him for some praise of their hostess's appearance. This was of course with soft looks, up and down, at her clothes. "Isn't she too nice? Did you ever see anything so lovely?"

"I'm so faint with inanition," Van replied to Mrs. Greudon, "that—like the traveller in the desert, isn't it?—I only make out, as an oasis or a mirage, a sweet green rustling blur. I don't trust you."

"I don't trust you," Nanda said on her friend's behalf. "She isn't 'green'—men are amazing; they don't know the dearest old blue that ever was seen."

"Is it your 'old blue'?" Vanderbank, monocular, very earnestly asked. "I can imagine it was 'dear,' but I should have thought—"



"It was yellow"—Nanda helped him out—"if I hadn't kindly told you." Tishy's figure showed the confidence of objects consecrated by publicity; bodily speaking a beautiful human plant, it might have taken the last November gale to account for the completeness with which, in some quarters, she had shed her leaves. Her companions could only emphasize by the direction of their eyes the nature of the responsibility with which a spectator would have seen them saddled—a choice, as to consciousness, between the effect of her being and the effect of her not being dressed. "Oh, I'm hideous—of course I know it," said Tishy. "I'm only just clean. Here's Nanda now, who's beautiful," she vaguely continued, "and Nanda—"

"Oh but, darling, Nanda's clean too!" the young lady in question interrupted; on which her fellow-guest could only laugh with her as in relief from the antithesis of which her presence of mind had averted the completion, little indeed, for the most part, as, in Mrs. Grendon's talk, that element of style was involved.

"There's nothing, in such a matter," Vanderbank observed as if it were the least he could decently say, "like challenging inquiry; and here's Harold, precisely," he went on in the next breath, "as clear and crisp and undefiled as a fresh five-pound note."

"A fresh one?"—Harold had passed in a flash from his hostess. "A man who, like me, hasn't seen one for six months, could perfectly do, I assure you, with one that has lost its what-do-you-call it." He kissed Nanda with a friendly peck, then, more completely aware, had a straighter apprehension for Tishy. "My dear child, you

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A STRANGE MIXTURE OF BARBARISM AND CHRISTIANITY—THE CELEBRATION OF SAN

1. Entrance to Underground Council-Chamber. 2. Racers at the Beginning of the Course. 3. Carrying the Patron Saint to the Race-Track. 9. The "Chiflonetes." 10. Tyr

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

GERONIMO'S DAY AMONG THE PUEBLO INDIANS.—Drawn by E. L. Blumenschein.—[See Page 1207.]

4. Drummer at the Church Door. 5. The Last of the Wheat. 6. Types—Apaches and Mexicans. 7. Ready for the Race. 8. A Gunner.
s—"Pueblos." 11. The Dance.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google seem to have lost something, though I'll say for you that one doesn't miss it."

Mrs. Grendon looked from him to Nanda. "Does he mean anything very nasty? I can only understand you when Nanda explains," she returned to Harold. "In fact there's scarcely anything I understand except when Nanda explains. It's too dreadful her being away so much now with strange people, whom I'm sure she can't begin to do for what she does for me; it makes me miss her all round. And the only thing I've come across that she can't explain," Tishy launched straight at her friend, "is what on earth she's doing there."

"Why, she's working Mr. Longdon, like a good, true girl," Harold said: "like a good, true daughter and even, though she doesn't love me nearly so much as I love her, I will say, like a good, true sister. I'm bound to tell you, my dear Tishy," he went on, "that I think it awfully happy, with the trend of manners, for any really nice young thing to be a bit lost to sight. London, upon my honor, is quite too awful for girls, and any big house in the country is as much worse—with the promiscuities and opportunities and all that—as you know for yourselves. I know some places," Harold declared, "where, if I had any girls, I'd see 'em shot before I'd take 'em."

"Oh, you know too much, my dear boy!" Vanderbank remarked with commiseration.

"Ah, my brave old Van," the youth returned, "don't speak as if you had illusions. I know," he pursued to the ladies, "just where some of Van's must have perished, and some of the places I've in mind are just where he has left his tracks. A man must be wedded to sweet superstitions, not, nowadays, to have to open his eyes. Nanda, love," he benevolently concluded, "stay where you are. So, at least, I shan't blush for you. That you've the good fortune to have reached your time of life with so little injury to your innocence makes you a case by yourself, of which we must recognize the claims. If Tishy can't stump you, that's nothing against you—Tishy comes of one of the few innocent English families that are left. Yes, you may all cry 'Oho!'—but I defy you to name me, say, five, or at most seven, in which some awful thing or other hasn't happened. Of course ours is one, and Tishy's is one, and Van's is one, and Mr. Longdon's is one, and that makes you, bang off, four. So there you are!" Harold gayly wound up.

"I see now why he's the rage!" Vanderbank observed to Nanda.

But Mrs. Grendon expressed to their young friend a lingering wonder. "Do you mean you go in for the adoption—?"

"Oh, Tishy!" Nanda mildly murmured.

Harold, however, had his own tact. "The dear man's taking her quite over? Not altogether unreservedly. I'm with the governor: I think we ought to get something. 'Oh yes, dear man, but what do you give us for her?'—that's what I should say to him. I mean, don't you know, I don't think she's making quite the bargain she might. If he were to want me I don't say he mightn't have me, but I should have it on my conscience to make it in one way or another a good thing for my parents. You are nice, old woman"—he turned to his sister—"and one can still feel, for the flower of your youth, something of the wonderful 'reverence' that we were all brought up on; for God's sake therefore—all the more—don't really close with him till you've had another word or two with me. I'll be hanged"—he appealed to the company again—"if he shall have her for nothing!"

"See rather," Vanderbank said to Mrs. Grendon, "how little it's like your really losing her that she should be able, this evening, fairly to bring the dear man to you. At this rate we don't lose her—we simply get him as well."

"Ah, but is it quite the dear man's company we want?"—and Harold looked anxious and acute. "If that's the best arrangement Nanda can make—!"

"If he hears us talking in this way, which strikes me as very horrible," Nanda interposed very simply and gravely, "I don't think we're likely to get anything."

"Oh, Harold's talk," Vanderbank protested, "offers, I think, an extraordinary interest; only, I'm bound to say, it crushes me to the earth. I've to make, at least, as I listen to him, a big effort to bear up. It doesn't seem long ago," he pursued to his young friend, "that I used to feel I was in it; but the way you bring it home to me, dreadful youth, that I'm already not—!"

Harold looked earnest to understand. "The hungry generations tread you down—is that it?"

Vanderbank gave a fine sad head-shake. "We speak a different language."

"Ah, but I think I perfectly understand yours!"

"That's just my anguish—and your advantage. It's awfully curious," Vanderbank went on to Nanda, "but I feel as if I must figure to him, you know, very much as Mr. Longdon figures to me. Mr. Longdon doesn't, somehow, get into me. Yet I do, I think, into him. But we don't matter!"

"'We'?"—Nanda, with her eyes on him, echoed it.

"Mr. Longdon and I. It can't be helped, I suppose," he went on, for Tishy, with sociable sadness, "but it is short innings."

Mrs. Grendon, who was clearly credulous, looked positively frightened. "Ah, but, my dear, thank you! I haven't begun to live."

"Well, I have—that's just where it is," said Harold. "Thank you, all the more, old Van, for the tip."

There was an announcement just now at the door, and Tishy turned to meet the Duchess, with Harold, almost as if he had been master of the house, figuring but a step behind her. "Don't mind her," Vanderbank immediately said to the companion with whom he was left, "but tell me, while I still have hold of you, who wrote my name on the French novel that I noticed a few minutes since in the other room."

Nanda at first only wondered. "If it's there—didn't you?"

He just hesitated. "If it were here you would see if it's my hand."

Nanda faltered, and for somewhat longer. "How should I see? What do I know of your hand?"

He looked at her hard. "You have seen it."

"Oh—so little!" she replied with a faint smile.

"Do you mean I've not written to you for so long? Surely I did in—when was it?"

"Yes, when? But why should you?" she asked in quite a different tone.

He was not prepared, on this, with the right statement, and what he did, after a moment, bring out, had, for the occasion, a little the sound of the wrong. "The beauty of you is that you're too good; which, for me, is but another way of saying you're too clever. You make no demands. You let things go. You don't allow, in particular, for the human weakness that enjoys an occasional glimpse of the weakness of others."

She had deeply attended to him. "You mean perhaps one doesn't show enough what one wants?"

"I think that must be it. You're so fiendishly proud."

She appeared again to wonder. "Not too much so, at any rate, only to want from you—"

"Well, what?"

"Why, what's pleasant for yourself," she simply said.

"Oh dear, that's poor bliss!" he declared. "How does it come then," he next said, "that, with this barrenness of our intercourse, I know so well your hand?"

A series of announcements had meanwhile been made, with guests arriving to match them, and Nanda's eyes, at this moment, engaged themselves with Mr Longdon and her mother, who entered the room together When she looked back to her companion, she had had time to drop a consciousness of his question. "If I'm proud, to you, I'm not good," she said, "and if I'm good—always to you —I'm not proud. I know at all events, perfectly, how immensely you're occupied, what a quantity of work you get through and how every minute, for you, counts. Don't make it a crime to me that I'm reasonable."

"No, that would show, wouldn't it? that there isn't much else. But how it all comes back—!"

"Well, to what?" she asked.

"To the old story. You know how I'm occupied. You know how I work. You know how I manage my time."

"Oh, I see," said Nanda. "It is my knowing, after all, everything."

"Everything. The book I just mentioned is one that, months ago—I remember now—I lent to your mother."

"Oh, a thing in a blue cover? I remember then too." Nanda's face cleared up "I had forgotten it was lying about here, but I must have brought it—in fact, I remember I did—for Tishy And I wrote your name on it so that we might know—"

"That I hadn't lent it to either of you? It didn't occur to you to write your own?" Vanderbank went on.

"Well, but if it isn't mine? It isn't mine, I'm sure."

"Therefore, also, if it can't be Tishy's—"

"It's simple enough—it's mother's."

"'Simple'?" Vanderbank laughed. "I like you! And may I ask if you've read the work?"

"Oh yes." Then she wonderfully said: "For Tishy."

"To see if it would do?"

"I've often done that," the girl returned.

"And she takes your word?"

"Generally. I think I remember she did that time." Vanderbank hesitated. "And read the thing?"

"Oh, no!" said Nanda.

He looked at her a moment longer. "You're too particular!" he rather oddly sounded, turning away with it to meet Mr. Longdon.

XXVIII.

When, after dinner, the company was restored to the upper rooms, the Duchess was on her feet as soon as the door opened for the entrance of the gentlemen. Then it might have been seen that she had a purpose, for after the elements had again, with a due amount of the usual shuffling and mismatching, been mixed, her case proved the first to have been settled. She had got Mr. Longdon beside her on a sofa that was just right for two. "I've seized you without a scruple," she frankly said, "for there are things I want to say to you as well as, very particularly, to ask More than anything else, of course, I want again to thank you."

No collapse of Mr. Longdon's was ever incompatible with his sitting well forward. "'Again'?"

"Do you look so blank," she demanded, "because you've really forgotten the gratitude I expressed to you when you were so good as to bring Nanda up for Aggie's marriage?—or because you don't think it a matter I should trouble myself to return to? How can I help it," she went on without waiting for his answer, "if I see your hand in everything that has happened since the so interesting talk I had with you last summer at Mertle? There have been times when I've really thought of writing to you; I've even had a bold bad idea of proposing myself to you for a Sunday. Then the crisis, my momentary alarm, has struck me as blowing over, and I've felt I could wait for some luck li'e this, which would sooner or later come." Her companion, however, appeared to leave the luck so on her hands that she could only snatch up, to cover its nudity, the next handsomest assumption. "I see you cleverly guess that what I've been worried about is the effect on Mrs. Brook of the loss of her dear Mitchy. If you've not, at all events, had your own impression of this effect, isn't that only because, these last months, you've seen so little of her? I've seen," said the Duchess, "enough and to spare." She waited as if for her vision, on this, to be flashed back at her, but the only result of her speech was that her friend looked hard at somebody else It was just this symptom indeed that perhaps sufficed her, for in a minute she was again afloat. "Things have turned out so much as I desire them that I should really feel wicked not to have a humble heart. There's a quarter indeed," she added with a noble unction, "to which I don't fear to say for myself that no day and no night pass without my showing it. However, you English, I know, don't like one to speak of one's religion. I'm just as simply thankful for mine—I mean with as little sense of indecency or agony about it—as I am for my health or my carriage. My point is, at any rate, that I say in no cruel spirit of triumph, yet do, none the less, very distinctly say, that Mr. Mitchett's disgusted patroness may be now to be feared." These words had the sound of a climax, and she had brought them out as if, with her duty done, to leave them, but something that took place, for her eye, in the face Mr. Longdon had half averted gave her after an instant what he might have called her second wind. "Oh, I know you think she always has been. But you've exaggerated—as to that; and I don't say that even at present it's anything we sha'n't get the better of. Only we must keep our heads. We must remember that from her own point of view she has her grievance, and we must at least look as if we trusted her. That, you know, is what you've never quite done."

Mr. Longdon gave out a murmur of discomfort which produced in him a change of position, and the sequel to the change was that he presently accepted from his cushioned angle of the sofa the definite support it could offer. If his eyes, moreover, had not met his companion's, they had been brought, by the hand he repeatedly and somewhat distressfully passed over them, closer to the question of which of the alien objects presented to his choice it would cost him least to profess to handle. What he had already paid, a spectator would easily have gathered from the long, suppressed wriggle that had ended in his falling back, was some sacrifice of his habit of not privately depreciating those to whom he was publicly civil. It was plain, however, that when he presently spoke his thought had taken a stretch. "I'm sure I've fully intended to be everything that's proper. But I don't think Mr. Vanderbank cares for her."

It kindled in the Duchess an immediate light. "Vous avez bien de l'esprit. You put one at one's ease. I've been vaguely groping, while you're already there. It's really only for Nanda he cares."

"Yes—really."

The Duchess hesitated. "And yet exactly how much?"

"I haven't asked him."

She had another, but a briefer pause. "Don't you think it about time you should?" Once more she waited, then seemed to feel that her opportunity wouldn't. "We've worked a bit together, but you don't take me into your confidence. I dare say you don't believe I'm quite straight. Don't you really see how I must be?" She had a pleading note which made him at last fix her. "Don't you see," she went on with the advantage of it, "that, having got all I want for myself, I haven't a motive in the world for spoiling the fun of another? I don't want in the least, I assure you, to spoil even Mrs. Brook's, for how will she get a bit less out of him—I mean than she does now—if what you desire should take place? Honestly, my dear man, that's quite what I desire, and I only want, over and above, to help you. What I feel for Nanda, believe me, is pure pity. I won't say I'm frantically grateful to her, because, in the long-run—one way or another—she'll have found her account. It nevertheless worries me to see her; and all the more because of this very certitude, which you've so kindly just settled for me, that our young man hasn't really, with her mother—"

Whatever the certitude Mr. Longdon had kindly settled, it was in another interest that he at this moment broke in. "Is he your young man too?"

She was not too much amused to cast about her. "Aren't such marked ornaments of life a little the property of all who admire and enjoy them?"

"You 'enjoy' him?" Mr. Longdon asked in the same straightforward way.

"Immensely."

His silence, for a little, seemed the sign of a plan. "What is it he hasn't done with Mrs. Brook?"

"Well, the thing that would be the complication. He hasn't gone beyond a certain point. You may ask how one knows such matters, but I'm afraid I've not quite a receipt for it. A woman knows, but she can't tell. They haven't done, as it's called, anything wrong."

Mr. Longdon frowned. "It would be extremely horrid if they had."

"Ah, but, for you and me who know life, it isn't that that—if other things had made for it—would have prevented! As it happens, however, we've got off easily. She doesn't speak to him—"

She had forms he could only take up. "'Speak' to him—?"

"Why, as much as she would have liked to be able to believe."

"Then where's the danger of which you appear to wish to warn me?"

"Just in her feeling, in the case, as most women would feel. You see she did what she could for her daughter. She did, I'm bound to say, as that sort of thing goes among you people, a good deal. She treasured up, she nursed along Mitchy, whom she would also, though of course not so much, have liked for herself. Nanda, with a word, could have kept him on, becoming thereby, for your plan, so much the less accessible. That would have thoroughly obliged her mother, but your little English girls, in these altered times—oh, I know how you feel them!—don't stand on such trifles; and—even if you think it odd of me—I can't defend myself, though I've so directly profited, against a certain compassion also for Mrs. Brook's upset. As a good-natured woman I feel, in short, for both of them; I deplore, all round, what's after all rather a sad relation. Only, as I tell you, Nanda's the one, I naturally say to myself, for me now most to think of. If I don't assume too much, that is, that you don't suffer by my freedom."

Mr Longdon put by with a mere drop of his eyes the question of his suffering. there was so clearly, for him, an issue more relevant. "What do you know of my 'plan'?"

"Why, my dear man, haven't I told you that ever since Mertle, I've made out your hand? What on earth, for other people, can your action look like but an adoption?"

"Of—a—him?"

"You're delightful. Of—a—her! If it does come to the same thing for you, so much the better. That, at any rate, is what we're all taking it for, and Mrs. Brook herself en tête. She sees—through your generosity—Nanda's life, more or less, at the worst, arranged for, and that's just what gives her a good conscience."

If Mr Longdon breathed rather hard it seemed to show at least that he followed. "What does she want of a good conscience?"

From under her high tiara, an instant, she almost looked down at him. "Ah, you do hate her!"

He colored, but held his ground. "Don't you tell me yourself she's to be feared?"

"Yes, and watched. But—if possible—with amusement."

"Amusement?" Mr. Longdon faintly gasped.

"Look at her now," his friend went on with an indication that was indeed easy to embrace. Separated from them by the width of the room, Mrs. Brook was, though placed in profile, fully presented; the satisfaction with which she had lately sunk upon a light gilt chair marked itself as superficial and was moreover visibly not confirmed by the fact that Vanderbank's high-perched head,

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google arrested before her in a general survey of opportunity, gave her eyes, in conversation, too prayerful a flight. Their companions were dispersed, some in the other room, and for the occupants of the Duchess's sofa they made, as a couple in communion, a picture, framed and detached, vaguely reduplicated in the high polish of the French floor. "She is tremendously pretty." The Duchess appeared to drop this as a plea for indulgence and to be impelled in fact by her interlocutor's silence to carry it further. "I've never at all thought, you know, that Nanda touches her."

Mr. Longdon demurred. "Do you mean for beauty?"

His friend, for his simplicity, discriminated. "Ah, they've neither of them 'beauty.' That's not a word to make free with. But the mother has grace."

"And the daughter hasn't?"

"Not a line. You answer me of course, when I say that, with your adored Lady Julia, and will want to know what then becomes of the lucky resemblance. I quite grant you that Lady Julia must have had the thing we speak of. But that dear, sweet, blessed thing is very much the same lost secret as the dear sweet blessed other thing that went away with it—the decent leisure that, for the most part, we've also seen the last of. It's the thing, at any rate, that poor Nanda and all her kind have most effectually got rid of. Oh, if you'd trust me a little more you'd see that I'm quite at one with you on all the changes for the worse. I bear up, but I'm old enough to have known. All the same, Mrs. Brook has something—say what you like—when she bends that little brown head. Dieu sait comme elle se coiffe, but what she gets out of it—! Only look."

Mr. Longdon conveyed in an indescribable manner that he had retired to a great distance; yet even from this position he must have launched a glance that showed him a middle way. "They both know you're watching them."

"And don't they know you are? Poor Mr. Van has a consciousness!"

"So should I if two terrible women—"

"Were admiring you both at once?" The Duchess folded the big feathered fan that had partly protected their range. "Well, she, poor dear, can't help it. She wants him herself."

At the drop of the Duchess's fan he restored his nippers. "And he doesn't—not a bit—want her!"

"There it is. She has put down her money, as it were, without a return. She has given Mitchy up and got nothing instead."

There was delicacy, yet there was distinctness, in Mr. Longdon's reserve. "Do you call me nothing?"

The Duchess, at this, fairly swelled with her happy stare. "Then it is an adoption?" She forbore to press, however; she only went on: "It isn't a question, my dear man, of what I call it. You don't make love to her."

"Dear me," said Mr. Longdon, "what would she have had?"

"That could be more charming, you mean, than your famous 'loyalty'? Oh, caro mio, she wants it straighter! But I shock you," his companion quickly added.

The manner in which he firmly rose was scarce a denial; yet he stood for a moment in place. "What, after all, can she do?"

"She can keep Mr. Van."

Mr. Longdon wondered. "Where?"

"I mean till it's too late. She can work on him."

"But how?"

Covertly again the Duchess had followed the effect of her friend's perceived movement on Mrs. Brook, who also got up. She gave a rap with her fan on his leg. "Sit down—you'll see."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

SAN GERONIMO.

The Pueblo Indian's Holiday.

SWIFT ARROW'S TALE.

THE Indian tells us the story of his people and their holiday as we sit in the cool shade of our adobe house:

"Many years ago, when ground was new and rocks were wet, we hed good chief. When he die we hed big day, feast, every year on day he die. We was in dis Nord San Luis Valley somewhere den. Some hunters came here, and tell Indians fine place, so dey move here, my people, five hundred years ago. Oh! full of game dis country; many buffaloes right over dere, lots deer an' wild horses. We hed squashes, beans, corn, plums, lots dings.

"You say we no hed horses, but we have tradition dat we got horses same like deers and buffaloes. Spanyars didn' bring deers and buffalo an' beans an' corn. We hed it. We were not Cat'olic den, same like Apaches. My people didn' know no white man. Us't be all time good friends to Apaches. Utes no good.

"One day one Spanyar came from de west, riding on one mule to Pueblo. (Dey never before saw one mule or one cow. No goat, no sheep eeder.) Den dey say he come from somewhere else. Dis is some oder nation. Some of dem want to kill dat man. Some say no kill him, he good. So chief say no kill him. In few years one troop come trading goods. Dey lives neighbors one mont'. Den dey say it be good to be Cat'olic. De priests baptized on one day, when we all hed feast an' races. After while dey got us to have dat feast and dances on last day Se'tember, so dey call it San Geronimo.

"En few years dey no like it to be Cat'olic, and kill priests an' teachers, an' all but one Spanyar. He hid in bushes, escape, bring out some big troop. Dey hed battle in November. My people run in mountains an' left all crops in houses. Spanyars burnt all houses. My people got very poor, an' den dey was living by hunting. Dey live dat winter like de doves, in cliff. Nex' year dey commence build houses we have now. Dey build for tree year, de five stories. Dey cut de roof beams wid stone axes.

"Quite a good while, 'bout t'irty year, the Spanyars no come. No San Geronimo dance dose year. Dey hed big feast on day we killed priests an' teachers. Den Spanyars come back. Priests commence build church. We go an' be baptized. Become Cat'olic.

"San Geronimo day we just have good time like Fourt' July. If we don't do nuttin' like dees, years will be longer. For de race we pick out fastest boys on each side of river. One side is North Pueblo; oder is Sout'. In morning dat day we pay seex dollar to say mass, an' dollar an' half to cantor. Den when mass is done we want to come out for races. After races, big race dance; everybody happy. In afternoon we have chiflonetes, de actors. Dis is to make people laugh, dis chiflonetes. Didn' have dis long time. 'Bout hundred years ago hed big eclipse of sun. Den we hed big famine—no water. For one year people very, very poor, starved. So de chief he say we have chiflonetes. An' dese actors, fony men, go roun' de houses an' make fone, so people forget dey hungry. So now dey have dem every year, just same. Dey paint dereselves up fouy, and shoot straw arrows.

"San Geronimo is for make pleasure for everybody—white man, Indian, Mexican. Not like white man—make 'em pay fifty cents, one dollar, ten cents. All free." And as Swift Arrow wrapped his blanket around his body and over one shoulder, he was proud he was an Indian.

SAN GERONIMO DAY.

The old bell on the church responds in musical tones to the rapping of two stones held in the hands of an Indian boy. The dignified Indian governor calls out from the square that it is the hour for the morning mass. The Pueblos solemnly file into the little sanctuary and kneel on the ground-floor. A drummer is stationed by the church door, and at his sides are six gunners charging their muzzle-loaders. The priest's monotone rises above the noise of the early morning, and soon the tinkling of a bell is heard. It is the signal, and the drums roll and the guns are fired into the air. Quiet follows, and the chant continues, followed at intervals by the noise of gun and drum.

The Apaches, dressed in most gorgeous costumes, some wearing hats, dot the square with brilliancy, refusing the Spaniard's religion. Visitors begin to arrive, and the road to Taos, three miles distant to the south, is marked by a trail of dust hanging in the air.

With a final roll of the drum and discharges from the guns, a procession comes out of the church bearing a small wooden image of San Geronimo. Four Indians hold the poles of a canopy to keep the sun from striking the sacred block of wood as they carry it to a bower overlooking the race-course.

The young runners of the South Pueblo are seen on a distant roof, their naked bodies shining in the bright light. The minor chords of an Indian song hurry the people around the group of athletes as they go through a short dance before lining up to receive last instructions from the coachers. The racers are divided into groups of sixteen, and as they attentively listen to a buck's advice two old men switch eagle feathers around their naked legs to make them swift. Then, with shrill calls, they trot slowly to their respective ends of the three hundred and forty-five yards' course. Eight young men from each Pueblo are represented in each group, and feel that the honor of the North or South Pueblo rests in their individual efforts. They are naked but for the breech-clout, and the stripes of paint on bodies and faces.

Many have light fluffy feathers pasted on their backs and legs. Stationed at short intervals along the track are coachers who keep up a continual yelling. The racing is done by couples running the course, and as they cross the line two more take it up. It takes over a quarter of an hour before the last pair decide the supremacy of the Pueblos, amidst great excitement.

The sport commences as two runners bound from the start at top speed. They are greeted with cheers all along the line, and some coachers strike their bodies with aspen branches. They race the distance evenly, so the two who continue start together. The next two pairs are as well matched as the first, and promises are for a close finish. But on the fifth lap comes a surprise. A runner with the imprint of a white hand on each breast takes the lead as he springs from a crouching start. He speeds along like an American sprinter, head up, running on his toes, and a great gap opens rapidly between him and his opponent from the North. His running is superb, and as he crosses the line of branches the South Pueblo starts with a lead of fifty yards.

"That chap spent six years at Carlisle," some one says; and he shows the training, for his time for the distance is forty-four seconds.

I am sorry he runs so well, for the race looks hopelessly lost for the North side, as, lap after lap, they can not lessen the gap. I climb to the top of the pueblo to see the whole course. There are still four more laps, and the Carlisle boy's gain remains the same. The fourth from the last race begins, and the North side runner clinches his hands in impatience waiting for his side to arrive. His opponent starts long ahead of him, and he can see him spurt along through the dust, coached and whipped ahead by his friends. But at last his side crosses the line, and with undaunted spirit the Indian sets after the small figure ahead of him. How that fellow does go! The pride of his Pueblo spurs him ahead, and his legs flash over the road like a perfect machine. The crowd resumes interest, and hope revives in the North side when the determined chap has cut the lead in two. It is a grand sight from my point of view, commanding the whole course, and the moving excited throng of gayly dressed people. The two succeeding laps shorten the lead somewhat, and at the far end I can see the start of the final race.

An old man is furiously switching the legs of a tall lithe fellow with his eagle feathers, while the South starts off confidently. The leader is fifteen yards ahead before the tall Indian tears away from the old coacher. The excitement is high now, and a line of motion can be seen in the crowd as the runners pass the people. The coachers along the line run beside their men in their wild efforts to hasten them on. But it is no trouble for the coachers of the man behind. With set jaws, and hands clinched till the muscles of the forearm stand out, he sweeps past them all, bringing cheers of admiration from the audience and fear and trembling to the supporters of the leader. They are both good runners, the best of each Pueblo, saved for the last; and from my high perch there seems no gain, and the course half over.

Yes, there is a gain—that tall Indian behind is surely creeping up, and his friends whoop and yell as they close in behind, trying to see the finish. He throws up his head as the hair falls in his face, and puts all his efforts into his spurt. I recognize him at that moment. It is Swift Arrow. And with a yell I lean 'way out from the 'doby chimney. "Beat him out—beat him out!" I cry, in excitement. He does not need my advice, for thousands of voices rend the air as his spurt brings him closer every second. Twenty-five yards more, and the South still has the lead. Swift Arrow's face is fiercely strained, and the muscles of his jaw are knots of light and shade. Tied! His name is not in vain. But will he win? His opponent feels him at his side, and tries hard to spurt the last remaining ten yards. The two black heads are side by side, a yellow knot flying from Swift Arrow's hair, and a blue one holding the long locks of his opponent. They struggle ahead with supremest effort. Pride is the Indian's moving force, and it tells now as the two pairs of legs fly evenly through the dust. "North!" "South!" rise from the din of the excitement, and with a happy heart I see the yellow knot forge ahead as they cross the finish.

The crowds of wagons and horsemen close in around the pueblo as the deep boom, boom of a big tomtom is heard. The racers have put on their moccasins, and form two bodies of dancers. The grouping is the same as in the preparatory dances, a close compact mass of Indians elbow to elbow. But a song that stirs you like the great movement in a Beethoven symphony rises from the many voices. The happy, quickly moving rhythm is echoed in the banging of the big drum, the jingling of many sleigh-bells, and the explosions of guns. Aspen leaves wave over the heads of the racers; naked boys and old men join the dancers; many of the crowd take up the infectious motion and song, and bounce up and down on their feet as they laughingly try to catch the song. The time grows quicker; the singers put more "snap" into the song, and dance in great joy, moving slowly sideways before the pueblo. Indian women on the roofs throw bread and fruit down on the crowd, the stern-faced governor presses back the people with the silver-headed cane presented to his tribe by President Lincoln, old men busily chase cameras away from the scene, and three bright red Apache squaws ride beside the dancers.

Arrived at the end of the pueblo, the song dies down, and with a whoop the dancers break through the crowd and joyfully rush across the little bridge, some stopping at the creek to throw water into their dry mouths. The Mexican horsemen plunge through the water, followed by the Apache squaws.

The dance is renewed on the other side, and winds around the underground council-chamber and under the scaffoldings. The three squaws have dismounted, and dance and sing in the middle of the group, undisturbed by the jolly racers. The noonday sun beats down on the bare backs, and beads of perspiration stand out on the painted foreheads. The dust rises in clouds, but neither the cheerfulness of the song nor the steady hammer of the drum abates till the circle around the square is completed. Then with wild "hi yi's" the racers run for their homes and dinners.

The great crowd settles down at lunch-time, and sets its tables on the wagon seats. Indian women come down the ladders with baskets of wheat on their heads, which they trade to the fruit merchants for apples and peaches. Some of the Mexicans dine with their Indian friends. American women buy the ornaments off the richly decked Apache's head and body. The newspaper men compare notes, and the "kodak fiends" tell of many serious troubles, usually averted by a good cigar or "two bits."

Some Mexican boys rush by on horseback, one waving a live rooster over his head. They are in for sport of their own. Planting the poor bird in the ground, with its head protruding, they run by, trying to pull it from its place. The successful boy rides swiftly off with his prize, the others after. They all struggle for the rooster, grappling and fighting, till little is left of the chicken. The Mexican who tore him from the ground has nothing to tell of his victory but two legs, a few feathers clinging to his torn clothes, a flushed face, and a perspiring horse.

THE CHIFLONETES.

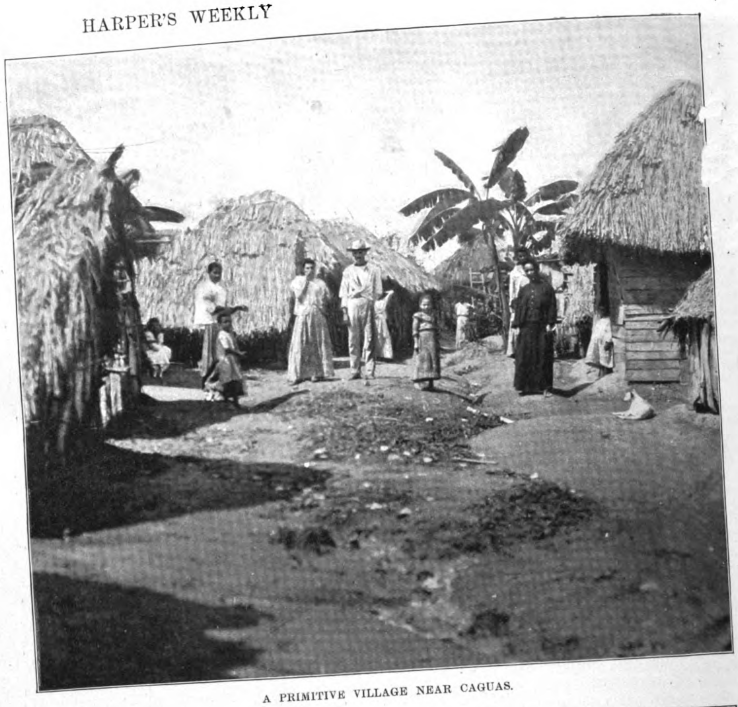
The afternoon is half gone, when two strangely painted figures mount from the underground council-chamber. Their naked bodies and faces are painted in black and white stripes, and bunches of withered grasses are stuck into the hair. These are the "chiflonetes," or, as Bandelier calls them, the "delight-makers." The black and white stripes are emblematic of the darkness and light of the eclipse which caused their establishment, and the withered grass symbolizes the parched crops.

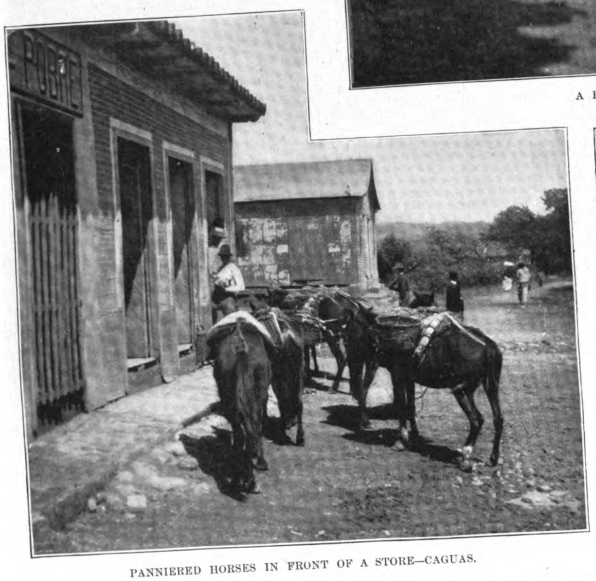
They proceed to "make fone," and a crowd of children follow them in glee. Some of the little brown babies cry in terror as the weird Indians come along, but to most of them it is the much talked-of, long looked-for event of the year. The "chiflonetes" succeed in surrounding themselves with an audience, and, just as their American brothers do in the circus, tell a good joke, or start a song and get badly out of tune. They stand on the little bridge and dance as funnily as possible, then chase the children around. They go through clown gymnastics, squatting on the ground in all shapes, standing on their heads or on each other's neck, play leap-frog, and cut up "monkey-shines" until they are tired.

After a short rest, the funny men, aided by a third Indian, again appear. Now they are armed with bows and light straw arrows, and sing a jolly hunting-song. They discover imaginary tracks, in the vicinity of the tall pole, out in the square. They lead evidently toward the pole, and there they lose the trail. Finally one Indian examines the pole, and, to his surprise, finds the footprints again. Up the trail goes, and bending back their heads, the "chiflonetes" see a dead sheep hanging at the top. They get out their straw arrows and try hard to bring down the game. As shooting is in vain, they shake the pole, and chop at it with stones, getting much humor out of sharpening the stones on boards, etc. They keep this up for nearly an hour, the only interruptions coming when they stop their play and seriously throw gravel at the holders of cameras. Eventually a short ladder is brought, and a "chiflonete" is started up the pole. It takes him at least a quarter of an hour to climb up, as he spends most of the time slipping back. But at last the sheep is reached, and it and the bread and fruit beside it are lowered to the ground. The fun is a little tiresome, lacking the "vim" and "snap" of our American foolishness, but it is as light and absurd as a comic opera.



The "chiflonetes" are another ray of light on the Indian's character, and show that beneath the serious dignity of his severe face lies a sense of humor as keen as his white brothers'.

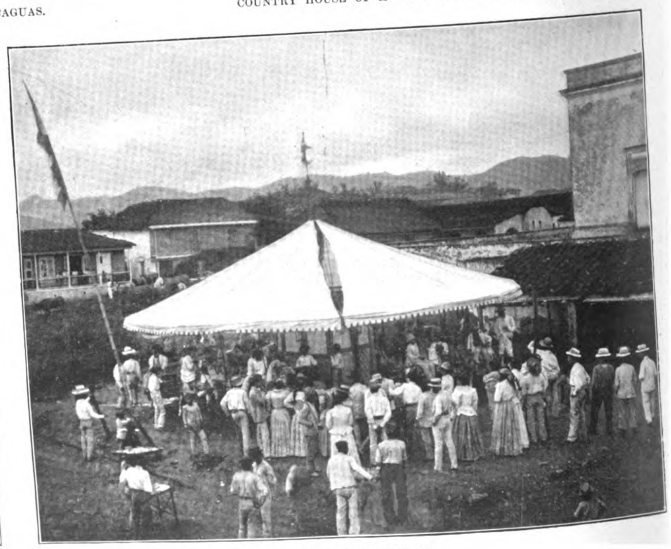
ERNEST L. BLUMENSCHEIN.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE BREAD-WAGON OF CAGUAS.

A PRIMITIVE VILLAGE NEAR CAGUAS.



PANNIERED HORSES IN FRONT OF A STORE—CAGUAS.

COUNTRY HOUSE OF A WELL-TO-DO PUERTORIQUEÑO.

NATIVE TYPES—A MOTHER AND CHILDREN IN STREET COSTUME.

CAROUSAL OF CAGUAS.

PUERTO RICO—OUR WEST-INDIAN ACQUISITION AND ITS PEOPLE

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILLIAM DINWIDDIE, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ELECTRIC-CABS IN NEW YORK.

THE age we live in is marked by no greater achievement than the almost universal evolution from animal to mechanical energy.

The birth of the steam-engine marked the beginning of mechanical motive power, and coincident therewith came the desire to propel vehicles by self-contained energy. Some of the very earliest applications of steam motive power were therefore in this direction. To the steam-motor have been added gasoline, benzine, and other oil-engines, and last, but by no means least, the electric-motor automobile has put in its appearance. The electric-motor automobile is now not an experiment, but actually enters into the every-day existence of Greater New York. Soon may we write the passing of the horse.

The development of the automobile carriage in this country has perhaps not been in exactly the same direction, nor has it been accompanied by as great a production and universal application, as in Europe. France has particularly distinguished herself in automobilism. Paris to-day has hundreds of horseless vehicles, operated by steam, gasoline, benzine, and in some few instances by electric motors, scurrying through its streets and boulevards, and recently a public automobile-cab service has been instituted. Electrically propelled vehicles constitute but a very small percentage of the equipment. American development, however, seems to lean toward the electric-motor conveyance. Many very excellent electric automobiles have been produced, and the electric-cab service recently incorporated in this city by the Electric Vehicle Company is unquestionably the pioneer electric-cab service of any magnitude. The plant, when equipped with its full complement of carriages, will be the largest in the world.

Many new and ingenious appliances are incorporated in the construction of these New York electric cabs, which are now regular competitors of the old-fashioned vehicles on Manhattan Island. The electric cabs have regular stations throughout the city, may be hailed when in motion, or can be ordered from the main station by telephone. The charges for time hire are the same as for horse-cab service, but the charge per mile is thirty cents, instead of fifty cents, the legal rate. With its full present equipment the service consists of fifty hansoms, fifty broughams, and also several special vehicles.

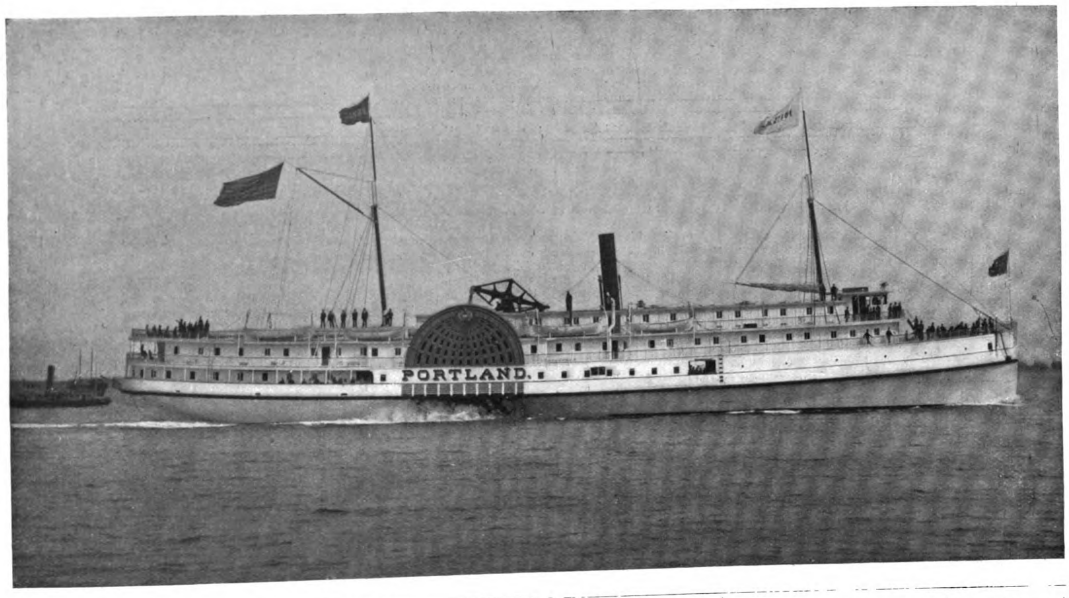
In general appearance the New York electric cabs are perhaps somewhat different from any vehicle heretofore constructed. The fore body is similar to an ordinary hansom-cab, but rearwardly projecting from this part of the vehicle is a box in which the batteries are housed. These batteries are composed of a multitude of lead plates carried in boxes and immersed in dilute acid. They are inserted or removed by taking off the rear end of this so-called battery-box. For obvious reasons the running gear is composed of four wheels instead of two, as in the ordinary cab, and their appearance, to say the least, is striking. Aside from the small diameter and extremely massive construction, they are fitted with immense pneumatic tires five inches in diameter, made up of rubber stock from five-eighths to one inch thick. These tires are pumped to a pressure of about eighty pounds. Another radical departure from ordinary practice is embodied in the arrangement of the front wheels as drivers, the vehicle being steered by the rear wheels. Each cab is fitted with two two-horse-power electric motors, one of which is geared to each driving wheel. The motors are entirely encased, and are attached to the axle adjacent to the wheels. The steering gear is entirely different from that of the horse-drawn vehicle. Each steering wheel revolves on a short axle pivoted close to the hub on an axle tree, so that it turns on an independent pivot. The two short steering axles are, however, connected together by various rods, so that both wheels move together.

The up-to-date "cabby" is seated on top of the battery-box, from which point the various controlling levers are easily accessible to him. Under his seat is the so-called controller. From this device, which is simply a peculiar electric switch for connecting the battery with the motor for various speeds, a handle projects upward on the left side of the driver's seat, so that by moving this lever forward from its normal position the batteries and motors are variously connected, and several speeds result. In front is a long lever which is connected with the steering gear. A movement of this lever forward or backward moves the steering wheels correspondingly to the right or left. Close to this steering lever is the brake treadle, which is moved by the cab-operator's foot and causes a strong brake to be applied directly to each motor. So positive is the action of this mechanism that the vehicle may be stopped within its length even when running at full speed. In ordinarily operating the cab, it is necessary to use these three controlling levers only, but to reverse the vehicle a switch is operated by the heel of the foot, which arranges the motors so as to operate in the reverse direction. The automobile cabman needs no hitching-post. Should he leave his seat, he carries away with him the safety-switch handle, by removing which the connection between the battery and motor is broken, and the cab cannot be started. As long as cabby attends to this part of his duty, runaway electric cabs will probably remain a rarity. This switch also serves as an emergency stop when running. In case of necessity, it is operated by a kick, thus instantly stopping the motors.

The batteries for each cab are held in a single tray or box, which is loaded into or unloaded from the cab by machinery. Each set of batteries for a single cab weighs about twelve hundred pounds. The cabs are fitted with electric side-lights outside, and electric reading-lamps inside.

Loaded with a fresh battery equipment, the electric cab can travel from twenty-five to thirty miles over the streets of New York. Its mission accomplished, the cab returns to the station, and probably requires recharging of the batteries.

In London and Paris this is done without removing the batteries from the vehicle, which, accordingly, must remain out of service for the hour or two necessary for the operation, often in the busiest time of the day. In New York, however, ingenious and powerful machinery removes the exhausted batteries and substitutes a set fully charged, with a facility which is amazing even to the expert.



The electric-vehicle service has for its home the old Michaux Club House, on Broadway near Fifty-third Street. The building is a large rinklike structure extending through from Broadway to Seventh Avenue, with an available ground area of 200×80 feet. With the exception of a small section about fifteen feet wide at each end of the building, for offices, waiting-rooms, repair shops, etc., the entire interior space is devoted to the manipulation of the cabs and their equipment.

Almost two-thirds of the large open interior is covered by a heavy steel pillar and girder construction, which on the ground-floor forms the so-called battery-room, and on the floor above serves as storage space for vehicles not in actual service. The front of the battery-room faces the main entrance, on Broadway. Here the cab loading and unloading machinery is located, and the batteries are carried from their resting-place to this point, and returned by an immense electric crane, which spans the battery-room from side to side—a distance of forty feet. This crane moves the entire length of the battery-room, on heavy girders forming the top of the side pillars. The batteries are placed on stands arranged in eight long rows, and, corresponding thereto, the crane is equipped with eight electric hoists, one over each row, so that a box of batteries is lifted bodily by the automatic hoisting grapple, and then carried by the crane to or from the loading table, which extends across the entire front end of the battery-room. This table is really a conveying-belt arrangement, intended to shift the battery placed thereon so that it is brought into position for either loading into the cabs or lifting by the hoists on the crane.

The vehicle to have its battery removed, or a new battery loaded, is backed up to one of the two platforms so that the opened end of the battery-compartment is against the loading table. These platforms are really a sort of double flat car, with their tops on a level with the floor, and arranged so that car and vehicle may be moved from side to side. In this position, the further handling of the cab and batteries for loading and unloading is entirely under the control of the crane-operator, who, from his cage suspended midway from the crane, has moved the crane so as to place himself directly behind the conveyer table. Here he has the hydraulic valves for operating the loading machinery. A turn of one valve, and the vehicle is shifted into proper horizontal position by the hydraulic cylinders on each side, and the operation of another valve actuates the hydraulic lifting-jack beneath the vehicle, and raises the body from its supporting springs. Having aligned the vehicle with the loading table, a hydraulic plunger directly behind the table is set into action. Out it shoots across the conveyer table, grips the battery-box still in the vehicle, and, by another turn of the valve by the operator, pulls it out upon the table. A pull on an adjacent lever starts the electric motor operating the conveyer table into action, and the removed battery is shifted under any one of the eight crane hoists. Now the crane machinery begins to play its part. A turn of an electric switch, and down comes the hoisting grapple, grips the battery-box, raises it from the table, and the operation of the crane motor now carries it back into the battery-room, where it is lowered to its respective charging table and automatically connected with the charging wires. When, however, it is intended to load the vehicle with another battery, the crane-operator, before bringing the crane to the loading table, picks up a fresh battery from its stand, and after having raised the old set from the conveyer, lowers the new, shifts it into position in line with the vehicle, and pushes it into the battery-compartment by the hydraulic plunger. All that now remains is to release the hydraulic aligning apparatus, and the freshly charged cab is ready to depart. The writer has seen a cab come in from the street, enter the loading platform, and go out again, all inside of four minutes. The perfection of modern mechanism is beautifully illustrated by the fact that the one man in the crane cage operates the entire composite machine, and the observer can scarcely appreciate that the removal and replacing of a battery equipment means the shifting about of two parcels weighing about twelve hundred pounds each.

If a vehicle is to be put out of service after being unloaded, it is moved from the loading platform by a couple of workmen, thoroughly washed and cleaned, and then lifted to the storage-floor by the rear electric elevator. When wanted again, it is lowered by another elevator, further in front, and shifted to the loading position. Electric current for charging the batteries is obtained from the Edison wires, which are brought into the building, and an elaborate switchboard for controlling the current is located on the wall adjacent to the main entrance, while the actual charging of the batteries is automatically provided for by other electrical appliances in the battery-room.

JOSEPH SACHS.

STEAMER "PORTLAND," OF THE PORTLAND STEAM PACKET LINE, LOST OFF THE COAST OF MASSACHUSETTS IN THE SEVERE STORM OF NOVEMBER 27, WITH ALL ON BOARD—AT LEAST 160 PERSONS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

BISMARCK'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.*

I.

In Wagner's operas which form the Nibelungen tetralogy the "Giant's motive" with its suggestion of elemental strength, and in his "Parsifal" the "Klingsor motive" with its suggestion of the wizard's castle of enchantment, occur only here and there, and in contrast with wholly different motives and themes—love-songs of men and birds, even choruses of flower-maidens who tempt young Parsifal—"flowers the enchanter plucks in spring, fragrant spirits growing here in summer and sun."

Now fancy an opera containing giants' and wizards' motives in great variety, but almost nothing weaker, very little that is less significant. Such an opera would correspond, in the world of music, to these Thoughts and Reflections. In all literature the work has not its fellow, unless one goes back to the Latin classics, and finds in Cæsar's De Bello Gallico the same chance to be at a great leader's side and in his confidence while tracing the course of important events. The massiveness of Bismarck's thought has its full effect. The sentences march like an army, coming to the point with certainty, but from many sides at once. The reader is conscious of immediate contact with an epoch-making personality, compares biography with autobiography, and gratefully realizes that, in the latter form, his contemplation of a great life cannot be disturbed by the intrusion of a little biographer with his own little "thoughts and recollections." The reader wants to be the only little man present.

And quite beyond the selfish enjoyment of this companionship lies a fact that soon becomes almost startlingly apparent: we must study our Bismarck all over again, from the beginning, forgetting much that we have fancied we knew about him. His own statements, not merely in regard to motives and relations with contemporaries, but as to some of the most important facts connected with the consolidation and expansion of Germany, tempt us to make a new application of the saying, vere scire est per causas scire: to know truly how the new German Empire was created, we must know Bismarck's life as it is now revealed with authority for the first time.

An impression that may not seem of equal importance or interest to everybody is one a careful reader cannot miss in these columns touching Bismarck's Americanism. "It has never seemed to me that noble birth could compensate for lack of ability," he says. In chapter iii., he complains that Friedrich Wilhelm IV. lets slip opportunities to control current events—the vital things—because of a fantastic attachment to certain methods of procedure—mere questions of form. In chapter iv. we find Bismarck ready to turn his hand to anything at a moment's notice, with American adaptability. Manteuffel asked him, quite unexpectedly, whether he would accept a foreign mission, and the reply was, simply, "Yes." Thereupon the King sent for him, and said, "You have a great deal of courage to undertake so unconditionally an office for which you have not been specially trained." "I replied," says Bismarck: "'The courage is all on the side of your Majesty ....I have the courage to obey, if you have the courage to command.'" It would be easy to cite many other passages proving that precisely those characteristics which differentiated Bismarck from his diplomatic associates and made him often an enigma to them, now make him appear to have been more like one of ourselves. Americans will win much nearer to him than ever before, and those who like to find a timely note in every new book will presently be saying that Bismarck's story shows what thorough training is required to make a statesman, what courses of study, what patient preparation, will fit our young men for the public service, now that our territory is to be enlarged.

A rather singular thing is that there seems to have been no period in the years of Bismarck's young manhood when he deplored a lack of recognition. He instinctively knew that indifference or opposition to his plans was not to be resented, but to be studied as problems, and it is a mark of his strength from the outset that he never doubted his ability to master any problem. A single admission of sensitiveness occurs in the second volume, chapter xxi., where he says that before, during, and after the Austrian campaign of 1866 his various conflicts of opinion with the King and the military leaders had so affected him that he was in need of rest and recreation; when reviewing his relations with Friedrich Wilhelm, however, as he does in chapter xxxiii., he disclaims all sensitiveness in the most striking terms. His master, in the main, trusted and liked him—thus he reasoned within himself; explosions of anger and "irregularities" should therefore be accepted as one accepts inclement weather or a storm at sea. It is futile to struggle against the vis major; and besides, he says, he loved the man. And presently we find him confessing: "The King himself, one day in 1865, in speaking with my wife, praised the skill with which I could anticipate and—this he added after a pause—guide his intentions."

II.

These pages, written in 1891–2, deal with events from 1832 onward. It is obvious that space for the treatment of essential things in the history of Europe during sixty years could be made only by careful omission of the unessential. Bismarck takes as his starting-point the influences which determined his choice of a career—his environment at school and university, his inherited tendencies; next he shows us the young lawyer (Auscultator) waiting for a favorable opportunity to engage in Prussia's diplomatic service, and meantime accepting an assignment to divorce-court practice—in which there occurred moments of embarrassment, as when he, a boy of twenty years, attempted to reconcile an angry married couple. But he learned how to face trying situations without embarrassment. When his speech in the first united Landtag called forth a storm of opposition (1847) he kept his place in the tribune, and read a newspaper until the noise subsided. Then he finished his speech.

The action grows stronger and the narration more lively in the second chapter. The revolution of 1848 called for masterful interposition at Berlin, and Bismarck's free activity formed a striking contrast to the powerlessness of other friends of the King, fettered as they were by tradition.

Bismarck's first visit at Sans Souci, which occurred in June, 1848, did not give promise of very friendly relations with the King. After dinner the King led his unwilling guest out on the terrace, and questioning him about his disposition, etc., received gruff answers. The Queen, who had been listening from a place of concealment, came forward from the shrubbery and demanded: "How can you speak so to your King?" "Lass mich nur, Elise," said the King, and then turning to Bismarck, asked what fault he had to find with him. "The evacuation of Berlin," was the blunt answer. "That was not according to my wish," replied the King. And the Queen, who had remained within ear-shot, added, "That is not at all the King's fault; he had not been able to sleep for three days." "A King must be able to sleep," said Bismarck.

At this time Friedrich Wilhelm was already anxious to secure Bismarck's services, but we know how the latter felt in regard to this suggestion, even after the King had given him repeated and substantial proofs of his benevolence. "I was convinced," he writes, "that the position of minister to the King would prove untenable for me. He regarded me as an egg that he himself had laid and hatched, and he would always have had the idea, when it came to differences of opinion, that the egg wanted to be cleverer than the hen." In other words, although this is not expressed in our text, Bismarck decided not to assume the dependent relation until his own growing reputation should have assured him a further measure of independence. What the King thought of him at this time is shown in the royal letter of introduction (June 5, 1852) to the Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria, in which the writer says that "Herr von Bismarck-Schönhausen belongs to a noble family which has been longer resident in our marches than my own, and which from the beginning, and especially in its present representative, has preserved its ancient virtues." It is rather amusing to read, in this immediate connection, that when Bismarck took to dancing for the sake of his health, the King objected. It seems that in 1849–50 the duties of his office kept Bismarck hard at work from eight o'clock until four, and sometimes later, and his need of exercise could only be satisfied at night. At one of the court balls a lady asked him to take the place of her partner, who could not be found, and after this experience of the cotillon he "enjoyed a more natural sleep than in a long time before"; and so, very properly, he continued the practice after he had become minister. His own expression is: "I did not refuse when I was invited to dance by ladies I knew or by the Princesses, but always had to hear sarcastic observations on the subject from the King, who said to me, for example: 'I am reproached with having chosen a frivolous minister. You should not strengthen the impression by dancing.' The Princesses were then forbidden to choose me for a partner."

A curious blend of diplomatic cunning with manliness is given in the fifth section of the ninth chapter. Bismarck was appointed ambassador to St. Petersburg in 1859. On the day set for his departure the banker Levinstein proposed his participation in a financial scheme which would net him twenty thousand thalers a year, on the condition that he should practically represent Austrian as well as Prussian interests at the Russian capital. Bismarck saw in this proposal an opportunity to secure for future use documentary evidence as to Austrian political methods, and so affected to consider the matter. Levinstein would not agree to make his offer in writing, but increased his bribe to thirty thousand thalers. "After I was convinced that I could not get any written evidence, I requested Levinstein to leave me, and made ready to go out. He followed me to the stairs.... Only when I called his attention to the steepness of the steps and to my physical superiority did he run down stairs ahead of me and leave me."

According to his own statement, this strong man's strongest foe was a woman, and the first passage in which he expresses his full appreciation of her hostility is perhaps the most emphatic of all. "I was obliged to recognize in Queen Augusta," he writes, "the antagonist who has most severely tested my ability to stand for what I thought my duty," and he adds that the hardest trial of his life, so far as nerves or temper was concerned, had the same source. A difficult situation is sketched in chapter vi., where he tells us that at the breakfast table the Queen made a practice of expounding her views to her husband, the subject of the "Vortrag" being letters and newspaper articles on questions of the public policy which sometimes had been inspired or edited by her for this special use. But when Bismarck took occasion to intimate that certain letters might have been procured by the Queen with the assistance of her "special politician," Herr von Schleinitz, the King, with his chivalrous sentiment, interposed absolutely in his wife's favor, and was inclined to forbid that one should believe a thing of that sort even if it were true. Little by little the minister learned to decide, in cases where his master would not consent to reasonable proposals, whether this opposition was based upon sincere conviction or was but the fulfilment of a promise made to the Queen. If the former, then there was hope of reaching an agreement and securing the necessary approval. If, on the other hand, the Queen's sharp speeches at breakfast, and the letters and articles written ad hoc, and her Majesty's insinuations that he would not sustain the views to which she had brought him "when he came to meet Bismarck" had wrung a promise from the King, then his arguments would be illogical. "Ei der Tausend!" the King would exclaim, finally, at the end of his dialectic resources; and "I knew then," Bismarck observes, "that my contest had not been with the King, but with his wife." The struggle was wellnigh life-long; now it is "König" and "Königin," again "Kaiser" and "Kaiserin," but always the same antagonism. One reads with regret that the Kaiser in the last years of his life gave up trying to keep his secret in Bismarck's presence, and referred to his wife as "the hot-head" (der Feuerkopf). By that time, no doubt, the two old friends, armed against the rest of the world, were thoroughly off their guard in confidential talks with each other. But Bismarck's account of his relations with this lady, whom he elsewhere characterizes as "courageous, sustained by a high sense of duty," closes with an exquisite touch. Her last letter to him was dated December 24, 1888. Bismarck notices that "the signature is in her own hand, but very different from the firm characters in which the Kaiserin used formerly to write."

It is especially in connection with the Empress Augusta that Bismarck records the oppressive sense of the superiority of French and English civilization that prevailed among Germans. She was the most brilliant of all those who held that a Frenchman, and even more an Englishman, by virtue of his nationality and birth, was superior to the German—was a "vornehmeres Wesen."

Of course Bismarck's whole thoroughbred nature protested against this conviction, not merely as a heresy, but even as treachery to the German national cause, which he had made his own. It is amusing to see what comfort he took in the misconduct of guests at Versailles when he visited Count Hatzfeldt at Paris in the summer of 1855. He "retired with the comforting impression that... the breeding and manners of the courtiers at home... were on a higher plane than in Paris, and that the time had passed for taking a thorough course in politeness and good behavior in France."

III.

Far and away the most absorbing portions of the whole story are those that enable the reader to trace the growth of this German national sentiment into a conviction so absolute that at the last, when the critical moment before the war of 1870–1 arrived, Bismarck stood practically alone, upholding the nation's honor when the King and his generals despaired. France had been hunting for a cause of war against Prussia of such a nature that the other German states would not be drawn into the conflict, and thought she had found such a pretext in the dispute touching the Spanish succession, for the candidate approved in Germany and Spain itself bore the name Hohenzollern. Bismarck's brief and clear analysis of the situation in 1870, as it is presented in volume ii., chapter xxii., puts the intolerable character of Louis Napoleon's pretentions and the "international shamelessness" of his methods in the clearest light. But the Prussian King and Queen, far from having an intimation of Sedan, feared another Jena, and would have kept the peace, no matter what humiliation a peaceful course involved. Was there ever such a lack of genuine information in respect to the actual state of affairs? Consider for a moment what was happening at the same time, say, on that July 18, when Bismarck, Count Roon, and von Moltke sat at table, and when the famous despatch from Ems was received. Bismarck says that when he questioned Moltke in regard to military preparations the general replied that if war was inevitable he could see no advantage in delaying its outbreak: in his opinion, it would, on the whole, be more advantageous to let hostilities begin quickly than to postpone them. Bismarck accepted this statement with implicit confidence, and he gives in full the considerations that led him to the conclusion that war could be avoided only at the cost of Prussian honor and Prussian leadership among German states. But in Prussian honor and in the confidence which Prussia invited and inspired the hope of Germany was placed. The cause of German nationality was at stake.

Now the Ems despatch, really a communication from the King, though signed by Abeken, showed a vacillating spirit and a disposition to prolong negotiations at Berlin, and yet it was in part courageous enough. Bismarck edited it; omitted all that savored of yielding; retained all that sounded most courageous; telegraphed the revised message to all the German embassies, and gave it to the press for publication. "Now that has a different sound," said Moltke. "It sounded like a parley before; now like a fanfare in reply to a challenge." "We must fight...," said Bismarck.

Friedrich Wilhelm had been conducting the negotiations in person, without consulting his minister. In other words, the executive in whose hands was all the power to offer peace or war did not correct his wholly erroneous impressions as to the relative strength of the French and German armies. He regarded the French military power as incomparably superior, and his own forces as so inadequate that nothing less than acceptance of French insult and withdrawal before French threats could prevent his losing the laurels won in '66. Such was his view. The facts were that the French army was unprepared, and his own probably the most efficient that the world had ever known. "He was seventy-three years old," says Bismarck, "and he loved peace.... I have been told that Queen Augusta implored her husband, with tears, before he left Ems for Berlin, to remember Jena and Tilsit, and to avert the war. I regard the report as credible—all but the tears."

We know also, though not from these pages, how thoroughly Louis Napoleon was deceived in respect to the effective strength and equipment of his army. It would seem, in view of these disclosures, that the monarchical form of government is not perfectly adapted to the conduct of war. In the twenty-third chapter (vol. ii.) we read of a lack of siege-guns in the Prussian army before Paris, unnecessary delay in forwarding ammunition and guns to the front, etc., as at Santiago.

But we must not leave the party of three who met at Bismarck's table on that 13th of July without noting the effect produced when the revised Ems despatch was read aloud. Moltke and Roon had been so depressed at the prospect of their King's yielding to France that they scorned food and drink. When they heard the words, "We must fight," and the other hearty words that followed, in which Bismarck explained that there was really no further doubt about the matter, "they suddenly got back the desire to eat and drink, and spoke gayly...." Moltke's tranquil passivity was laid aside; his usual moderation in speech was forgotten; he looked up toward the ceiling and smote his breast, as he said, "If I live to see that—to lead our army in such a war—as soon as it's over, the devil may take this old carcass, for all I care!"

I have been looking through the letters that have been published from Emperor William I. to Bismarck, and notice that the usual conclusion is, Ihr dankbarer (grateful) Wilhelm.

Until one gets used to the heavy tread, it seems almost as though a giant were walking—as we hold the book in our hands and forget the page in realizing the scenes and letting the actors live, and ourselves living with them. But the colossal figure is well proportioned, not clumsy and unskilful, in the usual fashion of the tribe of giants. And so of the book we may say that it is an adequate expression of great themes—deliberate, full, judicial in style as the subject requires in the main, and yet proving that the writer possessed a really wonderful adaptability, exemplified in some of the passages in a lighter vein which we have cited.

MARRION WILCOX.

* Bismarck the Man and the Statesman. Written and Dictated by Himself after his Retirement from Office. Volumes I. and II. New York: Harper & Brothers. Gedanken und Erinnerungen, etc. The present review is based upon the advance sheets of the German edition.

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

A CANADIAN SUGGESTION.

Sir J. D. Edgar, Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons, suggests that England should cede the island of Jamaica to Uncle Sam in exchange for one of the Eastern States.—DAILY PAPER.

Good for Sir J. D. Edgar! What a wondrous man is he!
A statesman past all question, and of glorious policy.
He'd give our nation ginger, if we'll give to his a State,
But just which one he'd like to have he does not indicate.

Can it be Maine, Sir Edgar wants? We can't believe it so,
Unless it be this Baronet is blind, and does not know
That up in Maine they've got a chap of genius rich and rare,
Who'd send him flying speedily from out the Speaker's chair.

New Hampshire? For a moment just suppose we acquiesce,
And Canada gets Chandler—it is much more than a guess,
With Chandler to digest, the realm will surely need to take Quite all the stock of ginger that Jamaica well can make.

Vermont? Where once Green Mountain boys laid Edgar's fellows out?
Shall Yankees let a loyalty that's never known a doubt
Go from their midst at any price—for any fabled sum?
Not even for a corner in your grand old stock of rum!

Perhaps it's Massachusetts that has caught the Speaker's eye—
The grand old brainy Commonwealth whose name shall never die.
Egad! we'll never part with that, Sir Edgar may be sure,
For if we did, what would become of Yankee literature?

Shall old Hosea Biglow become a mere Kanuck?
Is mere colonial fame indeed to be Longfellow's luck?
Are Dr. Holmes, and Emerson, and treasured Hawthorne too,
To be swapped off for Edgar's folk of dark and swarthy hue?

Connecticut? No, never! While Mark Twain doth pace the earth
We are not going to part with this fair home of cherished mirth.
A cry would rise to heaven that should make us all desist
From ever turning Twain into a British Humorist!

And Rhody? Little Rhody? Pretty baby-boy of States—
We'll never let dear Rhody go a-wandering from our gates.
The mass would ne'er condone an act whose very nature robs
Them of beloved Newport and its azure-blooded nobs.

And so it seems not feasible, this plan of Sir J. D.
We cannot do without our East, as far as we can see;
But if the failure of his scheme is going to make him blue,
To swap for old Jamaica how would Blackwells Island do?

JOHN KENDRICK BANGS.

PUERTO RICO.

THE HOME LIFE OF THE PEOPLE.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

IT is a hospitality highly seasoned with garlic and sweet-oil which the true-born Puertoriqueño proffers to Americans, but it is no less beautiful in sentiment, for all of its odoriferousness.

Perhaps never before in history have a foreign people, who talk an alien language, and who have been trained under a monarchical system for centuries, so gladly and with open hands extended welcome to a nation who differed from them in physique, customs, habits of thinking, and religion, as have the Spanish-speaking Puertoriqueños received the Americans. That some of this evident display of friendship is due to politic motives on the part of individuals is no less true, but it would be a mean and small spirit which would attribute to mercenary motives alone the constant extension of the right hand of good-fellowship which has met the army on all sides since its advent on the island.

There are many circumstances which have combined to bring about a felicitous relationship with America. For centuries Puerto Rico has lain in the grasp of the military; a few and much-favored number of men controlled the political and financial reins of the island, to their own personal betterment and self-aggrandizement. They kept down in poverty those who could be of little use to them by the basest and most open discrimination. They built up those who were willing to share their daily profits of hard labor with the gold and lace bedecked, and yet even those who were successful through their fawning upon the governmental representatives were not at all sure that their tenure of favor would be continuous. In a sentence, it has always been possible for the politico-military body, in whose hands rested the fate of the island population, to make a man powerful and rich and to beggar him as easily.

The process has brought about a social and financial condition in Puerto Rico not possible in the United States, and quite incomprehensible to our people. It has meant abject poverty to the great mass of the inhabitants. It has meant almost as low a rate of wage for the laboring-classes as in China. It has meant that the poor man can never be a landholder. It has meant that the land-owner, unless in high favor, must grind the vitals out of his peons, with scant profit to himself, after government excises and official tips have been paid. It has meant that a few, a very few, might become rich and prosperous, and it has meant, most of all, that no one, except the handful of men in despotic power, has had the slightest voice in moulding the laws governing a million people.

It is little wonder, then, that these same people stretch out their weak hands in joy, with the manacles riven at last, toward a government whose very spirit is supposed to breathe the perfume of individual freedom. May we meet the expectations of these people in full, and may the greed of American legislators and American financiers do no overt act which will lower the standard of our government as the Puertoriqueños fancy it.

There is a handful of Spanish malcontents in Puerto Rico—men who hate American institutions, men who have been favored under the old régime, who bitterly dislike the change; but how large this element really is will probably never be known, as it is masked under the Spanish smile of approbation, always ready to stab in the back.

The home life of well-to-do natives is extremely simple, due largely to the fact that excessive duties, lack of transportation facilities, and abominable roads—except the military roads—have militated against the introduction into their homes of the comforts which we consider so essential to life.

Even the finest haciendas are meagre and barren in their interior fittings. The floors are always bare. The walls have few pic-

(Continued on page 1212.)

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

FOOD FOR INFANTS.

THE Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk, as a baby food from the hour of birth, stands without a competitor, presenting as it does the most perfect preparation of milk for the use of infants.—[Adv.]

"VIOLETS OF THE CZAR."

How true it is that a name rightly chosen is a sure, guarantee of success! At this hour, when throwing as food to the attentive mind of man the most beautiful dream of humanity which an Emperor could conceive, the Czar, already so great, becomes idolized in the eyes of all nations, for, emanating from the soft and beautiful flowers of the Russian soil, a fragrant perfume spreads itself all over the world, fills it with its troubling breath, and conquers all women by its permeating sweetness: it is the "VIOLETS OF THE CZAR," that subtle perfume from the great Parisian firm, ORIZA-LEGRAND, whose universal vogue is now so easily explained.—[Adv.]

USE BROWN'S Camphorated Saponaceous DENTIFRICE for the TEETH. 25 cents a jar.—[Adv.]

INDIGESTION an unknown quantity where Abbott's—The Original Angostura Bitters—is the adopted tonic. —[Adv.]

No Christmas Table is complete without Dr. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS, the finest appetizer. —[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

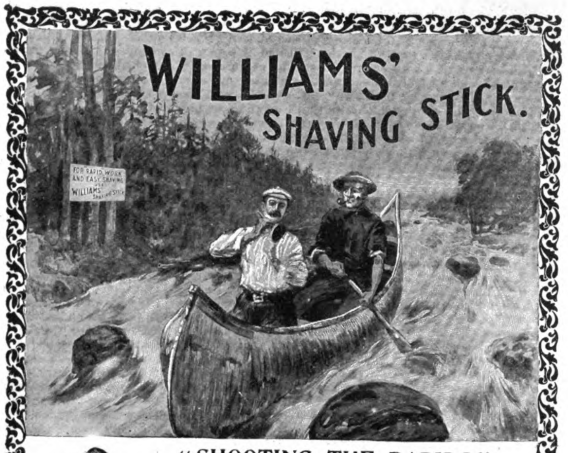
American People are proud to acknowledge as their own the superb American product—



GREAT WESTERN Champagne

Pure, palatable, purchasable. No fancy price for a foreign label. Will be served, if you call for it, at all first-class cafes, clubs, and buffets.

The present vintage is especially pleasing and extra dry.

PLEASANT VALLEY WINE CO., SOLE MAKERS, Rheims, - N. Y.

Sold by { H. KIRK & CO., New York. S. S. PIERCE CO., Boston.

"SHOOTING THE RAPIDS"

is often very risky business. Trust only in an experienced guide—one with a cool head and a strong arm.

SHAVING is risky, too, unless you have just the right shaving soap. In many soaps, disease germs, rank poison, smarting and burning sensations are the Hidden Rocks that threaten your safety, health, and comfort. Don't shave with soaps you know nothing about. Trust only in shaving soaps of known purity and long-established reputation.

You can always rely on the absolute purity and safety of WILLIAMS' SHAVING SOAPS, while the rich, cooling lather insures a degree of ease, comfort and luxury in shaving afforded by no other soaps.

Does your barber use WILLIAMS' SOAP? Do you?

Williams' Soaps sold everywhere, but sent by mail if your dealer does not supply you.

Williams' Shaving Stick, 25 cents. Genuine Yankee Shaving Soap, 10 cents.
Luxury Shaving Tablet, 25 cents. Swiss Violet Shaving Cream, 50 cents.
Williams' Shaving Soap (Barbers'), 6 round cakes, 1 lb., 40c. Exquisite also for Toilet. Trial Cake for 2c. Stamp.

THE J. B. WILLIAMS CO., GLASTONBURY, CONN.
London, 64 Great Russell St., W. C. Sydney, Australia, 161 Clarence St

A better Cocktail at home than is served over any bar in the World.

THE CLUB COCKTAILS

MANHATTAN, MARTINI, WHISKEY, HOLLAND GIN, TOM GIN, VERMOUTH and YORK.

We guarantee these Cocktails to be made of absolutely pure and well matured liquors and the mixing equal to the best cocktails served over any bar in the world. Being compounded in accurate proportions, they will always be found of uniform quality.

Connoisseurs agree that of two cocktails made of the same material and proportions the one which is aged must be the better.

Try our YORK Cocktail made without any sweetening—dry and delicious.

For Sale on the Dining and Buffet Cars of the principal railroads of the U. S.

AVOID IMITATIONS.

For Sale by all Druggists and Dealers.

G. F. HEUBLEIN & BRO., Sole Props.,
39 Broadway, N. Y., Hartford, Conn. 20 Piccadilly, W. London, Eng.

THE CHRISTMAS NUMBER OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY"

will be published next week, and will be the regular issue for December 17. It will contain forty-four pages, including an illuminated cover, a double-page Supplement in colors drawn by HOWARD PYLE; a Christmas story by FRANK R. STOCKTON, with colored illustrations by ALBERT E. STERNER; a Ghost Story by JOHN KENDRICK BANGS, illustrated by G. VERBEEK; a Cuban Christmas Story by HEZEKIAH BUTTERWORTH, illustrated by HENRY MCCARTER; full-page Christmas Drawings by ROSINA EMMET SHERWOOD, W. A. ROGERS, F. S. CHURCH, H. C. CHRISTY, H. M. WILDER and TAPPAN ADNEY; besides the usual news features and regular departments.

BOKER'S BITTERS

The oldest and best Specific against dyspepsia; an appetizer and a promoter of digestion.

Ask your Grocer, Liquor Dealer, or Druggist.

PATENT secured or money all returned. Search free. Collamer & Co., 1036 F St., Wash., D. C.

For Xmas Presents

"Taylor's EVERY TIME" JUSTLY CELEBRATED BONBONS CHOCOLATES

Large Assortment of Fancy Boxes and Baskets. By mail or express. 863 Broadway, New York.

SEND 1, 2, 3, or 5 Dollars and Candies will be packed and shipped any desired date.

THE CELEBRATED SOHMER

Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.

Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade. Our name spells—

S—O—H—M—E—R

New York Warerooms SOHMER BUILDING Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(Continued from page 1211.)

tures, though now and then one is surprised to see a clever paintings by one of the masters of the modern French school. The usual wall decoration affected is a pair of Spanish bass-reliefs in colored plaster or papier-maché. Chromos and vilely executed wood-cuts often make an appearance, and seem frightfully out of touch with the oftentimes beautiful architectural finish of the drawing-rooms, whose wide doorless archways are framed in carved woods and relieved of severity by scroll latticework.

Marble-topped mahogany tables with carved legs occupy the centres of the rooms. On them are flowering plants, vases of artificial flowers, and the photograph-album, and above the table is a hanging-lamp or chandelier, usually of cut glass, with a profusion of swinging prisms, sometimes gaudily decorated with bright-colored ribbons or festooned with artificial vines and flowers.

Cane-seated furniture is used exclusively. The great rolling rocking-chairs constitute the principal furniture, with a sprinkling of straight-backed chairs and cane settees. Many of these chairs would set the lover of novel forms and finely carved furniture wild, for numbers of them are rare antiques handed down for generations. The woods of the carved furniture are heavy and highly polished, while the more modern is lighter, without carving, depending upon the twisted and bent frames for beauty, and it is invariably painted a rich black.

Incongruous decoration is seen in every home, in the way of cheap porcelain vases, covered dishes with moulded figures upon them, antimacassars and tidies on the chairs, while in the doorways hang the cheapest of cheap lace curtains, held back by brass chains, with perhaps near by some pieces of wonderful hand-made native lace or drawn-work.

The mathematical precision with which all the furniture is placed in a well-regulated household always creates a thrill of horror in the æsthetic breast. Around the centre table, equally spaced, are the great rocking-chairs; against one wall, like guarding sentries, are the straight-backed chairs; while flat against the other wall is placed a cane couch or two. Even in the governor's summer palace this primness in furniture arrangement was found. Out on the broad balconies encased in closed white shutters, the beautiful chairs were also ranged down the side walls, with the tables in the centre, for all the world like a dairy lunch-room.

The beds of brass and metal are dreams in design, covered with canopies of lace, having auxiliary mosquito-netting, gathered up on the top during the day and let down at night. Wardrobes, and not closets, are used for clothes. Heavy carved dressing-tables, bureaus, and wash-stands are often seen, but to the majority these have been too great luxuries. Now and then one sees mirrors framed in heavy antique frames, which are delightful in their symmetry.

Bad soap is found everywhere, and a single comb and brush seem to meet the needs of the family. One seldom sees manicure sets, though the powder-puff and rouge are in evidence in every well-conducted house. The lack of toilet articles, dressing-stands, chiffonniers, and pier-glasses is painful to those who are familiar with the profusion of implements of dainty toilet.

The dining-room is always quite bare, with the exception of the table, and perhaps a side table, which holds the multitude of dishes for an ordinary dinner.

The kitchen has much of interest and novelty, and much dirt and many squalid children, which it is better not to see near meal-time. Modern ranges are seldom a portion of the culinary furniture, and when they do make an appearance they subserve the end of a quick-baking apparatus, in lieu of the slowly heated brick ovens of an older period. Every house has its charcoal cooking-pit, built out of brick, waist-high, the top of the bench being covered with a series of small square grated holes, over which pots and kettles and frying-pans are placed. The charcoal fire, in a country where coal is expensive and gas unknown, is an ideal fuel for cooking foods. It makes a quick hot fire with a minimum amount of fuel, and the many small holes permit a large number of dishes to be cooked and kept hot at the same time.

The opinion of most of the volunteer privates who have seen duty in Puerto Rico is that the population consists of a lot of Dugos linked together to see how much they can raise the price of every commodity, and to steal everything they can lay their hands upon. A striking exception among enlisted men to this state of feeling were the Fourth Ohio boys, who went home gladly, but with regret at leaving a people who did everything they could for their comfort. Their good fortune was the result of a kindly spirit, which imbued the entire regiment, exhibited toward the native population, and reciprocated in full meed by them. There is no intention to criticise other organizations, for the men lived hard lives in a hot climate, and were homesick and discontented, but there has been shown over and over again a wilful malice by a certain type of volunteers, resulting in ordering and cuffing the natives about, as if they considered them conquered animals instead of human allies and friends. This conduct in a few towns has thrown the volunteers out of touch with a people who, from habit at least, if not from better feeling, are inclined to show courtesy and graciousness to the military.

Those whose actions have been tinged with good intentions toward the native population have received a cheerful welcome, which has made many a lonely heart feel that service in Puerto Rico was not all hardship.

The officers have always been received in the best houses, where they have shown themselves appreciative of hospitality extended in a manner not known even in the United States. Everything in the Puertoriqueñohouses has been theirs—from the host's horses to his underwear and collar-buttons. His entertainers struggle to cook American dishes, and swell with pride when they obtain American fruits, cheese, and crackers for their tables.

A swell dinner in a Puertoriqueño home is a trying gastronomic ceremony. The menu is made up of astonishing viands, and the dishes seem to follow no conventional sequence in their procession to the table. Soup is as apt to be the second or third dish as the first. Roast beef and beefsteak are served at most unheard-of moments. The disastrous effect of a meat diet in tropical climes has been dwelt upon by medical experts, yet at one dinner no less than eight meat dishes were served — combinations of bacon, of ham, of kidney, of beef, and of chicken.

The following is the menu of a dinner given to two Americans by a rich sugar-planter: Fried eggs and two fried corn-cakes. Vegetable soup filled with garlic. "Gondinga" (a hash made of chopped kidneys and liver, seasoned with garlic and split olives). Larded beef, cooked juiceless and hard, flavored with garlic and oil. Beefsteak, onions, and garlic, fried in oil, and served in overdone fragments. Potatoes, sweet and Irish. Rice and scrambled eggs. Guava jelly in rectangular blocks. Cocoanut and brown sugar. American apples and cream cheese. Coffee and cigars. Champagne.

Claret was served through the entire dinner, and the coffee was either black or served with hot milk. Broken bread was kept always at hand.

There are many queer dishes—for example, vermicelli soup with whole pork chops, sausages, and tomatoes incorporated made its appearance on one table; on another was a boned goose stuffed with sweet red peppers, olives, and garlic; at still another, roast chicken stuffed with sausages, and the usual olives and garlic.

Sweet peppers bathed in olive oil are a common relish.

Garavansa, a succulent pea, not unlike a cooked chestnut in flavor, is a national Spanish dish. Frijoles, the Spanish red bean, comes on as a separate course. A number of dulces or sweetmeats are used, the oddest one being peanut taffy with chopped garlic.

Deviled land-crabs are a novel dish, and would be pleasant tasting minus the olive oil.

Aguacotas, or alligator-pear, a salad-plant, is eaten often in one of the earlier courses, with salt, pepper, and olive oil or wine vinegar.

Oranges and small bananas form another dinner course. Dry native goat-cheese, hand made, is used very commonly and widely. Sweet-potato soup is good and nourishing. The bread is generally better than ours, and is a close approximate to French bread.

Dinner is served, one article of food at a time, and the plates, knives, and forks are changed each time. At least a dozen such changes take place during a single meal.

Smoking goes on at the table, with the ladies present, and unfinished cigars are carried into the drawing-room.

The table decorations consist of a huge bouquet of native flowers, which are magnificent in their profusion and variety.

Napkins, where used, are generally as large as towels, but in many of the interior towns table-linen is at a premium, and it is slightly shocking to catch a pretty black-eyed señorita slyly wiping her rose-bud mouth on the edge of the table-cloth.

Rum, white wines, and cognac are brought out before and after dinner, and at any time the host may think the American taste craves stimulation, though in the daily life of the average Puertoriqueño he is remarkably abstemious, drinking perhaps before dinner a brandy and water, and before breakfast a little white wine.

The native early-morning meal is a cup of coffee with milk—addiction to the black-coffee habit does not exist on the island—and a piece of bread. Breakfast is served at eleven or twelve o'clock, and is seldom elaborate, unless guests are in the house. Boiled eggs, bread, and coffee satisfy the ordinary man, but the hungry man eats his garlicky beefsteak in addition.

Dinner is the meal of the day, and is eaten between six and seven o'clock. This is the native's only full heavy meal, and this fact may account for his ability to eat a quantity of food which leaves the average American a victim to indigestion and remorse.

The positions of honor at a dinner table are, among the older and non-travelled residents, in the following order: the head of the table to the most distinguished guest; the rest, in the order of their rank and importance, ranged around to the right, the host occupying the last seat after his guests. The women sit at the left of the table, all together. Among the more cultured classes the host occupies the head, the hostess the foot, the places of honor being the seats to the right and left of the host.

The evenings in the home—for instance, of an alcalde, the mayor of a town—are spent around the centre of the marble-topped table, lazily rocking to and fro in the big chairs. The men smoke their cigarettes — the women never smoke—and a flow of small-talk, filled with simple jokes and sallies, constitutes the entire evening's amusement. Where they have pianos, the daughters exhibit their limited skill on instruments which are jangled and out of tune. One never sees a book or a magazine in these houses, though in two or three of the larger cities there are many literary men. Reading is not a strong point of the island population. The women are pictures of self-complacent indolence in the evenings, though it must be understood that Puerto Rico women are far more assiduous in their interest in the household economy than are the women of the other Spanish-speaking territories of North America.

Every little comfort which these people can provide for the stranger within their gates is offered with a whole-souled cordiality that appeals to the heart by its true and unaffected ring, and, as Americans coming among them, we should remember that by meeting this spirit measure for measure we shall follow one pathway to a sincere and lasting mutuality of interests.

WILLIAM DINWIDDIE.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

OR SAMPLE CASE OF 4 BOTTLES, $5.00.
Blank cases, without marks indicating contents, when desired. All orders delivered, expressage paid.

HISTORY.—This Whisky was made in 1882 and 1883, exported in bond to Europe, and after twelve years returned to Louisville Customs Warehouse, where it was found necessary to repack it in glass, owing to the ancient and unsafe condition of the barrels, and which was done by special permit of the United States Treasury and under Government supervision.

AUG. COLDEWEY & CO., LOUISVILLE, KY.
Established 1848. Reference: Any Local Bank.

Financial

Letters of Credit. Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,
BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak.

Holidays are Kodak Days

Catalogues free at the dealers or by mail.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

THE HAIR 27th Ed., 25c. (or stamps.) Why it Falls Off, Turns Grey, and the Remedy. By Prof. HARLEY PARKER. A. N. LONG & CO., 1013 Arch St., Phila., Pa. "Every one should read this little book."—Athenæum.

Blakemore Whiskey 7 years Old.

NOTHING BETTER MADE OR SOLD.

Matured in wood and bottled in bond under Governmental Supervision.

If your dealer hasn't it, send us TWELVE DOLLARS, and we will have sent to your address by express prepaid a sample case containing TWELVE BOTTLES.

Freiberg & Workum,
Cincinnati, O.

The Ideal Sight Restorer.

A MOST VALUABLE AND SUITABLE PRESENT. THE INESTIMABLE BLESSING OF SIGHT. AVOID SPECTACLES, HEADACHE AND SURGICAL OPERATION. READ ILLUSTRATED TREATISE ON THE EYE. PAMPHLET MAILED FREE.
THE IDEAL COMPANY,
239 BROADWAY, N. Y.

The Berkshire Hills Sanatorium,

FOR THE SCIENTIFIC TREATMENT OF CANCER

Tumors, and all Forms of Malignant and Benign Growths,

Without the use of the Knif

THE LARGEST AND BEST EQUIPPED PRIVATE INSTITUTION IN THE WOR

We have never failed to effect a permanent cure where we ha had a reasonable opportunity for treatment.

Please state your case as clearly as possible and our book w complete information will be mailed free. Address,

Drs. W. E. Brown & Son, North Adams, Mas

HARPER'S thoroughly revised and classified, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents. CATALOGU

Guerlain Most Exquisite Retail Perfumery
15, RUE DE LA PAIX, PARIS
Catalogue post free on application.

The elegant and fashionable Parisian World uses:
Eaux de Cologne: Hégémonienne, Impériale, Russe, Ambrée.
Scents: Baume de Violette, le Jardin de mon Curé, Vere Novo, Jadis.
Supoceti, special soap for the face: Maréchale, Duchesse, Violette, Pao Rosa.
Powder for the face: Ladies in all climates Pink, Yellow, White.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AMATEUR SPORT

THE MOST SATISFACTORY EXHIBIT of the out-door athletic year, which may be said to close with the football season, was the unusually intelligent attitude of the press and the public towards sport—amateur and professional. Hitherto unreasoning partisanship and unreasonable prejudice have provided two irreconcilable elements—one that would see nothing beneficial and one that could see nothing harmful in sport. A few passing ills of the game closed the eyes of the first to all its vigorous beneficial virtues, and impulsive exaltation of those virtues and improvident partisanship have as completely shut the eyes of the other to the danger attending immoderate athletic indulgence.

Both were ignorant, both garrulous and unconvincing. Neither evinced any conception of the potentialities of sport healthfully and sensibly conducted; or of its influence upon the physical and moral welfare of Young America; or of obvious accomplishments in a wholesome direction, and the promise of eventual well-being that was assured by the character of men who had interested themselves in the work.

Since the dangers of the football craze which beset us four years ago have been met and overcome, the friends of amateur sport have increased greatly in numbers and in influence. Correspondingly, knowledge of the purpose and value of sport has been spreading. The newspapers have assigned more intellectual members of their staff to the amateur branch of their sporting departments, and the public therefore reads better-written sporting news, and comment that, much more often than formerly, upholds honesty and wholesomeness, and condemns the practices that argue for mere winning at any cost.

THIS YEAR IT LOOKS as though all the better class of newspapers had at length discovered—(1) the difference between a sportsman and a sporting-man; (2) that the vigorous play of our games makes for manly, morally and physically healthful men; (3) that sport is not to be condemned because, as in every other department of human endeavor, it has shortcomings amenable to repair; (4) that the sport of sportsmen is not to be confounded with the physical efforts of cads and muckers; (5) that the destiny of college sport is in the care of those who will not tolerate its serious misdirection; (6) that dispassionate fair treatment of sport situations is better business, and certain to gain more respectful attention, than ignorance, prejudice, and hysterics—all three of which have been on view in, for instance, many an absurd and wholesale condemnation of football to which I could point.

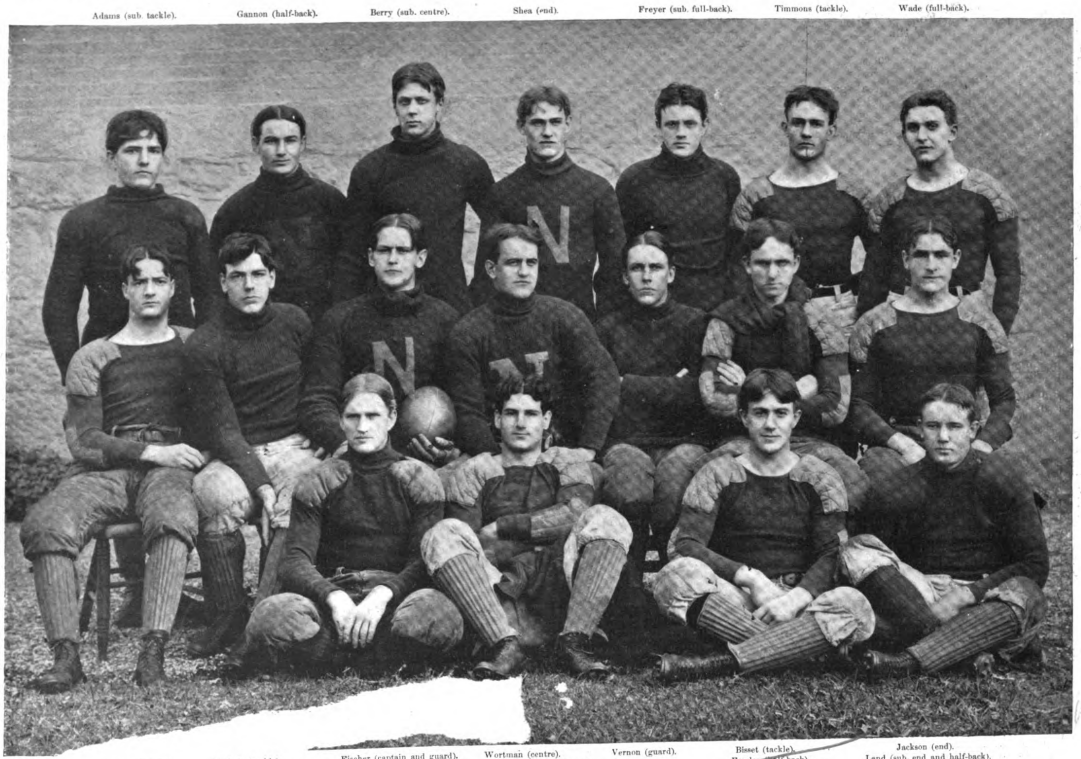
THE LAST TWO YEARS HAVE PROVED that football is neither the professionalizing nor the bone-crushing and muscle-lacerating engine some of the game's commentators proclaimed it to be in 1895. So also the evils of '95, declared by the same critics to be irremediable and disastrous, have yielded to the guiding influences that were at work even while these gentle bigoted souls shuddered in dismay over the game's present vandalism and its future dissolution. A few there were of the dailies that realized the value of sport as a wholesome element in the school and college days of our boys and young men, and their discernment was speedily rewarded by a greatly increased patronage of their sport department. There is yet seen now and again an attempt to sensationalize and bear false witness—but only by those who are reckless of facts in their madness to exaggerate or underrate that with which they are on no congenial footing—two schools of journalism whose extreme doctrines the pulsing, intelligent, self-respecting man leaves—the first, to the proletariat, whose intellectual food needs high color to be impressionable; the second, to the impotent and querulous, who, daring to venture nothing themselves, hate those with healthful minds and bodies, those that have hope and spirit and energy, and are not afraid or soured. New York suffers under the most flagrant exponents of both schools.

THE MOST PLEASING EVIDENCE of the new spirit, and the most important one, for its influence is wide, has been given by the spectators at baseball and football games during the year. Several years ago rowdyism at the professional baseball games, slugging on the football fields, and fake bicycling races excited no adverse comment among the spectators—indeed, they seemed to consider it part of the game, and to like it. I am speaking now more particularly of the West and some parts of the South. Last year there were mutterings of disapproval by the spectators on such occasions, and this year there has been no equivocal expression of opinion by the spectators where they have been the witnesses of rowdyism or slugging or faking. Here in our midst in New York we have noted the by no means uncertain exclamations of disapproval and disgust at the hoodlum spirit displayed in the professional baseball matches. Last year, when the eleven of the Kansas University gained unenviable notoriety by slugging its opponents in contests, we heard very little local comment; this year, however, we find the same college team vigorously and very generally condemned by the Missouri Valley press. Last year the spectators of Kansas University's unsportsmanlike work said nothing; this year a general disapproval was apparent during the game, and found strong expression immediately after it.

As a team largely reflects the teachings of its coach, we fear Wiley Woodruff must have been imparting to Kansas some of those methods which drew criticism upon his own first year's work on the Univ. of Penn. team.

THE SPIRIT OF THE SPECTATORS has very generally in the Middle West been emphatically against anything not fair and sportsmanly. There is no surer indication, in my opinion, of the development of a wholesome sporting spirit, of the development of the sentiment that makes for sport for sport's sake, and without which there can be no genuine growth of amateur sport. It seems to me I have never before noticed so much evidence of sport for its own sake—East and West and South—though I would not be understood as overlooking the many instances and the many directions in which the game for its own sake is an end yet to be attained.

Barring the difficulties in the Middle West among several of the larger universities, and which I expect to see work out to the good of the cause, there has been no interruption in the steady forward movement among the better college and school elements of the country. It is really very encouraging to know that the public's sense of honesty and justice has at length been aroused on the field of sport; it will lend strong support, moral and actual, to the cause of wholesome athletics.



IF IT WILL REACH CLUB ATHLETICS in the West, and particularly in Chicago, there will be cause for rejoicing. Two years ago the manager of the Chicago Athletic Club football eleven, with a great show of outraged virtue, expelled several members of his football team who had engaged with a rival club to play on its team—at so much a head—for a single game. At that time the Chicago club, through its football-manager, disclaimed professional methods, and uttered vow after vow to keep the club's teams absolutely above reproach. But the same old game of reimbursing, one way and another, men who play on its football and other teams seems quite as much in evidence as before the virtuous parade in '96.

The Chicago A. A. exercises a baneful influence throughout the entire Middle Western section by the manner in which it draws athletes into its fold. Chicago University has forbidden her athletes from taking part in club competition under the colors of any organization save those of their own university association, and Ann Arbor will shortly do likewise—to be followed, we hope, by Wisconsin and all the Eastern colleges. It is needed nearly as much around New York as around Chicago. Such legislation ought not to be necessary, but apparently it is, if the present healthful spirit just budding in Western college track and field sports is not to be stifled.

AMATEUR ATHLETICS ARE DEAD in Cleveland, and have been for four years. A rowdy spirit seems to have possession of that city in the matter of sport, and sportsmen will not attend athletic games or bicycle races. Even the decline of interest in professional baseball may be traced to rowdyism on the diamond and rowdyism on the bleachers, and because of it respectable people refuse to attend the games—another indication, by-the-way, of the vastly improved sportsmanlike spirit of the public, and one of the most encouraging signs in the campaign for amateurism. The great mass of people, I find, in the Middle West, are growing more and more interested in amateur sport, and less and less interested in professional baseball, fake bicycle matches, and the wrangles that accompany both. For this very reason it is all the more regrettable that the Chicago A. A. and the chief officials of the A. A. U. in the Middle West constantly, through their methods, act as a retarding influence upon the growth of a healthy amateur spirit.

LITTLE INTEREST IN AMATEUR SPORT is taken at Columbus and Indianapolis, while Cincinnati is beginning to show some concern—perhaps through the growth of Y.M.C.A. and other gymnasium athletics there. The most pernicious state of affairs I know of anywhere is to be found in the western Pennsylvania and eastern Ohio sections, where the Duquesne C.A.C. at Pittsburg, Greensburg A.C., Springfield, Akron, and other clubs are to be found. The arch-offenders are the Duquesne and Greensburg clubs, while an unwholesome spirit pervades most of the little towns, and even some of the colleges, of that entire section. Professionalism is in many cases open and confessed. It is exercising a most deleterious effect upon the game itself, to say nothing of the question of amateurism involved. Slugging in football is common, and in general the whole section needs a cleaning out. I shall have a great deal more to say on this subject and section later.

IT IS ENCOURAGING TO DISCOVER so much genuine interest in 'cross-country running as the individual cham-

THE FOOTBALL TEAM OF THE UNITED STATES NAVAL ACADEMY, ANNAPOLIS, MARYLAND.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

pionship revealed on Thanksgiving day. Perhaps there are no two games that have more to commend them than 'cross-country running and lacrosse; and certainly no two have received so little support from the colleges. There has been a slight movement in 'cross-country work within the last couple of years, but in the main this grand sport was left to the individual clubs. There is no department some care of the athletic clubs. There is no department of American athletics in which we are so weak. Compared with England, we are the veriest tyros; and even in Germany, just awakening to out-door sport, there is a more generally active interest than here in the United States, where 'cross-country running is among the oldest of our athletic endeavors.

And we need 'cross-country work more now, probably, than we ever did; we need it to develop distance-runners, of whom we have never had many; we need it to give our athletes stamina—the well-filled-out chests and the rounded legs that make the English athlete conspicuous, wherever he may be.

THE HABIT OF SPECIALIZATION—the fervor with which special lines of development are followed to the exclusion of all others—is harmful to general athletics. It is developing a comparatively few specialists of extraordinary skill in their respective fields, but lessening the general inclination for athletic endeavor, and lowering the average of athletic attainment among those whose skill and ambition do not rise to championship honors. Athletics, in other words, are to-day in the same condition as was football a half-dozen years ago, when, at the colleges, twenty-two men played the game, and the remainder of the college stood on the side-lines and watched them. Class matches and other excellent influences served to take a large number from the side-lines and put them on to the gridiron, so that nowadays the average of football skill and the number of men playing are greatly increased—to the betterment of the game, and to the physical well-being of the students. Everything that tends to promote development in these two very important directions should be encouraged, first, last, and at all times. They provide the life of the game and the sinews of competition. The "scrub" players, the men who knock the ball about on the college grounds, form the reserve, and awaken interest that the regular eleven, practising at some distance from the campus, might perhaps fail to arouse. And, best of it, they spread the glow and vigor of health, moral and physical.

THE AMERICAN TENDENCY TO CONCENTRATION makes for specialization and ulterior development along distinct lines, which is very good in so far as it does not hinder general participation in sport or narrow the field of endeavor. We need more games at our colleges and schools to provide a greater variety of play and give opportunity of play to a greater number of boys. It will invaluably increase the substitute material for 'varsity teams and lessen that intense—and, to my mind, harmful—concentration in any one sport. The more games we have, the more material there will be for representative teams, the higher the average quality of play, the more vigorous and healthful the tone of the sport and of the players. There should be association football, lacrosse, and 'cross-country running, games which at their highest development are surpassingly interesting, and yet games in which the unskilled may engage with pleasure and interest, and without danger of injury. For healthful development of wind and limb no games equal these three.

THE 'CROSS-COUNTRY CHAMPIONSHIP the other day attested the keen interest the sport arouses even in its neglected condition, and also suggested the desirability of establishing an annual inter-collegiate event in addition to this regular one of the A. A. U. The Thanksgiving-day meeting practically resolved itself, so far as team honors were concerned, into a struggle between Yale and Cornell, but the sport requires more attention and encouragement from the colleges than it now receives, and the surest way of giving it is through the establishment of a separate and annual fixture. Preferably it should be held not later than the middle of October, and before all interest of the inter-collegiate world is centred upon football.

There were forty-one starters on Thanksgiving, and thirty-two finished the six and two-third miles laid off around and over the Morris Park race-track. It was a hard course with its forty-five jumps in the five circuits of the flags, including some stiff Liverpools, the great water-jump, and the usual three-foot-six-inch hurdles. Considering the day, with its hurricane of wind and cutting sleet, the running of all was excellent, and of the six leaders exceptionally good. Cregan, Wright, Orton, and Bray alternated in the lead for three-quarters of the first lap, but thereafter Wright took the lead and maintained it, finishing close on to three hundred yards ahead of Orton, who will be remembered as the winner of this championship last year and the year before. Bray, who finished second, is a Williams College boy, and a runner of much promise.

The team contest provided the more interesting struggle, since the result was always in doubt until the last half-mile. Barry and Sweet kept well to the front throughout, and the remainder of their collegemates were on fairly even terms with the best of Yale's representatives. But in the last circuit the Yale men, who had kept together marvellously well, raced for and secured the lead, finishing 10, 11, 12, 13, 19, while Cornell finished 4, 5, 14, 18, 27, with the same, though not as well-conditioned, team as had beaten Univ. of Penn.

The leaders and their times follow:

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| 1—A. L. Wright | Brown | 38.33 |
| 2—John Bray | Williams | 39.00 |
| 3 George W. Orton | Toronto L. & A.A. | 39.30 |
| 4 A. L. Barry | Cornell | 39.32 |
| 5—A. J. Sweet | Cornell | 39.38 |
| 6 T. O'Connor | Pastime A.C. | 39.48 |
| 7 A. Grobl | Pennsylvania | 40.15 |
| 8—J. F. Cregan | N.Y.A.C. | 40.17 |
| 9—J. M. Lewis | N.W.S.A.C. | 40.35 |
| 10 S. R. Chittenden | Yale | 40.36 |
| 11 C. B. Spitzer | Yale | 40.37 |
| 12 H. P. Smith | Yale | 41.13 |
| 13 J. P. Adams | Yale | 41.19 |
| 14 C. C. Torrance | Cornell | 41.28 |
| 15 J. F. Malloy | Knight A.C. | 41.40 |
| 16—T. G. McGirr | N.Y.A.C. | 41.57 |

Among the clubs, the New York A. C. took first honors, those running for it finishing 1, 2, 7, 8, and 16—points being apportioned according to positions of the men at the finish, only the leading five in each team counting.

THE BROWN-DARTMOUTH GAME (12–0) bore significantly on the relative standing of the teams which come from what we may call the smaller New England colleges. Three of these—Dartmouth, Amherst, and Williams—are members of a league, with an annual all-round contest, which Dartmouth has won for six consecutive years; the remaining two—Wesleyan and Brown—have no league affiliations, although that has not prevented their meeting the others as the opportunity offered. This year especial interest attached to the Brown-Dartmouth game because Dartmouth had overwhelmed Amherst and beaten Williams and lost to Wesleyan, while Brown had made a very fair showing against the larger university teams, but had not met Wesleyan. The place of Wesleyan and Brown in the year's classification was therefore largely to be determined by the play of Brown against Dartmouth —a very unsatisfactory method, but the only recourse, since these two, so near of a class, who should have an annual game, for some reason do not. Judging by her play against Dartmouth and comparative work against the same teams during the season, Brown has not so strong an eleven this year as Wesleyan, by one, if not by two, touch-downs. And that which figures most importantly in Wesleyan's favor is Brown's fumbling. If the Providence men could hold on to the ball, the difference between Brown and Wesleyan would, I think, be very slight.

THE FEATURE OF BROWN'S PLAY against Dartmouth was unquestionably half-back Richardson's brilliant running, not only on caught punts, but around the ends and into the line; at the same time, his own kicking was very fair. Perhaps his occasional fumbling may be forgiven, although that fatal characteristic of the Brown team turned out to be a costly one. In the matter of fumbling, by-the-way, the past season seems to me to have been the most remarkable I have known. Brown's work in the first half was not reassuring. She not only failed to score, but seemed unlikely to do so by the frequency with which she lost more or less certain chances, by fumbling, at the critical moment. Dartmouth, on the other hand, except for one period at the close of the second half, when she worked the ball to Brown's fifteen-yard line, could make no substantial or steady gains running, and from the very beginning relied on the punting of Proctor, who, all things considered, did very well. Certainly he was of great service to his team, although his good work was neutralized by Dartmouth's poor ends, who cut practically no figure at all in checking Brown's running-back kicks. Almost without exception Richardson ran back, from fifteen to thirty yards, every one he caught of Proctor's punts, and while in the first half Dartmouth was saved heavier defeat by Brown's fumbling and loose play, in the second the repeated running back of punts, and fierce line-bucking, completely outweighed what there was of value in Dartmouth's defence.

BROWN PLAYED MUCH MORE STRONGLY and much more together in the second half, although Richardson's individual work was responsible for both touch-downs and both goals, a clever forty-five-yard run by Paine giving Richardson but fifteen yards to carry the ball for the second score. Individually Brown played well; Richardson, Paine, Murphy, and Wheeler doing excellent running with the ball; the quarter-back ran his team with good judgment, and the line men were acceptable. As a team, defensively its work was rather good, but offensively success was far more in the quality of the runner than in either the quantity or the quality of support given him.

Dartmouth was outplayed at every point except in punting, of which Brown did very little, relying solely on a running game; but Brown's play was not good enough to keep her out of about ninth place on the Eastern list of football positions this year. We hope next year to see a game between Wesleyan and Brown.

SPEAKING OF DARTMOUTH FOOTBALL reminds me of the long Western trip the team has just completed, and the thoughts it suggests. We have grown accustomed to the wanderings of the Carlisle Indian team during the football season, and if we have wondered when the men found time for study, we, or at least I, have thought that perhaps the vigorous play of the game, the association with college men, the contact with the outside world, were, in their way, valuable education to these red men. We have also become accustomed to occasional visits of teams from out of the West, more particularly from Chicago. It is no doubt excellent for the men, for the game and for the institutions which support it, that there should be trials now and again between teams of different sections; but they should invariably be arranged so that college work is not unusually interrupted, and should never be made the excuse for a tour. When the Chicago Athletic Club team comes East for a tour of the colleges, relying on the gate to reimburse the cost of the trip, no one is surprised, for that is the way of the Chicago and a majority of the other athletic clubs. We are surprised, however, when a college faculty permits its football team to follow the example of the athletic clubs, and especially of one with so little consideration for the health of amateur sport.

Dartmouth's trip to Cincinnati and Chicago, where she was soundly trounced, should rightfully professionalize every man on the team. That the trip was a flat failure at the gate (financially) and on the playing-field is just retribution. By rights the deficit ought to be made up by the faculty members, whose indifference to the ethics of college sport made the Western trip possible.

THE PLAY OF ANNAPOLIS THIS YEAR has shown the need for arranging future schedules of harder games; or perhaps I should better express it by saying—with teams playing a higher grade of football than those which the cadets have met. This is entirely irrespective of what the scores have been or whether Annapolis has won or lost.

As a team, the cadets were quick, hard players, but poor in the kicking game, and lacking in the finer points of football which come from plenty of individual coaching and practising, and frequent contact with big teams that are drilled in these particulars. Abundant individual coaching it is impossible, of course, for the Annapolis cadets to receive. First, because they have not yet established the graduate coaching system as West Point has done, and must depend therefore on one coach, who this year has been Richard Armstrong, than whom there is none better; and besides, their geographical position appears to prevent their meeting any of the larger elevens, save Princeton.

There is no doubt Annapolis labors under greater disadvantages than West Point, the number of men in the Academy being nearly one hundred less and the average age rarely exceeding eighteen years. In weight the line this year averaged 166 and the backs 150 pounds. Despite these handicaps, however, Annapolis each year sets to work with characteristic determination. The quality of that spirit is illustrated by the schedule of the last two years, which shows Princeton to have been the only team to defeat them. This year's team is the strongest Annapolis has had for several seasons, and it is therefore the more to be regretted permission for a game with West Point was withheld. I expect to see permission granted for a game next year, however.

SEVEN OF THE 'VARSITY CADETS had one or more years' experience. Wortman is fast, aggressive, and holds his own with any centre he has met. Fischer has been laid up all autumn with injuries, and unable to show his true form. Nichols played his first year, and is promising. Royall was also in his first year, is slow, yet thoroughly sure on end runs, but poor in getting down the field under kicks. Halligan learned his game from the mighty Heffelfinger, and has more than held his own, even against the big elevens. He is quick, aggressive, and a good ground-gainer. Bisset has developed rapidly this season —is indeed a sure, hard player—and carries the ball well. Jackson is slow and erratic, though capable, on occasions, of playing a good game. Taussig is fast, good driver and runner, and sure and hard tackler, but is weak on handling punts. Gannon is a valuable man to a team, steadying the backs and helping the runners; is a good tackler and very strong on the defensive, but poor on handling punts, and is not very sure on offensive work. Fowler is a light but a fast runner and a good tackler. He also is weak on punts. Wade is a sure short-distance gainer and long punter and hard tackler. The best all-round men of the team are Halligan, Taussig, and Fowler. The weakness of the eleven in the kicking department was due particularly to inability of the ends to get down under the ball. In the present-day development of the game, needless to say that particular weakness would prove costly, and especially so against West Point, which was very strong in the kicking department.

THERE WERE HALF A DOZEN LOCAL MEN among the sixteen survivors of the medal round at Lakewood last week, and it is reasonable to infer that their more intimate knowledge of the course was of material advantage in enabling them to finish ahead of veterans like Tyng and Park. At any sport a man is supposed to do his best when in his own country, and in this respect golf bears a close analogy to 'cross-country riding. No matter how plain the problem may look on paper, its solution, nevertheless, depends upon a knowledge of detail that only actual experience can give. The exact quality of the turf, the relative keenness of the putting-greens, and even the requisite carry for the hazards must all be learned by the sense of touch, and up to a certain point the home player necessarily has this advantage over the visiting one.

The fact that Douglas not only led all the field by a wide margin, but established a new amateur record for the course, is but the exception that proves the rule; his brilliant performance goes again to show that, among Eastern golfers at least, the champion stands in a class by himself.

IT MUST BE ADMITTED, however, that the scoring game under the severe weather conditions that prevailed on Thanksgiving day is more or less tinctured by pure luck. After a long tee shot, it is discouraging to find the ball half buried in mud, when in ordinary weather it would have run on for thirty yards farther and rested in a fair lie for the brassey. Perhaps the approach shot may be brought off with unaccustomed accuracy through the ball's dropping dead, but this one advantage is pretty sure to be lost on the soggy greens. Under the circumstances the qualifying figures were good, and if Tyng failed to get in, it was simply because his score was too often at sixes and sevens.

Evidently there is a time for all things, even for golf, and the vagaries of our Northern winter climate are heavier odds than any official handicapper would dare to give. The dismal spectacle presented two or three weeks ago at Baltusrol, when a dozen professionals and a quartet of amateurs wallowed all day in a quagmire while the rain came down in sheets, may be taken as satisfying evidence of sportsmanship, but the interests of golf would have been better served by a postponement. And, a fortiori, golf under snow rules is, properly speaking, only an amusement, and one which, more often than not, must be taken sadly. The Morris County and Richmond Hill golfers are sensible in closing their courses for the mid-winter months. The links assuredly profit by the rest, and the game itself is the more enjoyed for being played only in its regular season and under normal conditions.

OUTSIDE OF TYNG'S FAILURE TO QUALIFY, and young Winston's creditable showing, there were but few interesting features in the tournament. Tyng has not made a brilliant record in this year's golf, but it is unfair to say that he has gone back in his game. The truth is that the general standard has been advanced, and that Tyng, handicapped by his late entrance into the golfing world, has reached and stopped at his limit. If he had been playing golf twenty years ago, instead of baseball, he might have won its highest honors, for he possesses many of the qualities of the really great player. Up to this year his "get there" powers have kept him well up among the leaders, and if he must yield now, it is simply because the younger generation are beginning to display mastery in the finer points of the game that can only be acquired in youth and suppleness.

Douglas and Travis were picked to meet in the finals, and the conclusion was foregone. The final round in the driving snow soon became such a farce that the contestants sensibly called it off, and it is to be settled at some later date—during the holidays, I hear.

Middle Western football and the All-America eleven will be discussed next week.

CASPAR WHITNEY

"HOW TO GET STRONG, AND HOW TO STAY SO."—By William Blaikie.—New and Enlarged Edition.—Illustrated.—$1 75.—Harper & Brothers, Publishers.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE

The WAR AND ITS RESULTS

From a copyrighted photograph by Rockwood

COLONEL ROOSEVELT WRITES EXCLUSIVELY FOR SCRIBNER'S ON THE ENTIRE SUBJECT OF THE SPANISH WAR—ONE OF THE FEW FIGHTERS WHO IS ALSO A WRITER.

(1) "THE ROUGH RIDERS" begins in January and runs half the year, accompanied by a remarkable series of illustrations from photographs—a vivid, vigorous narrative, full of anecdotes of bravery and personal characteristics.

(2) "THE STRATEGY OF THE CAMPAIGN," "The Preparing of the Navy," "The Organization of the Departments," etc., to follow "The Rough Riders."

THE RT. HON. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN ON AMERICA, COLONIAL EXPANSION AND ANGLO-AMERICAN ALLIANCE—(in the December Scribner, now ready)—now that the war is over, the most momentous question of the hour—a remarkable expression of opinion by the English Colonial Secretary, the greatest political leader of his country, the greatest authority on colonial affairs, and the greatest exponent of American alliance.

RT. HON. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN

SENATOR LODGE CONTRIBUTES AN AMERICAN VIEW OF THE SAME PROBLEM in the same number for the conclusion of his "Story of the Revolution"—A surprising declaration.

RICHARD HARDING DAVIS, in this number, contributes "In the Rifle Pits," the latest of his famous war-descriptions, illustrated. (He will continue to write for Scribner's next year.)

RICHARD HARDING DAVIS

THE TAKING OF MANILA is graphically described by Capt. T. Bentley Mott, U. S. A.—written and illustrated on the spot—for the extraordinary December Scribner.

THE DECEMBER SCRIBNER, WITH SPECIAL CHRISTMAS COVER, NOW READY

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, $3.00 A YEAR. POSTAGE PREPAID; 25c. A NUMBER ✱ CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, NEW YORK

Well-informed travelers going to

CALIFORNIA

who appreciate the best of everything, always travel by

THE OVERLAND LIMITED

Because the equipment, consisting of modern double Drawing-Room Sleeping Cars, Buffet-Smoking and Library Cars with Barber, Dining Cars in which meals are served a la carte, and Tourist Sleeping Cars, provides every comfort for all classes of passengers. Train leaves Chicago at 6.30 p. m.

EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

ALL AGENTS SELL TICKETS VIA THE

Chicago & North-Western Ry.

PRINCIPAL AGENCIES:
461 BROADWAY.....NEW YORK.
368 WASHINGTON ST.....BOSTON.
213 CLARK ST.....CHICAGO.

The

Red-Bridge Neighborhood

A Novel. By MARIA LOUISE POOL. Illustrated by CLIFFORD CARLETON. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 50.

The late Miss Pool possessed, as we have said before, an enviable gift for the delineation of New England character. . . . In this story she has managed to set forth with notable tenderness and refinement the patient and unselfish love of a pure-hearted wife. "The Red-Bridge Neighborhood" is assuredly a sterling performance, and one that deepens regret that so strong and careful a hand has dropped the pen forever.—N. Y. Tribune.

OTHER NOVELS BY MISS POOL:

Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental

In the First Person. $1 25.
Against Human Nature. $1 25.
The Two Salomes. $1 25.
Mrs. Keats Bradford. $1 25.
Mrs. Gerald. Illustrated. $1 50.
Out of Step. $1 25.
Katharine North. $1 25.
Roweny in Boston. $1 25.

NEW YORK AND LONDON

Harper & Brothers, Publishers

Eau de Cologne No. 4711

The most pungent, exhilarating and refreshing Perfume. Used by persons of refinement. Imported into America for three-quarters of a Century. Be sure to get "No. 4711," which is the standard in all civilized countries.

MÜLHENS & KROPFF, N. Y., U. S. AGENTS.

"AN INTRUDER"

will think a long while if he knows there is a SMITH & WESSON Revolver in the house. All calibers; long or short barrel.

Write for descriptive catalogue.

SMITH & WESSON,
15 Stockbridge St., Springfield, Mass.

SO SIMPLE A CHILD CAN USE THEM

28 Styles from $5.00 to $100.00

All Cameras Sold under a Positive Guarantee

Send 2c. stamp for Catalogue. SUNART PHOTO CO. 92 Aqueduct St., Rochester, N.Y.

1899 Calendar.

A handsome 1899 Calendar, in colors, is being issued by the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Ry. This calendar has thirteen printings and is made by the patent transparency process, producing a beautiful color effect, especially when hung in the light.

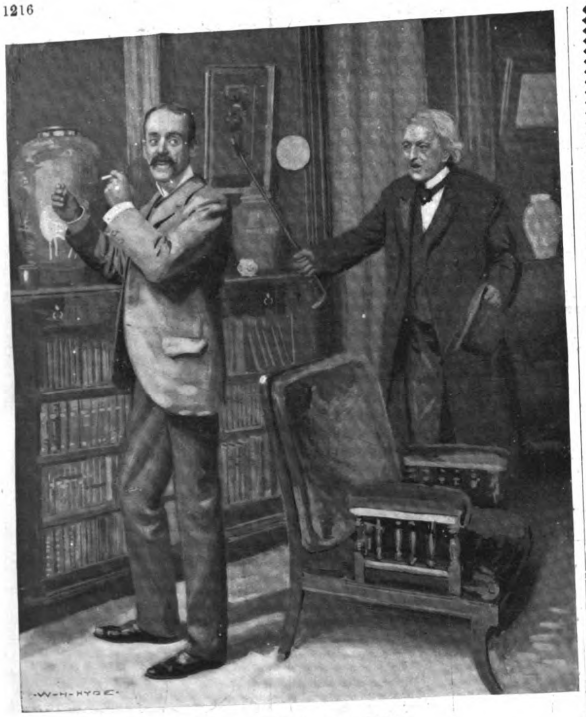
Design embraces a government mail pouch suspended from a mail crane, finished with a pleasing color sketch at bottom of hanger. Size of calendar, 14 x 20 inches.

Sent to any address on receipt of eight cents in postage. Ready for distribution December 15th. To insure getting a copy send in your order now to

A. J. SMITH, Gen. Pass. and Ticket Agent, Cleveland, O.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE, a descriptive list of over 300 volumes, will be sent to any address on receipt of Ten Cents in stamps.

EUROPE OR ORIENT



A series of attractive and comprehensive tours under personal escort, arranged to leave New York during Dec., Jan., and Feb., visiting Gibraltar, Italy, Southern France (the Riviera), Switzerland, Paris, London, etc. Also Italy, Egypt, The Nile, Palestine, Greece, etc. All expenses, $180 up, according to tour. Programs and Gazette, 100 pp., sent free. Apply to H. GAZE & SONS, Ltd. (Est. 1844), 113 Broadway, New York. R. H. CRUNDEN, General Agent. Boston Agency, 201 Washington St.; Chicago Agency, 220 South Clark St.

MAGIC LANTERNS WANTED AND FOR SALE OR EXCHANGE. HARBACH & CO. 809 Filbert St. Phila. Pa.

Digitized by Google

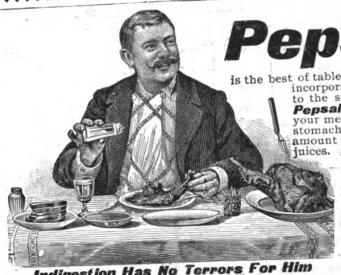
Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

COULD GIVE HIM NO HELP.

YOUNG BENEDICT. "I cannot help you any more. I'm married now, and I have no money to spare."

OLD DEPENDANT. "Well, I like that! Here you've gone and got married at my expense!"



A delicious drink sold at all soda fountains and cafes.

Vigoral

"Concentrated Beef"

Represents all the nutriment and flavor of prime roast beef in a condensed form. It builds up the invalid. Strengthens the convalescent.
Our Chafing Dish Recipe Book sent upon request. At all Grocers and Druggists.
ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

Pepsalt...

is the best of table salt, into every grain of which is incorporated digestive substances natural to the stomach. Fill your salt-cellar with Pepsalt and use it in place of salt at your meals. If you have indigestion your stomach does not supply the necessary amount of the dissolving or digestive juices. Pepsalt taken in place of salt at your meals makes good this deficiency, as you take with every mouthful of your food a similar substance to that which is required and at the right time, and your indigestion is a thing of the past.
Send for sample in salt-shaker bottle and try it.
Price 25 cents, postpaid.
THE VAUPEL SAMARITAN CO.,
45 Sheriff St., Cleveland, Ohio.

Indigestion Has No Terrors For Him
That salt-shaker is filled with Pepsalt

PEPSALT CURES AND PREVENTS INDIGESTION

"A PERFECT FOOD—as Wholesome as it is Delicious."

Walter Baker & Co.'s Breakfast Cocoa

The Standard for Purity and Excellence....
Trade-Mark.
Costs less than one cent a cup.
Our Trade-Mark on Every Package.
Walter Baker & Co. Ltd.
DORCHESTER, MASS.
ESTABLISHED 1780.

Imperial Russian Crown Sables.

One of the largest and finest collections in the world. Those from the Yakutsk district of Eastern Siberia are decidedly the handsomest ever imported.

Per skin, $40, $75, $125, $200, $250.

Hudson's Bay sable skins, $10, $15, $25, $35, and $50. It takes 2 or 3 skins for a muff, according to size, and 2 for a fashionable neck-piece. Tails, Russian, $2.50 to $5; Hudson's Bay, $1.50 to $4.

Capes, Victorines, Neck-Pieces, and Muffs, newest styles, in stock or to order without extra charge.

NOTE—I do not recommend blended sables. The process of darkening injures the fur; they fade in spots, look dull, and are a poor investment at any price. I will not sell them.

Up-to-date styles in Seal, Persian Lamb, Stone-Marten, Mink, Chinchilla, Ermine, Fox, etc.

Sleigh Robes, Men's Fur-lined Overcoats, Coachmen's Outfits.

Tiger, Leopard, and other fashionable fur rugs at the lowest possible prices for reliable goods.

C. C. SHAYNE,
IMPORTER AND MANUFACTURER,
42d St., West, bet. Broadway & 6th Ave.,
NEW YORK.
Fashion Book Mailed Free.

Arnold Constable & Co.

Laces

Real Lace Flounces, Trimmings, Veilings, Spangled and Chenille Nets, Lace Rufflings, Collarettes, Fichus, Embroidered Handkerchiefs.

Umbrellas.

Martin's Umbrellas.
City-made Umbrellas.

Broadway & 19th st.
NEW YORK.

CHEW
Beeman's
The Original
Pepsin Gum

Cures Indigestion and Sea-sickness.
All Others Are Imitations.

Joseph Gillott's STEEL PENS.
GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.
THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

PIANOS
Recent improvement in the construction of our upright and grand pianos render them absolutely unequalled. Send for new descriptive catalogue with prices and terms.

ORGANS
For fifty years the Standard of the World. New styles of parlor and church organs just introduced. Also large assortment of slightly used pianos and organs.
SOLD ON INSTALMENTS, Rented and Exchanged.
Mason & Hamlin Co.
146 BOYLSTON ST., BOSTON.
8 AND 5 WEST 18th STREET, NEW YORK.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,
BANKERS.
ESTABLISHED 1873.
2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.
Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.
Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.
Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.
A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.
Correspondence solicited.

By RICHARD HARDING DAVIS

A Year from a Reporter's Note-Book
Illustrated by R. CATON WOODVILLE, T. DE THULSTRUP, and FREDERIC REMINGTON, and from Photographs taken by the Author. $1 50.

In this volume Mr. Davis treats the Cuban Rebellion, and other matters of equal import, with his characteristic accuracy and skill, and the result is a volume of inestimable value to the student of current events.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR:

Three Gringos in Venezuela and Central America. Illustrated. $1 50.
About Paris. Illustrated by C. D. GIBSON. $1 25.
The Princess Aline. Illustrated by C. D. GIBSON. $1 25.
The Exiles, and Other Stories. Illustrated. $1 50.
Van Bibber, and Others. Illustrated by C. D. GIBSON. $1 00; Paper, 60 cents.
The West from a Car-Window. Illustrated by FREDERIC REMINGTON. $1 25.
Our English Cousins. Illustrated. $1 25.
The Rulers of the Mediterranean. Illustrated. $1 25.
Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers
New York and London

HARPER'S PERIODICALS
MAGAZINE, $4 00 a year
WEEKLY, $4 00 a year
BAZAR, $4 00 a year
LITERATURE, $4 00 a year
ROUND TABLE, $1 00 a year

EARL & WILSON'S
LINEN
COLLARS & CUFFS
BEST IN THE WORLD.

IF IN HASTE TAKE THE NEW YORK CENTRAL

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—No. 2191. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1898. PRICE, TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All Rights Reserved.

A CHRISTMAS BOX FROM HOME.

DRAWN BY W. A. ROGERS.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

CHRISTMAS NUMBER—FORTY PAGES AND AN ILLUMINATED COVER—PRICE, 25 CENTS

NEW YORK CITY, DECEMBER 17, 1898

Terms: $4 00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, and Mexico

Subscriptions may begin with any Number

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
New York City: Franklin Square
London: 45 Albemarle Street, W.

Also for sale at Brentano's, 37 Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris

CONTENTS OF THE CHRISTMAS NUMBER.

STORIES.

The Great Staircase at Landover Hall. By FRANK R. STOCKTON. Illustrated in Colors by ALBERT E. STERNER.

The Amalgamated Brotherhood of Spooks. By JOHN KENDRICK BANGS. Illustrated by G. VERBEEK.

A Spanish Money-Jar. By HEZEKIAH BUTTERWORTH. Illustrated by HENRY MCCARTER.

Christmas in the Klondike. By TAPPAN ADNEY. Full-Page Illustration by the Author.

A DOUBLE-PAGE SUPPLEMENT IN COLORS.

Small Game Better than None. By HOWARD PYLE.

FULL-PAGE ILLUSTRATIONS.

A Christmas Box from Home. By W. A. ROGERS.

Christmas Morning—The Challenge. By PETER S. NEWELL.

The Hero of the Occasion. By ROSINA EMMET SHERWOOD.

Christmas in Puerto Rico—A Cock-Fight at Caguas. By F. LUIS MORA.

The Christmas Hop at West Point. By H. C. CHRISTY.

The Merry Christmas of the Dancing-Bear and his Scheming Master. By H. M. WILDER.

OTHER FEATURES

This Busy World. A Christmas Paper. By E. S. MARTIN. Illustrated by H. B. EDDY.

Frederic Remington's Statuettes. By CHARLES H. CAFFIN. Illustrated.

London Letter. By ARNOLD WHITE.

Music. By E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON. Illustrated.

Drama. By JOHN CORBIN.

Amateur Sport—The All-America Football Team for 1898. By CASPAR WHITNEY. Illustrated.

NOTICE.—In order that this special Christmas Number may be complete in itself, the regular instalment of the Serial Story, "The Awkward Age," by HENRY JAMES, is omitted this week, but will be continued in the next Number.

THE Secretary of the Treasury has come to be a believer in subsidies for steamships, and in the policy of restricted trade to ships of American register between this country, Puerto Rico, and Hawaii. We have expressed our opinion more than once upon these policies, and especially the latter. Mr. GAGE is proposing that the republic shall adopt the colonial policy which was England's in 1776, the consequence of which was the loss of her most important American colonies and the establishment of this government. It is also the colonial policy which Spain has pursued, with results which are so recent that their lesson ought to have impressed Mr. GAGE more deeply. We believe that the policy which he advocates is destined, if adopted, to prove disastrous.

GOVERNOR TANNER'S indictment by the grand jury of Macoupin County, Illinois, is not to be rejoiced over as an act of virtue which has been directed against the illegal and rebellious conduct of the Governor of a great State. Governor TANNER is unfit for the office which he occupies, and he ought to be removed from it. But in removing him from it the people of Illinois should respect the law as he has contemned and outraged it. The chief executive of the nation or of a great State cannot be prosecuted for his conduct as a private individual can be. He is not amenable to the ordinary criminal processes of the State. The way to punish the Governor is through his impeachment, and not through an indictment: and those who would be glad to punish TANNER, who is possibly the greatest criminal who ever held the gubernatorial office in this country, ought to be especially careful of the methods which they adopt, for example's sake, if for nothing else.

THE New York Chamber of Commerce, through its committee, of which GUSTAV H. SCHWAB is chairman, has memorialized the President to invite the maritime powers of the world "to attend an international congress for the purpose of considering and adopting rules providing for the freedom from capture of private property on the sea, whether belonging to neutrals or non-combatant citizens of belligerent nations, except in the case of contraband of war or violation of a blockade." This is something that ought to have been done years ago, when the conditions of warfare on land were ameliorated, and when the barbarism of pillage was put an end to. One of our most distinguished jurists, Judge BRAWLEY of the District Court of the United States, sitting in Charleston, South Carolina, has lately, in a prize case which came before him, given strong expression to what is doubtless the sentiment of civilization on this subject, and it is auspicious that the President has accepted the suggestion of the New York Chamber of Commerce, and has taken the first step in a proceeding which may add another laurel to the wreath which the United States has long been wearing for its achievements in the cause of peace, and for the introduction of humane principles into war.

WE are told that the result of the election for Governor in Minnesota was not due to any feeling against the Republican party or Senator DAVIS, but to the personal popularity of Mr. LIND; that, in fact, Senator DAVIS is stronger to-day than he ever was before, and this on account of the prominence he has attained by his advocacy of war and expansion. However much we may disagree with Senator DAVIS on these subjects, we are glad that statesmanship has won in Minnesota, and that Mr. DAVIS, an educated lawyer and a man who thinks on political questions like a trained statesman, is assured of his position in a contest threatened by money-bags. It has been too much the habit, of late years, to give the prize of the Senatorship to rich men, and although we have disagreed radically with Senator DAVIS, we believe that he has come sincerely to the view which he holds by intelligent study of the question. We often find those who oppose us on these questions denouncing us as un-American because we do not agree with them, and we are glad to take this opportunity to express the hope that we never will be found calling a fellow-citizen unpatriotic because he does not think as we do on a public question.

THERE is a strong feeling among some very excellent citizens of Chicago against general criticism of Mayor HARRISON. This feeling has been aroused by the Mayor's attitude toward certain street-railroad corporations which are seeking an extension of their franchises for fifty years. Mayor HARRISON, and the good people of Chicago generally, think that the corporations have purchased what is known as the "ring" in the Chicago Board of Aldermen, and the ring constitutes a majority. The feeling against these corruptionists is so strong that threats have been heard against their lives, and Mayor HARRISON himself is reported as saying that if there is any hanging going on in the city he will not "turn in the riot call." This alone ought to settle the question as to whether he is the proper chief magistrate for a great city in the nineteenth century, although his fight against corruption is doubtless commendable in being strong and vigorous, and directed against that which is dangerous to our municipal life everywhere in this country. But notwithstanding the favor which Mayor HARRISON has won among some of the clergy and best citizens of Chicago, we continue to think him a dangerous demagogue, who, in his fight against ALTGELD, is seeking the support of the very elements that made ALTGELD prominent and dangerous.

THE report of the Secretary of the Treasury, so far as it deals with the revenues and expenditures of the government, is very far from being satisfactory. We do not say this because the estimates show an expected deficiency at the end of the current fiscal year of $112,000,000, and for the fiscal year of 1900 a deficiency of a little more than $30,000,000. We shall have to expect deficiencies for some time to come, and doubtless an increase of the bonded debt will be made necessary by the excess of expenditures over revenues. But this report is unsatisfactory mainly for its indefiniteness. It is entirely guess-work. Treasury reports are always more or less predictions, but this year the certainty is so slight that it may truthfully be stated that there is really no approach to it in the figures which Mr. GAGE presents to the country. The cost of the military and naval establishments is to be increased so much that the army, for example, for the current year, is expected to cost nearly ten times what it cost before the war broke out, and in 1900 it is expected to cost nearly five times as much. This may or may not be true. As to the amounts which Mr. GAGE predicts, we fancy that in reality, if the present tendency of the country towards militarism and imperialism goes on, the cost of the army will be found to have been underestimated by the Secretary of the Treasury. But everything depends, after all, on what Congress decides to do in these directions, and while we may be sure that the cost of governing the country is to be greatly increased, we do not know within millions the amount of this increase.

THE MESSAGE ON OUR COLONIES.

THE President's reason for not discussing in his annual message the subject of governments for the new colonies is conclusive. The message is an official document, and therefore deals merely with facts and deductions from facts, with actual situations and existing conditions, and not with conjectures or possibilities, certainly not with the possible results and sequences of diplomatic negotiations which are nearing conclusion, and which have not yet resulted in a treaty which has been submitted to the Senate for ratification. It is evident that the President believes that the treaty will be ratified substantially as it has been agreed to by the Paris commissioners, for he speaks of "the new possessions which will come to us as the result of the war with Spain." Nevertheless, there is room for doubt, and it is quite possible that further consideration may weaken the expansionists, and certainly a public debate on the treaty in the Senate will not be helpful to their cause. Mr. MCKINLEY, indeed, may induce Senators who are really opposed to expansion to vote for it, on the theory that to vote against it is to vote for a renewal of the war. It ought to be borne in mind, however, that only Mr. MCKINLEY can renew the war, and that, unless he orders the navy to attack Spain, there may be a real peace even though the treaty of peace may fail, and we seriously doubt if he would ever carry such a threat into execution, for the reason that if he did, he alone would be responsible for the consequences.

However the effort to secure ratification may result, the country ought to have the privilege of considering this proposed new departure from our old traditions, and of passing upon it squarely. Let us have the issue in the next Presidential campaign. The right to judge and determine upon a proposition to change the very character of the republic ought not to be denied to the people, if there is any significance or any reality at all in popular government. We are not among those who believe that this country cannot grow to the stature of this or of any other undertaking in the nature of government; but we do believe that this undertaking will never pay for the trouble and the cost that will be imposed upon us by the effort to administer the affairs of distant and dependent peoples under our present form of government and with our present condition of politics. It may be that the assumption of the new responsibilities will hasten the establishment of a permanent official class of administrative officers, and will bring us more speedily to the abandonment of our protective policy and the establishment of free trade. But if these ends are desirable, they should be gained without burdening ourselves with otherwise undesirable possessions, and when they are actually gained through the necessity of meeting new responsibilities, those responsibilities will even then be none the more desirable. In the end, as now, they must be reckoned with at their true value. Moreover, whether expansion will be beneficial or injurious to us, it involves a departure from the traditional principles of the republic and a change in our form of government, including important radical amendments of the Constitution, which we have already described. Even the expansionists themselves frankly admit that the new colonies must be governed outside of the Constitution, and that the restraints imposed upon Congress for the protection of the rights and liberties of our citizens will not apply to the people of the new colonies.

A subject of this importance is essentially one for the consideration and decision of the people, because it is constitutional in its nature. There are certain subjects on which the politicians ought always to seek the mandate of the people, and this is one of them. There is nothing practical to be gained by the immediate ratification of this treaty. It may go over until after the next Presidential election without any resultant harm to the country. Indeed, to ratify a treaty necessitating such enormous changes in the very structure of our government before the next Presidential election would be to take an unfair advantage of the people. It would be something in the nature of a snap judgment against the people, who, whether they eventually agree to the adoption of the policy of expansion or not, have the right to a full and free public discussion of the question, and an opportunity to declare their opinion after it has been intelligently and deliberately formed. Let ratifi

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tion be delayed, but let there be a public debate on the treaty in the Senate and in the House of Representatives. Such a debate will be followed by a wider, and perhaps a more thorough, discussion on the platforms and in the press of the country. After that we shall all be willing to abide by the decision of the people, expressed in their choice between the rival candidates for the Presidency; and if the choice be for expansion, we shall all join in the effort to make the government fit its new duties and responsibilities. The issue of expansion is a better and a more honorable issue to hold over for 1900 than is the currency question.

If the treaty should not be ratified at once, the conditions would be the same in the Philippines as the President intends they shall be for a long time to come. His language as to Cuba is as follows: "Until there is complete tranquillity in the island and a stable government inaugurated, military occupation will be continued." He also says, as to all our other actual and possible colonial possessions, "Until Congress has legislated otherwise, it will be my duty to continue the military governments which have existed since our occupation, and give to the people security in life and property, and encouragement under a just and beneficent rule." We have no doubt that the military rule will be, as Mr. McKINLEY says, just and beneficent. It will be much better than any rule which the politicians can give these colonies under any laws that exist to-day. Indeed, there is no law under which civil government could be maintained in these islands, and if the treaty were to be ratified to-morrow, Congress would be obliged to pass a joint resolution authorizing the President to continue military rule until it could devise and enact a scheme of civil government. Therefore, even if the treaty be ratified, we may expect a continuance of military rule in the Philippines, Cuba, and Puerto Rico for several years to come. In view of the fact that, treaty or no treaty, the new colonies will be under military rule for some time, there is no reason for hasty ratification or for a denial of the right of the people to pronounce judgment on the scheme to change their form of government, which, until now that it has been questioned by the expansionists, has been considered by all Americans as the best government which human ingenuity has ever invented. Mr. McKINLEY need only follow up the reticence of his message by recommending the practical submission of this question to the people, after the manner that we have suggested. Such an act would be one of high statesmanship, by reason of which there would be no change of conditions in the manner of exercising control over our colonies whether expansion were finally agreed to or not, while the people of this country would thus secure the right to refuse to change their government — a right which is theirs by reason of the very nature of their political institutions.

THE MORAL OF TWO CAREERS.

THE history of our politics has never taught the moral lesson more pointedly and effectively than in the downfall of FRANK S. BLACK at the time of THEODORE ROOSEVELT'S elevation. Both are still young men, as youth is rated in public life; both are men of ability enough to adorn public station, and with a laudable ambition for high position; both possess strong personalities, and have sought success deliberately by well-considered courses of action. Each has tried his experiment long enough to test thoroughly the effectiveness of his methods, and the popular verdict has been rendered after full deliberation.

"The republic is opportunity." In no other relation of life is GARFIELD'S oft-quoted declaration more frequently or more completely vindicated than in politics. The American people are not only ready to give a young and untried man a chance; they seem even anxious to welcome and encourage any new-comer who shows signs that he can do something if he is given a chance. The sudden rise of GROVER CLEVELAND within three years, from the Mayoralty of a third-rate city beyond the borders of which he was hardly known when he became its executive, to the Presidency of the United States, is of itself enough to show how quick and rich may be the reward of public confidence, once it is won.

BLACK was the son of a poor farmer with a large family "down East"; he had the hardest kind of a struggle to get a college education and a law training; he had to make his own way when he began practice. His was the sort of boyhood, youth, and early manhood which has always been accounted, by the masses of our people, a good training for the bearing of large responsibilities later on; and they still, as of old, enjoy conferring what they deem a just reward for the homely virtues through which an ambitious spirit has risen from poverty, obscurity, and what would elsewhere be, practically, hopelessness. Bitter as the struggle had been by which BLACK, at forty, had obtained an assured position in his profession, there could hardly have been a better "campaign document" for an aspiring politician than the record of those forty years as a private citizen.

The present generation has not seen a case where a young man so suddenly leaped into so high a position, with such still greater possibilities before him, as when, two years ago, Mr. BLACK was elected Governor of New York by a majority immense beyond all precedent. He had never held any office beyond a still unfinished term as Representative in Congress, and as Executive of the Empire State he now became a national figure. It would be hard to name an official, below the President, who occupies so commanding a position as the Governor of New York. If the man chosen to this post have an individuality of his own, he can engage the attention of the American people, as witness TILDEN and CLEVELAND, to cite no others.

Governor BLACK had convictions, and the courage of those convictions. He believed that political success was to be achieved through "practical politics." In the language of the practical politician, he "took no stock" in such ideals as civil service reform. He owed his nomination as Congressman to a notorious lobbyist, who later was the agent in securing his nomination for the Governorship. He believed that the LOU PAYNS had the Presidency within their grasp. So believing, Governor BLACK was cynical enough to proclaim his faith both in words and in actions, which spoke even louder than his words. In his inaugural address he proclaimed his intention to defy criticism as "intolerant clamor and irresponsible assault," and he ridiculed the careful work of years in improving the civil service by declaring himself in favor of "less starch." He made his unsavory sponsor insurance commissioner, against the earnest protests of the decent element in his party, and he reappointed a superintendent of public works whose selection by his predecessor had been a sad blot upon the latter's administration. He demoralized the merit system by forcing changes in the civil service law which rendered it little better than a farce.

All this, and much more of the same sort, Governor BLACK did openly and unblushingly, in the sincere belief, to all appearances, that the moral law had nothing to do with politics at the end of the nineteenth century. We had never seen precisely such an experiment tried before. There had been men enough who at heart accepted all that Mr. BLACK professed, but they had deemed it necessary to make pretences of something better. He acted everything out, because he was confident that the more open he was in his defiance the stronger he would become as a candidate for higher honors.

Governor BLACK had his own way, and made a thorough trial of his novel experiment. The result was his utter ruin. The appointment of PAYN as head of the Insurance Department, the free rein given ALDRIDGE in the Department of Public Works, the lowering of standards in the civil service, made a record so hopelessly bad that the Governor's party had no choice but to repudiate him. There was not a practical politician, outside those bound to him by personal ties, which rendered their opinion worthless, who did not see and admit that the renomination of Governor BLACK meant overwhelming defeat for the party. A candidate who had been elected by the extraordinary plurality of over 213,000 in 1896 had to be set aside in 1898 because of the record he had made in those two years.

The downfall of Governor BLACK under any circumstances would have been an impressive event. It was rendered doubly impressive by the fact that the immediate agent in that downfall was a man who had been his perfect antithesis. Colonel ROOSEVELT had won place after place by defiance of the professional politicians; he believed in more "starch" in the civil service; he had repeatedly demonstrated the sincerity of his independence; he accepted the moral law as the controlling force in human affairs—including politics. Because he was thus the antithesis of Governor BLACK, and only because he was, did Colonel ROOSEVELT stand any chance of rescuing his party from the defeat which threatened to overwhelm it. The "organization" of his party had to take him as its candidate or meet certain defeat. The nomination of Governor BLACK would have insured the success of the opposition, and nobody knew this better than the professional politicians themselves.

People do not often think of EMERSON as the philosopher of politics, but nowhere did he show his clear-sightedness better than in his discussions of public affairs. There is a passage in his Man the Reformer, written at Concord back in 1841, which could not apply more patly to the United States of 1898 if it had been said after a study of BLACK and ROOSEVELT:

> We complain that the politics of masses of the people are controlled by designing men, and led in opposition to manifest justice and the common weal and to their own interest. But the people do not wish to be represented or ruled by the ignorant and base. They only vote for these because they were asked with the voice and semblance of kindness. They will not vote for them long. They inevitably prefer wit and probity.

THE CURRENCY AND ITS COMPTROLLER.

IT would be curious, if it were not so very familiar, that an existing condition of business, however abnormal or even injurious, comes to be regarded by men engaged in the business which it affects as the normal condition, without which the further transaction of business would be impossible, even inconceivable. We are best used to this way of thinking, or of not thinking, as it regards the tariff. Even when a modification has proved to be advantageous, as was the case, in its effect upon the exports of manufactures, of what the Senate left of the WILSON bill, some beneficiaries of the change continue to object to it.

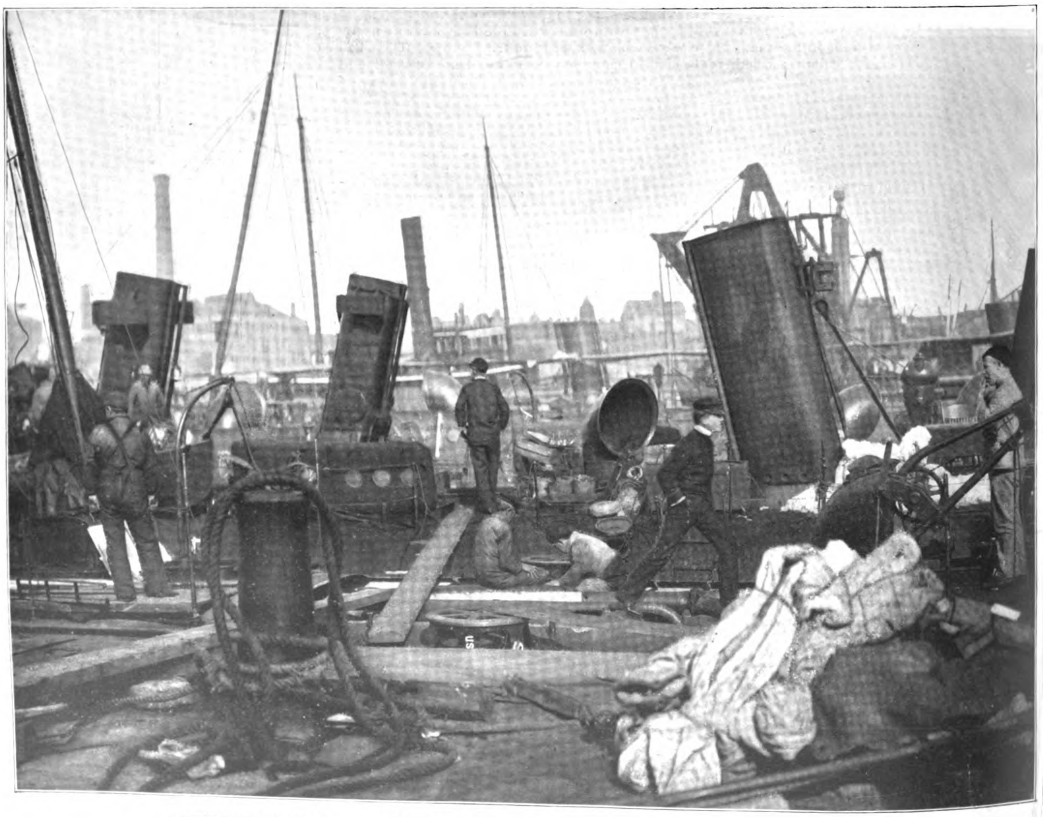
The currency fetich is not of so long standing as the tariff fetich. But it is equally impressive to many minds, and among them is the mind of the Comptroller of the Currency, Mr. C. G. DAWES. His report makes it clear that he regards the existing mixed system of currency, including the national-bank notes and the Treasury notes, and involving the "endless chain," as "the fixed custom and general law of man." No writer of any standing as an economist has a word to say in favor of that system. Historically it has no claims to consideration. Instead of having been carefully thought out with reference to the needs of the country, it was the hurried makeshift of the sorely pressed Secretary CHASE to save the Treasury. It had the advantage of making a forced and immediate market for government bonds, and that was decisive.

Why the Comptroller of the Currency should set his face against every rational attempt to improve this system is by no means so clear as why Mr. CHASE should have devised and enforced it. He has neither the pride of paternity nor the excuse of a seeming necessity. In the mean while the mischiefs of the existing system have become not merely apparent, but glaring. It has given opportunity for dangerous attacks upon the soundness of the currency and the maintenance of the standard of value, of which the most formidable was made in 1896, and another seems to be preparing for 1900. It has furnished an excuse for these assaults in artificially restricting the banking facilities, which the agricultural districts, according to the most credible and impartial witnesses, urgently need. The very basis of the security of the noteholders is gradually dwindling and disappearing, and yet the Comptroller of the Currency has nothing but opposition for the thoughtful and well-matured scheme that has been propounded for taking the currency out of politics and the government out of the banking business, and for allowing every community in need of enlarged banking facilities to supply those facilities for itself, and, as it were, automatically.

Mr. DAWES'S specific argument is almost all directed against one point, which the plans to which he refers have in common. This is that, in his words, "they seem to ignore the interests of bank depositors," with which he regards himself as "peculiarly charged." We know of no reason, certainly the statutes give none, why the depositor should be dearer to him than the noteholder. The title of his office would suggest that the latter should be his peculiar care. What he chiefly objects to is the proposition that the notes of a bank should be the first lien upon the assets, as they are in Canada. This he describes as "giving noteholders a preference over depositors," which he thinks "normally unjustifiable" and "inherently wrong." The difference is obvious. The depositor of a bank is a creditor who has had means of informing himself as to the responsibility of his debtor, and who makes his deposit at his own risk. The noteholder is a man who may be the whole width of the continent away from the debtor, may have no means of making inquiries about him, and ought to be enabled to take with absolute confidence a note of any bank in the United States which is allowed to issue its notes as currency. That is the very meaning, in the present sense, of the phrase "a sound currency." It is plain that no help can be had from the present Comptroller of the Currency towards putting the currency on a safer and a more rational basis.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Copyright, 1898, by Frederic Remington.



"THE TRIUMPH."

Copyright, 1898, by Frederic Remington.

"THE WICKED PONY."

TWO BRONZE STATUETTES BY FREDERIC REMINGTON.—[See Page 1222.]

DECEMBER SCENES AT THE NAVY-YARD—PREPARING THE TORPEDO-BOATS FOR WINTER QUARTERS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE HERO OF THE OCCASION.—Drawn by Rosina Emmet Sherwood.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LONDON.

November 26, 1898.

Of all recent utterances upon the foreign relations of this country, Mr. Chamberlain's speech remains the most significant. Its importance lies not only in what he said, but in the fact that it was he who said it. His position in British politics is a very curious one. A man of extraordinary intellectual keenness, of wider and more exact knowledge than he is usually credited with, beyond comparison the most effective debater in Great Britain, greatly and vastly ambitious, he has been for many years within sight of the top rung of the ladder, but has never succeeded in setting foot upon it. Lord Randolph Churchill once bitterly but truly called Mr. Gladstone "an old man in a hurry." Mr. Chamberlain is not old, but he is sixty-two. It was his impatience to be Prime Minister that caused him to oppose Gladstone so acutely over the home-rule bill, for he himself had already offered a single national council to Ireland, as has just been clearly shown by Barry O'Brien's Life of Parnell and the re-views of it. Many of his friends now think that his ambition has taken the form of a desire to be Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He has two rivals—one, his own leader, Lord Salisbury; the other, in the Liberal camp, Lord Rosebery. The former is aging fast, and the Conservative rank and file is honeycombed with discontent at his weakness; but the latter is undoubtedly making great strides back to power, and the country is unmistakably rallying to him. Mr. Chamberlain's problem must be, within which party is he most likely to realize his desire? Among the Tories he is distrusted for his past Radical record, and jealously disliked for his undoubted ascendency in the ministerial councils. At the same time he is greatly feared because of the possibility that by returning to his old Liberal allegiance he might smash the Unionist alliance and bring down the Tory party in ruins. Knowing this, he speaks with a freedom, not to say a recklessness, upon which nobody else would venture, and of course he knows precisely what is taking place in the cabinet and behind the scenes. It is for the reasons thus hastily sketched that his words are heard and read with such keen interest here. On the Continent he is erroneously regarded as the trumpet through which Lord Salisbury blows more warlike blasts than he thinks it diplomatic to produce on his own instrument. The leading Belgian paper, for instance, has just summarized his position by saying, "Lord Salisbury reigns, but Mr. Chamberlain governs." This is not so; but Mr. Chamberlain's speeches are almost as important as if it were.

During the prolonged and bitter negotiations over West Africa, Mr. Chamberlain developed a deep resentment to the course and the methods of French statesmanship, particularly as embodied in M. Hanotaux. Certain remarks made by the latter to a friend of mine and repeated to Mr. Chamberlain strengthen this feeling, although the remarks themselves have never been made public, and it would not be discreet to write them now. The echo of his resentment is plainly and deeply heard throughout his Manchester speech. At the same time, everything that he said about France is the literal truth.

It is a simple statement of fact that French influence has steadily been used to hamper every detail of Egyptian administration and to delay the progress of Egypt itself, and that France has grotesquely stretched her rights under the Treaty of Utrecht, to the intense indignation of the people of Newfoundland, and has thus produced a situation which, I may parenthetically add, will startle several countries when it is reflected in the report of the Newfoundland Commission, about to be issued. It is true also that England was put to a great and unnecessary expense in the creation of a new and separate army in order to protect her remaining Hinterlands in West Africa; that British trade has been destroyed in Madagascar by what Mr. Chamberlain called, with needless qualification, "almost a breach of faith"; that in Siam, in Tunis, in Abyssinia, in China, in South Africa, "we have found French influence exerted without regard to British susceptibilities and without regard to British interests." There is, moreover, the grave remaining problem of the future of the Bahr-el-Ghazal, with its seven armed French posts established by Marchand, the evacuation of Fashoda being, as Mr. Chamberlain said pointedly, "only a symbol."

In view of all this, and what I have explained before with regard to Mr. Chamberlain's position, his declaration that "it is necessary, if we are to arrive at a different kind of understanding, that French politicians should, once for all, abandon the tactics which they have been pursuing for so many years," is little short of a direct menace. I was myself at Manchester and attended the annual conference of the Liberal-Unionist party held there. In the classic precincts of the Free Trade Hall, memories yet linger of John Bright's great efforts to make the food of the people plenteous and free, and of the struggle for reform which was fought and won at Manchester in the middle of the century. Here it was, to a mass-meeting of five thousand Unionists, Conservative as well as Liberal, that Mr. Chamberlain—"sexagenarian dandy" he is termed by the French papers—delivered his first fighting speech after returning from America. His trip to the States seemed to have refined him. His face grows more like that of Pitt every year, while the physiognomy of Sir William Harcourt, by strange coincidence, more closely approximates to the heavy visage of Charles James Fox. It is a critical period in Mr. Chamberlain's career. Of the speech itself little need be said, and the impression made upon prominent politicians who heard it was reflected in the smoking rooms of many country houses in Lancashire the same evening. Every member of Parliament with whom I was brought in contact gained the same impression as myself. Mr. Chamberlain means war unless the international conduct of France changes for the better. Practically, if not constitutionally, the Foreign Secretary, the Premier, and the Queen divide among them the responsibility for resorting to the arbitrament of war. In the present ministry it is otherwise. Mr. Chamberlain, as Colonial Secretary, is responsible for Newfoundland, and it seems not unlikely that England may ere long be in a crisis with France over that island. At Manchester he dropped a hint, to which the people of this country have not yet paid sufficient attention. "The interference of the French with the development of the colony has," he said, "increased. At the present time it is suffering a most serious injury from what I venture to think is an intervention which is of no advantage to France, although it certainly is of serious detriment to our colony of Newfoundland." The question is very important. Newfoundland is the place of all places in which it is possible for France to renew the policy of pin pricks over which she has just been defeated in Upper Egypt. France has a claim to a certain right in that island which we in England cannot deny, mainly because it has never been defined. At the beginning of the eighteenth century France and England were in a chronic state of war. In 1713 the Treaty of Utrecht, which for the time ended hostilities, secured the sovereignty of Newfoundland in England. Unfortunately, however, it left to France an undefined right which modified our sovereignty. It yielded to her the privilege of catching and drying fish on the western and northern sides of the island.

Thus, although no territorial rights were conceded to France, the practical result was that both the early settlers and the native population were excluded from what was and is potentially the richest part of the colony. More or less, they have been excluded ever since, and the subject has been a bone of constant contention when no larger quarrel occupied the thoughts of the two governments concerned. There was, as I have indicated, more in Mr. Chamberlain's reference to Newfoundland than meets the eye of the casual reader. If France ever seeks a cause of quarrel with England in earnest, she will pursue it on the sea, and she will discover a cause of quarrel at a spot where, standing firm on moral and legal rights, England is at the same time locally vulnerable. Just such a place is Newfoundland. In regard to that island we should not be able to deny the moral claim absolutely; but, in the absence of means by which to settle the question of title, facts are more than usually valuable, and of these I will give a few.

Newfoundland is the oldest of England's colonial possessions. When we discovered and acquired the island, France had nothing to do with it whatever. We established in it such legal and other usages as the civilization of the time allowed. To this day every institution of government or commerce which is helpful to its progress was founded and maintained by English knowledge and English enterprise. In these early times, however, in Newfoundland, as in all other parts of the world which England has colonized, French ambitions have sought to share in the benefits which have accrued from the discoveries and the enterprise of our people. The French followed us to Newfoundland, just as, nearly two centuries later, they followed us to Africa. The difficulty is that in the earlier adventure they followed us with much more effect. In 1578 there were four hundred vessels engaged in the fisheries off the island. Of these only fifty were English. All the others were French and Spanish. It is on the strength of that fact, in combination with the unbusinesslike terms of the Treaty of Utrecht and its modification in 1783, that the French government of to-day affirms a moral basis for pin-pricking. As I have said, the fact is indisputable; but it is not the only one to be considered. At the time of the treaty the population of the island, the area of which is almost as large as Scotland, and potentially much wealthier, was less than the population of a humble county-town of the smallest shire in these islands. Now, according to the latest statistics available, which are those of 1891, the population is well over 200,000. Industries, the arts and commerce, have flourished proportionately. Popular government in its most modern and equitable sense has been established, and is broad-based on the people's will. In short, progress in every direction conceivable has been made. All this is entirely due to England. The part of France has invariably been to assert moral claims which she has not yet had the courage to enforce. Should she wish to do so now, or at any other time, in an endeavor to compensate herself for the disaster which has come upon her through her own folly in Egypt, we shall not feel our moral right any the less real because it is not inscribed on the parchment of Utrecht. It is much to the credit of Mr. Chamberlain that he has given the country warning of the new complication which looms darkly ahead. Even as the Constitution of the United States made no provision for the possibility that stress of unforeseen circumstances might force her to annex or acquire the Sandwich Islands, Cuba, and the Philippines, so England is not to be blamed if through the same causes she is obliged to curb French pretensions in Newfoundland.

It had seemed at one time as if the Panama scandals that threw such a lurid light on the methods of French financiers and politicians, and finally drove M. Grévy from his exalted position into the retirement of private life, were to find their parallel in England. Happily the revelations in connection with Mr. Hooley's bankruptcy, although they have excited much public interest, and even set us on the tiptoe of expectation, have not so far disclosed, at least to any appreciable extent, the same grave causes for public alarm. It is true that certain persons of high social position, and others, have sought, under Mr. Hooley's inspiration, that short and easy road to fortune which we have been taught to regard as the dream of the idle. But while the revelations of the Registrar's Court are sufficiently instructive, and by no means without their seamy side, it can hardly be said that they amount to a national indictment. The gravest incident that has come to light in this matter, and that may be said to touch the community most nearly, is the avowed attempt on Mr. Hooley's part to purchase a distinction which some good people had hitherto supposed to be the reward of recognized public service, benevolent enterprise, or efficient political support. Whilst it is substantially true that these are the grounds on which, to a very large extent, honors have been conferred, it is fair to admit that the possession of great wealth, either in personalty or in landed estates, has also been an important consideration in the distribution of titles. It would be easy to give the names of men who in our time have been granted titles for their wealth alone, but to do so would be invidious, and there is no useful purpose to be served in naming individuals when the facts are not in dispute. There was a subtle cunning in Lord Beaconsfield's remark that every country gentleman with $50,000 a year and a good character should be ennobled. The act of ennoblement confirms his loyalty and imposes a hereditary obligation of upright conduct.

The reason for this recognition of wealth can easily be traced to a characteristic national sentiment. To the average Briton the rights of property are almost as sacred as the shibboleth of law and order, and this sentiment is, in the main, responsible for the system which re-enforces the peerage and baronetage from the capitalist, merchant, and landlord class. The belief that duty as well as privilege is the accompaniment of high rank and position is so thoroughly ingrained in the minds of the majority of Englishmen that one is rather tempted to accept than dispute it. In any case, it is difficult to protest that such ideas are the survival of feudal modes of thought—traditional, sentimental, archaic—when one is assured by practical, matter-of-fact, successful people, who call into service no imagination, that they are satisfied that the possession of wealth and its employment in certain directions are ennobling of themselves and constitute claims to distinction.

It did not require the public investigation into Mr. Hooley's affairs to prove that all parties in the state need money wherewith to grease their machinery, and that party officials are always very willing to obtain it on terms; but it is greatly to Lord Salisbury's credit that in this case he exercised a sound discrimination. By returning Mr. Hooley's check for $250,000 and refusing the baronetcy he showed a wisdom and foresight for which in other matters he has not always been distinguished, and saved the country from an unpleasant scandal. It is idle, however, to contend that the various peers, honorables, and right honorables who have contaminated themselves by dealing with Hooley are not smirched by contact. The late Archbishop Whately was fond of saying that the man who associated with chimney-sweepers must get smutted. The Hooley breed has existed from all time. The South-Sea Bubble and the cycle boom are of the same family. Circumstances only differ. Of the intermediary in the Hooley baronetcy affair, Sir William Marriott, himself a Privy Councillor, I can only say that, having had agreeable relations with him in former years, I am surprised that, having occupied the position of Judge-Advocate-General, he could have fallen into such a company. The one satisfactory feature of the Hooley business is that there is a general desire to get at the truth, and that the people who have made haste to get rich too quickly are socially irretrievably maimed.

ARNOLD WHITE.

FREDERIC REMINGTON'S STATUETTES: "THE WICKED PONY," AND "THE TRIUMPH."

It is not an unusual thing for an artist temporarily to abandon his pencil and brushes and seek expression in sculpture. As one of them said the other day, "There is a fascination in being able to get around your figures and see how they look at the back, and the process forces you to a reliance upon form and gives a directness to your method of work." It is quite in accord with the energy and straightforwardness of Mr. Remington's style that he should occasionally stop working on the flat, with its illusions and make-believes, and revel in the actual "round." Hitherto he had given us "The Bronco Buster" and "The Wounded Bunkie," both works of remarkable strenuousness and daring. They are frankly realistic, but their realism is of a character that must command unstinted admiration. It is not the kind that is displayed in reproducing all the imperfections as well as the good points of a model that maintains a fixed pose as long as needed. In such work there is nothing commendable; it is an absolute negation of art, which presupposes the expression of some idea personal to the artist. In Mr. Remington's case there is no question of the mental picture. It is of the most vivid and assured kind, resulting from a faculty of observation quite extraordinary in its comprehensiveness. What he has seen in his study of horses and their riders he has seen with such completeness that he can record with accuracy an action which was momentary, or which passed before his eyes like a flash. A preference for such which makes an appeal to the imagination cannot interfere with one's admiration for such evidence of genius as this.

Of these later statuettes, one, "The Wicked Pony," recalls the qualities of the earlier ones. The man has been thrown and is lying flat. He has caught the pony by its ear and pins its head to the ground. The brute realizes its impotence, and is lashing out with its hind legs. The question is, will the man in getting on to his feet succeed in keeping his hold? It is one of those questions that are apt to be decided in less time than is spent in asking them, and the remarkable feature of the composition from a technical point of view is that though the action is momentary, its retention in bronze does not make it seem stiff. The movement throughout is free and spontaneous.

The other statuette has high qualities of a different order. Its subject is "The Triumph," and it represents an Indian reining in his horse and rising in his seat as he holds aloft a scalp. It is not a tour de force that we are here called upon to admire, but a serious attempt to express a moment's energy by methods reposeful and dignified. As a thing to live with, this group is more agreeable than the others, and technically it is superior. The composition is built up with a true feeling for what is big and impressive. The line made by the horse's fore leg upon the ground and the man's arm is an axis of determined energy, around which the rest of the parts are distributed with an excellent sense of balance. There is also a fine crescendo of energy. If you trace it upwards you will find no anticlimax; the supreme point, in every sense, is the clinched fist. They are cast by the Henry-Bonnard Co.

It is interesting to study Mr. Remington's method of modelling. It is not so much that of a sculptor as of a black-and-white artist—suggestive rather than thorough. For example, on the hind quarters, especially around the hip, there is an arrangement of light and shade, very effective in its broad and suggestive treatment. The attitudes, on the other hand—the points where a sculptor would concentrate his energy—are flat and nerveless. The fetlocks and pasterns, for instance, do not suggest the tension which the pose of the horse must have put upon them. These statuettes should be taken for what they are intended to be—vivid representations expressed with determined directness. More attention to detail might have marred their spontaneity.

CHARLES H. CAFFIN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

"DEAR me! Dear me!" exclaimed our Uncle Samuel. "That's a fat stocking!"

He lay in bed on Christmas morning regarding it. There it hung, long, fat, and knobby, from the chimney-piece around the big fireplace—big for a modern fire-place—in our uncle's bedroom. Our uncle has reached a time of life when he wakes early in the morning, but unless there is special occasion for hustling he does not rise when he wakes, but lies abed and thinks. For an hour he had been regarding his stocking with quiet meditation, without the least show of eagerness to get at it. He always hangs his stocking up, and every year this ever-so-long, Father Time or Santa Claus or some one has filled it overnight with the year's accumulations, so our uncle is pretty well used to fat stockings, and they no longer excite him.

But this year's stocking was fatter than usual. Uncle Sam lay still and looked at it and sighed. Then he turned on his back and sighed again.

"Darn it!" said Uncle Sam.

The stocking stirred; a head popped out of the top of it. There was a soft soldier hat on the head. It looked at Uncle Sam and grunted and popped back. But the stocking began to get impatient, and when our uncle looked at it again there were jerky motions visible through its texture.

"Bless me!" said Uncle Sam, and with that he got up and put on his dressing-gown. Then lifting the stocking from the nail, he took it by the toe and shook its contents all out in a heap on the bed. Then he had to smile, for all that he was feeling pretty grim, considering it was Christmas morning, for the contents hastened to separate themselves from one another, just as football-players do when the umpire shouts something, or angle-worms when you tip them out of the bait-box. They scrambled about on the counterpane, sorting out and grabbing their several effects, which in most cases were military hats and equipments which had been shaken off in the overturn. They were puppets, a lively lot of them, and in a jiffy they had themselves in order and were standing in a group on the uneven surface of the bed.

COLUMBIA ENCOUNTERS THE BIRD OF DESTINY.

"Bless me!" said Uncle Sam, and picked up the whole lot of them at once in his big hands and set them down very carefully on the large round table that stands in his room. Then he drew on his trousers and sat down and looked at them. There was one very lively one in eye-glasses and a soft hat with the brim skewered up at the sides in a fantastic sort of way, and this one, as soon as his feet found a fair surface, bustled about like anything and had all the others up in a line, with himself at one end of it, and then they all saluted Uncle Sam.

"Good morning, dears," said our uncle, and they all said good-morning. Then the abnormally brisk one came forward two steps, and saluted with so much animation that he made Uncle Sam grin with as much cheerfulness as any grown man can feel before breakfast. "Here we are, uncle," said he—"here we are, wishing you a merry Christmas and fetching you the fruits of victory." And then he smiled so widely that Uncle Sam smiled back almost as cheerfully, and his eyes twinkled, and picking that puppet up, he looked him over, with evident amusement and satisfaction, from the bullet holes in his hat to the jagged edge of his sword and his spurs with the broken rowels. The brisk puppet was so active that his arms and legs moved up and down in the air while our uncle was looking at him, which made the old man chuckle. As soon as his feet touched the table again he scampered off to the end of the line and grasped by the hand a particularly spruce and dignified puppet in an admiral's uniform, and led him forward, followed by a little group of others in various outlandish costumes. The spruce puppet saluted our uncle, and our uncle gravely returned his salute, and looked at him long and with close attention. He did not pick him up, for indeed he was not the sort of puppet that invited familiarities, but presently he wrote something in a little book which lay near him. Then he bowed, and the spruce puppet fell back, and our uncle considered the little group that had followed him. They were dark-complexioned folk, not very big, but well put together and proportioned. Most of them had straight hair, but among them were a few under-sized negroes. One or two of them bustled about with some show of authority, but, as a whole, they seemed an orderly and sober-minded group. All the other puppets were interested in them, the spruce puppet regarding them with an air which had in it something of paternal responsibility, while the brisk puppet went behind them to where the spruce puppet stood, and evidently put questions to him about them. Uncle Sam picked up every man of them one by one, and scrutinized everything about each one from his hair to his feet, noting the clothes that he wore and their texture, the shape of his head, his muscles, his complexion, his hands and whether they showed signs of work, his weapons when he had weapons, and his label when he had a label. Most of them did have labels, as "Luzon," "Panay," "Mindanao," and other outlandish names; and one or two funny ones, unlike the rest, who made Uncle Sam smile in the midst of his seriousness, turned out to be labelled "Guam." On the outskirts of this group was another little group which seemed related to it, though not part of it, which was labelled "Hawaii," and this lot too Uncle Sam regarded with attention, though not with the intimate scrutiny he bestowed on the others. Presently he fell into so brown a study over them all that the spruce puppet shifted his position, stretched himself a little, and turned aside his head to hide a yawn, observing which the brisk puppet saluted again and marched the whole group back to their place.

SAMMY'S SUGAR-PLUMS.

Back he came again with another squad, and fetched them up so energetically that our uncle was stirred from his meditations, and his eyes ceased to stare and began to see again. These too were dark men, but not so dark as the former ones. Neither were their clothes so odd, but in most ways they were more like what we would be if we were puppets and not real people. There were no great number of them, and one or two puppets in generals' uniforms, who marched up with them, exchanged cheerful salutes with Uncle Sam and caused him to write down more names in his little book. One of this group the old man picked up and looked at his label, as if to make sure, and reading "Puerto Rico" on it, he glanced at a cabinet in the corner in which many other puppets had already been placed, and seemed to find spare space there for this group too.

Then he nodded his head, and this squad went back, and the brisk puppet marched up another group, not unlike its predecessor, but larger, more various, and superintended by divers admirals and generals and captains and supervisors, variously equipped. In this group the brisk puppet seemed to take the most interest of all, especially when a lot more names went into Uncle Sam's book. Many of the puppets in this group were ragged and worn. Most of them were shaky on their legs, and some fell down in the ranks. Uncle Sam looked at them sorrowfully, and drummed on the table with his fingers and whistled very low and thoughtfully long after the brisk puppet had marched them all back. Then he left them there, and dressed himself and went to breakfast.

PEACE.

"Merry Christmas, Samuel!" cried Columbia, as she reached out for his coffee-cup.

"Merry Christmas, Columbia!" replied Uncle Sam.

"My goodman seems worn this morning. Let me get his coffee into him quickly."

"Worn! And good reason, Columbia. Such a stocking-ful as I have left upstairs! All those new families that we've got mixed up with lately have been sending me samples."

"Nice people?"

"No doubt, but not at all our kind. A good many colored families, and the notion of more colored families makes me a bit nervous. Lots of brown families—very nice straight-haired brown families, dressed mostly in night-shirts, and with no more notion of a ballot-box than a Methodist has of incense. All shades of brown families, from drab to burnt-umber, speaking anything that comes handy, and professing all phases of piety—the Holy Father's, the Sultan's—all except ours; fire-worshippers, idol-worshippers—every kind, I guess, except plain, pious, dollar-worshipping Protestants. I'm that rattled with the various eccentricities of them that I have turns of wishing our folks had just sat still and not meddled."

"Come, come, Sam! Cheer up! You can't expect everything to come right all at once; neither can you expect something for nothing. You got some considerable satisfactions this last year. There's our friend Bull. It was worth a good deal, really, to know how excellent his disposition is towards us."

"Surely. My heart really warms to Bull. I wish I had his faculty of getting on with these brown families. He seems to do well by them, and they by him, and the more of them there are, and the more kinds of religion they have, and the farther off they live, the better he seems to like it. You see, Bull has webbed feet, as he should have, to be sure, living as he does on that little island, which really isn't much more than a rock to dive off of. Of course our folks here can swim a stroke or two at a pinch, but, cracky! some of those samples upstairs have come ten thousand miles! If we start an agency as far off as that, how ever shall I have the face to meet my old friend James Monroe? You remember how set James was against letting outsiders stake out claims in our neighborhood, for fear they'd involve us in their quarrels. What he'd say to our being interested in these brown people who live in a regular nest of jealous neighbors I'm sure I don't know."

UNDER THE MISTLETOE.

"But Bull has agencies out there, Sam."

"Oh yes, Bull has; but Bull's Bull. He's got to have 'em. That's his business. I tell you I wish, more'n half the time, that after our boy George had done his job he'd cut for home. But, after all, running's not much in George's line, and it's a long ways, and I'm not sure that George, blown as he was, had the wind and the legs for it."

"It's been a good season for some of our boys, Sam."

"Oh yes. I'm proud of the boys."

"There's Theodore. Since he ran up the hill that time and got so much credit he's been just bursting with energy, and over in Manhattan and thereabouts they think there's nothing too good for him. I believe that if he lives to really grow up he'll be one of the handiest men in the family, Sam; and, really, he's older now than I ever supposed he'd get to be."

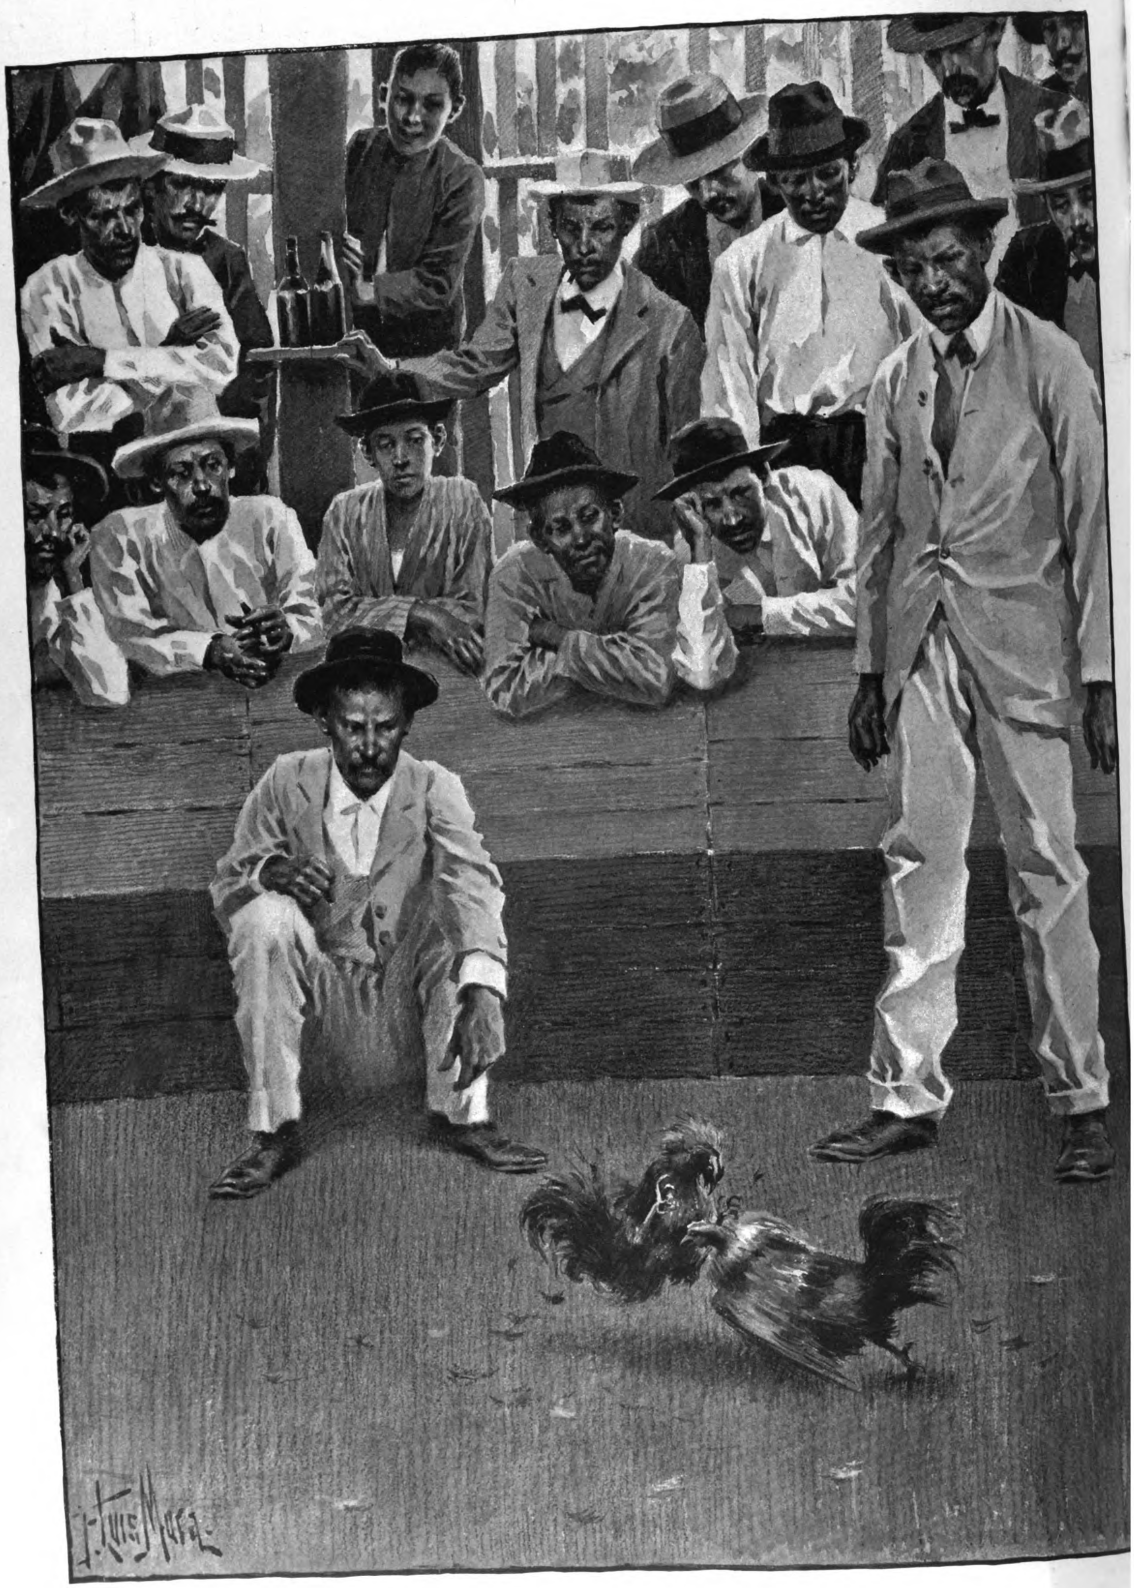
"Oh yes, Columbia, Theodore's a good lad, and if he only keeps his wheels on his feet he's bound to skim along."

"And William Sampson, Sam, and all those fine fellows with him, and plucky little Joe, and dozens and scores and hundreds of others, hundreds and thousands of others, and more and more and more behind them. Nobody knew what a family we had before we had this trouble, and the neighbors have never been so polite to me as they have been of late. I tell you, Sam, there's been a lot of good, and if some of what comes with it looks like evil, you'd better just harden your heart and gulp it down. I haven't fed pie into you all these years without learning something about the strength of your digestion. And as for James Monroe, you can explain to James that circumstances alter cases, and that when a man takes hold he can't always let go just when it happens to suit him."

"There's no logic to you, Columbia. You talk, like every woman who is really valuable, not as you think, but as you happen to feel. You know as well as I how much it is due to your sentimentalism that we ever got into this mess. What did my old friend Marquis Lafayette use to tell me? 'When you find yourself in a scrape, Sam,' says he, 'cherchez la femme.' That's you, Columbia! You work like a mechanical toy. Touch your heart, and you shut your eyes. I tell you those brown families live ten thousand miles off, in a climate that makes our folks sick."

"And if you let them alone, Sam, what then?"

"There'll be the mischief to pay, I suppose, until some one of the neighbors steps in and stops it. And like enough the neighbors will fight to settle as to which one of them shall step in."



"And how will that suit you, Sam?"

"Just there's the trouble, Columbia."

"My poor old Sam! That's one trouble at least that he will never suffer from. More coffee, grumbler? No! Then I'd hurry up stairs. There's a rumpus there, and I judge the samples have got to fighting."

E. S. MARTIN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CHRISTMAS IN PUERTO RICO—A COCK-FIGHT AT CAGUAS.

DRAWN BY F. LUIS MORA.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HOLIDAY FESTIVITIES AT THE UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY, WEST POINT—THE CHRISTMAS HOP.—Drawn by Howard Chandler Christy.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

JOHANNA GADSKI,
Soprano, of "The Charles A. Ellis Opera Company," Philadelphia.
Copyright, 1898, by A. Dupont.

MUSIC

ART makes the world's faithfulest and longest holiday. Its gifts are not restricted to a Christmas-tide profusion, any more than is music limited by the stately loveliness of the Adeste Fideles and the joyous Magnificat. Rich and fruitful indeed are the topics latent in this immediate hour of the local musical season. They press on one's conscience and taste and enthusiasm. The splendid course of opera at the Metropolitan, sung alternately in three tongues—to which a fourth one, our own, so readily could be added under the circumstances—suggests by itself half a dozen considerations worthy of the pens of the most careful reviewers, and meriting the perusal of all readers who have other than a superficial feeling for opera's charm and its lasting welfare. At least three or four of these topics—in certain instances queries—will not be fubbed off much longer. For the moment, however, unmistakable are the claims on a reviewer's office as merely a recording angel. My duty is the merely historical one toward what Miranda calls "a tale to cure deafness."

The Holiday of the World's Heart.

Says Byron, cynically, if with much perception,

> The devil hath not, in all his quiver's choice,
> An arrow for the heart like a sweet voice.

Symmetrical, and full of a beauty of vocalism that one well may seek New York this winter to relish, have been the performances at our Opera House thus far. We may expect the links in the season's long chain to be as glittering to the end. But even in noting here the Juliette of a Melba, the Violetta of a Sembrich, it is on M. Albert Saléza's tenor that the intensest interest of the city has been centred since this admirable French artist appeared in Gounod's "Roméo et Juliette." I am sorry that M. Saléza is not likely to have a chance this season to show himself to New-Yorkers in three or four of the impersonations that best suit him, as a singer and actor scarcely surpassed in Europe to-day. But he is an adaptive artist, as well as one gifted. If he do not sing Mathó, Mylio, Otello, or Siegmund, the strange beauty of his voice, and even the fierce flash of his dramatic fire, will be quite plainly shown as Roméo, Don José, or Raoul de Nangis. M. Saléza's voice is one among a hundred French ones in size, in sweetness, in steadiness, in purity of intonation and volume, in the passionate warmth and finish of usage that have grown more and more peculiar, not to Italy, but to Gallic lands and training. These traits are often ill represented by other men singers from Paris. Often compared with Capoul—in amatory rôles—Saléza really advances on that favorite of twenty years ago. Saléza is more the tenor to recall Italo Campanini, as Campanini was circa 1878–9, before overwork for Mr. Mapleson did him remediless injury. M. Saléza's voice dominates the stage, evenly and richly; it fills the house from parquet to amphitheatre, as did the voice of Campanini, or as does that of M. Jean de Reszké. This is the case in spite of the fact that M. Saléza shows neither a particularly mobile countenance like Van Dyck's, nor a divorce from stage conventions such as does Jean de Reszké. But Saléza's lithe nervosity of movement (when swift movements are to be made), his poses that are almost invariably effective, the buoyant suggestion of virile full-blooded youth in all that he does, even when it is done with a touch of real gaucherie, are traits that add seduction. Such a singer is that rarest creature just now to be exploited by an operamanager—a versatile young tenor without the faulty tricks of the French school, who shall carry by storm the coldest patronage of a foreign audience when singing parts that it knows almost as well as the artist himself knows them. M. Saléza's success here has been practically unqualified, and Mr. Grau's discretion in importing him is already blessed. He is still a young man, born in 1867. He was a Paris Conservatory graduate in 1888. He has been of vogue since the hour of his début in Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys," at the Opéra Comique. There, by-the-bye, he alternated with M. Gibert, another superior French tenor, just now a star dependence of Mr. Charley's large company in New Orleans.

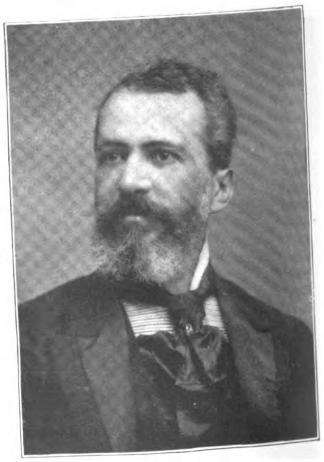
ALBERT ALVAREZ,
Tenor, of "The Charles A. Ellis Opera Company," Philadelphia.

By-the-bye, let us not fancy that we are having all the good and interesting opera to ourselves, even if Mr. Grau's Napoleonic policy is setting before us the most majestic names. Three or four other social centres are active this year, not only in symphonic concerts, but in superior operatic rewards for all the virtuous. Almost simultaneously with the inauguration of our own operatic week, both New Orleans and Philadelphia have started upon their seasons, which are of a strength unusual. In Philadelphia, it will be remembered, Mr. Charles A. Ellis is the supreme impresario. There now exists, however, a fine treaty of reciprocity between him and Mr. Grau that makes their singers interchangeable between New York and Philadelphia, almost without exception. The first Philadelphia performance was "Faust," sung in French. In "Faust" Madame Melba was the Marguerite, and the Faust was M. Bonnard, a French tenor, who made a considerable impression. Mesdames Ternina and Gadski, and Messrs. Pandolfini (a rather superior Italian tenor lately heard here in concert), Andreas Dippel, Albert Alvarez, and Ernest Kraus are only a fraction of Mr. Ellis's large troupe. Alvarez is another signally important loan from the Paris Opéra, where he has a heavy responsibility in the heroic and lyric routine. M. Alvarez's best part is his Samson, in Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah," and while his voice shows wear, it is resonant, large, and dramatic in timbre. Madame Ternina has been briefly heard here, and, like Madame Gadski, is, in German opera, of first rank. As for that fair and far-away French city of the South, New Orleans, ever an aristocratic as well as old home of French opera in this country (the only one where a municipal support ever has been given to it), Mr. Charley, the present manager of the opera, has a fine company and a large subscription. His forces include Mesdames Fièrens, Dalzen, Phillips, Bergès, Savine, and Pouget, and the Messrs. Gibert (whom I recall in "Le Roi d'Ys," Paris, years ago as an excellent young artist), Gaidan, Godefroy, Gauthier, and Darnead. Madame Fièrens has pleased the New Orleans public as Valentine. The size of the New Orleans Opera House admits of both grand and light opera, a happy variety. Thus "Les Huguenots," "L'Africaine," "Il Trovatore" ("Le Trouvère") are relieved by "La Mascotte" and "Fra Diavolo." It is worth while to notice that in San Francisco, where there is a large German population, such a taxing work as Goldmark's "Die Königin von Saba" was given last month with general local praise.

Opera in Philadelphia, New Orleans, and San Francisco.

EDOUARD DE RESZKE,
Barytone Bass, of "The Maurice Grau Opera Company."
Copyright, 1898, by A. Dupont.

ALBERT SALÉZA,
Tenor, of "The Maurice Grau Opera Company."
Copyright, 1898, by A. Dupont.



If I am speaking of opera at all, I should not forget that the Castle Square Company, at the American Theatre in this city, is now carrying on Puccini's "La Bohème" for a second week, with noteworthy musical success and a most beautiful and accurate scenic dress. What a commentary on the intelligence, so often underrated, of the real musical public of the city! Does Fifth Avenue know that excellent work and works are to be heard so far westward of Arline's marble halls? Certainly Eighth Avenue may unawares reach nearer to a state of musical grace than Lenox Hill. "La Bohème" is evidence and to spare. Miss Yvonne de Treville, Miss Knox, Mr. Sheehan, and Mr. Chase are at their best in this difficult score.

The Castle Square Company in "La Bohème."

Wars and conquests and the heart-beats of patriotism do not always do their duty as musical inspirations, even if Handel's noble "Dettingen" Te Deum, his overwhelming "Utrecht" Jubilate, and Beethoven's "Heroic" Symphony argue otherwise. But the splendid first performance, some nights ago, of Mr. Walter Damrosch's "Manila" Te Deum, sung by the Oratorio Society at Carnegie Hall, put Mr. Damrosch forward not as the writer of a dull opera, but of a powerful, dignified, and often most beautiful piece of religious music; infused with military exultation wholly becoming and wholly impressive. Mr. Damrosch is not a strong melodist; but in the dignity of this sumptuous choral work that lack is little felt. The finest numbers are perhaps the "Sanctus" and "Thou art the King of Glory, O Christ," and the uplifting, imposing conclusion—at which the audience rose by a common and due impulse. Mr. Damrosch is under stood to have given up most of his conductorial work, that he may compose. If this, the first-fruit of his resolve, be the predecessor of others so fair, he has chosen the better part. The quartet of singers—Mesdames Emma Juch, Gertrude May Stein, and Messrs. Theodore van Yorx and Heinrich Meyn—sang extremely well—Madame Juch in chief.

Mr. Damrosch's "Manila" Te Deum.

E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

LUIGI MANCINELLI,
Composer and Conductor, of "The Maurice Grau Opera Company."
Copyright, 1896, by A. Dupont.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Herbert Witherspoon (Colline). Harold Butler (Schaunard). Villa Knox (Musetta). Frank Moulan (Alcindoro). Joseph Sheehan (Rudolph). Yvonne de Treville (Mimi). W. G. Stewart (Marcel).

CONCLUDING SCENE OF ACT II. OF PUCCINI'S OPERA "LA BOHÈME," AT THE AMERICAN THEATRE, NEW YORK.

ONCE upon a time, so long ago that nobody now alive remembers it, there lived a Little Boy who knew how to have fun in his own back yard. He made mud pies, and made believe he ate them and liked them. He folded a leaf from his daddy's morning paper and made a hat that he thought as fine as any soldier ever wore. He whittled a sword out of a lath, and with it slew dragons in the hen-coop. He stole the cook's broom, and in a jiffy the handle was a horse that galloped him round and round the back yard. Altogether he learned how to do so many things, and to have so much fun with them, that there wasn't a boy on the block that was as bright or had as happy a laugh. When Christmas came, his father said, "Little Boy has such a good time with his broomstick that I think I'll give him a real hobby-horse." His mother gave him a soldier suit and hat. His uncle gave him a little tin sword, and a gun that shot pellets. His aunt, who couldn't bear to see his hands dirty, gave him a real mince pie. For a week Little Boy thought he was the happiest boy alive, and he laughed as he had never laughed before. But he broke his sword the very first day. He pranced about the front street in his new soldier clothes until his mother had to call him home and keep him there. Then, with his gun, he shot the neighbors' cats on the back fences, until the gun had to be taken away. Finally he got terribly tired of riding a horse in the nursery, that never took him anywhere. I forgot to say that the mince pie made him positively sick. At the end of a fortnight he had lost his happy laugh; and one day his mother, to get rid of him, said, "Why don't you go out and play with your old things in the back yard?" She was very much surprised to find that he didn't care for them any more. To this day nobody knows why his free and hearty laugh has gone, and why he has become such a stupid, dissatisfied boy.

The Gifts of Santa Claus.

In no previous season have the American theatres received such a wealth of Christmas gifts from abroad as in the season that is now at its height. The most successful German farce of last year, "Im Weissen Rössl," is excellently presented at the Irving Place Theatre. The most flagrant Parisian obscenity has passed its hundredth night at a Tenderloin theatre. The merriest French farce, Bisson's "On and Off," is running indefinitely at the Madison Square. The most praised comedy, Lavedan's "Catherine" has outrun our wildest hopes at the Garrick. "Cyrano de Bergerac" is poking his nose into every town in this broad land of ours. As for English, the two leading melodramas, "Sporting Life" and "The Christian," are still dazzling the multitude; and comedies from the two leading dramatists, Henry Arthur Jones's (or Oscar Wilde's) "The Liars," and Arthur W. Pinero's "Trelawny of the Wells," have an indefinite grip on the Empire and the Lyceum respectively. Moreover, all these gifts from over-sea are more than adequately staged and acted. For quite a while now we have all laughed with all our hearts, and any one who didn't know would think us the brightest and happiest little boy on the block.

Hæc Fabula docet ....

In one way perhaps we are. We know how to appreciate the Gemüthlichkeit of "Im Weissen Rössl." We gorge the spicy Parisian obscenity as if it were a New England mince pie. We applaud the skill and verve of "On and Off"; we grasp the intimately Gallic motive of "Catherine." To hear us rave over "Cyrano" one would think we knew something of the Hôtel de Rambouillet. Though essentially not a sporting nation, we enjoy the whiff of the stable in "Sporting Life," and Heaven only knows what worse thing it is we like in "The Christian." We are up to date with the atmosphere of fast English society in "The Liars," and we know enough of the Leech girl and her crinolines to be touch for touch with "Trelawny." In a word, I doubt if there is another public anywhere that would receive the intellectual wares of all nations with such undiscriminating discrimination.

The American Cosmopolite.

Undoubtedly clever as all this is, there is something that it is emphatically not. The one thing we Americans can't find on our stage is our own minds and hearts. We may like to gorge ourselves with the French pâté that so delights the Tenderloin, but in the end it will make us sick in a way that the home-made pie never can. It may be a lot of fun to strut with Cyrano in a soldier suit from France, but that is not the way we learned to fight at Bunker Hill and at San Juan. If the drama has any real use it is to give a fitting and a lasting form to all the best things we feel. By doing so it rouses in us the sense of what we are and what we are good for, and makes that sense a power. We are still having no end of a good time with our Christmas gifts, but by-and-by the Goddess of Liberty will grow tired of it all, and ask us why we don't run out into our own back yard and play with our mud pies and lath swords.

"Clever, but is it Art?"

Meantime we have learned that our back yard is only a back yard. After seeing "Cyrano," who would go to "The Maine Avenged," or to "Red, White, and Blue"? Who cares for "Uncle Dick," even though Mr. Sol Smith Russell did bring a beam of good American sunshine into its dreary void? Mr. Augustus Thomas's "The Medler," even with Mr. Stuart Robson to make it live, lacks the scenic aptitude we find in "The Liars" and "Trelawny." Of all the new plays of the season, thus far, Miss Irwin's "Kate Kip, Buyer" has most of the spirit of American life. Let us get all the satisfaction we can out of that!

American Life as seen from our own Back Yard.

Our latest hope was Mr. E. W. Presbury's "Worth a Million," with which Mr. William H. Crane opened at the Knickerbocker. The play has died almost without a struggle, but, because of its obvious effort to be artistically American, it is worth while to find out why it failed. The alleged amusement in the play is caused in part by the fact that an alleged lady has induced a man to propose marriage to her, in cold blood, for the purpose of bringing an alleged gentleman, whom she loves, to the point of proposing himself. She assumes that the alleged gentleman will cavesdrop if he gets the chance, and, to be sure, he does. All the people in the play are obtrusively fashionable. They talk glibly of a hotel called The Waldorf; they take runaway lunches at a confectioner's named Maillard, and relate what they ate with the unrelenting exactitude of a menu, even adding how much they paid for it all; and they bet boxes of something called Huyler's, with an air of savoir-faire. To clap the anticlimax, they allude to Hoboken as the acme of vulgarity and pretentiousness. The citizens of Hoboken have seldom had greater cause to complain. To any one who did not know their city it must seem self-evident that the people of the play all hailed from there, and were struggling to conceal the fact. It is almost a public duty to protest that in no part of any country could so many men and women be found who are so ill born and ill bred. In view of the fact that the play makes so great a virtue of dealing with American life, perhaps we all have a grievance. The long and short of it is, we have had so many new toys to play with that our own poor things are a bore.

The Wisdom of Santa Claus.

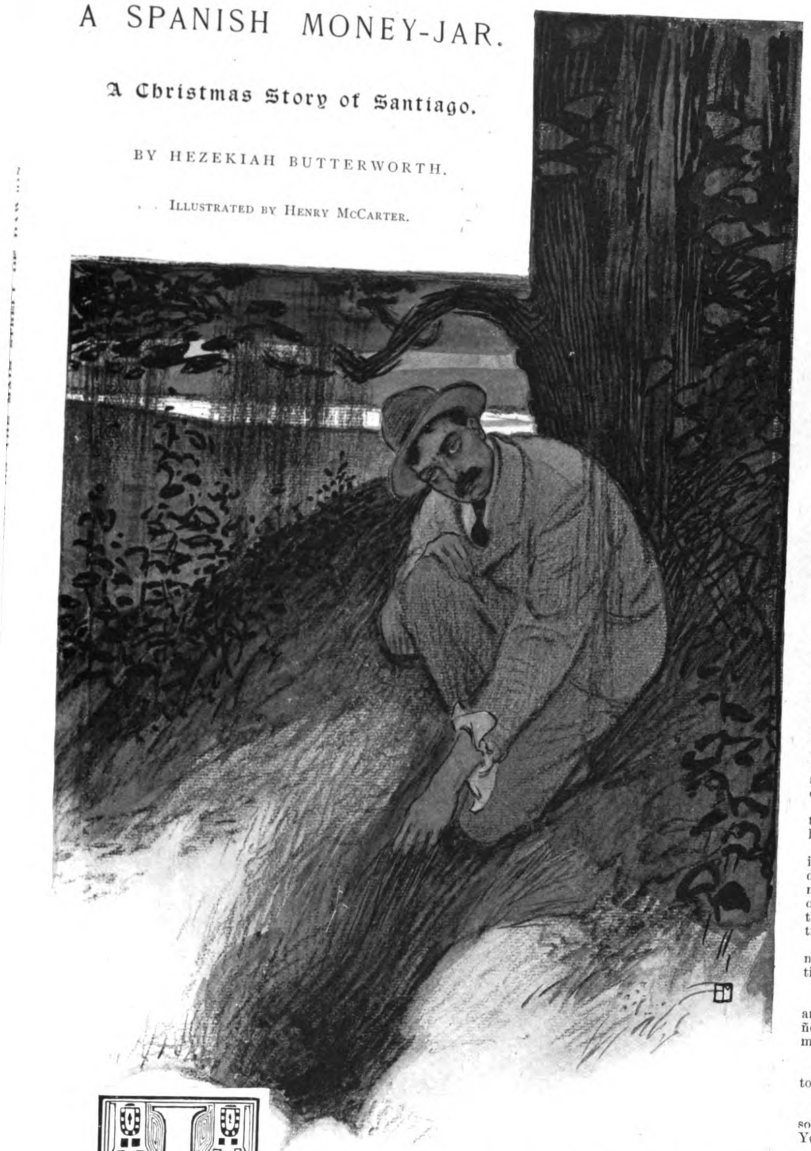
It would be easy to pull a long face over all this. Perhaps it would not be quite just. After all, Santa Claus, like most saintly and reverend parties, is, in the main, to be trusted. Little Boy would have learned by himself in the course of years that a mud pie is a mud pie, and a broomstick a broomstick. Perhaps Santa Claus knew all the time that a hobby-horse is the shortest cut from a broomstick to a Pegasus. In the end we shall learn that a French obscenity makes us sick, and that Gascon "langwidges" and a Gascon soldier suit have very little to do with the way we speak and fight. On the other hand, the lessons they have taught us in the mechanics and the literary capabilities of the drama are likely to endure. At least, people of our race have frequently been indebted to Latin races for a hint as to some new way of amusing ourselves. It has been gravely argued that in all the great eras in English literature the impulse has come from without; and it does seem as if the Anglo-Saxon temperament had to be thoroughly galvanized before it wakes up to the fact that about the most interesting things in this very interesting world are poems and pictures and plays. Chaucer took most of his stories, much of his versification, and perhaps all of his literary inspiration from French, Italian, and classical sources. Shakspere borrowed most of his plots and much of his manner directly, or indirectly, from the Continent. The lines in which Portia describes an English gentleman are suggestive on this point: "How oddly he is suited! I think he bought his doublet in Italy, his round hose in France, his bonnet in Germany, and his behavior everywhere." The Elizabethan poet was of a piece with the Elizabethan gentleman. Perhaps we Americans should be glad we have the cosmopolitanism of our very worthy ancestors. So wake up, you playwrights, and let us forget our mud pies and put off our soldier clothes. These foreign playthings are all well enough for a while, but we must grow up sufficiently to write and to enjoy the kind of plays that come home to us. Such plays are more fun and last longer than almost anything else in this bustling world, and when they come laughing down from generation to generation they hold a nation together in a way nothing else can.

JOHN CORBIN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CHRISTMAS IN THE KLONDIKE—HOLIDAY GREETINGS BETWEEN AN "EL DORADO KING" AND A "DOG-PUNCHER" ON THE MAIN STREET OF DAWSON.
Drawn by Tappan Adney.—[See Page 1243.]



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

A SPANISH MONEY-JAR.

A Christmas Story of Santiago.

BY HEZEKIAH BUTTERWORTH.

ILLUSTRATED BY HENRY MCCARTER.

IT was at the English consulate at Santiago de Cuba, where might be gathered tales that would have saved the head of the lovely vizier's daughter of Arabian romance, the enchanting Scheherazade. Such places are the Southern consulates, where float the lazy clouds of light cigars in palm-cooled air, with the blue sea rolling before them, and the still sky burning above. Such used to be the English consulate of the "City of Cuba," as the ancient collection of houses on the yellow mountain-side under the protection of St. James (Santiago) was called.

Some chance remarks made on a balcony of the consular office, by the vice-consul to a manager of the Cobre (copper) mines, were my first introduction to the strange story that I have to tell. Sitting in the cool, and looking listlessly down on the water-bright harbor—a bowl in the mountain, as it were—this consular agent said:

"I have often been sent by the consul to take charge of the effects of the dying. This is one of the curious duties of the consulate. The wishes of a dying man are sacred. To fulfil them is to be blessed, led, and prospered. To ignore them is to lose the right direction of life!"

He spoke the words absently, as though he thought he was overheard by some spirit in the air.

The dreamy remark started me on a new train of thought. I leaned forward and said,

"Mr. Mascaline, do the dead know?"

"Know? Yes. I am not a spiritualist, but I believe that those whom we help here come back and help us in the visions of a larger life. I am not a Catholic, but I have come to think that the Catholic doctrine of the Communion of Saints as applied to souls that are invisible is founded on eternal truth. The dead do know, and they give right and holy direction to the lives of those who once helped them in their need. I could tell you tales."

"Señor Mascaline, I have always thought that vice-consuls were engaged only in commercial things. I never saw before what an opportunity is given them for the study of spiritual mysteries, and I am glad to find that your experiences have led you to such cheerful views of the future, and to the kinship of departed souls, if such there be, to the living. Tell me some story of your consular life that has led you to your present views."

"Have you been listening to what is going on in the street?"

I had not. He referred to a religious procession—a common thing. Bells were beating the breathless air. A band of music was playing some far-away Andalusian air. It was surrounded by a moving crowd of negroes and peons. Then came military officers glittering in insignia, holding their hats in one hand and candles in the other; the Governor-General followed, glittering with the regalia of his office, a man of gold. Then the city council, and after them white-robed priests, and a gorgeous catafalque borne on the shoulders of negroes, on which was a jewelled image of the Virgin.

As the image passed under our eyes like a vision, Mr. Mascaline said:

"That is the Virgin of Charity. Her shrine is at the village of Cobre, near the copper-mines, some twelve miles from here. The value of the offerings to the shrine of the Virgin of Charity amounted to $30,000 in a single year."

He then told me the legend of this image—a wonder which was found drifting upon the sea.

"Do you believe the legend, señor?" I asked.

"No."

"Do you believe in making offerings to such a shrine?"

"Ah, my friend, I am not so clear there. Sacrifices of faith lift the soul into spiritual light. Let me tell you the tale of an offering that was made to that shrine by a young Englishman who did not believe the legend of the Virgin of the sea. It is a Christmas story. Christmas is a joy here; the world all seems to be born again when the bells of the cathedral are echoed from the mountain-side. It is a story that will illustrate what I mean when I say that the wishes of the dead are sacred, and that in fulfilling them we bring favorable influences into our lives—wings, white wings—angels' wings. Did you never read in the ancient Scriptures how that one prayed that 'angels' wings might encompass him like a wall'? You may think me superstitious, but I mind that they do, my American friend—I mind that they do."

He leaned on a table, on which were cards which he never played, and a bottle of aguardiente from which he never drank. His life followed the best traditions of the Church of England, and had become spiritualized beyond any set forms.

"Did you ever see a Spanish money-jar?" he began.

"No, señor."

"They are made of clay, with round bowls and long necks, like water-jars. They were once used for the purpose of burying money."

He added:

"The grandees used them in the times of the pirates and boucaniers. The Church buried them in the patios. The peons buried them in their gardens. When the peons were dying they would tell the secret of the places where their money-jars were buried to some relatives or friends, and they in turn would tell it to others in their last hours. So a Spanish money-jar would lie buried in the same place, under the same date-palm or ceiba (cottonwood) tree for generations. A money-jar is the subject of my story.

"Some twenty years or more ago there came to Santiago a young English naturalist named Ralph Marlowe. He was a dissipated man, and soul and body had both been weakened by dissolute habits. But he had a warm, generous heart and a high sense of honor, which he had been too weak to follow. There was the making of a glorious man in him, and he won my affections in spite of his weakness, as some men do.

"He was the son of a baronet. He had been sent adrift from home on account of a scandal that he had brought upon a proud family. He turned naturalist as an excuse to hide his ruined influence. What he needed was a return to honor, but what he wanted was money. How could he become rich in this far-away Spanish province of Santiago? This question haunted him continually.

"One day, as we were seated in the consulate as you and I are now, a strange thing happened. The building began to tremble. The whole city trembled as if shaken by an invisible giant; dust clouds rose from the mountains; the harbor grew dark, and towers fell down. People rushed into the streets, crying 'Terremoto! terremoto!' (the earthquake). They fell on their knees in the squares and cried for mercy to the heavens. The whole city seemed to crumble, and the walls to dissolve into the earth.

"A number of churches in the province of Santiago fell, and the adobelike walls that encompassed them lay scattered around the ruined towers. The priests left their old places, and soon after the disaster it began to be whispered about in Santiago that one might gain a fortune by searching for the money-jars buried in the abandoned church gardens.

"Ralph Marlowe heard the exciting suggestion, and the thrill of an adventurer filled his soul. He thought of little but money-jars.

"'Gold, gold!' he said to me one day. 'I must have it. That is what I came here for. I must have it to redeem my lost reputation, consul!' He added: 'Let me make a journey with you to the coffee farms. There are orchids there that I wish to see. There are trees there that grow around trees. There are trees that grow on trees, and suck their sap like as sin eats up the soul.'

"'Ralph,' said I—for such I had come to call him—'you need something better than gold to redeem your reputation. What you need is a new sense of honor.'

"'I have the sense,' said he, 'but not the strength.'

"He looked me in the face pitifully, and said: 'There are some things richer than orchids in the mountains, Señor Consul. I can see them in my mind. They haunt me. They won't let me rest.'

"'What are they?' I asked.

"'Money-jars. What wouldn't I give if I could return to England rich? Señor Consul, you must help me.'

"He bent an earnest face on me, and added:

"'Think of it—discredited at twenty-one! Shunned by society! I have done wrong, but, oh, how I have suffered! You do pity me, don't you, Señor Consul?'

"I did pity him. I told him that he might make a journey with me to the cafetales of Guantanamo. The place is one of the most beautiful in the world, and some day, when a good government shall give opportunity to Cuba, this region will be filled with American, English, or German life which will reap fortunes from one of the most productive districts under the sun.

"We set out for the coffee plateaus.

"We went by boat to the harbor of Guantanamo. Then we rode up the hills. The rainy season had passed. The sky was a splendor, and the wonderful vegetation a charm. The earth here pours forth vegetation as from fountains of life. The world has yet to discover Guantanamo.

"There was everything on the way to enchant a naturalist. There were ceiba-trees in fetters, being pulled down to the earth by the lianas of the cupey. I could but feel the likeness of the captive ceiba to the case of my young friend.

"But his mind was no longer on the ceiba or cupey. Splendid orchids swung in the air, varieties that I had never seen before, but his eye was lost to their beauty. One thing alone haunted him now—it was the finding of money-jars. Of this he talked with every way-side peon whom he met.

"As we ascended the mountains, there was opened to our view the glory of the sea. The air was as clear as crystal, and every breath seemed full of life. Every light breath of the sea-breeze caused a quivering of palms, as in the fabled orchards of leaves of gold. The sky was like purple fire, and yet it seemed to mingle with the earth.

"No gardens of kings could equal the vegetation of the slopes and plateaus. Here were fragrant gardens of wild orange-trees; here the sweet-scented jasmines trailed over the decaying trees; here the delicate heliotrope checkered the open ways. Pomegranates showed their red cheeks amid the quiver of leaves. Date-palms with green necks loomed so high in air as hardly to cast a shadow.

"Butterflies like flowers bloomed out here and there, insects like gems gleamed among the byways, and everywhere clusters of palms rose like tents, and cocoanuts that lifted their cool buckets of milk-water in the air.

"The sunset on the sea was like the last day. The tropic night fell quickly—the shutting of the doors of

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google heaven. The sea turned violet; then the stars came out, like sentinels guarding the earth. The near planets hung liquid and low, like lights in the silent chambers of the Deity. High among them shone the Southern Cross.

"The far-away turquoise sea became a scintillation of stars, a palpitating splendor of fervid airs and soporific breezes and crepuscular dimnesses. As we journeyed upward, we seemed to be ascending the sky.

"I had letters to mine host, Monsieur Rosseau, who expected us, and whose casa was illuminated in honor of our arrival.

"Mine host was a Frenchman, his wife was a Spanish lady, and her mother, Señora Lance, was an ancient Spanish dame nearly a hundred years old. She was a strange character. She sat on the balcony much of the time as one dead.

"I addressed this aged woman. She crossed herself and said,

"'Mi casa está á su disposicion.' (My house is yours.)

"Ralph, with his mind full of money-jars, seemed intensely and instinctively drawn to this strange woman.

"Before we were called out to tea he sat down by her on the wide veranda under the great fanlike shadows of the royal palms. He made a few complimentary remarks in clear words in regard to the beauty of the country, and then approached the subject nearest to his heart.

"'Is any treasure ever found in this country?'

"The withered señora crossed herself, and shook her head mechanically as one dead.

"'Any money-jars?'

"Señora Lance started like a form galvanized.

"'It is you who say that.' She crossed herself again, and spoke like one talking out of the past.

"'And who said there were, and why do you ask that? Have you the inner vision? Pardon!'

"Her head turned to and fro, and she said:

"'Excuse me if I have been rude. I am tired. I am almost to the end of the way, and am tired. I am resting a little before I go. Money-jars!'

"Her withered hands started up; her form bent forward. The effort seemed to exhaust her. She fell back in the chair as one dead, again dropping a gold snuff-box into her lap.

"We were called to our meal. The presiding genius of the dining-room was a mulatto, or creole, the sight of whom filled me with surprise, and whose proportions I shall never forget. She must have weighed more than three hundred pounds. She talked Spanish, French, and English, mingling the three languages in an odd way that held one by its singularity.

"She tried to bow as we entered the room. How could she? There was no part of her body that could bend. So she shook her white apron and blinked the large white spaces of her eyes.

"'Bonjou', messieurs. Buenas noches, señors. Ebening, sars [sirs] Americanos.'

"She flapped her white apron three times, and directed us to our places at the table, and surveyed us while the mozos brought in the food. Ralph was as absent as usual, and she studied him doubtfully, her arms, as large as an ordinary body, resting on her hips, with her hands turned back, and the fingers moving as though weaving.

"The table was bountiful. At every order that we gave, our fat French housekeeper, whose name was Merci, said 'Merci!' and shook her apron. She seemed to feel a sense of gratitude at being able to serve us. We called her 'Missie,' for so our host had done.

"Our bedroom was on the ground-floor, for the house was built around a patio, in which were fountains, flowers, birds, dogs, and an orange-tree.

"In the room were two iron beds. We were about to disrobe, when Missie appeared, shook her apron and said,

"'Mi casa á su disposicion!'

"She shook her apron again and retired to an adjoining room; for the mistress of the tables was a woman of no common importance, and this one was a creole—and a seeress, as we afterwards found.

"I threw myself upon my bed exhausted. The falling water on the fountain outside and the fragrance of the orange-tree soon led me away to the border-land of sleep, when I was startled by an agonizing cry from Ralph:

"'Señor Consul—wake!'

"'Como?' said I, dreamily.

"'What indeed, Señor Consul. Your life is in danger. Wake! What is that on the wall over your bed?'

"With a great effort I opened my eyes.

"'Nothing but a spider,' as I saw that insect, as big as a bird, with feathered legs, retreating towards the roof.

"'Nothing, Señor Consul? Nothing? Do you call that nothing? It is a tarantula. He will drop down on you, and then you will be dead. Wake!'

"'That's nothing,' answered I. 'The house is full of them. They never trouble any one.' The insect was hurrying away as fast as his many legs would carry him.

"How cool to my dulling senses was the falling of the springs of the fountains in the moonlight! I could see the drops glisten through lattice curtains as I closed my eyes. I breathed again the fragrance of the orange-tree, and sleep once more led me to her border-land, when another shriek pierced the air like a fife note.

"'Señor Consul—Deo Supremo! Señor!'

"I said not a word. A sea-breeze moved the lattice curtains—how delicious!

"'Señor Consul—Consul señor! There's a snake in the room!'

"'Go to sleep, my friend. I am weary. Is it black?'

"'Black? Black as the imp of darkness himself. I can see him now. He lies at the foot of your bed. I can see his eye wink.'

"'Oh, amigo, go off to sleep in this cool mountain air. That's nothing but a ratter.'

"'A ratter!' he said, as if electrified, starting up in bed like a New England ghost from a grave. 'A ratter?'

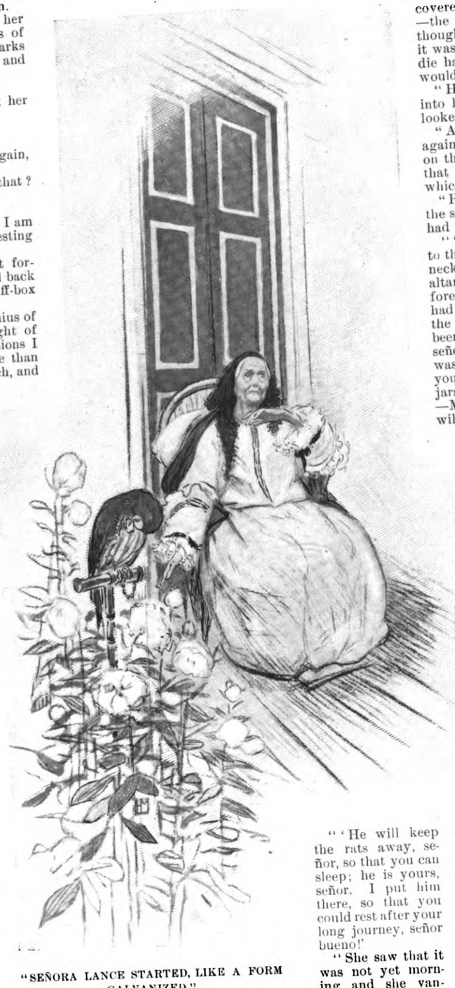
"'No, no—a ratter. Now let us both go to sleep; everything will be all right in the morning, and the valley will be below us, and you shall see the most glorious sunrise that ever broke upon your view.' I closed my eyes and refused to answer any more questions.

"Presently I heard Ralph knock on the side of the partition at the foot of his bed, that connected with the big fat woman's room.

"She gave a groan.

"'Missie!'

"'Bonjou', señor,' she said, half French and half Spanish.



"'Missie!'

"'Yes; the top of the morning,' she said, in English. 'Is it morning?'

"'No, Missie; there's a snake in the room. A snake!'

"'Mi serpiente á su disposicion, señor.' (My snake is yours.)

"'Deo Supremo! What is that you say, Missie? Have I gone mad? He winks. Missie—say!—his eye goes round!'

"SEÑORA LANCE STARTED, LIKE A FORM GALVANIZED."

"'He will keep the rats away, señor, so that you can sleep; he is yours, señor. I put him there, so that you could rest after your long journey, señor bueno!'

"She saw that it was not yet morning, and she vanished into the land of dreams.

"There was a whirring, whishing sound on the floor. The domestic snake was moving with almost electrical swiftness after some poor unfortunate rat that had found a way into the room through the unloose floor. There was a little squeal, and the ratter and rat were gone. Missie was snoring. I opened my eyes, which seemed glued, and never did I see such a form of terror as that which sat up shaking in the other cot.

"'Jumping Jackson!' cried Ralph, suddenly using an unknown classical term of provincial origin. 'Am I mad?'

"'That is only a domestic snake,' said I, 'as harmless as a bird. They keep such about the place for ratters. There would be little comfort here without them.'

"We woke up in the morning. Clarinas were singing in the patio. I lifted the curtain, and never burst upon my eyes such a scene of extended beauty. I roused Ralph, and we two went out on the veranda.

"The peaks and mornes were flaming. Below was the valley of Guantanamo. The coffee-farms in dewy freshness glittered like far billows of the sea. Everywhere gleamed in the air the tentlike palms.

"The old Spanish lady came hobbling out thus early and sunk into her chair.

"'Bueno!' she said.

"'Como pasa la noche?' said Ralph.

"'Mal—badly,' she said, with shaking hands. 'What you said last night touched my mind.'

"'And what was that, señora? I am sorry indeed if I have made the night unquiet.'

"'About the money-jar. Did you ever hear of my Fidele?' Her hands trembled again.

"'No, señora. May I ask you who was Fidele?'

"'My little daughter—she went away sixty or more years ago. She had come to love God, so she did not die; she went away, leaving the form—what a beautiful form it was!' The old woman's hands shook again. 'She had a money-jar. I'll tell you about it all as soon as I get my strength.' She added, 'Fidele was a saint.'

"'I'm stronger now,' she presently said. 'Fidele buried her money-jar under the ceiba-tree. After she went on beyond we went to find it, and it was gone. It was buried under the tangle grass, and the roots of the grass had not been broken. It was gone. No man in all the country round would have stolen Fidele's money-jar, and the pirates never could have disturbed it, else the roots of the grass would have been broken. The roots of that grass do not break for many years. But it was gone.' She seemed lost, then roused up again. 'What do you suppose became of Fidele's money-jar? The money in it was nothing to me, but that jar was very precious to her soul. There was a fortune of gold in that jar, and she covered the gold doubloons with frankincense and myrrh—the bishop gave those perfumes to her. It seemed as though her soul was buried in that money-jar—not because it was so rich in gold, but for a sacred reason. I would die happy if I could know that jar had been found. I would give back to the finder doubloon for doubloon.'

"Her hands shook again. The sea sunlight streamed into her face, and in it she sank into a deep sleep and looked like one dead, as before.

"At breakfast the ponderous Missie flapped her apron again, and, when the meal was over, went out and sat down on the cool water-sprayed patio to talk with a parrot, that answered all her questions with, 'No necesito,' to which the fat creole replied, piously, 'Jesis Ma'ia!'

"Ralph joined her. He began to question her about the saintly Fidele, and the place where the lost money-jar had been buried.

"'Bon Die'!' said Missie, reverently. 'I could take you to the very spot. That jar was as tall as a baby, and its neck was as long as a flamingo's, and it smelled like the altar of heaven—so I have been told. It all happened before my day. But they dug for it when I was a girl—it had been conjured—the jar had been conjured away, for the roots of the tangled grass that lasts forever had not been broken. If you will follow me out into the cool, señor, I will take you to the ceiba-tree where the treasure was buried. If you could find it, the señora would make you rich. She is rich. She is likely to have many money-jars—but she only cared for that one jar. Monsieur Señor—Mister Ralph—I have heard her say that she would be willing to die poor if she could only find that one jar. I sometimes think in imaginations that Fidele put her jewels into the jar. There was something peculiar about it—I never knew what—only they say that the señora has talked of it for sixty years. She once lost a ship at sea, and never spoke of it often. Venga—follow me!'

"She waddled away through the garden that was bending with flowers. She met a blacksnake in the way, and pushed him aside with her bare foot. Ralph travelled rapidly by the place.

"They came into the open fields, and beyond it was an ancient ceiba-tree that lianas had caught as with a lasso and were pulling down.

"The sun was fierce now, and Missie sunk down into the shadow of the tree.

"Ralph sat down beside her, and looked up to the mountains and down to the sea. Over the latter a great steamer was passing. The mountain air was melting. The world all seemed like an island floating about in a vast sea of sunlight.

"How the sargazo gleamed like a cloth of gold and pearls on the far dazzling ocean! How the tepid wind stirred the top of the imprisoned ceiba-tree! How green grew the mangoes along a winding stream below! How the clouds with pearl and aureate lustres drifted here and there in the sun, like the robes of goddesses' chariots! Everything was life.

"The grass at the foot of the tree lay in a mat.

"'It was there,' said Missie, 'that the money-jar was buried.' She touched the spot with her bare feet. A single stone was there.

"'Missie,' asked Ralph, 'did anything ever happen between the time when the jar was buried and when they went out to find it?'

"'Nothing, monsieur, nothing; at least nothing but the earthquake. That turned many things about—the solid hills and all; but it did not move the ceiba-tree. It did not break the grass mat. No, no, nothing has happened. No wars, no pirates—that all ceased long, long ago. No!'

"'How was the treasure buried, Missie?'

"'And you may well ask that. They dug a hole in the earth, and came to a solid rock, like that you see up yonder. Then they picked a hole in the hard rock and set into it the money-jar, and sealed it up with ground stone. That ground stone would have had to be picked out. I would not like to do it!

"'Now comes the marvel,' she added. 'Jesis—Ma'ia! They opened the hole to find the jar, and they found that the roots of the grass had not been broken; but when they came to the rock, it was solid. It was as solid as though it had never been drilled at all. The jar had been conjured away. Mon Die'!'

"'Did the earthquake move the rocks on the mountain, Missie?'

"'And sure it did; it tumbled them down like a giant. The mountain moved. A hill over yonder went down and there rose a lake!'

"'Was that rock above us moved?'

"'A little way, señor.'

"Ralph measured the distance from the rock on the mountain-side to the rock under the ceiba-tree. He reasoned that the two rocks were a part of each other. A strange light came into his face.

"'Which way was the rock on the hill moved?' I asked.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"'To the west.' She pointed with her loglike arm.

"He measured the distance that the rock under the tree and the mat of earth would have been moved to follow the angle of the rock on the hill, and he placed his eye on the very spot where he believed the lost money-jar could be found. He saw how the rock could have changed place without moving the earth above it. The rock could have moved under the detached earth. He saw a possible solution to the long mystery.

"He sat down under the ceiba-trees, and Missie told him the stories that she had heard of the little saint Fidele. The girl had sought to fill the money-jar, to bury it, and had died of some mountain fever—that was all.

"They went back to the quinta, as the rambling house of the hacienda was sometimes called.

"The withered señora had awakened, and she said,

"'Señor Ralph, if you will find Fidele's money-jar I will return you doubloon for doubloon.'

"'Señora,' said Ralph, 'pardon me, but may I ask why that jar was so dear to her heart?—your family was rich without it.'

"'Yes, yes; si, si; oui, oui. I am glad to hear you ask that. Sit down there, and I will tell you. This was the reason: It was to be a Christmas gift. The dear child had set her heart upon that!'

"Her head moved to and fro.

"'You may have heard of the Virgin of Charity at Cobre.'

"'Yes, señora!'

"'Well, the dear child had set her heart on making a Christmas gift to the Virgin of Charity at the shrine. It was not for herself that she filled the money-jar; no, no. It is not for the money that I want that money-jar; no, no. What do I care about money when my soul is about to rise? What I want the money-jar for is to fulfil the wish of my little saint's life; to send it, as she expected to do, to the shrine of My Lady of Charity. I said I would give you doubloon for doubloon if you would find that precious jar with its frankincense and myrrh! The perfumes may be dead now. I will give you two doubloons for one. That jar is a treasure that belongs to the altar of heaven.'

"Her head dropped; she crossed herself, and sat motionless. She then lifted her face again, and said:

"'She comes back to me some times, like a star, when I sleep. Oh, those dreams are blessed!'

"The next day Ralph wandered about the mountain plateau with restless feet. In the dusk the family and their guests gathered again on the veranda.

"The night grew more and more luminous and beautiful. The veranda was wide, and the people in the service of the household gathered upon it, where they could receive the cool air that came up from the sea. There was a mulatto, a sort of major-domo, who had made himself locally famous by purchasing his brother from slavery in his younger days. The Spanish slavery had merciful features, and among these was the slave's privilege of earning money during holidays. The holidays in Cuba were many, and this man, who had purchased his own freedom by such work, also bought the liberty of his brother, and made the youth a Christmas present to his mother.

"This man could play the guitar in a rude but musical way. He brought out the instrument, and strummed a number of old haunting airs. He at last touched a chord of 'Bonnie Doon.' Ralph started up nervously at the sound, and said:

"'I used to be a choir-boy. I have sung that air at Christmas festivals to the words of an English poet who died young, and who had been tempest-tossed by infidelity. White was his name; the poet-laureate Southey writes of him.'

"He repeated the words 'tempest-tossed,' walking with his hands behind him, and added,

"'There is something in that ballad that haunts me—it seems to be a parable of my life somehow.'

"Ralph became very restless amid these quiet scenes. We asked him to sing the ballad as he used to do when a choir-boy. The mulatto played the soul-haunting air, and Ralph sang the ballad of the poet who had been 'tempest-tossed' by infidelity, as he had done at English church festivals when a boy:

> 'When marshalled on the nightly plain
> The glittering host bestud the sky.'

"When he had finished the first stanza he gave a nervous turn, and said:

"'I used to sing the second verse in the boy choir as a solo. What wouldn't I give to feel again as I did then? I wish I could be my old Christmas self again!'

"The last words impressed me. His true soul was in them. He had noble impulses, but he had fallen under the power of his lower nature, and a struggle to gain a better will was going on within. He sung the stanza, in which the poet described his own conflict:

> 'Once on the raging seas I rode:
> The storm was loud, the night was dark;
> The ocean yawned, and rudely blowed
> The wind that tossed my foundering bark;
> Deep horror then my vitals froze;
> Death-struck, I ceased the tide to stem,
> When suddenly a star arose—
> It was the star of Bethlehem!'

"His voice was usually sympathetic, and to-night it had a pathetic tone. The cooling of the azure heat, the far-away glimmer of the dusky opal sea, the wine of the mountain air, the silent march of the stars, made the night one to awaken latent feelings. The better soul of Ralph came out in that old English Christmas song, but it disappeared. Money-jars took the place of the star of his vision.

"Ralph's desire to find hidden gold grew more and more intense. His mind returned to it in all he said or did. He went botanizing daily.

"One day he returned with a piece of the trunk of a jaquey-tree, a glory of the woods. This tree begins its life on the branches of a common tree, and grows downward and roots itself in the earth, and then enfolds the tree on which it has had its growth, and causes the latter to decay. The new tree then flourishes in bloom and beauty, having eaten up the old one.

"He brought to me the trunk of the jaquey-tree which he had sawn out. It was a kind of parable to him.

"'It may be so in life,' he said. 'The beautiful may grow on the worthless material and consume it, and cause it to disappear in the flowers of the air.'

"Ralph wandered over these regions on horseback, taking a great interest in the gardens of churches and in wayside shrines.

"Missie, from the French islands, said to me one day, pointing to her turbaned head,

"'I mind that young man is conjured; now he is; I can see it in my inner eye.' She flapped her white apron knowingly, and added, oddly, 'Or it may be that he has been bitten by a jigger.'

"He used to come home late at night. Now he had been to some far-away sugar-mill; once to a zapateado. But twice I noticed a strange thing: he poured water from the water-jar over the ends of his fingers; they were bloody, and the nails were torn.

"He did not sleep; he would start up in the night and cry out, 'Money-jars!' and strike out here and there with his torn hands, as though there were money-jars in the air.

"Ralph became more absent, queerer, and more restless nights. He seemed to have made some discovery. I would ask him where he had been, and he would return but one answer, which was, 'Botanizing.' Once he brought home a species of the night-blooming cereus, and said, 'It blooms alone among the rocks, but it is beautiful.'

"He would sit up in bed nights, holding his head in his hands. He did not seem to hear the plash of the fountains in the darkness, nor the singing of the clarinas in the red rifts of the morning. I began to feel an aversion to him, and I wondered what the future of this strange life would be.

"One day he did not come home. I was greatly alarmed. The beautiful forests were full of poisons, pitfalls, and dangers, and the young man had become more and more absent-minded.

"We searched for him, but found no trace of his wanderings, except that the earth had been opened by some unknown hand at a place some distance from the ceiba-tree. The matted grass there had been broken. Missie said that he had buried himself there.

"Two days after his disappearance I received a note that caused my heart to stand still. It read strangely, and I read between the lines:

"'SEÑOR,—I have found some rare orchid specimens and other things. I have barrelled them, and wish to take them direct to Santiago on the steamboat that sails to-day. You shall hear from me in Santiago. Thank your friends for the courtesies they have shown me. You shall know more.

RALPH MARLOWE.'

"What had happened? Who had helped Ralph to barrel the rare orchids? How did he get to the sea? Was this letter true? Had he found the money-jar? If so, why had he not returned it to the señora and received the reward? Had he reasoned that it would be discourteous to me to accept a reward for such a service? There had been going on some undercurrent of life; there was not a true ring in this message. In some way his heart now was untrue. I gasped as I read it, and, when I spoke of its contents to the señora, she said:

"'Now I shall never find the money-jar. I wanted the Virgin of Charity to have that before I died; I wanted her to have it for Fidele's sake. I care for nothing more.'

"She waved her fan in the hot air, dropped her trembling hands, and fell asleep as one dying. I pitied her.

"I was sorry that I had given my confidence to Ralph Marlowe. There was something wrong in his conduct, or he would not have left me in this way, so discourteous to those to whom I had introduced him. I was hurt.

"A week passed, when I returned to the consulate of Santiago de Cuba, hoping to find the young man there; but he did not appear. He had gone to Cobre, evidently to avoid me.

"The week before the Christmas holidays I went to Cobre. I there met Ralph at a fonda and pasada. It was a withered man who stood before me.

"'Ralph,' I exclaimed, 'what has happened to you? What has changed you in this manner? Have you had the fever?'

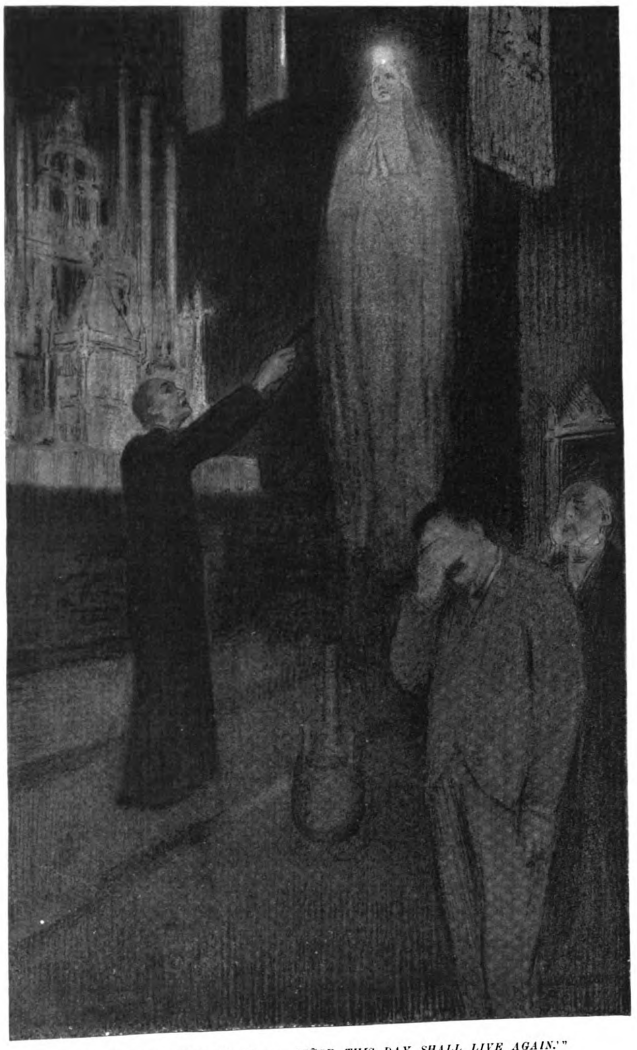
"'Yes, I have had a fever—God knows what it is—a fever of the mind I think it is. Señor, I found the money-jar, and I am haunted. I will die after this way—have pity on me once more. Come out under the tamarind-trees, Señor Mascaline, and I will tell you.'

"A shadow seemed passing before me as I followed him.

"'You found the money-jar?' I said. 'Why did you not return with it to the señora? You would have been honorably rewarded.'

"'I reasoned then that you would not have allowed me to receive a reward as a guest of the house. These Spaniards are gentlemen.'

"I gasped, 'Where is the money-jar?'



"'It is here in Cobre.'

"He continued his narrative:

"'The country people, who are all heart and kindness, helped me barrel the jar in orchids and take it to the sea.

"'We embarked. The sea was like glass as we sailed away. Then I began to think of what I had done, and a fire was kindled within me. It burned—here in my heart. My thoughts caused it to burn. No one can tell what I have suffered.

"'We had not been long out to sea when a cloud began to stretch across the sky like an apparition. It darkened and threw a shadow over the waters. Then a wind arose coming down from Cape Maisi, to the north. The boat tossed about like a shaving. She took in water. The sailors cast out the cargo, and ordered me to roll out the barrel.

"'A VISION COMES TO ME. . . . SEÑOR, THIS DAY SHALL LIVE AGAIN.'"

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"'I refused; they stormed. Such thunder! Such lightning! The heavens seemed bowed upon the sea.

"'They threw over the barrel. It was my life; my heart was in it. It floated, and I threw myself upon it, and drifted with it upon the war of the waters. I lost it in the rain and darkness, but swam and found it again. I never could have believed that such a power of struggle was in me. Señor, as the storm broke, something happened. I will tell you what happened when you shall come to have confidence in me. Some day I will tell you all.

"'After the storm the sailors found me, and I drew the barrel after the boat with a cord.

"'We landed at Santiago. I looked in the glass at the hotel, and saw that something had come over me. I could not tell what. I do not know now, only that my heart was on fire, and thoughts made it burn, and I withered. Then I thought of Fidele, and a new spirit came to me.

"'Señor, you will be slow to believe what I am about to say, after my unworthy conduct. That money-jar belongs to the soul of Fidele.'

"'Bueno!' I said, in the sense of well.

"'She had prepared it as an offering to the shrine of the Virgin of Charity. To make a pilgrimage to the shrine with this offering was the dearest wish of her life.'

"'Bueno, my friend.'

"'I desire to make that gift to the shrine for her now, after she has laid in the grave for sixty years. But, señor, I am a thief.'

"'You are a thief, amigo mio.'

"'I hoped never to hear the winds of Cape Maisi again, except on a home voyage, but I must go back to the señora on the mountains and confess my conduct.'

"'Bueno, bueno; that resolution is worth more than all the money-jars of Spain!'

"'If she forgive me, I am going to ask her permission to make a Christmas offering of the money-jar to the shrine, as a penitent soul. A new spirit seems to be guiding me. All my desires have changed. I have found a new person in me. I have now the strength to do right. Help me to begin. I am going to live again. Señor Consul, you have been true to me, a roofless wanderer.'

"'There is but one way to begin a new life, and to cause the new spirit that you have found in you to grow: Go back to the señora! That is the first step.'

"He dared the winds from Cape Maisi and the plunging waters again, and in a week he returned to Santiago and came to Cobre.

"I could see a new joy in his face. My heart leaped to his.

"'What said the señora?' asked I. 'You told her all?'

"'All, señor. I made a glass of my soul.'

"'And what did the señora say?'

"'She said: "Amigo, I forgive you all. Take the money-jar to the shrine of Our Lady of Charity, for I can see that God wills you to do it. This is the hour I have been waiting for all these withering years. Now I can die content." She said that. Then she crossed herself and called to Monsieur Rosseau: "Let him be rewarded, doubloon for doubloon."

"'Then she began to tremble. Her hands trembled, and then they were still. Her face quivered, and then it became like wax. Her eyelids fell, and she sat there like a thing of clay; her breath was gone. Señor, how mysterious is life!'

"'Did they reward you?'

"'Señor, can you think that I would accept any reward after my conduct? There is a new spirit in me. I am going to-day to give up the money-jar. Will you go with me?'

"I began to hope for the new man that I saw in Ralph Marlowe. I analyzed his motives now—he was not seeking for gain, but for honor, and freedom from the sins that bound him, and that sense of honor came from a desire to fulfil a trust of the dead. I went with him to the church.

"Do the dead know?

"The money-jar was tall and heavy. It had handles like ears, and two mulattoes bore it after us. The people stared as we passed through Cobre.

"Palm-Sunday had passed, but the church was still a bower of palms. The air was heavy with the odors of faded flowers.

"We saw at the altar the parish priest. He was directing the decorations for the Christmas festival. He came down the aisle to meet us at the door, in his dark robe, and with an illumined face. His eye fell upon the money-jar.

"'What have you here, señors?' he asked, in a tone so spiritual that it showed that his service was faith-inspired and sincere. 'Is it an offering? We have need of money. The poor multiply.'

"'A money-jar,' said Ralph, in Spanish—'an offering from the dead.'

"'It is a strange experience to which you introduce me, señor—a mystery. When did the owner of the treasure die?'

"'Sixty or more years ago, your reverence.'

"'That is marvellous indeed. But, pardon, how did the money-jar fall into your hands? Pardon; I would know, since you bring it here.'

"I looked at the face of Ralph. A high purpose rose into his eyes. A new man had indeed come into him. I could see the new soul as he answered in honest tones that echo a clear soul:

"'I found it. I stole it after I found it; I now bring it to you, though I am one whom your Church would call a heretic. I am not a Catholic, but, Catholic or Protestant, I love all men who seek to be led by the spirit of God.'

"'What words were these!

"'My good friend,' said the priest, 'you must have had some unusual experience. Why have you brought the treasure here?'

"'To fulfil the wishes of the dead. The young saint Fidele, who died a generation ago, desired that this money-jar be given to this shrine, and I come bringing it as a matter of honor. She wished it to be a Christmas gift, and she hoped to give it herself and to make a pilgrimage to do it—Saint Fidele. I have brought it for her; will you give it to the cause of the Virgin of Charity in her name? It is the Christmas offering of the soul of Fidele, made by a penitent. You know all.'

"The priest bowed his head as in meditation or prayer, and moved back, pressing his hands against his eyes. He presently stopped and lifted his white hands in the air, and holding over his head a crucifix, said:

"'A vision comes to me—I can see something that you do not see; I can see an angel between you and me, an angel with a star on her brow. Señor, I seem to speak under the influence of that bright form. Señor, this day shall live again. Señor, your life is about to change. Your service to the dead shall bless you forever. I shall pray for you.'

"He lifted the crucifix, and seemed gazing upon some blessed form that we could not see.

"The acolytes took up the jar and bore it into the sacristy, and the priest moved back towards the altar, which was now being illumined in the darkness that was falling.

"I was filled with wonder at all these spiritual mysteries. I had no fixed opinions then, as I have now.

"We went out into the twilight. Ralph Marlowe did not speak. He put his arm on my shoulder. He was crying. He said:

"'You cannot trust me now, but you will. The new man within me is growing. I saw something on the sea!'

"We walked along towards the public-house, and I could hear him singing, in a low voice, in which was the new man and new resolution:

> 'Once on the raging seas I rode;
> The storm was loud, the night was dark!'

"Christmas week in the tropics seems like a new birth of the creation, owing to the simple faith of the people. The bells, the music, the palms, the fireworks, the children in white robes, the blessing of altars, the crowns of flowers, give a living picturesqueness to the Festival of the Nativity nowhere else to be found. All join in the joy.

"The Miracle Church at Cobre had melodious bells. We could not resist them on that Christmas week.

"We went to the church with the tide of garlanded people to look into the representation of the sacred cradle. And, owing to the gift that Ralph had made in the name of the little Saint Fidele, our coming was hailed like a visit from the Magi.

"The parish priest approached us in one of these visits, and repeated, with a change of pronouns,

"'That day shall live again!'

"Ralph was affected, and he said to me, on leaving the church, which was blazing with lights and made misty by odorous oils,

"'I care for myself no more; I am going to give myself to humanity; my old self is gone!'

"He had become another being. A new spirit creates life anew. His face was changing.

"He returned to England.

"What followed Ralph after these strange experiences? I asked this question daily for years, for the young wanderer had gained my affection. I had seen in him the struggle of a soul against a lower nature. Did he ever regain the moral will? Did he ever become 'his old Christmas self again'? Did that day live again?

"I heard from him once in a brief letter. He said that the doors of home had been opened to him; that that night's experience in the raging sea had led him to religious consecration; that there was nothing to live for in this world but the soul, and that he was preparing to enter the church as a deacon. He thanked me over and over again for what I had been to him and had sought to do for him. A consular agent meets with many experiences like these. I pitied him, loved him, and hoped for him.

"His memory would come back to me when I heard the bells of the Miracle Church of Cobre ringing, as I frequently did, for I often visited the English colony at the mines.

"Just before the war I was called back to England, some fifteen years after the finding of the money-jar, which had become a kind of Christmas legend in the place. I was in search of a man who had gone from Santiago to Southampton, and had disappeared in the English towns. I failed to find him, and I came, on the week of the Christmas holidays, to Southampton, and there waited for a ship.

"In the little sailors' chapel down by the sea, near the place where Canute is said to have rebuked his courtiers by commanding the waves on an overturning throne, an 'appointment' was made one night that there would be a union children's festival at the church at Winchester, and that the Bishop of Winchester would be assisted on that occasion by the new Bishop of Ripon, who was called the 'children's bishop,' who would sing solos with the children in the choruses. Winchester was some miles away, but I recalled that the church was the place once famous for the mortuary chests of the Saxon kings, and having some days to wait, I resolved to attend the festival.

"I entered the church. It was long, vast, and dim. Over the altar was a cloud of evergreens, and in the evergreens burned a star. I was early, and I took my place in a recess where I could look directly at the choir.

"Waiting, I took up a programme. My eye ran over it; one of the numbers read, 'Old Song—Scottish melody; chorus and solo; solo by the Bishop of Ripon.'

"My mind travelled back to the evening of that night on the coffee-mountains of the province of Santiago when Ralph Marlowe had sung Henry Kirke White's song to the Scottish melody of 'Bonnie Doon.' I looked up to the star in the evergreens, and wondered. I somehow felt the near approach of some kindred spirit—some souls are organized to receive such impressions; mine is.

"The church blazed with lights and filled with people. The great chorus of children gathered, and the organ thundered Handel's Halleluiahs, shaking the tombs of the Saxon kings, who ceased to listen long centuries ago. The Bishop of Winchester conducted the exercises, which were very simple and beautiful.

"At last the number entitled the 'Old Song' was reached. The children arose to sing, when there appeared among them in his white robes one of the most spiritual faces upon which I ever looked. But back of those luminous features was a face that I seemed to have met in some long gone experience in life.

"The organ thundered again. It had a soul that day. It was indeed the old air of 'Bonnie Doon' that was rolling under the roofs that covered the royal dead of the long dead centuries. The chorus arose, and the mighty church was flooded with the old song:

> 'When, marshalled on the nightly plain,
> The glittering host bestud the sky,
> One star alone of all the train
> Can fix the sinner's wandering eye:
> Hark, hark, to God the chorus breaks
> From every host, from every gem;
> But one alone the Saviour speaks—
> It is the star of Bethlehem.'

"The congregation became silent. The church seemed breathless and waiting. The organ was playing mystic music, so sweet and low that the pipes seemed pastoral. The Bishop of Ripon was about to sing.

"Then the storm of music rose again. The voice of the bishop rolled out as on the waves of a singing sea:

> 'Once on the stormy seas I rode;
> The winds were high, the night was dark;
> The ocean yawned, and rudely blowed
> The wind that tossed my foundering bark.
> Deep horror then my vitals froze;
> Death-struck, I ceased the tide to stem;
> When suddenly a star arose—
> It was the star of Bethlehem!'

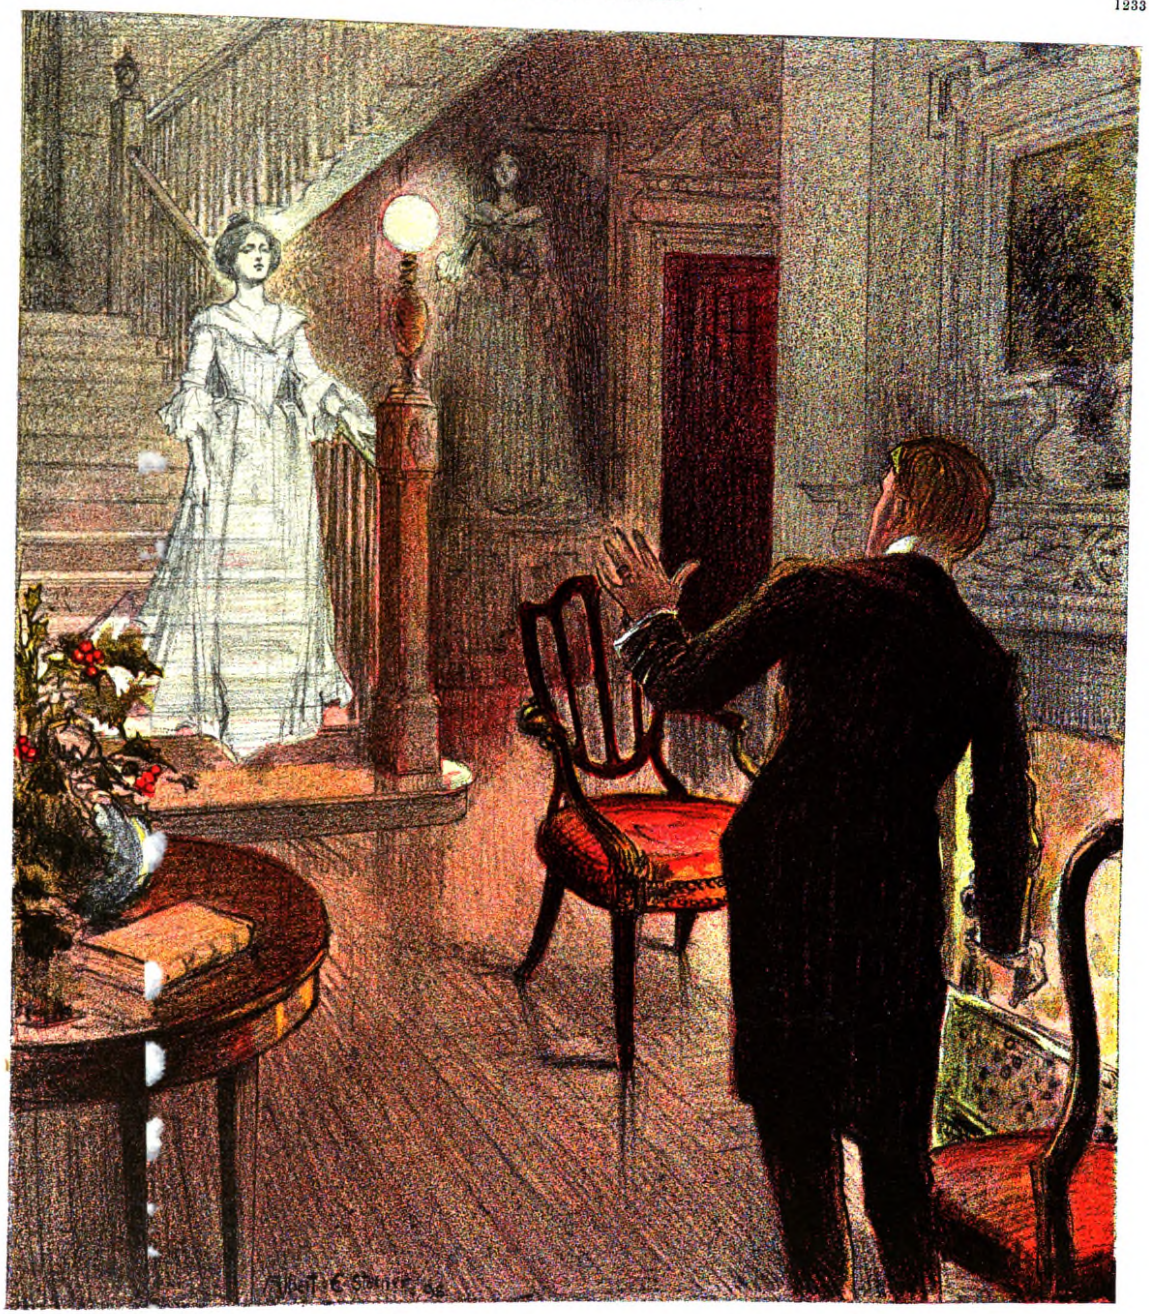
"His eye fell upon me. I saw his countenance change. I saw his lips quiver. He turned and looked up to the star blazing in the cloud of evergreens over the cross behind the altar, then his eye again fell upon me.

"Now came a great burst of song, the bishop leading:

> 'It was my guide, my light, my all;
> It bade my dark foreboding cease,
> And through the storm and danger's thrall
> It led me to the port of peace.
> Now, safely moored, my perils o'er,
> I'll sing first in night's diadem,
> Forever and forevermore,
> The star, the star of Bethlehem!'

"The next number on the programme was 'An Address by the Bishop of Ripon.'

"How noble and inspired he looked as he came forward!



"He began: 'I was once tossed on the waves of Guantanamo Bay, and my soul was heavy with sin. A Star broke through the clouds and blazed out like yonder star in the cloud of evergreens. Señor Consul, sitting before me in yonder pew, that is why I saw that night, of which I promised to tell you. Señor Consul, you will believe me now—that soul lived again!'

Do the dead know? they reward us for filling their good wish Answer me, O Christ night; O night sacred all good souls! Dios

"'I SAW SOMETHING ON THE SEA.'"

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE GREAT STAIRCASE AT LANDOVER HALL

A Christmas Story. By Frank R. Stockton

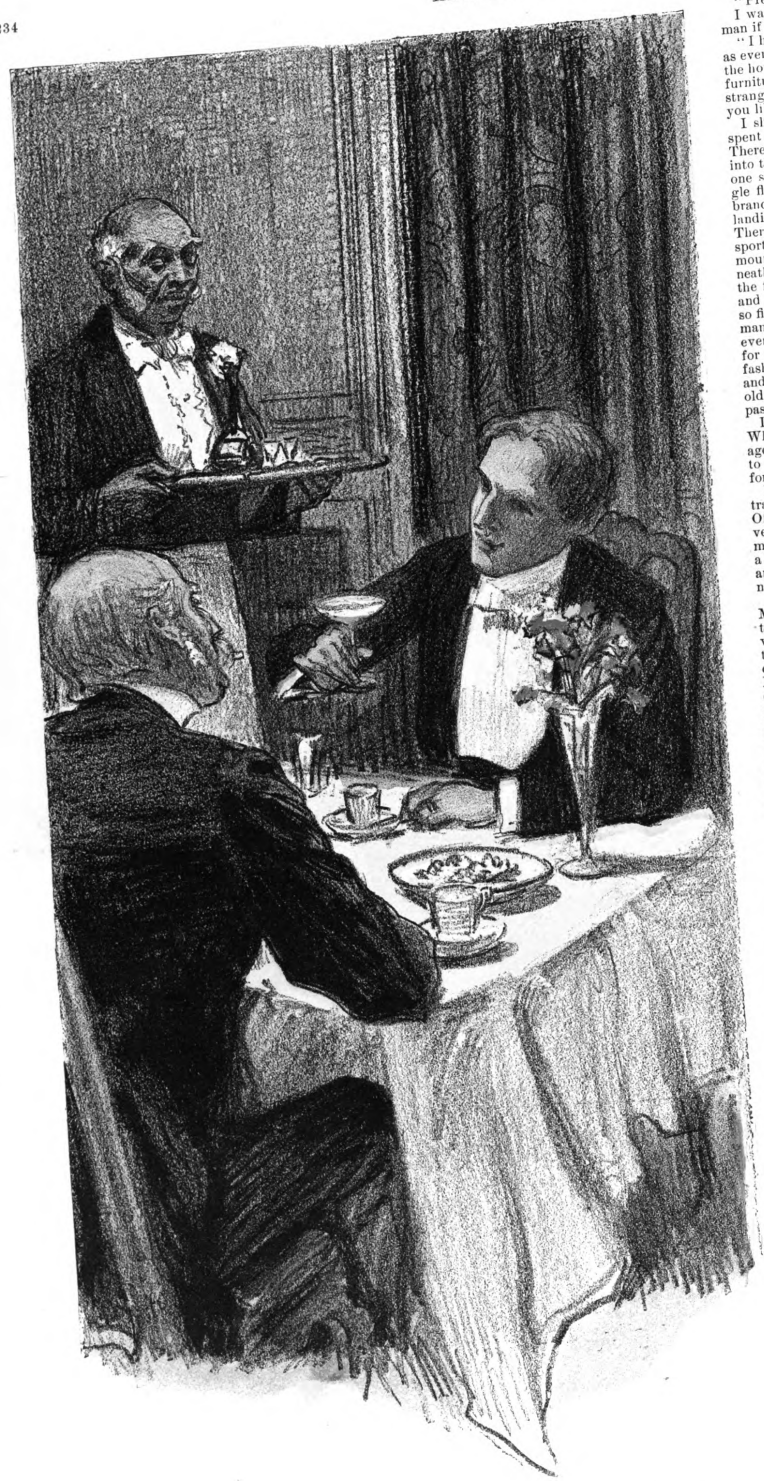
I WAS spending a few days in the little village of Landover, simply for the purpose of enjoying the beautiful scenery of the neighborhood. I had come up from Mexico because the weather was growing too warm in that region, and I was glad of the chance to vary my interesting and sometimes exciting travels with a little rest in the midst of this rural quiet.

It was early summer, and I had started out for an afternoon walk, when, just upon the outskirts of the village, my attention was attracted by a little group at a gateway which opened upon the road. There were two women and an elderly man. The women appeared to be taking leave of the man, and one of them frequently put her handkerchief to her eyes. I walked slowly, because I did not wish to intrude upon what seemed to be an affecting leave-taking; so when I reached the gate the women had gone, but the man was still standing there looking after them.



Glancing over the low fence, I saw a very pretty grove, apparently not well kept; and some distance back, among the trees, a large old house. The man was looking at me with a curiosity which country people naturally betray when they see a stranger, and as I was glad to have some one to talk to, I stopped.

"Is this one of the old family mansions of Landover?" I asked. He was a good-looking man, with the air of a head gardener.

"It is not one of them, sir," he answered; "it is the only one in the village. It is called Landover Hall, and the other houses growed up around it."

"Who owns it?" I asked.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"That is hard to say, sir," he said, with a grim smile; "though perhaps I could tell you in the course of a couple of weeks. The family who lived there is dead and gone, and everything in it is to be sold at auction."

I became interested, and asked some questions, which the man was very willing to answer. It was an old couple who had owned it, he said. The husband had died the previous year, and the wife about ten days ago. The heirs were a brother and sister living out in Colorado, and as they had never seen the house, and cared nothing about it, or about anything that was in it, they had written that they wished everything to be sold, and the money sent to them as soon as possible.

"And that is the way it stands," said the old man. "Next week there is to be a sale of the personal property—a 'vandoo' we call it out here—and every movable thing in the house and grounds is to be sold to the highest bidder; and mighty little the things will bring, it's my opinion. Then the house will be sold, as soon as anybody can be found who wants it."

"Then there is no one living in the house at present?" said I.

"Nobody but me," he answered. "That was the cook, and her daughter the chambermaid, who just left here. There is a black man who attends to the horses and cows, but he will go when they are sold; and very soon I will go too, I suppose."

"Have you lived here long?" I asked.

"Pretty near all my life," said he.

I was greatly interested in old houses, and I asked the man if I might look at the place.

"I have not had any orders to show it," he said; "but as everything is for sale, I suppose the sooner people see the household goods the better; there's many a bit of old furniture, candlesticks, and all that sort of thing, which strangers might like to buy. Oh yes; you can come in if you like."

I shall not attempt to describe the delightful hour I spent in that old house and in the surrounding grounds. There was a great piazza in front; a wide hall stretched into the interior of the mansion, with a large fireplace on one side, and a noble staircase at the further end, a single flight of stairs running up to a platform, and then branching off on each side to the second floor. On the landing stood one of the tallest clocks I have ever seen. There were portraits on the walls, and here and there a sporting picture, interspersed with antlers and foxes' heads mounted on panels, with the date of the hunt inscribed beneath. There was an air of largeness and gravity about the furniture in the hall which was very pleasing to me, and when I entered the long drawing-room I found it so filled with books and bric-à-brac of the olden days, with many quaint furnishings, that, had I been left to myself, even the long summer afternoon would not have sufficed for their examination. Upstairs was the same air of old-fashioned comfort. The grounds—the grass rather long, and the bushes untrimmed—were shaded by some grand old trees, and beyond there were gardens and some green pasture-fields.

I did not take the walk that I had proposed to myself. When I left the old house I inquired the name of the agent who had charge of the estate, and then I went back to the village inn, where I sat communing with myself for the rest of the afternoon and all the evening.

I was not yet thirty, I had a good fortune, and I had travelled until I was tired of moving about the world. Often I had had visions of a home, but they had been very vague and fanciful ones. Now, for the first time in my life, I had seen a home for which I really might care; a house to which I might bring only my wearing apparel, and then sit down surrounded by everything I needed, not even excepting books.

Immediately after breakfast I repaired to the office of Mr. Marchmay, the lawyer who had charge of the property. I staid there a long time. Mr. Marchmay took dinner with me at the inn, and in the evening we sent a telegram to Colorado. I made a proposition to buy everything for cash, and the price agreed upon between me and Mr. Marchmay was considerably higher than could have been expected had the property been sold at auction. It is needless to say that my offer was quickly accepted, and in less than a week from the day I had first seen the old house I became its owner. The cook and the house-maid who had retired in tears from its gateway were sent for, and reinstalled in their offices; the black man who had charge of the horses and cows continued to take care of them, and old Robert Flake was retained in the position of head gardener and general care-taker, which he had held for so many years.

That summer was a season of delight to me, and even when autumn arrived, and there was a fire in the great hall, I could not say that I had fully explored and examined my home and its contents. I had had a few bachelor friends to visit me, but for the greater part of the time I had lived alone. I liked company, and expected to have people about me, but so long as the novelty of my new possessions and my new position continued I was company enough for myself.

At last the holiday season came around, and I was still alone. I had invited a family of old friends to come and make the house lively and joyous, but they had been prevented from doing so. I afterward thought of asking some of my neighbors to eat their Christmas dinner in the old house, but I found that they all had ties and obligations of their own, with which I should not seek to interfere. And thus it happened that late on Christmas eve I sat by myself before a blazing fire in the hall quietly smoking my pipe. The servants were all in bed, and the house was as quiet as if it contained no living being.

For the first time since I lived in that house I began to feel lonely, and I could not help smiling when I thought that there was no need of my feeling lonely if I wished it otherwise. For several years I had known that there were mothers in this country, and even in other countries, who had the welfare of their daughters at heart, and who had not failed to let me know the fact; I had also known that there were young women without mothers who had their own welfare at heart, and to whom a young man of fortune was an object of interest, but there was nothing in these recollections which interested me in these lonely moments.

The great clock on the landing-place began to strike, and I counted stroke after stroke; and when there were twelve I turned to see whether I had made a mistake, and if it were now really Christmas day. But before my eyes had reached the face of the clock I saw that I was mistaken in supposing myself alone. At the top of the broad flight of stairs there stood a lady.

I pushed back my chair and started to my feet. I know my mouth was open and my eyes staring. I could not speak; I doubt if I breathed.

Slowly the lady descended the stairs. There were two tall lamps on the newel-posts, so that I could see her distinctly. She was young, and she moved with the grace of perfect health. Her gown was of an olden fashion, and her hair was dressed in the style of our ancestors. Her attire was simple and elegant, but it was evident that she was dressed for a festive occasion.

Down she came, step by step, and I stood gazing, no only with my eyes, but, I may say, with my whole heart I had never seen such grace; I had never seen suc beauty.

She reached the floor, and advanced a few steps towar me; then she stopped. She fixed her large eyes upon n for a moment, and then turned them away. She gazed the fire, the walls, the ceiling, and the floor. There can upon her lovely features an almost imperceptible smil as though it gave her pleasure thus to stand and lo about her.

As for me, I was simply entranced. Vision or no visi spirit from another world or simply a mist of fancy mattered not.

She approached a few steps nearer, and fixed her e

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SMALL GAME BETTER THAN NONE.

From the Painting by Howard Pyle.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

upon mine. I trembled as I stood. Involuntarily the wish of my heart came to my lips. "If—" I exclaimed.

"If what?" she asked, quickly.

I was startled by the voice. It was rich, it was sweet, but there was something in its intonation which suggested the olden time. I cannot explain it. It was like the perfume from an ancient wardrobe opened a hundred years after a great-grandmother had closed and locked it, when even the scent of rose and lavender was only the spirit of something gone.

"Oh, but if you were real!" I said.

She smiled, but made no reply. Slowly she passed around the great hall, coming so near me at one time that I could almost have touched her. She looked up at the portraits, stopping before some old candlesticks upon a bracket, apparently examining everything with as much pleasure as I had looked upon them when first they became mine.

When she had made the circuit of the hall, she stood as if reflecting. Fearful that she might disappear, and knowing that a spirit must be addressed if one would hear it speak, I stepped toward her. I had intended to ask her if she were, or rather ever had been, the lady of this house, why she came, and if she bore a message, but in my excitement and infatuation I forgot my purpose; I simply repeated my former words—"Oh, if you were but real!"

"Why do you say that?" she asked, with a little gentle petulance. "I am not real, as you must know. Shall I tell you who I was, and why I am here?"

I implored her to do so. She drew a little nearer the fire. "It is so bright and cheerful," she said. "It is many, many years since I have seen a fire in this hall. The old people who lived in this house so long never built a fire here—at least on Christmas eve."

I felt inclined to draw up a chair and ask her to sit down, but why need a ghost sit? I was afraid of making some mistake. I stood as near her as I dared, eagerly ready to listen.

"I was mistress of this house," she said. "That was a long, long time ago. You can see my portrait hanging there."

I bowed. I could not say that it was her portrait. An hour before, I had looked upon it as a fine picture; now it seemed to be the travesty of a woman beyond the reach of pigments and canvas.

"I died," she continued, "when I was but twenty-five, and but four years married. I had a little girl three years old, and the very day before I left this world I led her around this hall and tried to make her understand the pictures. That is her portrait on this other wall."

I turned, and following the direction of her graceful hand, my eyes fell upon the picture of an elderly lady with silvered hair and benignant countenance.

"Your daughter?" I gasped.

"Yes," she answered; "she lived many years after my death. Over there, nearer the door, you may see the picture of her daughter—the plump young girl with the plumed hat."

Now, to my great surprise, she asked me to take a seat. "It seems ungracious," she remarked, "that in my own house I should be so inhospitable as to keep you standing. And yet it is not my house; it is yours."

Obedient to her command, for such I felt it to be, I resumed my seat, and to my delight, she took a chair not far from me. Seated, she seemed more graceful and lovely than when she stood. Her shapely hands lay in her lap; soft lace fell over them, like tender mist upon a cloud. As she looked at me her eyes were raised.

"Does it distress you that this house should now be mine?" I asked.

"Oh, no, no," she answered, with animation; "I am very glad of it. The elderly couple who lived here before you were not to my liking. Once a year, on Christmas eve, I am privileged to spend one hour in this house, and although I have never failed to be here at the appointed time, it has been years, as I told you, since I saw a fire on that hearth and a living being in this hall. I knew you were here, and I am very glad of it. It pleases me greatly that one is living here who prizes this old place as I once prized it. This mansion was built for me by my husband upon the site of a smaller house, which he removed. The grounds about it, which I thought so lovely, are far more lovely now. For four years I lived here in perfect happiness, and now one hour each year something of that happiness is renewed."

Ordinarily I have good control of my actions and of my emotions, but at this moment I seemed to have lost all power over myself; my thoughts ran wild. To my amazement, I became conscious that I was falling in love—in love with something which did not exist; in love with a woman who once had been. It was absurd; it was ridiculous; but there was no power within me which could prevent it?

After all, this rapidly growing passion was not altogether absurd. She was an ideal which far surpassed any ideal I had ever formed for the mistress of my home. More than that, she had really been the mistress of this house, which was now my home. Here was a vision of the past fully revealed to my eyes. As the sweet voice fell upon my ears, how could I help looking upon it as something real, and listening to it as something real, and loving it.

I think she perceived my agitation; she looked upon me wonderingly.

"I hoped very much," she said, "that you would be in this hall when I should come down to-night, but I feared that I should disturb you, that perhaps I might startle or—"

I could not restrain myself. I rushed toward her and interrupted her with passionate earnestness.

"Startle or trouble me!" I exclaimed. "Oh, gracious lady, you have done but one thing to me to-night—you have made me love you! Pardon me; I cannot help it. Do not speak of impossibilities, of passionate ravings, of unmeaning words. Lady, I love you; I may not love you as you are, but I love you as you were. No happiness on earth could equal that of seeing you real—the mistress of this house, and myself the master."

She rose, drew back a little, and stood looking at me. If she had been true flesh and blood she could not have acted more naturally.

For some moments there was silence, and then a ter-

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

rible thought came into my head. Had I a right to speak to her thus, even if she were but the vision of something that had been? She had told me of her husband; she had spoken of her daughter; but she had said no word which would give me reason to believe that little girl was fatherless when her mother led her around the hall and explained to her the family portraits. Had I been addressing my wild words of passion to one whose beauty and grace, when they were real and true, belonged to another? Had I spoken as I should not have spoken even to the vision of a well-loved wife? I trembled with apprehension.

"Pardon me," I said, "if I have been imprudent. Remember that I know so little about you, even as you were."

When she answered there was nothing of anger in her tone, but she spoke softly, and with, I thought, a shade of pity.

"You have said nothing to offend me, but every word you have spoken has been so wild and so far removed from sense and reason that I am unable to comprehend your feelings."

"They are easy to understand!" I exclaimed. "I have seen my ideal of the woman I could love. I love you; that is all! Again I say it, and I say it with all my heart: Would you were real! Would you were real!"

She smiled. I am sure now she understood my passion. I am sure she expected it. I am sure that she pitied me.

Suddenly a change of expression came over her face; a beaming interest shone from her eyes; she took some steps toward me.

"I told you," said she, speaking quickly, "that what you have said seems to be without sense or reason, and yet it may mean something. I assure you that your words have been appreciated. I know that each one of them is true and comes from your heart. And now listen to me while I tell you—" At that moment the infernal clock upon the landing-place struck one. It was like the crash of doom. I stood alone in the great hall.

The domestics in that old house supposed that I spent Christmas day alone; but they were mistaken, for wherever I went my fancy pictured near me the beautiful vision of the night before. She walked with me in the crisp morning air; I led her through the quiet old rooms, and together we went up the great staircase and stood before the clock—the clock that I had blessed for striking twelve and cursed for striking one. At dinner she sat opposite me in a great chair which I had had placed there —"for the sake of symmetry," as I told my servants. After what had happened, it was impossible for me to be alone.

The day after Christmas old Mr. Marchmay came to call upon me. He was so sorry that I had been obliged to spend Christmas day all by myself. I fairly laughed as I listened to him.

There were things which I wanted him to tell me if he could, and I plied him with questions. I pointed to the portrait of the lady near the chimney-piece, and asked him who she was.

"That is Mrs. Evelyn Heatherton, first mistress of this house; I have heard a good deal about her. She was very unfortunate. She lost her life here in this hall on Christmas eve. She was young and beautiful, and must have looked a good deal like that picture."

I forgot myself. "I don't believe it," I said. "It does not seem to me that that portrait could have been a good likeness of the real woman."

"You may know more about art than I do, sir," said he. "It has always been considered a fine picture; but of course she lived before my time. As I was saying, she died here in this hall. She was coming down stairs on Christmas eve; there were a lot of people here in the hall waiting to meet her. She stepped on something on one of the top steps—a child's toy, perhaps—and lost her footing. She fell to the bottom and was instantly killed—killed in the midst of youth, health, and beauty."

"And her husband," I remarked, "was he—"

"Oh, he was dead!" interrupted Mr. Marchmay. "He died when his daughter was but a mere baby. By-the-way," said the old gentleman, "it seems rather funny that the painting over there—that old lady with the gray hair—is the portrait of that child. It is the only one there is, I suppose."

I did not attend to these last words. My face must have glowed with delight as I thought that I had not spoken to her as I should not. If I had known her to be real, I might have said everything which I had said to the vision of what she had been.

The old man went on talking about the family. That sort of thing interested him very much, and he said that, as I owned the house, I ought to know everything about the people who formerly lived there. The Heathertons had not been fortunate. They had lost a great deal of money, and, some thirty years before, the estate had passed out of their hands and had been bought by a Mr. Kennard, a distant connection of the family, who, with his wife, had lived there until very recently. It was to a nephew and niece of old Mr. Kennard that the property had descended. The Heathertons had nothing more to do with it.

"Are there any members of the family left?" I asked.

"Oh yes!" said Mr. Marchmay. "Do you see that portrait of a girl with a feather in her hat? She is a granddaughter of that Evelyn Heatherton up there. She is an old woman now and a widow, and she it was who sold the place to the Kennards. When the mortgages were paid she did not have much left, but she manages to live on it. But I tell you what you ought to do, sir: you ought to go and see her. She can tell you lots of stories of this place, for she knows more about the Heathertons than any one living. She married a distant cousin who had the family name; but he was a poor sort of a fellow, and he died some fifteen years ago. She has talked to me about your having the old house, and she said that she hoped that you would not make changes and tear down things. But of course she would not say anything like that to you; she is a lady who attends to her own business."

"Where does she live?" I asked. "I should like, above all things, to go and talk to her."

"It is the third house beyond the church," said Mr. Marchmay. "I am sure that she will be glad to see you. If you can make up your mind to listen to long stories about the Heathertons you will give her pleasure."

The next day I made the call. The house was neat, but small and unpretentious—a great drop from the fine hall which I now possessed.

The servant informed me that Mrs. Heatherton was at home, and I was shown into the little parlor—light, warm, and pleasantly furnished. In a few minutes the door opened, and I arose, but no old lady entered.

Struck dumb by breathless amazement, I beheld Evelyn Heatherton coming into the room!

I could not understand; my thoughts ran wild. Had some one been masquerading? Had I dreamed on Christmas eve, or was I dreaming now? Had my passionate desire been granted? Had that vision become real?

I was instantly convinced that what I saw before me was true and real, for the lady advanced toward me and held out her hand. I took it, and it was the hand of an actual woman.

Her mother, she said, begged that I would excuse her; that she was not well and was lying down. Mr. Marchmay had told them that I was coming, and that I wanted to know something about the old house; perhaps she might be able to give me a little information.

Almost speechless, I sat down, and she took a chair not far from me. Her position was exactly that which had been taken by the vision of her great-grandmother on Christmas eve. Her hands were crossed in her lap, and her large blue eyes were slightly upraised to mine. She was not dressed in a robe of olden days, nor was her hair piled up high on her head in bygone fashion, but she was Evelyn Heatherton in form and feature and in quiet grace. She was some years younger, and she lacked the dignity of a woman who had been married, but she was no stranger to me; I had seen her before.

Encouraged by my rapt attention, she told me stories of the old house where her mother had been born, and all that she knew of her great-grandmother she related with an interest that was almost akin to mine. "People tell me," she said, "that I am growing to look like her, and I am glad of it, for my mother gave me her name."

I sat and listened to the voice of this beautiful girl as I had listened to the words which had been spoken to me by the vision of her ancestress. If I had not known that she was real, and that there was no reason why she should vanish when the clock should strike, I might have spoken as I spoke to her great-grandmother. I remained entranced, enraptured, and it was only when the room began to grow dark that I was reminded that it was incumbent upon me to go.

But I came again, again, and again, and after a time it so happened that I was in that cottage at least once every day. The old lady was very gracious; it was plain enough that her soul was greatly gratified to know that the present owner of her old home—the house in which she had been born—was one who delighted to hear the family stories, and who respected all their traditions.

I need not tell the story of Evelyn and myself. My heart had been filled with a vision of her personality before I had seen her. At the first moment of our meeting my love for her sprung into existence as the flame bursts from a match. And she could not help but love me. Few women, certainly not Evelyn Heatherton, could resist the passionate affection which I offered her. She did not tell me this in words, but it was not long before I came to believe it.

It was one afternoon in spring that old Mrs. Heatherton and her daughter came to visit me in my house—the home of their ancestors. As I walked with them through the halls and rooms I felt as if they were the ladies of the manor, and that I was the recipient of their kind hospitality.

Mrs. Heatherton was in the dining-room, earnestly examining some of the ancestral china and glass, and Evelyn and I stood together in the hall, almost under the portrait which hung near the chimney-piece. She had been talking of the love and reverence she felt for this old house. "Evelyn," said I, "if you love this house and all that is in it, will you not take them and have them for your own? And will you not take me and love me and have me for your own?"

I had my answer before the old lady came out of the dining-room. She was reading the inscription on an old silver loving-cup when we went in to her and told her that again Evelyn Heatherton was to be the mistress of the old mansion.

We were married in the early winter, and after a journey in the South we came back to the old house, for I had a great desire that we should spend the holidays under its roof.

It was Christmas eve, and we stood together in the great hall, with a fire burning upon the hearth as it had glowed and crackled a year before. It was some minutes before twelve, and, purposely, I threw my arm around my dear wife and turned her so that she stood with her back to the great staircase. I had never told her of the vision I had seen; I feared to do so; I did not know what effect it might have upon her. I cared for her so earnestly and tenderly that I would risk nothing, but I felt that I must stand with her in that hall on that Christmas eve, and I believed that I could do so without fear or self-reproach.

The clock struck twelve. "Look up at your great-grandmother, Evelyn," I said; "it is fit that you should do so at this time." In obedience to my wishes her eyes were fixed upon the old portrait, and, at the same time, looking over her shoulder, my eyes fell upon the vision of the first Evelyn Heatherton descending the stairs. Upon her features was a gentle smile of welcome and of pleasure. So she must have looked when she went out of this world in health and strength and womanly bloom.

The vision reached the bottom of the stairs and came toward us. I stood expectant, my eyes fixed upon her noble countenance.

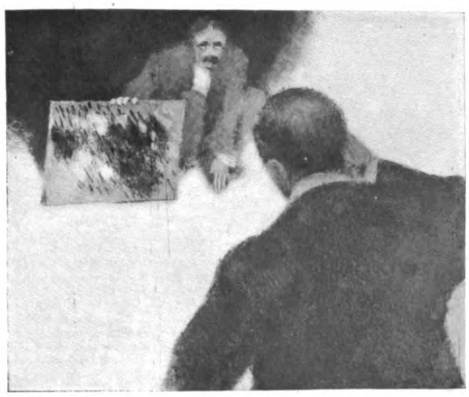
"It seems to me," said my Evelyn, "as if my great-grandmother really looked down upon us. As if it made her happy to think that—"

"Is this what you meant?" said I, speaking to the lovely vision, now so near us.

"Yes," was the answer; "it is what I meant, and I am rejoiced. I bless you and I love you both," and as she spoke two fair and shadowy hands were extended over our heads. No one can hear the voice of a spirit except those to whom it speaks, and my wife thought that my words had been addressed to her.

"Yes," said my Evelyn; "I mean that we should be standing here in her old home, and that your arm should be around me."

I looked again. There was no one in the hall except my Evelyn and myself.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE AMALGAMATED BROTHERHOOD OF SPOOKS.

A Letter to the Editor.

BY JOHN KENDRICK BANGS—ILLUSTRATED BY G. VERBEEK.

"I THOUGHT A MILE WAS THE PROPER DISTANCE"

IT is with very deep regret that I find myself unable to keep the promise made to you last Spring to provide you with a suitable ghost story for your Christmas number. I have made several efforts to prepare such a tale as it seemed to me you would require, but, one and all, these have proved unavailing. By a singular and annoying combination of circumstances in which only my unfortunate habit of meeting trouble in a spirit of badinage has involved me, I cannot secure the models which I invariably need for the realistic presentation of my stories, and I decline at this present, as I have hitherto consistently declined, to draw upon my imagination for the ingredients necessary, even though tempted by the exigencies of a contract sealed, signed, and delivered. It is far from my wish to be known to you as one who makes promises only to break them, but there are times in a man's life when he must consider seriously which is the lesser evil, to deceive the individual or to deceive the world, the latter being a mass of individuals, and, consequently, as much more worthy of respect as the whole is greater than a part. Could I bring myself to be false to my principles as a scribe, and draw upon my fancy for my facts, and, through a prostitution of my art, so sickly o'er my plot with the pale cast of realism as to hoodwink my readers into believing what I know to be false, the task were easy. Given a more or less active and unrestrained imagination, pen, ink, paper, and the will to do so, to construct out of these a ghost story which might have been, but as a matter of fact was not, presents no difficulties whatsoever; but I unfortunately have a conscience which, awkward as it is to me at times, I intend to keep clear and unspotted. The consciousness of having lied would forever rest as a blot upon my escutcheon. I cannot manufacture out of whole cloth a narrative such as you desire and be true to myself, and this I intend to be, even if by so doing I must seem false to you. I think, however, that, as one of my friends and most important consumer, you are entitled to a complete explanation of my failure to do as I have told you I would. To most others I should send merely a curt note evidencing, not pleading, a pressure of other work as the cause of my not coming to time. To you it is owed that I should enter somewhat into the details of the unfortunate business.

You doubtless remember that last summer, with our mutual friend Peters, I travelled abroad seeking health and, incidentally, ideas. I had discovered that imported ideas were on the whole rather more popular in America than those which might be said to be indigenous to the soil. The reading public had, for the time being at least, given itself over to moats, and châteaux, and bloodshed, and the curious dialects of the lower orders of British society. Sherlock Holmes had superseded Old Sleuth in the affections of my countrymen who read books. Even those honest little critics the boys and girls were finding more to delight them in the doings of Richard Cœur de Lion and Alice in Wonderland than in the more remarkable and intensely American adventures of Ragged Dick or Mickie the Motor-boy. John Storm was at that moment hanging over the world like the sword of Damocles, and Rudolf Rassendyll had completely overshadowed such essentially American heroes as Uncle Tom and Rollo. I found, to my chagrin, that the poetry of Tennyson was more widely read even than my own, even though Tennyson was dead and I was not. And in the universities whole terms were devoted to the compulsory study of dramatists like Shakspere and Molière, while home talent, as represented by Mr. Hoyt or the facile productions of Messrs. Weber & Fields, were relegated to the limbo of electives which the students might take up or not, as they chose, and then only in the hours which they were expected to devote to recreation. All of which seemed to indicate that while there was of course no royal road to literary fame, there was with equal certainty no republican path thereto, and that real inspiration was to be derived rather under the effete monarchies of Europe than at home. To Peters the same idea had occurred, but in his case in relation to art rather than to literature. The patrons of art in America had a marked preference for the works of Meissonier, Corot, Gérôme, Millet—anybody, so long as he was a foreigner, Peters said. The wealthy would pay ten, twenty, a hundred thousand dollars for a Rousseau or a Rosa Bonheur rather than exchange a paltry one hundred dollars for a canvas by Peters, though, as far as Peters was concerned, his canvas was just as well woven, his pigments as carefully mixed, and his application of the one to the other as technically correct as was anything from the foreign brushes.

"You can't take in the full import of a Turner unless you stand a way away from it," said he, "and if you'll only stand far enough away from mine you couldn't tell it from a Meissonier."

And when I jocularly responded to this that I thought a mile was the proper distance, he was offended. We quarrelled, but made up after a while, and in the making up decided upon a little venture into foreign fields together, not only to recuperate, but to see if so be we could discover just where the workers on the other side got that quality which placed them in popular esteem so far ahead of ourselves.

What we discovered along this especial line must form the burden of another story. The main cause of our foreign trip, these discoveries, are but incidental to the theme I have in hand. Our conclusions were important, but they have no place here, and what they were you will have to wait until my work on Abroad versus Home is completed to learn. But what is important to this explanation is the fact that while going through the long passage leading from the Pitti Palace to the Uffizi Gallery at Florence we—or rather I—encountered one of those phantoms which have been among the chief joys and troubles of my life. Peters was too much taken up with his Baedeker to see either ghosts or pictures. Indeed, it used to irritate me that Peters saw so little, but he would do as most American tourists do, and spend all his time looking for some especial thing he thought he ought to see, and generally missing not only it, but thousands of minor things quite as well worthy of his attention. I don't believe he would have seen the ghost, however, under any circumstances. It requires a specially cultivated eye or digestion, one or the other, to enable one to see ghosts, and Peters's eye is blind to the invisible and his digestion is good.

Why, under the canopy, the vulgar little spectre was haunting a picture-gallery I never knew, unless it was to embarrass the Americans who passed to and fro, for he claimed to be an American. I knew he was not a living thing the minute I laid eyes through him. He loomed up before me while I was engaged in chuckling over a particularly bad canvas by somebody whose name I have forgotten, but which was something like Beppo di Contarini. It represented the scene of a grand fête at Venice back in the fifteenth century, and while preserved by the art-lovers of Florence as something worthy, would, I firmly believe, have failed of acceptance even by the catholic taste of the editor of an American Sunday newspaper comic supplement. The thing was crude in its drawing, impossible in its coloring, and absolutely devoid of action. Every gondola on the canal looked as if it were stuck in the mud, and as for the water of the Grand Canal itself, it had all the liquid glory under this artist's touch of calf's-foot jelly, and it amused me intensely to think that these patrons of art, in the most artistic city in the world, should have deemed it worth keeping. However, whatever the merit of the painting, I was annoyed in the midst of my contemplation of it to have thrust in the line of vision a shape—I cannot call it a body, because there was no body to it. There were the lineaments of a living person, and a very vulgar living person at that, but the thing was translucent, and as it stepped in between me and the wonderful specimen of Beppo di Somethingorother's art, I felt as if a sudden haze had swept over my eyes, blurring the picture until it reminded me of a cheap kind of decalcomania that in my boyhood days had satisfied my yearnings after the truly beautiful.

I made several ineffectual passes with my hands to brush the thing away. I had discovered that with certain classes of ghosts one could be rid of them, just as one may dissipate a cloud of smoke, by swirling one's outstretched paw around in it, and I hoped that I might in this way rid myself of the nuisance now before me. But I was mistaken. He swirled, but failed to dissipate.

"HE VANISHED IN SOMETHING OF A RAGE."

"Hum!" said I, straightening up, and addressing the thing with some degree of irritation. "You may know a great deal about art, my friend, but you seem not to have studied manners. Get out of my way."

"Pah!" he ejaculated, turning a particularly nasty pair of green eyes on me. "Who the deuce are you, that you should give me orders?"

"Well," said I, "if I were impulsive of speech and seldom grammatical, I might reply by saying Me, but as a purist, let me tell you, sir, that I'm I, and if you seek to know further and more intimately, I will add that who I am is none of your infernal business."

"Humph!" he said, shrugging his shoulders. "Grammatical or otherwise, you're a coward! You don't dare say who you are, because you are afraid of me. You know I am a spectre, and, like all commonplace people, you are afraid of ghosts."

A hot retort was on my lips, and I was about to tell him my name and address, when it occurred to me that by doing so I might lay myself open to a kind of persecution from which I have suffered from time to time, ghosts are sometimes so hard to lay, so I accomplished what I at the moment thought was my purpose by a bluff.

"Oh, as for that," said I, "my name is So and So, and I live at Number This, That Street, Chicago, Illinois."

Both the name and the address were of course fictitious.

"Very well," said he, calmly, making a note of the address. "My name is Jones. I am the president of the Amalgamated Brotherhood of Spooks, enjoying a well-earned rest from his labors on his savings from his salary as a walking delegate. You shall hear from me on your return to Chicago through the local chapter, the United Apparitions of Illinois."

"All right," said I, with equal calmness. "If the Illinois spooks are as Illinoisome as you are, I will summon the board of health, and have them laid without more ado."

Upon this we parted. That is to say, I walked on to the Uffizi, and he vanished, in something of a rage, it seemed to me.

I thought no more of the matter until a week ago, when, in accordance with an agreement with the principal thereof, I left New York to go to Chicago, to give a talk before a certain young ladies' boarding-school, on the subject of "Mus-

"TURNING A PARTICULARLY NASTY PAIR OF GREEN EYES UPON ME."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

cular Romanticism." This was a lecture I had prepared on a literary topic concerning which I had thought much. I had observed that a great deal of the popularity of certain authors had come from the admiration of young girls—mostly those at boarding-school, and therefore deprived of real manly company—for a kind of literature which, seeming to be manly, did not yet appeal very strongly to men. In certain aspects it seemed strong. It presented heroes who were truly heroic, and who always did the right thing in the right manner. Writers who had more ink than blood to shed, and a greater knowledge of etiquette than of human nature, were making their way into temporary fame by compelling chaps to do things they could not do. I rather liked to read of these fellows myself. I am no exception to the rule which makes human beings admire, and very strongly too, the fellow who poses successfully. Indeed, I admire a poseur who can carry his pose through without disaster to himself, because he has nothing to back him up, and, wanting this, if by his assurance he can make himself a considerable personage, he falls short of genius only by lacking it. But this is apart from the story. Whatever the general line of thought in the lecture, I was, as I have said, on my way to Chicago to deliver it before a young ladies' boarding-school. I should have been happy over the prospect, for I have many warm friends in Chicago, there was a moderately large fee ahead, and there is always a charm, as well, in the mere act of standing on a dais before some two or three hundred young girls and having their undivided attention for a brief hour. Yet, despite all this, I was dreadfully depressed. Why, I could not at first surmise. It seemed to me, however, as though some horrid disaster were impending. I experienced all the sensations which make four o'clock in the morning so dreaded an hour to those who suffer from insomnia. My heart would race ahead, thumping like the screw of an ocean greyhound, and then slow down until it seemingly ceased to beat altogether; my hands were alternately dry and hot, and clammy and cold; and then like a flash I knew why, and what it was I feared. It suddenly dawned upon my mind that, by some frightfully unhappy coincidence, the address of Miss Brockton's Academy for Young Ladies, whither I was bound, was precisely the same as that I had given the vulgar little spook at Florence as my own. I had entirely forgotten the incident; and then, as I drew near to the spot whereon I was to have been made to suffer through the machinations of the local chapter of the Amalgamated Brotherhood of Spooks, my soul was filled with dread. Had Grand-Master-Spook Jones's threat been merely idle? Had he, even as I had done, dismissed the whole affair as unworthy of any further care, or would he keep his word?—indeed, had he kept his word, and, through his followers in the Amalgamated Brotherhood, made himself obnoxious to the residents of Number This, That Street?

"A SPECTRE BRASS BAND."

"GHOSTS HAD PARADED THROUGH THE HOUSE, THREATENING THE OCCUPANTS."

My nervous dread redoubled as I neared Chicago, and it was as much as I could do, when the train reached Kalamazoo, to keep from turning back. And the event showed that I suffered with only too much reason, for, at the house of the institution, I found it closed. The door was locked, the shades pulled down, the building the perfect picture of gloom. Miss Brockton, I was informed, was in a lunatic-asylum, and two hundred and eighty-three young girls, ranging from fourteen to twenty years of age, had been returned to their parents, the hair of every mother's daughter of them blanched white as the driven snow. No one knew, my informant said, exactly what had occurred at the academy, but the fact that was plain to all was that, some two weeks previous to my coming, the school had retired at the usual hour one night, in the very zenith of a happy prosperity, and gathered at breakfast the next morning to find itself wrecked, and bearing the outward semblance of a home for indigent old ladies. No one, from Miss Brockton herself to the youngest pupil, could give a coherent account of what had turned them all gray in a single night, and brought the furrows of age to cheeks both old and young, nor could any inducement be held out to any of the pupils to pass another night within those walls. They one and all fled madly back to their homes, and Miss Brockton's attempted explanation was so incredible that, protesting her sanity, she was nevertheless placed under restraint, pending a full investigation of the incident. She had, I was informed, asserted that some sixty ghosts of most terrible aspect had paraded through the house between the hours of midnight and 2 A.M., howling and shrieking and threatening the occupants in a most terrifying fashion. At their head marched a spectre brass band of twenty-four pieces, grinding out with horrid contortions and grimaces the most awful discords imaginable—discords, indeed, Miss Brockton had said, alongside of which those of the most grossly material German street band in creation became melodies of soothing sweetness. The spectre rabble to the rear bore transparencies, upon which were painted such legends as, "Hail to Jones, our beloved Chief!" "Strike One, Strike All!" and, "Down with Hawkins, the Grinder of Ghosts!" This last caused my heart to sink still lower, for Hawkins was the name I had given the vision at Florence, and I now understood all. It was only too manifest that I was the cause of the undoing of these innocents.

My lie to Jones had brought this disaster upon the Brockton Academy. The dreadfulness of it appalled me, and I turned away, sick at heart, only to find myself face to face with the horrid Jones, grinning like the cad he had proved himself.

"Well, you have done it," I cried, trembling with rage. "I hope you are proud of yourself, venting your spite on an innocent woman and two hundred and eighty-three defenceless girls."

He laughed.

"It was a pretty successful haunt," he said; "and possibly, now that Mrs. Hawkins and your daughters—"

"Who?" I cried. "Mrs. What, and which?"

"Your wife and children," he replied. "Now that the local chapter has attended to them, maybe you'll apologize to me for your boorish behavior at Florence."

"Those people were nothing to me," said I. "That was a boarding-school you have driven crazy. I was merely coming here to lecture—"

I immediately perceived my mistake. He could now easily discover my identity.

"Oho!" said he, with a broad, grim smile. "Then you lied to me at Florence, and you are not Hawkins, but the man they call the spook Boswell among us?"

"Yes, I am not Hawkins, and I am the other," I retorted. "Make the most of it."

"I thought that was rather a large family of girls for one man to have," rejoined Jones. "But see here—are you going to apologize or not?"

"I am not," I cried. "Never in this world nor in the next, you miserable handful of miasma!"

"Then, sir," said he, firmly, "I shall order a general strike for the Amalgamated Brotherhood of Spooks, and the strike will be on until you do apologize. Hereafter you will have to derive your inspiration from a contemplation of unskilled spooks, and, if I understand matters, you will find some difficulty in raising even these, for there is not one that I know of who doesn't belong to the union."

With that he vanished, and I sadly made my way back to my home. Once at my desk again, I turned my attention to the work I had promised you, and, to my chagrin, discovered that while I had all the concomitants of a successful Christmas story, I could not write it, because Grand-Master-Spirit Jones had kept his word. One and all, my selected group of spooks went out on strike. They absolutely refused to pose unless I apologized to Jones, and by no persuasions, threats, or cajoling have I been able since to make them rise up before me, that I might present them to my readers with that degree of fidelity which I deem essential. My home, which was once a sort of spirit club, is now bare of even a semblance of a ghost worth writing up, and, conjure as I may, I cannot bring them back. The strike is on, and I am its victim. But one miserable little specimen have I discovered since my interview with Jones, and so unskilled is he in the science of spooking, that I give you my word he could not make a baby shiver on a dark night with the temperature twenty below zero and the wind howling like a madman without; and as for making hair stand on end, I tried him on a bit of hirsute from the tail of the timidest fawn in the Central Park zoo, and the thing fell over as limp as a strand from the silken locks of the Lorelei.

That, my dear sir, is why I cannot give you the story I have promised. I hope you will understand that the fault is not my own, but is the result of the evil tendency of the times, when the protective principle has reached the ultimate of tyrannous absurdity.

While Jones is at the head of the Amalgamated Brotherhood my case is hopeless, for I shall never apologize, unless he promises to restore to poor Mrs. Brockton and her two hundred and eighty-three pupils their former youthful gayety and prosperity, which, I understand upon inquiry, he is unable to do, since the needed patent reversible spook, who will restore blanched hair to its natural color and return the bloom of youth to furrowed

"THE THING FELL OVER LIMP."

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

heeks, has not yet been invented; and I, he only person in the world who might ave invented it, am powerless, for while the oycott hangs over my head, as you will see or yourself, I am bereft of the raw material or the conducting of the necessary experiments.

THE WORLD IMPROVES.

See double-page colored supplement, "Small Game Better than None," drawn by Howard Pyle, with this number.]

OLD-FASHIONED gentlemen we praise,
As did our dads before us,
And call old times "the good old days"
In approbative chorus.

Yet no man of us needs be told
That times we laud as "good" and "old"
Had still their drawbacks manifold;
That some folks, then as now, were rude;
That greedy ends were oft pursued
By methods still more bold and crude
Two centuries ago than now,
When wiser heads know better how.

Let's not regret the past, but give
Due thanks that it's our lot to live
Not in Queen Anne's, but Croker's, reign,
When power discreetly used may gain
The full reward that power deserves
Without offence to timid nerves.

E. S. M.

CHRISTMAS IN THE KLONDIKE.

CHRISTMAS everywhere should be a day f happiness and merrymaking, but I wonder how many of those who spent last season n the Klondike (or who are there now) can ook back on it with any pleasure?

With hardly an exception it was our first winter amid far Northern conditions, and in ddition to what might possibly be called ardships of the climate were those attending he circumstances of our coming and our ode of living; for we had reached Dawson fter the arctic winter had set in.

The old-timers and those so fortunate as o have been in Dawson in time, or with fficient money to place a large order at the ores for the necessaries of life, which are rdered in advance sufficient for the year, ere comparatively well provided for, even hough some of the steamers failed to get in ith supplies to fill many of the orders completely. But none of the new-comers knew his. The "Chee-chalkos," as we were called, in our anxiety to reach the mines before he river closed, were exhausted in body, ind, and resources. Some had outfits large ough to tide them over until the first teamer came up in the spring to relieve lmost certain famine, some had flour enough or only a few months, still others had less, nd there were some who had not a pound f grub, a dollar of money, nor proper clothes n their backs. Many of these last preferred the remoter dangers of remaining in he Klondike to those of the trail, which was, y early winter, thronged with men fleeing or their lives, and, but for aid, starving.

The fear of famine was therefore over s all—though no one would starve so long s there was food in the camp. The days bout Christmas grew short, only a bit of iffused daylight between ten and three, the n being visible from the high ground, and he nights almost endless in their dreariness; or, like nearly everything else, candles were ort, and one could afford but one at a me.

Men went over their grub-piles, then easured the time, and figured to a pound hat they could allow themselves each day. here were parties living on a meal a day. n one cabin that I knew they allowed themselves bacon but twice a week. Flour was he staple by which the abundance of other hings was measured, and it was not until ome time after Christmas—namely, on January 10—that I noted as important news that ood was easier, flour having dropped to fty dollars a sack, damaged flour being orth as low as thirty-five. There were lots f people in the camp with sufficient equanimity to do as my friend Captain Anderson rote out that he was doing—eating the best rst, and the worst afterwards. And while pring revealed that our fears were groundless (since so many had departed from the amp), this anxiety was a distinct feature of ur life as a whole.

The feeling at this time is expressed in ome little verses by my versatile friend ussell S. Bates, which, in addition to their ther beautiful qualities, are true to nature, or they were scribbled in medias res. Here ey are:

THE LONE FLAPJACK.

One cold Alaska's winter day
I sat within my lonely shack;
Without, old Boreas held full sway,
While cold came in through every crack.
Upon the stove was scarce a snack—
My daily meal, a lone flapjack.

Upon the floor my flour lay—
In all 'twas less than half a sack.
My beans and bacon on that day
Would hardly constitute a pack.
Could I live on till first of May
Upon one lone flapjack a day?

While pondering thus, and looking back—
For I ne'er in my life did lack Three sumptuous, hearty meals a day—
Judge Mastason, to my dismay,
Came in and said, "My dear old Mac,
Can you give me a hot flapjack?"

My friend has gone, the days seem black,
I miss his hearty, genial way.
His friends at home will test his sack
'Mid popping corks, as good friends may;
But should the spring convey him back,
He's welcome to my lone flapjack!

As Christmas approached, preparations were made to celebrate in some fashion; if not hilariously, then with as much propriety as possible. Some put little evergreens in front of their places, which in a dim way suggest the Christmas season. They were not hard to get, for the country is full of spruces of just the right size. Every one tried to have something special for dinner. There was much in our surroundings to suggest the season of gayety—the snow and cold, the people in furs and bright bits of color, the tinkling of bells of the swell dog-teams.

But while we had these natural accompaniments of the season, one prime essential was lacking. There was not a turkey in the camp. Some one had reported that a Dutchman brought a turkey in over the ice, one that his wife had cooked in Skaguay, but I believe that was not true. Andrew Flett, the Saskatchewan half-breed, with his train of dogs and the official mail (and a file of

(Continued on page 1245.)

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

RIGID RULES ENFORCED.

VETERINARIES of the N. Y. Condensed Milk Co. examine cows supplying milk for the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk, to guard against any contamination. Send for "Infant Health." Information valuable to every mother.—[Adv.]

"VIOLETS OF THE CZAR."

EVERY one has his own peculiar idea about life, and sees it all in beauteous form according to the realization of his desiderata. Some aspire after riches, others after glory, others after love, . . . and each pursues his dream with desperation. . . . But beyond the initial aspiration upon which life is based there exists a certain amount of exquisite enjoyments of which one and all without exception is anxious to partake; and the purest, most refined, and at the same time the one which appeals the most to the senses is to be found in perfumes; in fact, which modern organism could resist the ideal attraction and the charms inspired by the "VIOLETS OF THE CZAR" of ORIZA-LEGRAND, for to them it intoxicates the brain and the heart!—[Adv.]

"FEEL good as new."—Sentiment of hundreds after giving Abbott's—The Original Angostura Bitters, a fair trial. Fair health inevitable result. Get Abbott's. —[Adv.]

No Christmas Table is complete without Dr. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS, the finest appetizer. —[Adv.]

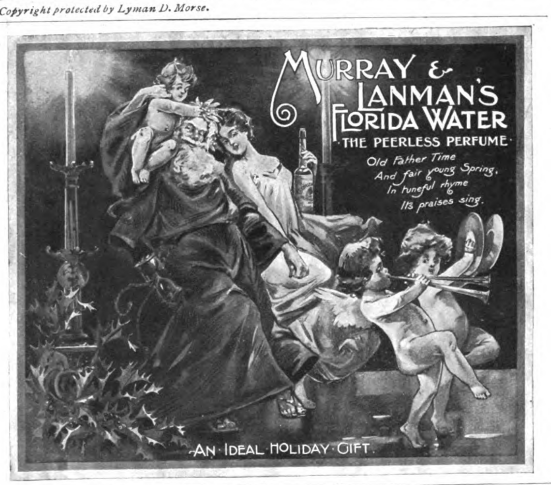
ADVERTISEMENTS.

TO INSURE Perfect Rest and Comfort for the Invalid

the "PERFECTION" AIR MATTRESS should be used. No hospital or sick-room is properly equipped without it. Bed-sores are unknown where "Perfection" Air Mattresses are used. Send postal for book of information.

MECHANICAL FABRIC CO.,
Providence, R. I.
(Air-Goods Dept.)



The Ideal Sight Restorer.

A MOST VALUABLE AND SUITABLE PRESENT. THE INESTIMABLE BLESSING OF SIGHT. AVOID SPECTACLES, HEADACHE AND SURGICAL OPERATION. READ ILLUSTRATED TREATISE ON THE EYE. PAMPHLET MAILED FREE. THE IDEAL COMPANY, 239 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Copyright protected by Lyman D. Morse.

7,000 Guns in Stock

WE SELL GUNS of every reputable American and foreign make, and give wholesale prices to everybody. We carry in stock

Fishing Tackle and Sporting Goods amounting to a quarter of a million dollars. We can please the fancy of millionaires, or meet the demands of the poorest sportsman and angler. Write for prices, or ask us to send you our Sporting Goods Catalogue. We load and sell over

1,000,000 Hand Loaded Shells a Year

Ask us to send you our price card of hand and machine loaded shells. We have

The largest Gun Repair Shop in America

We make guns, re-bore, re-stock, repair—in fact, alter a gun to suit the owner, and guarantee satisfaction. Write for prices.

MONTGOMERY WARD & CO.

Originators of the Catalogue Business 111 to 120 Michigan Ave, cor. Madison St., Chicago

MENTION THIS PUBLICATION WHEN WRITING

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Bills of Exchange bought, and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,

BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

THE CELEBRATED

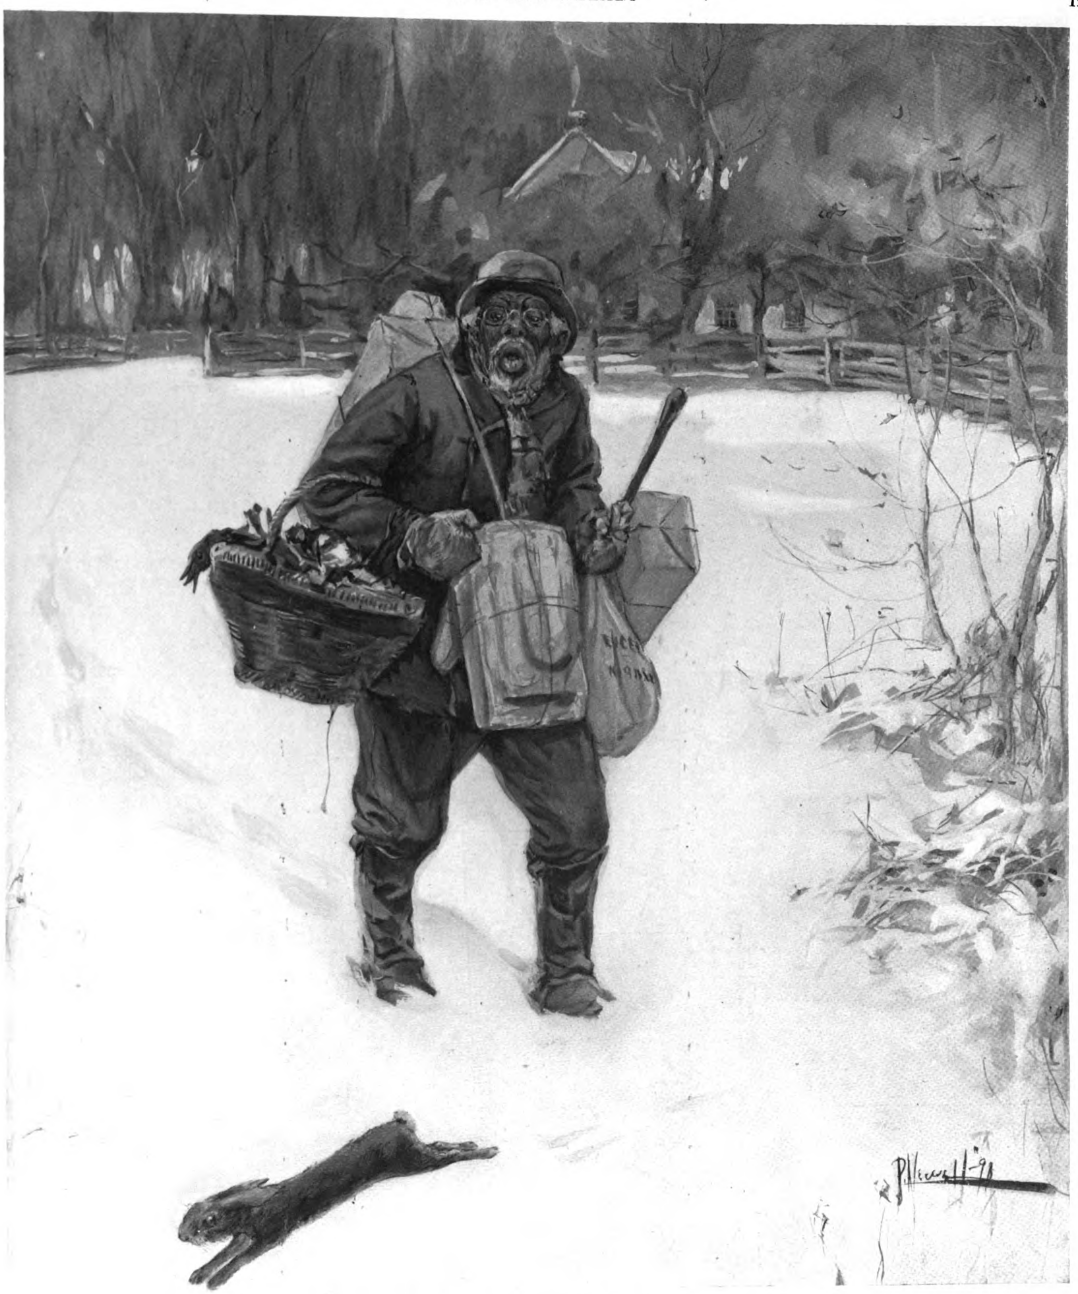
SOHMER

Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.

Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade.

Our name spells—

S—O—H—M—E—R



New York Warerooms SOHMER BUILDING Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A Merry Christma

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CHRISTMAS MORNING—THE CHALLENGE.—DRAWN BY PETER S. NEWELL.

(Continued from page 1244.)

HARPER'S WEEKLY), was the first to arrive straight through from outside. But on the 10th of April a man answering the description did arrive, and raffled the turkey off in McPhee's saloon, netting him $174; but he said he would not bring in another at the same price. So a description of our Christmas turkey must be of the one we did not have. If any one had owned a turkey, we could have found a way to dispose of it without fatal effects, as cranberries are plentiful in the Yukon.

I was not worried about the outlook for Christmas dinner until Pelletier, my cabin partner, announced that he had invited some friends to dinner. Heavens! I looked under the bunk where we had our stock of grub safely cached. There was bacon, plenty of that, but we were getting a little tired of it three times a day. Flour, plenty of that too; not much hand at making bread—never did cook until I had to. Pelletier no better, but with more imagination for concocting, which is nine parts of good cooking. Vegetarian, too, he was, having to live on soup vegetables and beans since he cooked that last lot of eighteen loaves that we could not eat, and that the dogs would not eat either, because he forgot to sweeten the sour dough. It would be flapjacks and beans. Plenty of them; got wet coming down river, but all right yet.

Milk all gone last week; don't know what possessed me not to put in two or three cases of condensed milk; those old-timers must have tough constitutions, when they said to bring in only pork and beans. Butter, some left; we will soon be able to call it cheese or butter. It is hard to tell the difference now.

Pelletier said, "Leave it to me!"

Day before Christmas he came in with some bundles, which he threw down on the table. I saw they were cans —some condensed cream, two tins of French pease, and— a can of turkey!

With the help of the turkey, which Pelletier had somehow rustled out of one of the stores, and with the counsel of old Joe Liberty, an old-timer from Juneau, who had come to live in the cabin, we made out not badly. One of our guests was setting out on the tedious journey to the outside, and it was a farewell dinner as well for him—a better one than many a poor fellow already on the trail was having that day.

And it was better than many a one has had on the Yukon. Nearly every one I knew began to have a touch of scurvy. We all missed the fresh meat.

Unable to stand the dreariness, and, moreover, being anxious to explore the upper Klondike, where few white men had been, soon after Christmas I threw some blankets and some grub on a sled and ran off with the Indians, and lived like a heathen for a month or two.

I heard much complaint about the food in Dawson, though I think the cooking of it is as important as the quality. I wonder what those old-timers were made of who, at the time of the strike on El Dorado, had nothing but candles to put in the beans, not even salt, until Swiftwater Bill thought they were using too many candles for drifting and shut down on them, and then they had nothing to season with but sarsaparilla.

I heard of another Christmas dinner, of two old-timers in the Lower Country. They were original old-timers; had been sixteen years in the country; came here from Cassiar; hadn't seen a railroad train for forty years; whiskers a foot long—what they call "sour-dough stiffs" down in Circle. Though the biggest-hearted men, they were regular old cranks. These two old-timers were living in the same old cabin; but each had his own stove, did his own cooking, had his own outfit, and his own side of the cabin, the two households being as distinct as if they were miles apart. It was Christmas, and one of the men had found a soup-bone, so as to have something special. The other man saw the preparations, and resolved to have something extra that day too; but he had no soup-bone, only soup vegetables; so he too made himself some soup. They sat down to dinner, each in his own corner. The man who had the bone tasted his soup.

"I tell you," said he, smacking his lips, "this soup tastes good," and kept on eating.

The other smacked his lips too; never looked up, but shook his head, saying, "It can't taste any better than mine." And those two old cranks kept on eating, each telling how good his own soup was, and it never occurred to either of them to offer some to the other!

I only heard this story. Alaska is the abiding-place of colossal liars. One must believe nothing he hears, and only half of what he sees.

TAPPAN ADNEY.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

1. "Yes, Brunie, this is pretty hard lines fer Chris'mas eve, an' I feel bluer 'n ever, after seein' that bootiful tree down in the school-house yonder."

2. "Say, Brunie, here comes the feller what's goin' ter be Sandy Claws down there to-night. Heard him say so in the village to-day. Costume's in that bag. You spring out on him an' git it. I've got a scheme."

3. "W-oo-o-o-o-o-ff!"

4. "Bully boy, Brunie! he won't stop runnin' fer a week."

5. "Now all yon've got ter do is ter jest shin down the chimbly, and when yer gits in, scare 'em."

6. Deacon Shaddock: "Hark, little children, for even now I think I hear old Santy coming down this unused fireplace."

7. "Ah, yes, here comes the dear old fellow. Don't be frightened, children. How de do, San—"

8. "W-o-oo-oo-ooo-ff!"

9. "Woof! Wo-oo-ff! Wo-oo-ooff!"

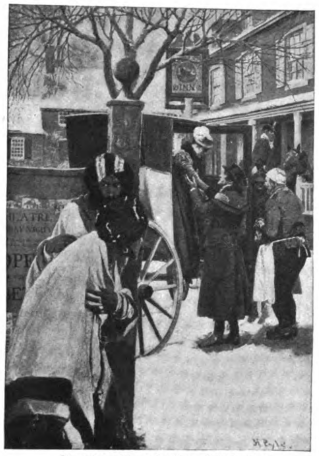
10. "Shake der tree again, Brunie; dey won't dare show up before daylight. Say, dis is a rather merry Chris'mas, after all."

THE MERRY CHRISTMAS OF THE DANCING-BEAR AND HIS SCHEMING MASTER.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



Miniature Reproduction of Cover
IN COLORS AND GOLD BY A. B. WENZELL

THE CHRISTMAS NUMBER

CONTENTS

Cover in Colors and Gold . . . . . A. B. Wenzell
"Sir Bruin," a Christmas adventure . . . S. R. Crockett
Illustrated by Peter Newell
"When the Door Opened—?" a short story . Sarah Grand Illustrated by A. B. Wenzell
"In Shakespeare's Time," . . . . . Edmund Gosse
Decorated by George Wharton Edwards
"Christmas in the South" . . . . . Frank L. Stanton
Illustrated by Louis Loeb
Stories, Essays and Poems, by Clinton Scollard, Alice Meynell, Edgar Saltus, and Walter Camp
Double-Page Supplement in Colors by F. C. Yohn, "The Trooper's Toast" AND
"THE PRICE OF BLOOD,"
A Christmas extravaganza written and illustrated
By HOWARD PYLE

Miniature Reproduction of Full Page
SUPPLEMENT IN COLORS BY HOWARD PYLE

The CHRISTMAS COLLIER'S is the first American weekly to rival the famous Christmas numbers of London and Paris. It consists of 42 pages, beautifully and profusely illustrated, both in colors and black and white, by famous artists. It contains Christmas stories, poems and essays by the very best writers. On sale everywhere. Price Twenty-five Cents.

COLLIER'S WEEKLY for 1899

Will continue to uphold its reputation, gained during the war with Spain, as the best illustrated record of the world's events. Its special artists, photographers and correspondents will be found in the far off Philippines, in Cuba, Puerto Rico, London, and Paris—wherever the interests of American readers are engaged. It will cover every special field of interest at home, as abroad, and its departments will include weekly articles on American Sport, the Drama, Literature, Art, and Women's work, by such noted authorities on the subjects named as Walter Camp, John D. Barry, Alice Meynell, Lionel Strachey, etc.

ART The art programme includes a series of twelve "GREAT PICTURES" by the foremost illustrators of the day, and frequent contributions from A. B. Wenzell, Howard Pyle, F. C. Yohn, Jay Hambidge, Henry Reuterdahl, Albert Sterner, Frederic Remington, and others.

FICTION A new serial story, "Janice Meredith, A story of the Revolution," by Paul Leicester Ford, author of "The Honorable Peter Sterling," dealing with love and adventures at the time of the Revolution, and full of stirring incidents from the career of Washington, profusely illustrated by the pupils of Howard Pyle; short stories by Henry James, Stephen Crane, Julien Gorden, S. R. Crockett, and other well-known writers.

SPECIAL FEATURES The Editorial programme for 1899 includes a series of twelve important articles by famous men, on subjects of vital interest, and other unusually attractive features.

Enthronization of Queen Wilhelmina

SPECIAL OFFER

The price of a yearly subscription is Four Dollars, but the publisher will send the paper, postpaid by mail, to any reader of Harper's Weekly, from January 1st to April 1st, on receipt of One Dollar.

Address COLLIER'S WEEKLY
NEW YORK

President McKinley at the Omaha Exposition

Taking of Khartoum

THE PEACE COMMISSION AT PARIS

Launching of the Battleship "Illinois"

ARTISTS, PHOTOGRAPHERS, AND CORRESPONDENTS EVERYWHERE

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AMATEUR SPORT

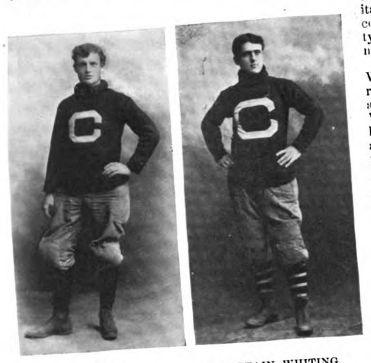
ALL-AMERICA FOOTBALL TEAM FOR 1898.

Romeyn (West Point), full-back.
Dibblee, Captain (Harvard), and McBride (Yale), half-backs.
Daly (Harvard), quarter-back.
Cunningham (Michigan), centre.
Hare (Pennsylvania) and Boal (Harvard), guards.
Chamberlin (Yale) and Hillebrand (Princeton), tackles
Palmer (Princeton) and Hallowell (Harvard), ends.

SUBSTITUTES.

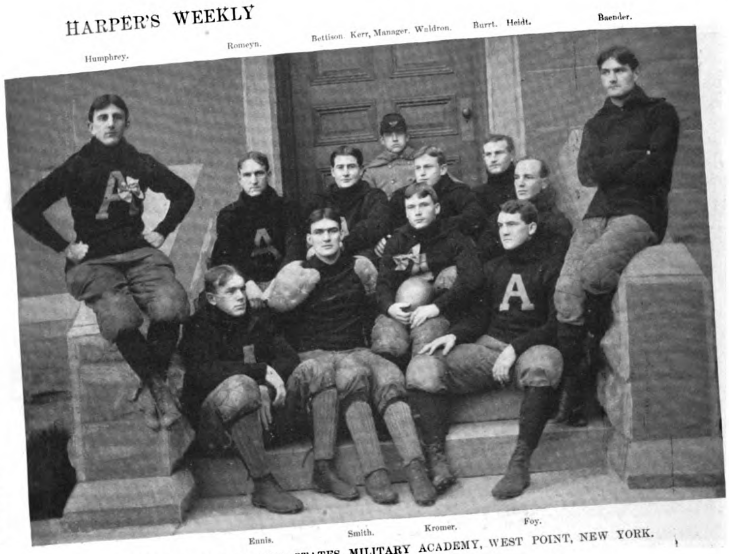
IN THE LINE.



Overfield (Pennsylvania), Brown (Yale), Burden (Harvard), Haughton (Harvard), Donald (Harvard), Folwell (Pennsylvania), Poe (Princeton).

BACK OF THE LINE.

Reid (Harvard), Warren (Harvard), Kromer (West Point), O'Dea (Wisconsin).



EXCEPT FOR SOME GENERAL IMPROVEMENT in punting, the football season of '98 marked no development deserving commendation. On the contrary, the average quality of play among the larger university teams of the East, Harvard not included, was distinctly lower than that of '96—I was in Siam and Sumatra hunting big game in '97, and therefore saw none of the elevens of that year. Among the smaller college teams East and South there appears to have been about a maintenance of the level of play of two years ago. In the Middle West, generally speaking, there has been a perceptible advance, although two of the larger universities, Chicago and Wisconsin, show less evidence of it than the others. Meanwhile the standard of general play of the larger university teams, East and West, is slowly and surely approaching a basis from which comparison is not only possible, but highly creditable to the West. There is not yet equality—it would be unreasonable to expect it—but the West is no longer the unthinking pupil of the East.

NEW AND DISTINCT PLAYS are developed, and defensive as well as offensive work laid out on original lines. Michigan's line-up on the defensive this year, though somewhat approaching Univ. of Penn.'s skilful arrangement of her back field, was an illustration in this respect. In the first class, the Eastern standard is yet quite a bit higher than the Western; how much higher it is impossible to judge accurately, and time wasted to speculate. Perhaps three touch-downs higher would be a conservative guess. It should be borne in mind by our Western reader that while Chicago was at her best against Univ. of Penn., the latter looked forward to the meeting with Harvard as her crucial test and culminating effort of the year. At the same time it must be acknowledged that Univ. of Penn.'s play against Harvard was but very little, if any, stronger than against Chicago. But carrying out the comparison is checked again by the fact that Harvard's final display of the year

REED, Left Guard, Cornell Team. CAPTAIN WHITING, Left Half-back, Cornell Team.

FOOTBALL ELEVEN, UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY, WEST POINT, NEW YORK.

—her top form, in other words—at New Haven, was, on the offensive, a good twenty-five per cent. stronger than it had been at Cambridge against Univ. of Penn.

IF I WERE PINNED DOWN to an expression of opinion on the comparative merits of Eastern and Western play, I should unhesitatingly declare Michigan, Chicago, Wisconsin, West Point, and Cornell in the same class, with very little indeed to choose between at least the leading two Westerners and the teams from Ithaca and the Military Academy. Those who like to pursue these sectional comparisons to the bitter end can, without much difficulty, discover the relative positions of West Point and Cornell in the Eastern ranking.

Between the smaller colleges of the East and of the West I am inclined to think—although figures to corroborate my belief are wanting—that if we leave out Wesleyan and Brown and Carlisle, which occupy a rank between West Point et al. and Dartmouth, which is the undisputed leader of the New England league, the advantage will be all with the West. The Western small college team, as a rule, when it plays football, plays with comparatively great offensive strength, and a defence only slightly inferior to that of the Eastern small college of corresponding size. Moreover, it looks as though the faculties of the smaller Middle-Western colleges showed more concern than do the faculties of some Eastern small colleges for the ethical side of their sport. I wish to be understood as not including western Pennsylvania and western Ohio and the Missouri Valley section in this reference to comparative ethics in the Eastern and Western small colleges.

THE LESSON OF THE SEASON was contained in the triumph of the evenly developed team. Never before has so striking an illustration been given of the fallacy, in present-day football, of relying upon unusual strength in one direction to make amends for real weakness in another. Not before has such incontrovertible evidence been furnished to prove that, in the modern game, a strong line is not all-sufficient to success. On the 5th of November Univ. of Penn. had a line about as strong, defensively, as Harvard's, and offensively a little stronger, yet Harvard scored and Univ. of Penn. did not; Yale's line, defensively and offensively, was stronger than Princeton's, yet Princeton scored and Yale did not. Univ. of Penn. ran the ball about eighty yards more than Harvard, and yet lost; Princeton gained during the game, including Poe's ninety-five-yard run on a fumble, one hundred yards less than Yale with the ball in hand, yet Princeton won.

It means, if it has any significance, that the team which is well rounded out has material advantages in match play over one unevenly developed, and yet more brilliant, perhaps, in one or even two directions. It means, furthermore, that after many tentative efforts the kicking game has come to be an actuality. Not as an occasional resort during a hotly contested match, but as a regularly organized part of a team's play. The season has shown, too—emphasized its lesson in this respect, indeed—that the kicking game does not begin and end with merely booting the ball when no gain can be made by the runners, does not, in fact, mean simply lifting the ball into your opponents' territory, or at least away from your goal-line, but it means that the kicking game implies punting, supporting the backs' work with the ends, and handling the kicks of opponents.

REALLY THIS READS LIKE THE A B C of football, and as a matter of actual fact, so it is; and that being so, did any one ever see elementary principles more ignored than they were this year by Univ. of Penn. and—Yale? Fancy Yale disregarding the rudiments! Truly a change has come to New Haven.

Yale's ends provided indifferent support to even the mediocre punting exhibited by the blue at Princeton and again at New Haven, but Univ. of Penn. revealed more startling evidence of ignorance by permitting opponents' kicks to bounce and roll along undisturbed towards her goal-line. Had one not seen it, one could hardly believe a 'varsity team capable of such incompetency in this particular. When Univ. of Penn. did not let the punted ball bounce and roll, she muffed it, and Yale muffed and fumbled more than her erring companion because she attempted to catch more frequently.

IN OTHER RESPECTS YALE'S WORK WAS STRONG; her running game and her determined defence alone saved her from demoralization under Princeton's continued punting, and spared her even a worse defeat, by a couple of touch-downs, at New Haven. But a great part of the time there was lacking that clean-cut, sharp teamwork that has been so prominent a feature of Yale's teams in recent years. Between Yale and Univ. of Penn., this year, it is difficult to choose. One had first-class and the other had indifferent initial material in the back field; Yale's poor work was due largely to men being laid up and unwise handling; Univ. of Penn.'s backs muffed and let the punted ball bounce and roll, probably because they did not have it in them to do better. The back fields of both, at all events, neutralized the first-class work of their respective lines. With Yale's back field in sound physical condition the team would be strong enough, I think, to defeat Univ. of Penn., but on the showing made

W. T. REID, JR., Full-back, Harvard.

WHEELER, Full-back, Princeton.

P. OVERFIELD, Centre, Pennsylvania.

W. F. BENNETT, Capt. and Left Guard, U. of Michigan.

CHARLES WIDMAN, Left Half-back, U. of Michigan.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE ❖ WORLD'S ❖ RENOWNED ❖ BREWERY

CROWNED WITH GOLD MEDALS WHEREVER EXHIBITED

THE CHRISTIAN MOERLEIN BREWING CO.

HIGHEST AWARDS AT CINCINNATI INDUSTRIAL EXPOSITIONS,
1880. 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, 1888.
AUGUSTA, Ga. EXPOSITION, 1888.
WORLD'S FAIR, CHICAGO, 1893.
COTTON STATES EXPOSITION, ATLANTA, 1895.
TENNESSEE CENTENNIAL, NASHVILLE, 1897.

For its

National Export & Barbarossa Bottled Beer

BECAUSE OF ITS PURITY, FLAVOR and HEALTH GIVING QUALITIES

CINCINNATI, OHIO. U.S.A.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

, the two are very evenly matched, with perds slightly in Yale's favor.

Penn. depended throughout the year almost the guards-back formation or system, but end of the season—notably in the Cornell reased the variety of plays. It is probable we next year, even a greater number started from tion, to the increased effective playing strength ren. Outland did his best work of the year in e late variations.
ore than any other of the large universities, ran rom their positions, and held to a more simple . Harvard and Univ. of Penn., and also Prince-more line men in interference than Yale, the more cleverly than Princeton. Harvard and Penn. more frequently dropped forwards behind advance the ball from the half-back's position, ne time the play of Harvard and Yale was much a than that of Univ. of Penn. Princeton used her nost entirely through the centre, or in end plays nd halves, or in mass-on-tackle plays. Univ. of nployed the quarter-back kick—which, on the work, probably lost more ground than it gained—delayed pass, which was executed very skilfully ions, and resulted in good gains.

Importance of the kicking game, by which I l that the game includes—punting, handling of its' kicks, and support by the ends—is markedly by the disposition of Princeton in the season's of teams. It was Princeton's very excellent
; in that respect which gave her victory over Yale, because of development in that department of the nd not on account of the Yale victory, that I rank on next to Harvard this year. If that showing e ignored, Princeton would be fourth instead of Both Univ. of Penn. and Yale exhibited much stronger offensive play than Princeton, and Univ. of Penn.
was as strong, and Yale stronger, also on the defensive.
As a matter of fact, Princeton's victory was quite a surprise, for no one had thought it possible for Yale to fumble so repeatedly, and Princeton's team had not shown a running game that warranted confidence in her ability to win.
Her interference was really not first class; it was not harmonious in itself, nor was it always timely. There was not the life or dash of the '96 eleven, and this year's team fumbled a great deal more than the one of two years ago.
Indeed, this has been a notable year in respect to fum-bling. I do not recollect another like it—when two of the leading four 'varsity teams threw away their chances by unexampled uneven development, and three of the four failed to equal their previous standard of play.

Only one team in the country played high-class football this year, and that team was Harvard. Not only played the best football of '98, but displayed a quality of consistent, accumulative team-work such as no eleven has ever excelled, and which only a couple of Yale's best teams have approached. It was unquestionably the most perfectly rounded-out team the game has produced. A team with no apparent weakness, with its work in all departments equally strong; relying on no one style of play or formation or system, but capable of adapting its game to changing conditions, and always discerning, tireless, and skilful. I have never seen another team of which so much could be said. The back field and the line worked together without a hitch, each supporting the other, to the making of a powerful whole.

And one of the good features of Harvard's season was the steady, continuous improvement throughout the practice, which seemed timed to bring the team to top form on the day of the Yale game. The eleven that played Yale could scarcely be recognized as the one which had experienced so much difficulty defeating the Indians.
The offence against Univ. of Penn. was a mere suggestion of the strength it developed two weeks later against Yale.

On the day Harvard played Yale she was much stronger than at Cambridge two weeks before, and outclassed every other one of the four 'varsity teams. It was a great victory for Harvard, and the least significant, though perhaps most satisfying, result to the average Harvard man was witnessed at New Haven.
The most important victory was in Boston, where prejudice in system and conflict in opinion had been conquered and unified. The influences that have been at work the past two years, looking to the subordination of individuals into one intelligent co-operating body working for the interest of the university, have brought about handsome results. There is a new spirit at Boston—and it breathes Harvard. The day of that bumptious creature who sees not and cares not to see beyond his own exploitation has passed from Cambridge—probably not to return. The lesson has been long in the learning.
Credit is due Mr. Forbes for harmonizing the various elements and organizing and directing the coaching, and clinging to it steadfastly, to Dr. Brooks, who supported Mr. Forbes, and to Lewis, Waters, and Dean, who, among others, aided in the coaching.

Based on this year's showing and on its consistent work of the last four years, I put West Point at the head of the second class, which includes also Cornell, Michigan,
Chicago, and Wisconsin. Perhaps Cornell might defeat
West Point, but I should wish to see it before believing.
On this year's work alone West Point deserves precedence, and her best game was against Princeton. There is so little to choose between any of them that an all-round contest in this class, which is of course not feasible, would produce exceptionally interesting games. Wisconsin's fate in such a contest would perhaps not be so uncertain, but as between Michigan and Chicago, or West

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WALTHAM WATCHES

Ask your jeweler for a WALTHAM watch and he will supply it, no matter if he happens to have personal prejudices in favor of some other. Insist upon having a WALTHAM and no other. There are other American watches and other American watch companies, but none of them can make a WALTHAM watch. The American Waltham Watch Company is the first American company; the first to be organized (nearly half a century ago), and the first at the present time in the quality and volume of its product. WALTHAM watches are all good time-keepers—some of them better suited for one class of service, some for another.

We particularly recommend the movement engraved with our trade-mark "Riverside," as combining high quality and medium price.

AMERICAN WALTHAM WATCH CO.,
Waltham, Mass.
For sale by all jewelers.

The Best is the Cheapest

Rae's Olive Oil is both the best and cheapest, quality considered.

The Chemical Analysis of S. Rae & Co.'s Finest Sublime Lucca Oil, made Sept. 15th, 1896, by the Ledoux Chemical Laboratory, declares it to be "unadulterated by admixture with any other oil or other substance. It is free from rancidity and all other undesirable qualities, and it is of Superior Quality and Flavor."

S. RAE & CO., Leghorn, Italy.
Established 1836.

Gold Seal
Champagne

is a natural sparkling wine produced in Am ica under the supervision of expert forei wine-makers.
It is equal in flavor to many brands of i ported wines with inflated reputations, and purity is unexcelled.
The difference is only in the price, the fore article costing two and one half times as m as Gold Seal.
Why pay the difference?
A trial case will convince you of the ex
lence of this genuine American product. sale by all wine-dealers and grocers. Send illustrated booklet on wine-making.
URBANA WINE CO., Urbana, N

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

B. Altman & Co.

NEW YORK

Have imported this season an unusually fine Collection of Art Porcelains and other objects of art from the leading workshops and studios of Europe, among which are many designs appropriate for engagement, wedding, holiday, and other gifts.

Carrara Marble Figures and Busts; Vienna and French Bronzes; French Clocks and Mantel Sets; Sevres and Vienna Porcelains; Hand-Painted Porcelains in Florentine Frames; Limoges and Vienna Enamel Plaques and Vases; Dutch Silver; Bronzes; Cut Glass and Lamps; Art Porcelains in Ginori, Cantagalli, Sevres, Vienna, Doulton, Dresden, Coalport, etc.

Harper's Catalogue

thoroughly revised and classified, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

COLONEL ROOSEVELT ON THE WAR

COL. THEODORE ROOSEVELT
From a copyrighted photograph by Rockwood

SCRIBNER'S WILL PUBLISH ALL OF THE GOVERNOR'S WRITINGS ON THE WAR WITH SPAIN.

(1.) THE ROUGH RIDERS begins in January and runs through six numbers—the picturesque narrative of a unique regiment by its famous leader. Illustrated by a remarkable series of photographs taken in the field.

(2.) HOW THE NAVY PREPARED, The Administrative Side of the Campaign, the Strategy, etc. (in all of which Col. Roosevelt took an active part), to follow "The Rough Riders."

RICHARD HARDING DAVIS will contribute a Spanish-War love story to the January Scribner, and will continue to be a frequent contributor throughout a notable year.

THE FULL ILLUSTRATED PROSPECTUS, TELLING OF STEVENSON'S LETTERS, CABLE'S AND "Q'S" SERIALS, SENATOR HOAR'S AND MRS. JOHN DREW'S REMINISCENCES, ETC., WILL BE SENT FREE TO ANY ADDRESS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS should begin with the January Scribner. Only $3.00 a year; 25 cents a number.
Charles Scribner's Sons, 153-157 Fifth Avenue, New York City, N. Y.

Don't Take It

If your dealer offers you another collar button and says "it's just as good" as the

KREMENTZ One-Piece Collar Button

There's no "just as good" kind made. You get a new one in case of accident of any kind. All jewelers sell them. Insist on getting the KREMENTZ. Postal us for booklet.

KREMENTZ & CO. 48 Chestnut Street, NEWARK, N. J.

No. 4711 ESSENCE OF Rhine Violets No. 4711

The highest degree of refinement.—Wonderfully delicate and lasting.—Absolutely true odor of the living flower.—Be sure to get the "No. 4711."

Sole U. S. Agents
MÜLHENS & KROPFF
NEW YORK

PIANOS

Recent improvement in the construction of our upright and grand pianos render them absolutely unequalled. Send for new descriptive catalogue with prices and terms.

ORGANS

For fifty years the Standard of the World. New styles of parlor and church organs just introduced. Also large assortment of slightly used pianos and organs.

SOLD ON INSTALMENTS, Rented and Exchanged.

Mason & Hamlin Co.

146 BOYLSTON ST., BOSTON.
8 AND 5 WEST 18th STREET, NEW YORK.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Point and Cornell, or either one of the Eastern teams and one or the other of the Westerners, the better team could only be decided by actual play. It is difficult to place Annapolis because she meets so few of the others, but I should say she belongs at the foot of this class. None of these teams, except Michigan, has made any notable advance in the quality of its play over last year. Cornell and West Point were particularly good in handling kicks. So far as ethics are concerned, Chicago retrograded; she played Herschberger and Cavanaugh, a flagrant breach of the spirit and text of the rules to which Chicago had subscribed. I shall take up this and associate matters more fully later. I can only say now that the confidence sportsmen reposed in the Chicago University faculty, and especially in Stagg, appears to have been misplaced.

CARLISLE, WESLEYAN, AND BROWN are three that should meet frequently on the football field, and yet that play one another but rarely; indeed, I do not recall if Carlisle and Wesleyan have ever met. Wesleyan has made an excellent record this year, as her scores show, and so have Carlisle and Brown, although the last, despite the showing against Harvard (with Daly and Haughton and Dibblee out), has probably not so strong an eleven this year as either of the others.

I should put Oberlin also in this class, and at the same time expect to hear a storm of criticism sweeping down upon me from Ohio. I have no doubt many enthusiastic friends of Oberlin have long since, on the strength of the showing against Cornell, figured that college to be of football equality with Michigan, Chicago, and Wisconsin. Cornell's games against Carlisle and against Oberlin were vastly different in force; against Carlisle she was fifty per cent. the stronger. The fact that Carlisle played a tie game with University of Cincinnati after Oberlin had beaten her 6-0 is no more convincing than the other game in the attempt to argue Oberlin, on comparative scores, into a place alongside of Michigan. Oberlin has played good football and made an excellent record, but she would find her skill put to utmost test in holding a place in the class I place her, without aspiring to greater difficulties in the class next above.

DARTMOUTH, ILLINOIS, UNIV. OF CINCINNATI, Minnesota, and Pennsylvania State appear to be pretty much of a class, notwithstanding some discrepancies in scores. Cincinnati beat Dartmouth 17-12, and Carlisle defeated Illinois 10-0. I should be inclined to place Illinois at the head of this group; her showing against the Indians was unexpectedly good. Pennsylvania State made an excellent record. Perhaps the surprise of the smaller college football season was the great falling off in Lafayette's play. But, after all, it was only getting back to the healthful normal state. During the athletic fever a few years back, Lafayette secured several men of exceptional ability who would be ineligible in these days. These stars, together with excellent coaching, put Lafayette, for one year and part of another, above her natural class and her rival Lehigh, and she has but returned to them this year.

Amherst, Williams, Trinity, displayed their usual level of football, which has shown no advance for several years.

There are many other small college teams that should be classified, but which cannot be discussed, because there is no way of getting a line on their play through their meeting teams whose standard of performance is established. The showing of a single game may or may not be significant; it depends so much on the circumstances.

This is especially true of the games in the practice season which the larger elevens play with the smaller, and that is why, too, so many go astray in figuring out a 'varsity team's strength by a score or series of scores it may have made in the early weeks of its practice season.

The larger elevens use these games simply as practice—in the testing of new men, new formations, new plays; it is a trying-out season, whose results give the desired finish for the important games, towards which all development, all training is tending. What happens in the mean time is by the way. No one, for example, imagines Harvard and Brown even as near an equality as the score of their game (17–5) suggests.

THE ONLY EMBARRASSMENT ENCOUNTERED in choosing an All-America eleven this year is in the superabundance of riches. There are not so many stars as some years have given us, but there is such a number of thoroughly first-class players that one wishes to use them all and cannot, even by increasing the substitutes to eleven. When it becomes necessary to put such a man as Haughton among the substitutes, the quantity of high-class material may be appreciated. There is really very little difference, in my judgment, in the strength of the All-America team and that of its substitutes—what a game the two would make! There has not been a year when as much could be said, or when the teams were so evenly balanced and generally well developed in all departments of the game.

I wish to add—I believe I do so every year—that, in filling positions, regular and substitute, on this All-America team, I consider the candidate's all-round skill and judgment, his ethics, and his antecedents. It is not my purpose to have any man on the national eleven whose appearance on a college team during the year has been in violation of the spirit of amateur sport, or one whose play has been unsportsmanly. Again—the retirement through injury of a player whose standard of performance has been established will not lessen his chances to make the All-America, provided, of course, his ability entitles him to consideration. This, it seems to me, is only fair.

THOROUGHLY GOOD MATERIAL back of the line was more abundant in '98 than in any previous year I remember. And in this direction the West has had a larger representation than during any year of its football history. O'Dea's (Wisconsin) drop-goal from his own fifty-yard line, Widman's (Michigan) brilliant sixty-five-yard run through half a dozen of the Chicago team for a touch-down, Slaker's (Chicago) line-bucking against Univ. of Penn. and again against Michigan, Caley's (Michigan) work in the Chicago game, were all performances to suggest the quality of the men the West is developing in the back field. And there were others, too—Johnston (Northwestern), McLean (Michigan), Kennedy (Chicago), and no doubt yet others of good quality of whom I have not kept track. In the East the general quality was high, but in so many individual cases marred by uneven development. Several backs of exceptional line-bucking ability

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ABOUT C. D. GIBSON IN LIFE

Is bicycling bad for the heart?

HANDSOMELY PRINTED CATALOGUE CONTAINING 120 EXAMPLES SENT ON RECEIPT OF TEN CENTS

Life publishes proofs of the best work of all its leading artists, including C. D. Gibson. These proofs are hand-printed, on Japan paper, mounted ready for framing. They are attractive and artistic decorations for any house and are as suitable presents —holiday, wedding, birthday, or for any occasion—as one can give. They cost $2.00 apiece, and can be had of all booksellers or of Life Publishing Company, 19 West 31st Street, New York. Any reader of HARPER'S WEEKLY who sends us five dollars will receive one of these proofs free (selection to be made from our catalogue), also back numbers of Life from September 8th to date (containing the Mr. Pipp Series, by Gibson), the extra Easter and Christmas numbers of Life (retailed at 25 cents each), and Life for one year, from January 1 to December 31, 1899 (52 numbers). This offer is net, and can only be made by Life Publishing Co., 19 West 31st St., New York City.

After January 1st Mr. Gibson will draw only for Life and his work can be seen in no other publication

THIS DRAWING IS ONE OF THE MR. PIPP SERIES, BY C. D. GIBSON, NOW APPEARING IN LIFE, INCLUDED IN THE ABOVE OFFER

THE EDUCATION OF MR. PIPP.
III.
He is much gratified at the attention shown him when in London

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak.

Holidays are Kodak Days.

Folding Pocket Kodak $10.

Folding Pocket Kodak $10.

Indoors and Out the holiday season is a delightful one for amateur photography, making the Kodak an especially welcome Christmas Gift.

The Christmas tree, groups of friends at the dinner table or at the card party are all fascinating subjects for the flash-light and the winter days give ample opportunity for indoor portraiture, while outside, the barren, wind swept fields, or the trees covered with their feathery mantles of white offer unlimited possibilities to the amateur artist.

Flash-light pictures and daylight pictures are easy with a Kodak.

KODAKS $5.00 to $35.00.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

Catalogues free at the dealers or by mail.

Your Salary depends on your value. Technical knowledge will greatly increase your value. Study at home. Success guaranteed. Best text books free.

STENOGRAPHY

Bridge Steam, Electrical or Civil Engineering; Mathematics; Chemistry; Mining; Architectural or Mechanical Drawing; Surveying; Plumbing; Architecture; Metal Pattern Drafting; Prospecting; Book-keeping; English Branches

TAUGHT BY MAIL $2.00 a Month

Circular free. State subject you wish to study. Estab. 1891. 45,000 students and graduates. The International Correspondence Schools, Box 1159 Scranton, Pa.

For a CHRISTMAS PRESENT what would be more acceptable than a

Poco Camera

Picture-taking is a most delightful pastime, Winter or summer. Made doubly so by using a perfect camera. POCOS ARE PERFECT. Ask your dealer to show you the POCO, or write for descriptive catalogue. ROCHESTER CAMERA & SUPPLY CO., Rochester, N. Y. 43 Elizabeth St.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THERE IS ONLY ONE POND'S EXTRACT.

Cheapest, because Best.
Always Pure and Safe.
Can be used, with equal safety, both Internally and Externally.

POND'S EXTRACT is manufactured by us, at our own factory, with the most improved machinery, under our own supervision, and every bottle is guaranteed to be pure, uniform and unequalled in quality.

A RELIEF FOR EVERY PAIN.

Cures Inflammations, Hemorrhages, Catarrh, Piles, &c.

USED BY PHYSICIANS, SURGEONS, DENTISTS AND HOSPITALS IN AMERICA AND EUROPE.

Indorsed by Presidents, Senators and Congressmen of the United States, by Governors and other Dignitaries; also by Royalty of Europe.

☞NOTE OUR NAME ON EVERY LABEL AND WRAPPER.

POND'S EXTRACT CO., - New York and London.

Pure Wool Soap

Trade Mark Registered 1896

Made for the skin of all people—for bath, for toilet—safe, clean, positively pure.

If your dealer doesn't sell Wool Soap, the purest toilet and bath soap on earth, send your name and address, and his, too, on a postal and we'll send you a sample cake free.

Swift and Company, Chicago

The only soap that won't shrink woolens

A TRIP TO JAMAICA

The Queen of the West India Islands.

Avoid the severity of our American Winters and take your vacation at this garden spot of the earth. About $5 00 a day pays all expenses.

Send for our beautifully illustrated pamphlet K for full particulars.

PIM, FORWOOD & KELLOCK,
STATE ST., NEW YORK CITY.

Well-informed travelers going to

CALIFORNIA

who appreciate the best of everything, always travel by

THE OVERLAND LIMITED

Because the equipment, consisting of modern double Drawing-Room Sleeping Cars, Buffet-Smoking and Library Cars with Barber, Dining Cars in which meals are served a la carte, and Tourist Sleeping Cars, provides every comfort for all classes of passengers. Train leaves Chicago at 6.30 p. m.

EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

ALL AGENTS SELL TICKETS VIA THE

Chicago & North-Western Ry.

PRINCIPAL AGENCIES:
461 BROADWAY.....NEW YORK.
368 WASHINGTON ST.....BOSTON.
212 CLARK ST.....CHICAGO.

The Improved
BOSTON GARTER

Is the recognized STANDARD for MEN'S WEAR.

Keeps the Stocking Free from Wrinkles

DOES NOT BIND

THE Velvet Grip CUSHION BUTTON CLASP

Lies flat to the leg. Does not tear the stocking, and will not unfasten accidentally.

SOLD EVERYWHERE

Sample Pair by Mail { Silk. 50c. / Cotton, 25c.

GEORGE FROST CO.
BOSTON, MASS.

Arnold Constable & Co.

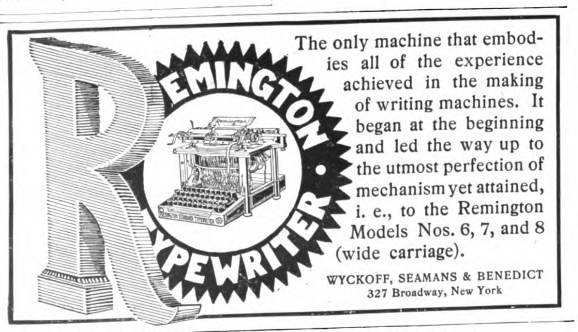
Men's Furnishings.

Men's Neckwear, Shirts, Pajamas, Dressing Gowns.

Gloves.

Men's Riding and Driving Gloves, Fur-lined Gloves, Gloves for Evening Wear.



Martin's Umbrellas.

Imported and City made Umbrellas.

Broadway & 19th st.

NEW YORK.

THE HAIR 27th Ed., 25c. (or stamps.) Why it Falls Off, Turns Grey, and the Remedy. By Prof. HARLEY PARKER. A. N. LONG & CO., 1013 Arch St., Phila., Pa.
"Every one should read this little book."—Athenæum.

The only machine that embodies all of the experience achieved in the making of writing machines. It began at the beginning and led the way up to the utmost perfection of mechanism yet attained, i. e., to the Remington Models Nos. 6, 7, and 8 (wide carriage).

WYCKOFF, SEAMANS & BENEDICT
327 Broadway, New York

HARPER'S CATALOGUE

Descriptive list of their publications, with portraits of authors, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

COMPARATIVE SCORES OF THE EASTERN FOOTI

| | Princeton. | Yale. | Harvard. | Univ. of Penn. | Cornell. | Brown. | Carlisle Indians. | West Point. | Annapolis. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Harvard | ..... | 17–0, Nov. 19. | ..... | 10–0, Nov. 5. | ..... | 17–5, Nov. 12. | 11–5, Oct. 29. | 28–0, Oct. 15. | ..... |
| Princeton | ..... | 6–0, Nov. 12. | ..... | ..... | 6–0, Oct. 22. | 23–0, Oct. 29. | ..... | 5–5, Nov. 5. | 30–0 |
| Yale | 0–6, Nov. 12. | ..... | 0–17, Nov. 19. | ..... | ..... | 22–6, Oct. 19. | 18–5, Oct. 22. | 10–0, Oct. 29. | ..... |
| Univ. of Penn. | ..... | ..... | 0–10, Nov. 5. | ..... | 12–6, Nov. 26. | 18–0, Oct. 8. | 35–5, Nov. 12. | ..... | ..... |
| West Point | 5–5, Nov. 5. | 0–10, Oct. 29. | 0–28, Oct. 15. | ... ..... | ..... | ..... | ..... | ..... | ..... |
| Cornell | 0–6, Oct. 22. | ..... | ..... | 6–12, Nov. 25. | ..... | ..... | 23–6, Oct. 8. | ..... | ..... |
| Wesleyan | .... ..... | 0–5, Oct. 1. | ..... | 0–17, Oct. 19. | ..... | ..... | ..... | 8–27, Oct. 8. | ..... |
| Carlisle Indians | ..... | 5–18, Oct. 22. | 5–11, Oct. 29. | 5–35, Nov. 12. | 6–23, Oct. 8. | ..... | ..... | ..... | ..... |
| Brown | 0–23, Oct. 29. | 6–22, Oct. 19. | 5–17, Nov. 12. | 0–18, Oct. 8. | ..... | ..... | ..... | ..... | ..... |
| Dartmouth | ..... ..... | ..... | 0–21, Oct. 8. | ..... | ..... | 0–12, Nov. 21. | ..... | ..... | ..... |
| Annapolis | 0–30. | ..... | ..... | ..... | ..... | ..... | ..... | ..... | ..... |
| Lafayette | 0–34, Oct. 12. | ..... ... | ..... | 0–32, Oct. 22 | 0–47, Nov. 12. | ..... | ..... | ..... | 0–18. |
| Williams | ..... | 0–23, Oct. 8. | 0–11, Oct. 1. | ..... | 0–12, Nov. 5. | ..... | 6–17, Oct. 15. | ..... | ..... |
| Lehigh | 0–21, Oct. 1. | ..... | ..... | 0–40, Oct. 15. | ..... ... | ..... | ..... | 0–18, Oct. 22. | ..... |
| Penn. State Col. | 0–5, Oct. 26. | ..... | ..... | 0–40, Oct. 1. | ..... | ..... | ..... | ..... | 11–16 |
| Amherst | .... ..... | 0–34, Oct. 5. | 2–53, Oct. 12. | ..... | ..... | ..... | ..... | ..... | ..... |

spoiled their work by wretched fumbling. Yale had in Dudley, Durston, Townsend, Benjamin, Corwin, great possibilities, and yet injuries and fumbling very materially lessen the impression they left on the year. At least three of these men should make names for themselves next year under better handling.

Princeton had a couple of serviceable though not brilliant backs in Beardsley and Black, and Kafer showed possibilities had he been given longer practice. Wheeler was Princeton's best full-back, though one half of only one game. Univ. of Pe able ground-gaining back was Outland, v game did some of the prettiest end runni Coombs was serviceable on occasion, but, Univ. of Penn.'s back field was mediocr

Harvard's back field was very strong collectively, Daly, Dibblee, Warren, and a unit; West Point's back field was pe

ADVERTISEMENT

What

Viola Allen

Says:

"I have found your

Johann Hoff's

Malt Extract

to be wonderfully strength-giving when fatigued from overwork, and gladly acknowledge its great value as a most efficient tonic."

Viola Allen

Johann Hoff's Malt Extract Gives Strength

HARPER'S CATALOGUE

Descriptive list of their publications, with portraits of authors, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Yale
MIXTURE FOR # Christmas

Ladies, this jar, containing a pound of Yale Mixture, will prove as acceptable a Christmas present as anything you can make or buy for a man who smokes. It is really a very attractive and permanently useful ornament—for the library—den—or student's room. The cover is made to hold sponge (or apple), to keep the tobacco always moist and in perfect smoking condition. Every one knows how good Yale Mixture is. There is nothing better—it smokes cool, sweet, does not bite the tongue, and is fragrant and pleasant in the house.

Ladies should encourage Pipe-smoking—as it is economical! You can buy this jar (400 pipefuls in it) at any first-class Tobacco store for $2.00. 400 cigars would cost $60.00. Pure, natural tobacco like "Yale," smoked in a pipe, is the best smoke of all, and never fails to satisfy!

Merry Christmas

to all and to all A Good Time

Something most acceptable
Something most gracious
as a
Christmas Gift

10 YEARS OLD

Hunter Baltimore Rye

The Favorite of all first-class Clubs, Cafés, Hotels

OLD by 10 years' standing
PURE by natural process
MELLOW by reason of age and proper storage

50 POUND MELONS AND 5 POUND BUNCHES OF GRAPES AT MAYWOOD.

An Opportunity

To Learn of the General Resources and Conditions of

California

A semi-monthly paper, in which is given current information concerning fruit land, its market price, adaptation, cost of orchard planting and cultivation, plans by which orchards are developed for non-resident owners, profits realized, methods of harvesting and selling fruit, poultry industry, cost of building material, tax rates, cost of general commodities, climate as it affects health and vegetation, rainfall and temperature, freight and passenger rates to and from California, together with much other news of interest to those looking to California for a home or an investment, will upon request go to you if you will pay the postage at the rate of one cent per issue. Not more than twenty-four cents, which pays for twenty-four numbers, will be accepted.

FOSTER & WOODSON,
1135 Broadway, New York City.

THE CLUB COCKTAILS

MANHATTAN, WHISKY,
TOM GIN,
MARTINI,
HOLLAND GIN,
VERMOUTH and YORK.

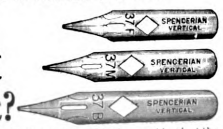
Years of experience have verified the theory that a Cocktail made of the best materials and aged is infinitely better than those prepared as wanted. As a Cocktail is substantially a blend of different liquors, and as the oldest distillers are a unit in admitting that all blends improve with age, it must be accepted as a fact, ratified by the general experience of the trade, that an aged mixed drink of any kind is superior to one made as wanted. Cocktails as served over bars are made entirely by guess, while the Club Cocktails are aged all ready for use, and require only to be poured over cracked ice and strained off to be in perfect condition. They are made entirely by actual weight and measurement, and admitting that the same quality of materials are used in both cases, the wholesale form of making must be the only way of getting Cocktails of uniform quality. Thousands have discarded the idea of trying to mix their own Cocktails; all will when they have given The Club Brand a fair trial.



Avoid imitations.

G. F. HEUBLEIN & BRO., Hartford, New York, London.

Spencerian Pens

New Series No. 37.

See That Hole?

That is for inserting a pointed instrument to eject the pen from the holder, and to prevent the ink from flowing back on the pen and soiling the fingers.
Samples on receipt of return postage. Ask for Vertical No. 37.

Spencerian Pen Company
450 Broome Street, New York.

Blakemore Whiskey 7 years Old.

NOTHING BETTER MADE OR SOLD.

Matured in wood and bottled in bond under Governmental Supervision.

If your dealer hasn't it, send us TWELVE DOLLARS, and we will have sent to your address by express prepaid a sample case containing TWELVE BOTTLES.

Freiberg & Workum,
Cincinnati, O.

CHICKEN

NOVEL MEXICAN DELICACY.

Minced chicken, highly seasoned with Mexican spices, and wrapped in corn husks. Unique, delightful.
At grocers, or ½ pound can mailed for 10 cts in stamps. Booklet sent on request.

TAMALE

ARMOUR PACKING CO.
DEPARTMENT H
KANSAS CITY MO. U.S.A.

OLD POINT COMFORT.

Six-Day Tour via Pennsylvania Railroad.

The first of the present series of personally conducted tours to Old Point Comfort via the Pennsylvania Railroad will leave New York and Philadelphia on Tuesday, December 27.

Tickets, including luncheon on going trip and one and three-fourths days' board at Old Point Comfort, and good to return direct by regular trains within six days, will be sold at rate of $15.00 from New York; $13.50 from Trenton; $12.50 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points.

For itineraries and full information apply to Ticket Agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

Stenographers

find pencil perfection in Dixon's Stenographer Pencils—made especially for shorthand writing. Just the size to prevent tiring the hand. Three degrees of hardness. Every desirable requisite in one and the same pencil strongly recommends

Dixon's AMERICAN GRAPHITE Pencils.

All grades—softest to hardest.
JOSEPH DIXON CRUCIBLE CO., Jersey City, N. J.

PURE WATER

is distilled water. Nothing but distillation will eliminate both organic and inorganic impurities. An ordinary cook-stove is all you need with

THE SANITARY STILL

to give you plenty of pure, sparkling water, aerated with sterilized air. Free Booklet. Our $10 STILL has twice the capacity of others. Write at once for particulars.

CUPRIGRAPH CO., 125 North Green St., CHICAGO

THE DECKER

Established 50 Years.
Decker's Lightning Cushion.
Billiard, Pool, Bagatelle Tables. All Supplies—Repairing.
Catalogue Free.
105 East 9th Street, New York City.

SO SIMPLE A CHILD CAN USE THEM.

The smallest practical folding camera,—takes pictures 4 x 5,—the Sunart New Cycle Vidi No. 2, $8.00.
Send 2c. stamp for catalogue illustrating 28 styles, $5 to $45.
SUNART PHOTO CO., 92 Aqueduct Street, Rochester, N. Y.

WASHINGTON.

Holiday Tour via Pennsylvania Railroad.

December 27 is the date selected for the Personally-Conducted Holiday Tour of the Pennsylvania Railroad to Washington. This tour will cover a period of three days, affording ample time to visit all the principal points of interest at the National Capital, including the Congressional Library and the new Corcoran Art Gallery. Round-trip rate, covering all necessary expenses for the entire time absent, transportation, hotel accommodations, guides, etc., $14.50 from New York, $13.50 from Trenton, and $11.50 from Philadelphia. Proportionate rates from other points.

SPECIAL TEACHERS' TOUR.

A special teachers' tour, identical with the above, will be run on the same date. Tickets for this tour, covering all necessary expenses, including accommodations at the National Hotel, Willards Hotel, or the Hotel Regent, $2.00 less than rates quoted above. Side trip to Mount Vernon and admission to the grounds, fifty cents additional. Side trip to Old Point Comfort, returning via the Cape Charles Route until January 1, $4.00 additional.

For itineraries and full information apply to Ticket Agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

MAGAZINE, $4 00 a year.
WEEKLY, $4 00 a year.
BAZAR, - - - $4 00 a year
LITERATURE, $4 00 a year
ROUND TABLE, $1 00 a year.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Lieut. J. E. Craven, U. S. N. Naval Constructor R. P. Hobson, U. S. N. Lieut. G. P. Blow, U. S. N.

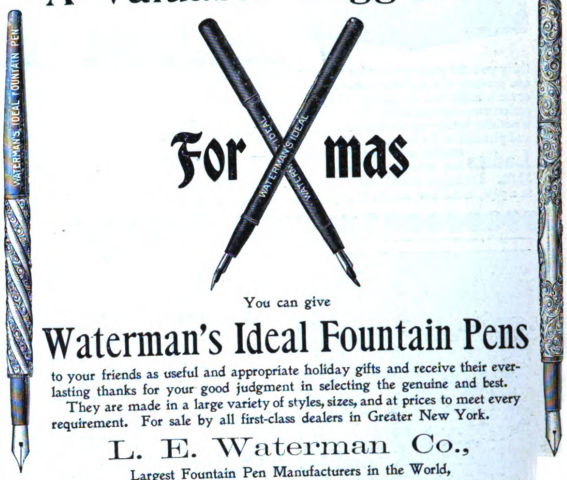
THE "MARIA TERESA" ASHORE OFF CAT ISLAND.
The Board of Survey appointed by Captain McCalla inspecting the Wreck, Nov. 14.

Ivory Soap, because of its purity, its quick profuse lather, its easy rinsing quality and the smooth pleasant sensation it leaves, is the favorite soap for the bath.

WARNING.—There are many white soaps, each represented to be "just as good as the 'Ivory';" they ARE NOT, but like all counterfeits, lack the peculiar and remarkable qualities of the genuine. Ask for "Ivory" Soap and insist upon getting it.

Copyright, 1896, by The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati.

Armour's Extract of Beef
"has that rich, beefy flavor."
For preparing soups, sauces, gravies, etc. "Culinary Wrinkles" gives many ways of using Extract. It's mailed free for the asking.



ARMOUR'S CONCENTRATED TABLETS of BEEF EXTRACT and VEGETABLES—condensed food—for home use or travelers—Sample Box containing sufficient for three meals, free, for a two cent stamp and your dealer's name.

Actual size of Tablet.

Address ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

A Valuable Suggestion

You can give Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pens to your friends as useful and appropriate holiday gifts and receive their everlasting thanks for your good judgment in selecting the genuine and best.
They are made in a large variety of styles, sizes, and at prices to meet every requirement. For sale by all first-class dealers in Greater New York.
L. E. Waterman Co.,
Largest Fountain Pen Manufacturers in the World,
155 & 157 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

WONDERFUL TRIËDER BINOCULARS
Have 8 to 10 times the power of the best of the old-style field and opera glasses.

½ Actual Size.

PRICES RANGE FROM
$44.50 to $72.50.

Pocket size—invaluable for Army and Navy, War Correspondents, Race Meets, Regattas, Travel, and the Theatre.

Sizes No. 20 and No. 30, with a magnifying power of six and nine diameters, respectively, are universally regarded as the best field-glasses to be had, and are specially recommended as Christmas presents.

Send for Descriptive Catalogue. For sale by leading jewelers and opticians throughout the United States. Among them:

NEW YORK—Theodore B. Starr, F. G. Schmidt, Gall & Lembke, GaNun & Parsons, Queen & Co., Ferd. Kreuter, W. C. Cullen.
CHICAGO—N. Wattry, C. D. Peacock, Spaulding & Co., Hyman, Berg & Co., A. Coe.
PHILADELPHIA—Queen & Co., Bonschur & Holmes, Williams, Brown & Earle.
BOSTON—Pinkham & Smith.
PITTSBURGH—Wm. E. Stieren.
WASHINGTON—Franklin & Co., D. M. Walford, Claflin Optical Co.
ST. LOUIS—A. S. Aloe Co., Erker Bros.
SAN FRANCISCO—Hirsch & Kayser, Henry Kahn & Co., Geo. H. Kahn.
BROOKLYN—J. B. Hoecker.
HAMILTON, ONT.—Thomas Lees.
TORONTO—Chas. Potter.

C. P. GOERZ,
52 Union Sq. (East), New York City.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,
BANKERS.
ESTABLISHED 1873.
2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.
Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.
Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.
Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.
A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.
Correspondence solicited.

BRASS BAND
Instruments, Drums, Uniforms, Equipments for Bands and Drum Corps. Lowest prices ever quoted. Fine Catalog, 400 Illustrations, mailed free; it gives Band Music & Instructions for Amateur Bands.
LYON & HEALY 17 Adams St., Chicago.

E&W MARK
EARL & WILSON'S
LINEN
COLLARS & CUFFS
BEST IN THE WORLD.

PATENT secured or money all returned. Search free. Collamer & Co., 1036 F St., Wash., D. C.

W. & J. Sloane
Are now showing a rare collection of Fur Rugs comprising skilfully mounted
Nubian Lions, Polar Bears,
Mongolian Tigers, Black Bears,
Leopards, Foxes,
Angoras.
Not only do these Fur Rugs make a handsome furnishing, but they add warmth and dignity wherever used.
Broadway & 19th St.
NEW YORK.

WATCHES, DIAMONDS
And Fine Jewelry.
BENEDICT BROTHERS, of Broadway and Cortlandt Street, have for the HOLIDAYS a fine and carefully selected stock of choice Diamonds and other Gems, Fine Gold Jewelry, Sterling Silver Goods, etc. Attention is called to our several grades of TIME-KEEPING WATCHES, all made especially for our house and bearing our name.
EVERY WATCH GUARANTEED!
"THE BENEDICT"
Perfect Collar and Cuff Button.
END VIEW SIDE VIEW
In Gold, extra heavy Rolled Gold, and Sterling Silver.
"Note": The GENUINE BENEDICT BUTTON has the name "BENEDICT" and date of patent stamped upon it.
A set of four makes an acceptable present!
Benedict Brothers
JEWELERS,
Broadway and Cortlandt Street, N. Y.

Theatre Train for Chicago—12.10 Midnight—via New York Central.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—No. 2192.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS.
All Rights Reserved.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1898.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

"CAST LOOSE AND PROVIDE."

ACTION EXERCISE ON BOARD U. S. S. "OREGON," ON THE VOYAGE TO MANILA.

DRAWN BY H. REUTERDAHL.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, DECEMBER 24, 1898

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy — $4 00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, and Mexico

Subscriptions may begin with any Number

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

London: 45 Albemarle Street, W.

Also for sale at Brentano's, 37 Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris

IN the issue of December 10, relying upon an interview published in a daily newspaper, the WEEKLY stated that Attorney-General GRIGGS had expressed the belief that in legislating for our new colonies Congress would not be bound by the constitutional limitations imposed upon it for the protection of the States and of the rights of individuals. The Attorney-General now writes us to say that he has not made any statement or given any opinion to justify our remarks. Most of these, however, were our own inferences from the premises which we have already stated, and which are, in fact, the opinions of many expansionists, if they are not those of the Attorney-General. We regret to have been led into error by trusting to a newspaper interview, and to have thus done Mr. GRIGGS a wrong.

THERE are a good many bad features in both the MILES and the HULL army bills, but we hope that there will be a reconciliation between the two, resulting in the elimination of the bad features of both, and especially of one gross injustice in the latter. Whether we keep the Philippines or not, or whether the treaty of peace signed at Paris is ratified or not, we need a much larger army, and still more we need an army much better organized than that which we had at the outbreak of the war. No one knows better than General MILES the weak points in his own and in Mr. HULL'S bill, but he was evidently under the necessity of preparing a measure that would not invite opposition from the army, and consequent confusion of mind among Congressmen. Whatever happens, we advise the army and all its branches to keep out of the struggle in Congress. If a bill is to be passed at the present session, it will be because Congressmen are left to work out their own conclusions without professional interference. The army or some of its branches can probably defeat any measure agreed upon by the two military committees.

THE PICQUART case has aroused a good deal of interest and is exciting a good deal of attention in Paris, and there are people who would spit upon PICQUART, as well as those who think him a hero. That he is a hero, however, seems to be the opinion of the most judicious and best informed, for he has voluntarily endangered his position, which was a brilliant one, because he believed that injustice had been done DREYFUS which seriously reflected upon the honor of the army, and upon the republic itself. These same enemies of PICQUART, some of whom, under the leadership of two Deputies, paraded the street in which the Cherche Midi prison is situated, for the simple purpose of insulting the man who was helpless behind bars, are also the enemies of the Cour de Cassation; and one of the Deputies, in his harangue before the Cherche Midi prison, called the justices of the court "infamous monsters," while another declared that they were "perverting justice." The Cour de Cassation, by-the-way, in preventing the trial of Colonel PICQUART, is itself deserving of great honor. At the same time it is moving France to its senses. It not only stood out against the storm of crazy public sentiment, but it has calmed the angry feelings of the populace, and has induced a good many people who were the enemies of DREYFUS on general principles to reflect. The result has been that a professor and revisionist, after making a speech in support of his contention, was cheered by his students when he appeared in the lecture-room at the Sorbonne. These same students would probably have stoned him a month ago, and before the Cour de Cassation had taken its position on the revision. It is evident that there is a good deal to hope for from France, and that there, as in other countries, calm discussion is likely to produce beneficent results.

INTEROCEANIC CANAL PROBLEMS.

THERE is no doubt that the time is nearly here for the construction of a canal uniting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, but the questions involved, so far as the government is concerned, are grave and difficult, and there are various forces at work which are hostile to one another, and necessarily make speedy action impossible. There are the antagonisms, in the first place, between government ownership of the canal, and government control, and mere government participation including endorsement of a private corporation. Then there are the international questions involved. There is nothing, however, of such serious import that it may not be settled, provided that nothing but the public welfare is considered. The country has made up its mind that a canal ought to be constructed, and, as matters now stand, the Nicaragua Canal is the only one in the public contemplation. Indeed, this route has been the only one in the thoughts of the people for many years, and also the only project which has been presented to Congress in such a manner as to excite an interest sufficient to be formulated and embodied in bills and reports, and in appropriations for commissions charged with the task of making investigations and surveys. The Panama route has been so long surrendered to French exploiters that the public seems to have forgotten that the United States government has rights there other than those represented in a physical way by the Panama Railroad.

The rights of this country in Panama are contained in a treaty which was negotiated with New Grenada in 1846, and which is still operative between this country and Colombia, the latter having succeeded to New Grenada in 1862. Under this treaty the United States have "the right of way or transit across the Isthmus of Panama upon any modes of communication that now exist or that may hereafter be constructed." This right is guaranteed both to the government and the citizens of this country, and there is a further guarantee as to tolls to be charged. In return for this, "the United States guarantee positively and efficaciously to New Grenada, by the present stipulation, the perfect neutrality of the before-mentioned isthmus . . . and, in consequence, the United States also guarantee, in the same manner, the rights of sovereignty and property which New Grenada has and possesses over the said territory." As we have already said, this treaty is still in force, and, so late as President CLEVELAND'S first administration, troops of the United States were landed on the isthmus, under its provisions, for the suppression of disorder and the protection of the property of the Panama Railroad Company. The advantage which the United States have under this treaty is the joint control of the canal with New Grenada for purposes of commerce, it being stipulated that the charges and tolls imposed upon the one shall be no greater than those imposed upon the other.

Thus much for the treaty status of the Panama Canal, and the rights which this country possesses in the work now in progress on the isthmus. Whether that work will result in the actual construction of a canal is a question which is now interesting engineers, the views of General ABBOTT having already been stated in the WEEKLY. All that we care to state in this article is that if a canal be built at Panama the rights of the United States, so far as the transit of persons and vessels engaged in commerce is concerned, will be the same as those of Colombia, and will, we think, be practically the same so far as the passage over the isthmus of troops and war-vessels is concerned.

The first arrangement for a canal was made by this government with the government of Nicaragua, and contemplated the construction of a ship waterway over the route from Greytown to the Pacific by way of Lake Nicarágua. This arrangement was entered into in 1849, and resulted from the acquisition of California in May, 1848. As soon as the concession was obtained, however, conflicting rights or claims on the part of Great Britain were encountered. That government exercised a protectorate over the Mosquito Indians, who occupied nearly the whole of the eastern coast of Nicaragua, over Belize, or British Honduras, and over the Bay Islands and other islands adjoining Honduras. It was therefore realized at Washington that if this country undertook to aid in the construction of a canal and to control it, especially if it was built through territory which might be claimed by the British government as the property of the Mosquito Indians, serious difficulty might result. Therefore Mr. CLAYTON, President TAYLOR'S Secretary of State, requested the British government, of which Lord JOHN RUSSELL was the head, to consent to the construction of the canal through Mosquito territory. The British government declined to do this, and the result was the negotiation of the CLAYTON-BULWER treaty of April, 1850. In this treaty the two governments agree that "neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship-canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same, or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have, to or with any state or people, for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America, or of owning or exercising any dominion over the same." We have quoted this at length from the first article of the treaty because it has nearly always been contended by the United States that in continuing to exercise a protectorate over the Mosquito Indians and over some of the islands Great Britain has violated the treaty from the beginning, and that therefore the convention is, and always has been, void. It has been also contended by various Secretaries of State that Great Britain has not only continued to exercise a jurisdiction which she was bound to surrender under the CLAYTON-BULWER treaty, but that she has enlarged her jurisdiction and violated her agreement not to colonize the Central American states, especially through a treaty made with Guatemala in 1859, in which her Honduras "settlements" were transformed into "possessions." This contention was made by Secretary FRELINGHUYSEN in his instructions to Mr. LOWELL in 1882, and in the same instructions he insisted that the intention of the CLAYTON-BULWER treaty was "to dispossess Great Britain" from the Mosquito territory. Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN also contended that the treaty failed for lack of consideration, its one object, the building of the canal by the concessionnaire of 1849, not having been accomplished. Nearly all American Secretaries of State have contended that the CLAYTON-BULWER treaty is void; but President BUCHANAN, in his fourth annual message, 1860, declared that, through treaties concluded by her with Honduras and Nicaragua, Great Britain had relinquished her protectorate over the Mosquitoes, and that therefore the dangerous question "arising from the CLAYTON and BULWER treaty.... had been amicably and honorably adjusted."

Subsequent Presidents and Secretaries, however, did not agree with BUCHANAN, although Mr. BLAINE seemed to assent to the theory of the treaty's survival by asking Lord GRANVILLE to consent to its abrogation, and President CLEVELAND recognized it. The difference of opinion on this subject between the two governments, however, continues, the British Foreign Office holding that the treaty is in force. However this may be, it is quite evident from the friendly sentiment prevailing between the two countries, and from more specific testimonies, that the difference can be arranged, and that Great Britain will agree to give to the United States all the ownership that Congress may desire the government to have, and full control of the canal besides. It is not likely, moreover, that any bill will be passed by both Houses of Congress unless it contains a request or an instruction to the President to agree with Great Britain in a renewal of the essential feature of the CLAYTON-BULWER treaty that the two powers shall guarantee the neutrality of the canal.

There are some difficulties too in the way of the pending MORGAN bill to be found in the Nicaragua concessions, especially one which seems to forbid control by the United States. Whether this can be so readily overcome is a serious question. The Nicaraguan government is not friendly to the Maritime Canal Company, but is evidently friendly to EYRE and CRAGIN, to whom it has granted a reversion of the Maritime Company's concession when it terminates, as is claimed, on the 9th of next October. Probably then the questions with Nicaragua will be much easier of settlement if they exist, but in the mean time vested interests of citizens of the United States may be imperilled or lost.

At any rate, so far as the government is concerned, it is clear that it is guaranteed all the rights it needs, less than actual ownership, in any canal that may be built at Panama, and that it may secure even greater rights, if it wishes them, at Nicaragua by diplomatic management. At all events, it seems as though the necessary preliminary work in canal-building, if the Nicaragua route is to be insisted on, is for the Executive.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ANGLOPHOBIA.

BY EDWARD ATKINSON.

IN seeking for the source of a prejudice against England which cannot be denied, we may find that slight causes of animosity may gradually affect popular thought, leading to dangerous conditions in the relations even of the States of the Union, yet more in the relation of our nation to others.

The inherited burden of slavery caused the perversion of thought which led men of otherwise incorruptible integrity to maintain negro servitude even to the arbitrament of war. This was due to the false conviction that the only possible relation of the white and black races was that of master and slave.

The disease which I have named anglophobia is of a somewhat similar nature. It will die without resort to violence, under the incentive which is now leading to a study of the relations of the English-speaking people to each other. Events wholly unforeseen a short time ago have stirred the hearts of multitudes, who are now trying to find a way to extend the aid and sympathy to each other which are the logical outcome of the mutual service developed by their commerce. Presently every one will wonder how very slight obstructions should so long have kept English-speaking people at variance, when their whole methods of thought, ends, aims, hopes, laws, and customs are nearly identical. This superficial animosity has been attributed to several causes.

First, to the school-books in which what has been called history is taught. In these books the battles of the Revolution and the isolated naval battles of the war of 1812 are brought into most conspicuous notice. But this is a slight and wholly insufficient cause of animosity.

Second, to the aid and sympathy which a small Tory faction gave to the support of slavery during the civil war. This has been a cause of rightful reprehension, but only toward this faction, which did not represent the people of England.

Among grown men these sources of animosity soon cease to be of any effect. They do not bear the test of time or intelligence. Yet an almost unacknowledged jealousy, suspicion, and distrust of British influence have remained, which might at any time in the last few years have become a grave danger. It therefore becomes not only expedient but necessary to search for the true cause of this animosity, in order that it may be removed.

It is due to a false conception of the nature of commerce. Is it not apparent that men who regard the effort of foreign manufacturers to sell their goods in this country, in exchange for our products which they need, as "a war upon domestic industry" (I quote from a speech of a Senator of the United States) must be led to a state of animosity against those who thus threaten us? Must they not impute false motives and unjustifiable methods to the leaders in such an attack? The mediæval theory that in the conduct of international trade what one nation gained another must lose, and that the possession of colonies justified their oppression in the effort to profit the nation which had conquered and occupied them, still has a strong hold on the minds of many men in the highest positions of influence and authority in this country. They are blind to the simple principle that commerce consists in an exchange of goods for goods, to the benefit of each country, only the balance of trade, so-called, being settled in specie. If there were no other monetary relation between countries except this exchange of goods, that country which exported more goods than it imported would lose by the traffic and the trade would stop. When mutual benefit and mutual profit end the commerce ends. No one has cleared away this rubbish about the balance of trade more effectively than Daniel Webster.

Now to the application of these ideas. The writer began a serious study of the principle of commerce during the first year of the civil war. He had been brought up in the belief that slave labor was necessary to the production of cheap cotton, and that impression prevailed among all his business associates in the cotton manufacture. He was surrounded by men who held the conviction that low rates of wages were necessary to the production of manufactured goods at low cost. He had been bred in the belief that the protection of domestic industry by the imposition of a high duty on foreign imports was the right of every true citizen. Beginning with the study of the cotton fibre, he found that De Bow, editor of De Bow's Review, and previously the superintendent of the latest census, was held of highest authority in statistical science and in Southern agriculture. The facts and figures which De Bow presented regarding the production of cotton, and the theory on which he defended slavery, were generally accepted throughout the North, and formed the basis of the political convictions in the South. He held that the crop of cotton would diminish the more active the demand and the higher the price. Admitting his premises, his conclusions were based on sound reasoning and were fully justified. He proved that for every cent added to the price of cotton a hundred dollars was added to the price of the human chattel then assumed to be necessary for its production. He then proved that the slave-breeding States north of the cotton-fields could not meet the demands of the slave-consuming States in which cotton was raised, and that in the process the human cattle were rapidly worked out. On this abhorrent logic the system of slave labor rested, and to it the so-called Cotton Whigs of the North lent their support.

It took very little research to expose the excessive cost of such a system of labor, and the fallacy of the assumed necessity even of black, much less of slave, labor in the production of cotton. These fallacies were exposed in the first pamphlet ever published by the writer, "Cheap Cotton by Free Labor," 1861.

The writer then took up the question of wages. He soon discovered the profound error in the idea that low rates of wages are necessary to the production of manufactured goods at low cost. This error lies at the bottom of the humiliating fear of foreign pauper labor which still pervades the minds even of persons of intelligence in this country who have not studied the question. The writer found, both in his own experience in the conduct of factories and in the observation of other employers of large numbers of working-people, that preference was always given to workmen of highest skill in order to convert crude materials into finished goods at the lowest cost by the unit of product. Conversely he observed that the workmen of highest skill and aptitude earned the highest rate of wages through the possession of this very power of reducing the cost of labor. High wages were found to correspond with low cost, low wages or cheap labor with high cost, except in branches of industry which are conducted mainly by manual labor, and in which time and physical strength or aptitude in the use of the fingers are the principal factors. Yet it is only after twenty years that this conception has now become a part of the common thought of almost every one.

It now needs only one single proposition to prove it for all time. We are now exporting one hundred million dollars' worth of goods per month, of nearly every kind produced in this country. One or more examples of almost every useful product is now being exported to every known port on the globe, at the rate of twelve hundred million dollars' worth per year. Ninety per cent. are sold to the manufacturing or machine-using states and nations, whose power of purchase has been increased by the application of science and invention to their own products. These goods are sold in competition with the products of the machine-using nations, and mainly to them, namely, Great Britain, France, Germany, the Netherlands, and Belgium, in which countries the rates of wages are, as a rule, from twenty-five to fifty per cent. less than they are on the fields, in the factories, and in the workshops in which export goods are made. Our products of all kinds are sent for sale not only to those manufacturing countries themselves, but, in competition with their products, to the non-machine-using nations of the world, in comparison with whose wages the earnings of the workmen of these countries are far higher; while in comparison with the workmen in this country our wages are five to ten fold greater.

If the rate of wages governed or controlled the cost of labor in these products, not one dollar's worth of any kind could be exported from this country to any part of the world, unless possibly to Australia and New Zealand, where the rates of wages are reputed to be higher than they are in the United States.

One could not deal with this problem of wages without being led directly to study the basis of the theory of what is called protection. The logic of the facts forced the writer, against his will, to give up all his previous ideas and to become the advocate of the sure and steady reform of our revenue system, until we should reach free trade. He has since advocated that policy for the purpose of protecting American labor and developing domestic industry to the utmost.

At a somewhat earlier date the writer had come into very intimate relations with the late David A. Wells, who was then a disciple of Henry C. Carey. Mr. Wells, having had his direction turned by myself to the logic of the facts, had himself begun to doubt his former convictions, when we both attended one of the afternoon sessions of what was called the Hock Club, at the house of Mr. Carey. In the course of that afternoon's discussion—if discussion it could be called—Mr. Carey said that in his judgment "the material progress of the United States would be more fully promoted by a ten years' war with Great Britain than by any other method." It then became evident to Mr. Wells that if what Mr. Henry C. Carey conceived to be the promotion of domestic industry and the protection of American labor rested upon such an abhorrent conception, the whole theory must be false, as that conception was immoral, and repugnant to every principle of science and of justice. His subsequent investigations finally brought him to the same conclusions which the writer had attained, his own survey giving him a much broader examination of the facts than had been possible to the writer.

Do we not find a cause of animosity against Great Britain in the prevalence of these ideas, to which Mr. Henry C. Carey did not hesitate to give expression? Yet this false conception of the relative loss and gain in commerce and of antagonism in international trade was derived by us from British precedents, and has only been surmounted by the English-speaking people themselves during the last fifty years. We are but repeating history, and we are being led by the logic of the facts to the same revolution of ideas which occurred in Great Britain a little over fifty years ago under the leadership of Sir Robert Peel. The effort of the mother-country, after the conquest of Canada down to the beginning of our Revolution, had been to prevent the establishment of manufactures in the colonies of America, which nevertheless were established, and, on the evidence of Alexander Hamilton, were thriving in every direction at the time when he made his notable report. The effort of the mother-country had been to forbid intercolonial trade. This effort was later coupled with one to enforce the navigation laws, which had fallen into disuse, against the colonies as if they were foreign countries. These were true causes of animosity, and they led to the independence of the United States.

It was not until 1842 that Sir Robert Peel, who had been elected with a large majority in Parliament to sustain the so-called principle of protection, became convinced that the system had ended in privation. He was convinced by the logic of the facts and by the figures of the national accounts compiled by Joseph Hume under an order of Parliament of 1840. Never before had the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland been in such extremity. He pictured these bad conditions in burning words, which I quote from memory:

"Ships rotting at the wharves, agricultural laborers starving in the fields, the manufacturing operatives rioting in the streets, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer seated on an empty chest over the pool of a bottomless deficiency fishing for a budget."

He condemned the existing conditions by saying that the policy which had been so long established "for the purpose of developing and keeping the home market had effectually destroyed that market by reducing the mass of the population to beggary, destitution, and want."

Such was the end of the effort to hold the sole control of the trade of the colonies, and of the effort to maintain restrictions on British manufactures and production under the name of protection.

In one of his subsequent speeches, covering the record of his reform, he used the following words, which would now be most fitly applied to the reform of the tariff of this country:

"I stated, and I am now ready to repeat the statement, that if we had to deal with a new society, in which those infinite and complicated interests which grow up under institutions like those in the midst of which we live had found no existence, the true abstract principle would be 'to buy in the cheapest market and to sell in the dearest.' And yet it is quite clear that it would be utterly impossible to apply that principle, in a state of society such as that in which we live, without a due consideration of the interests which have grown up under the protection of former laws. While contending for the justice of the abstract principle, we may at the same time admit the necessity of applying it partially; and I think the proper object is, first of all, to lay the foundation of good laws, to provide the way for gradual improvements, which may thus be introduced without giving a shock to existing interests. If you do give a shock to those interests, you create prejudices against the principles themselves, and only aggravate the distress."

We have outgrown the present system, and on every hand the representatives of nearly every branch of industry in the country are demanding the promotion of exports, and that must be the ruling motive in the reform of our present system of collecting the revenue. When that work is done, the prime cause of animosity against Great Britain will have been removed. We are seeking a market for the excess of the crude products of our farms, our mines, and our forests, and of late we have also been seeking a foreign market for the excess of the highest types of all our manufactures.

The largest market for these goods exists among the states of Europe, whose power of purchase has been increased by their application of science and invention to all the arts. The power of purchase must exist in order that there may be any power of sale, and that power is found chiefly in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and her colonies. For ten years prior to 1897 the English-speaking people of the world and their dependencies bought from us sixty per cent. of all that we had to sell. Next to them, our competitors in manufacturing—France, Germany, Belgium, and the Netherlands—bought of us twenty-three per cent. of all that we had to sell. The rest of the world, only seventeen per cent. It follows that if our own interest be regarded as the single motive, we should endeavor to increase the power of purchase of the machine-using nations, especially of Great Britain, by opening our ports, under purely revenue duties, to their goods and wares of every kind —a free buyer always tending to become more and more a free seller, and vice versa.

We are in danger at the present time of being misled by the lack of attention to the statistics of international commerce. We are being told to seek an extension of our markets in Asia, Africa, the Philippine Islands, and in the Spanish-American states of South and Central America and the West Indies, even to the danger of adopting the mediæval follies of establishing colonies for the purpose of maintaining the sole control of their trade. We are being urged to adopt the very policy which has ruined Spain, and which France and Germany are pursuing at an excessive cost without any profit in the trade of their colonies. In repeating history, let us not repeat the very policy which Great Britain gave up fifty years ago, to her own immense benefit, as well to that of every section of the world over which she has carried the rule of the common law, the justice of the English courts, and the security of the British administration.

In the year 1898 our exports were as follows:

EXPORTS OF THE UNITED STATES FOR TWELVE MONTHS ENDING JUNE 30, 1898.

| | | | Per cent. |
|---|---|---|---|
| United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland | | $540,860,152 | 43.92 |
| British colonies and dependencies: | | | |
| Gibraltar | $304,899 | | |
| Malta | 64,352 | | |
| Bermuda | 998,941 | | |
| British Honduras | 555,179 | | |
| British North America | 84,911,260 | | |
| British West Indies | 8,359,740 | | |
| British Guiana | 1,792,912 | | |
| Australia | 15,603,763 | | |
| British Africa | 12,027,142 | | |
| British Asia | 10,961,055 | | |
| | | 135,602,173 | 11.01 |
| | | $676,462,325 | 54.93 |
| Germany | $155,039,972 | | |
| France | 95,452,692 | | |
| Netherlands | 64,274,622 | | |
| Belgium | 47,606,311 | | |
| | | 362,373,597 | 29.43 |
| Austria-Hungary, Italy, Spain, and all other European States | | 69,718,419 | 5.66 |
| | | $1,108,554,341 | 90.02 |
| South and Central America, Mexico, and West Indies not British, including Cuba and Puerto Rico | | 77,194,168 | 6.27 |
| Asia not British | | 33,863,213 | 2.75 |
| Oceanica not British, including Philippine Islands | | 6,387,618 | .52 |
| Africa not British | | 5,330,610 | .44 |
| | | $1,231,329,950 | 100.00 |

It will be observed that the whole of the Spanish-American states, the whole of Asia not British, Oceanica, including the Philippine Islands not British, and Africa not British, possessed the power of purchasing from us a fraction under ten per cent. of our entire exports, while the British colonies and dependencies only bought from us a fraction over eleven per cent. It will be remarked that if even a tolerable treaty of reciprocity is now negotiated with British North America we may expect an increase in a single year in their purchase of our goods in a sum more than equal to the entire trade of Oceanica not under British rule, including the Philippine Islands. The purchasing power of the Philippine Islands is so small, and the exports are so insignificant, that to introduce them in

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google able would require a carrying of the decimal point he hundredths of one per cent.—they are not worth g separately.

are already the largest consumers of the crude ucts of Asia, Africa, Oceanica, and the Spanish rican states, but the wants of these hand-working le are very limited. The wants of the population of , Africa, and Oceanica are limited to a few yards each hat are called cotton goods, usually loaded to the ex-of twenty-five or thirty per cent. with clay and ch, or to the cheapest products formerly called Brum-em (Birmingham), but now commonly marked "Made ermany." We may increase our exports by making ds of these kinds; far better to increase our exports to European states, which demand good quality, and ere our fabrics are sold mainly on their superiority, wing bills of exchange as we do now in payment for crude products of Asia, Africa, and Oceanica. Wits the fact that our total exports to these barbarous ntries and to the semicivilized Latin American states, included, are less than our exports to the British col-ies only, and have been so year by year for twelve years.
t our wages are the highest in the world.

The reason is very plain. Wages are recovered from e sale of the product, in the manufacture of which cap-al has been advanced. The capital of this country, con sting of food, fuel, metal, timbers, and fibres, is in exess of that of any other manufacturing country. We roduce an excess of food, an excess of uel, an excess of metal, an excess of mber, and such an excess of cotton hat with the proceeds of a small part re can buy all the wool we need. When ommon-sense is applied to the producion of wool on the cotton-fields we shall ecome exporters of wool as well as of otton. All other manufacturing states with which we compete are deficient n one or more of these elements of production, and are mainly dependent upon us for their supply. Under these conditions our high wages are derived from products made at the lowest cost of production.

Our other advantage has consisted in national taxation at the rate of only $5 per head each year, $2 50 being applied to the normal cost of government—civil, military, and judicial under conditions of peace. This sum has been wholly derived from liquors and tobacco, domestic and foreign; while the other $2 50, derived mainly from sugar and miscellaneous duties, has covered pensions and interest.

At $5 per head our national taxation has been less than half in terms of money that of Great Britain and Germany, less than one-third that of France, less than one-fifth that of Austria and Italy.

If regard be given to the ratio of national or imperial taxation to the annual product of labor and capital from which it is derived, we have a considerable advantage even over Great Britain; but our greatest advantage is over Continental Europe, in which Great Britain shares in somewhat less measure. That advantage is from six to ten per cent. of our entire product. The burden of the rule of blood and iron in Germany, and the curse of militarism in France and Italy and Austria, take from their annual product from ten to twenty-five per cent., from a supply which if wholly devoted to subsistence would barely suffice, leaving but a small margin. Hence this so-called pauper labor is ineffectual, and in some parts of the Continent, notably in Italy, loathsome diseases generated by want of food are spreading through the country. Our national taxation has not exceeded two and one-half per cent. upon our entire product; that of Great Britain somewhat larger, but yet a burden easily borne. Other things being equal, on taxation at $5 per head we can make a profit of six to ten per cent. on products upon which France, Germany, and other Continental states can make nothing, and on which some would lose. Under these conditions the English-speaking peoples control the commerce of the world. Their profits would yield an ample return upon capital on the mere difference in the burden of national taxation.

When the obstructions to the mutual service of the English-speaking people are removed, the cause of animosity will go with them. No wonder that the dynastic rulers of Continental Europe fear the removal of the animosity which has existed in this country against Great Britain, and dread the commercial union of the English-speaking people, before which their power to sustain the military system would be destroyed.

The policy now named imperialism, and sometimes called expansion, advocated by those who desire to extend the sovereignty of the United States over Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippine Islands, is a long step toward militarism. The lowest charge in money which is anticipated for the next two years by the Secretary of the Treasury adds $3 per head to our peace expenditures of $5, making $8 per head, or over $225,000,000 a year, thus throwing away our main advantage in a futile attempt to gain a share in commerce which is not worth having at any such cost, while subjecting the armed forces which will be needed to maintain that dominion to corruption of the blood from nameless diseases, which will be the inevitable consequence of the adoption of this policy.

As President McKinley wisely said, and still appears to hold, the perversion of a war entered upon in the name of humanity to a war of conquest would be a national crime.
It is evident from his message that he will resist the commission of this crime, and in that resistance every true citizen of any repute may be relied upon to support him.

Boston, December 7, 1898.

WILLIAM BLACK.

The death of Mr. William Black, which occurred on Saturday, December 10, at his home in Brighton, England, ended a literary career which will no doubt always be regarded as one exceptionally easy of comprehension, exceptionally free from the difficult problems and contradictions which a student of literature expects to find in the life of an eminent writer. There was, to be sure, a little vacillation for a few years before the novelist recognized the field in which it was easy and natural for him to excel, but after the discovery had been made, a few simple principles were formulated which served him, and served him wonderfully well, through rather more than thirty years of activity. Everybody who has read even a few of his books knows the principles of his art, which were applied consistently in every piece of work to which he put his hand, and which we find more or less completely exemplified now in every one of his many volumes —almost twoscore of them. He believed that a story should be wholesome and easy to understand, and really a story rather than a problem, theory, or protest in disguise; he unfeignedly liked the world and found it beautiful; he saw clearly the attractive features of attractive people, and he was observant of quaint and amusing characteristics as well. What he saw he has described in his novels with simplicity, directness, and uncommon zest. The people and the scenes thus transferred from life to literature have delighted and will continue to delight a very large number of gentle readers, for the essential pleasures in life are not the exclusive property of a single generation. Those persons whose taste has been formed by constant attention to the later school in fiction, which is so much more complex, strenuous, and "expansive," may be expected to rebel against uniformity and consistency. It is in their prayers, and the prayers of all, that the new fiction may be wider and stronger, as well as freer, than that which preceded; but it will still be conceded, in justice to the older form, that "those things must beautiful be called which, often seen, please often."

William Black

Born, November 15, 1841. Died, December 10, 1898.

William Black was born in Glasgow, Scotland, on the 15th of November, 1841. In his native town he received a thorough elementary training, so far as the local schools could supply it, and, with the most sincere appreciation of natural scenery—of form, color, phases, and changes in the landscape—he studied at the government art schools. And he had the power to execute as well as to appreciate, but to execute with the pen rather than with the brush. Without the designing hand—without the "potter's thumb," so to speak—the artistic instinct will not produce works of art, though the impulse, baffled on that side, may find admirable expression in literature. Black became a journalist, at first in Glasgow, and subsequently in London, and, just before reaching the age of twenty-six, wrote his first novel, Love or Marriage, which was published in 1867, and afterwards withdrawn, at the author's request. The list of his works (novels and volumes of short stories) is as follows:

In Silk Attire; Kilmeny; A Daughter of Heth; The Strange Adventures of a Phaeton; A Princess of Thule; Three Feathers; Madcap Violet; Green Pastures and Piccadilly; Macleod of Dare; Nanciebel; Mr. Fisistratus Brown, M.P., in the Highlands; The Monarch of Mincing Lane; The Maid of Killeena, and the Marriage of Moira Fergus; Lady Silverdale's Sweetheart; Sunrise; White Wings; The Beautiful Wretch; The Four Macnicols; The Pupil of Aurelius; Adventures in Thule; Yolande; Shandon Bells; Judith Shakespeare; White Heather; The Wise Women of Inverness; Sabrina Zembra; The Strange Adventures of a House-Boat; In Far Lochaber; The New Prince Fortunatus; Donald Ross of Heimra; Stand Fast, Craig-Royston!; The Magic Ink; Wolfenberg; The Handsome Humes; Highland Cousins; The Penance of John Logan, and Two other Tales; Briseis; and Wild Eelin. His biography of Goldsmith is, so far as I know, the only work of considerable length that he undertook in the department of criticism.

Fortune, after coquetting with him for a while just at first, though never quite leaving his sight, came to walk at his side and sit at his hearth after A Daughter of Heth was published. Probably the story is so well known that a few words will bring it all back; and one can easily recall the typical characters: Mr. Gavin Cassilis, the parish minister of Airlie, and his son "the Whaup," and the very dangerous Lord Earlhope, and Catherine Cassilis, called "Coquette." And the Manse itself, and Loch Scavaig, and the places down the Clyde—how typical these scenes are! And this situation: Catherine Cassilis is the daughter of the minister's only brother, who had left Scotland in his teens, and never returned; and, to speak plainly, his family had been glad when he went abroad, for he was the prodigal son, whom no one was anxious to see again! He had married a foreign woman, too, which put a climax to his wickedness, as the Airlie people thought; but the reader is assured the French lady he married was of the most gracious temperament, and had the sweetest looks, and had brought her Scotch husband a fine estate on the Loire. Alas! the mother and father of a fascinating little heroine had died within a few hours of each other, cut off by a fever which raged over the south of France; and so now we see the girl of eighteen, just come from a French school, arriving at the house of her only living relative, the Airlie minister.... Are they not all remembered now—these scenes and people and situations? Across the thousands of miles that intervene many grateful readers on this side of the Atlantic will send their acknowledgments, or, if they only speak the words, will unconsciously turn towards the East, as though Black were still there.

In an English edition of The Strange Adventures of a Phaeton, I think (for unfortunately the volume is not at hand), the most attractive drawing contains a portrait of Black's real heroine—the her. Black, of Scotch descent, though born in Northumberland, has shared her husband's tastes and found her pleasure in his occupations, as one may judge from the saying, "The year is without salt when I do not go to Scotland." Their daughters are Mabel and Violet, and their son Norman—a young lawyer.

Marrion Wilcox.

ART.

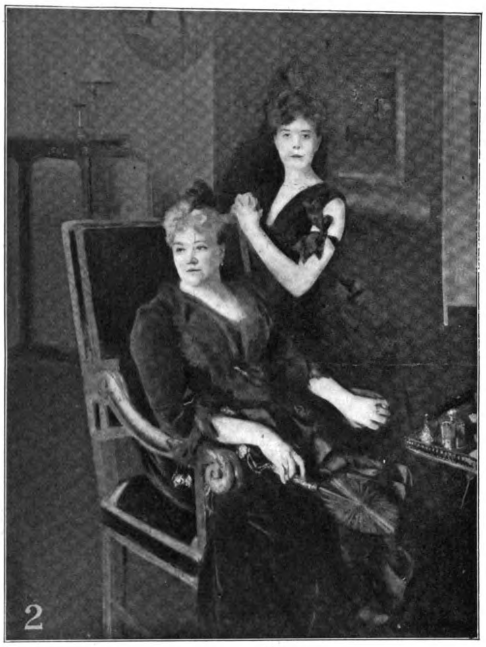
THE LOAN EXHIBITION OF PORTRAITS AT THE NATIONAL ACADEMY.



How differently different painters attack the problem of a portrait! Such an exhibition as the present one at the National Academy impresses this on one's attention. There is the simply objective method, the plain statement of fact; the same with an addition of pictorial or decorative treatment; then the admixture of the subjective through a varying scale of schemes of light and color, and manifestations of the personal sentiment of the painter, until we reach a point where the subjective excludes the objective, and the portrait is lost in the picture. And in all one can trace the relation which for the time being existed between the painter and the sitter, varying from the merely business one, through all sorts of shades of sympathy, up to actual antipathy.

Of the last an illustration has been seen by some in John S. Sargent's wonderful portrait of "Mr. Wertheimer," the London picture-dealer. Philistinism, they think, has here been pilloried—the trading in art for money alone. The gentleman is a Jew, with racial peculiarity of features very pronounced. His gaze is keen and concentrated, commercial, if you will, but quite possibly more—subtle, deep, and discriminating. The droop of the shoulders and the extreme sensitiveness felt all through the figure may reveal the habitual pliability of the trader, or, not unreasonably, the receptivity and impressionableness of an artistic temperament—possibly both. Opinions will be divided. Sargent's other examples in this exhibition are less fortunate. The "Portrait of Two Ladies" was painted as long ago as 1885, before the painter had matured his strength in the direction of leaving out as well as of putting in, and though splendid in parts, is as a whole crowded and incoherent. In the "Calvin S. Brice," by the curious introduction of a screen that cuts the background in half, a shrinkage is given to the shoulders which unpleasantly emphasizes the largeness of the head.

As examples of the simply objective method, Carolus Duran's portraits may be cited. They are boldly direct, hard and assertive, and ungracious in color. His pupil Carroll Beckwith shows the influence, but has added a certain exuberance both of drawing and color which

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

FROM THE LOAN EXHIBITION OF PORTRAITS AT THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

Portrait.—A. L. Zorn. 2. Portrait.—John S. Sargent. 3. "Mrs. Henry W. Poor."—G. Boldini. 4. "Dr. Polk."—R. de Madrazo. 5. "Miss Florence Robinson."—J. Carroll Beckwith. 6. "Mona."—William M. Chase. 7. "Mrs. Mowbray."—H. Siddons Mowbray.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google makes his portraits in a measure handsomer, though still prosaic. The specimens of Bonnat's work are equally direct, but reveal character both on the part of the painter and of the sitter. His influence also may be traced in a pupil, Alfred Collins. Witness his portraits of Dr. Rainsford and Dr. Draper.

Chartran's "Mrs. Clarence H. Mackay" is an example of the decorative kind. The lady, adorned and surrounded with flowers, is seated on a bench with a classical garden at her back. The whole thing is pretty—fatally so, for the painter has been "intoxicated with his own exuberance," and crowded his canvas as if he had been decorating an arbor. In the direction of mere prettiness, however, Madrazo, as represented here, is the most flagrant offender. These faces of shell-like pink and whiteness, and the glittering toilettes, suggest the decoration of a bonbon-box. Boldini's brilliance is of a less innocuous sort.

It is a relief to turn aside to the honest, deep-intentioned efforts of some of our own painters. There is often more of painterlike quality than human interest about the work of William M. Chase, but this cannot be said of his beautiful portrait of Mrs. George B. Ely, so strong and earnest and dignified; or his tenderly impressive "Mona," or of the splendid burst of color in the picture of "Miss C." Miss Cecilia Beaux's new picture, "Dorothea and Francesca," is scarcely a portrait, but its sober force, and the delicious movement running through the two figures, which, hand in hand, are executing the step of a dance, lift this gifted lady one rung higher. Her "Mother and Son," on the other hand, does not improve upon acquaintance. The perspective of the picture is up hill, and the figures are stiff and isolated. The "Portrait of Cynthia," however, is a lovely bit of childhood. The strength, directness, and withal searching tenderness of Frank W. Benson's method are fairly well represented in his "Portrait of Mrs. P. K." H. Siddons Mowbray's three little portraits —two in a scheme of black and gray, and one in gray and greenish-blue—have the preciousness of gems of an exquisite setting. Gracious and tender, they are dignified notwithstanding their minuteness. It is interesting to compare with these the severer refinement of Kenyon Cox's "Mrs. O.," and T. W. Dewing's "Portrait of a Lady." The latter, with its green-gold background, yellow-upholstered chair, and the dark hair and gray-white dress of the lady, reaches an indescribable perfection of refinement. But the face is in shadow; as a portrait it is only dimly discernible. The feeling is almost entirely spiritual, instead of mingling spirit and flesh, as in Mr. Mowbray's. It is a beautiful expression of its author's sentiment rather than a portrait. In this exhibition, therefore, it is less in place than, for example, J. Alden Weir's "Miss Pierson." Here there is spirituality as well as physical charm, a fair, pure young face, not without sprightliness, painted with a clean and tender brush that reveals the sensitive artist in every stroke.

That prince of impressionists, though he is not numbered with the band, J. McNeill Whistler, is well represented by "The Girl in White"—a face and figure that haunt you, because nothing is intended except the one impression that the painter wished to convey, and that is conveyed with an apparent simplicity that enables you to penetrate to the heart of the thought. Close by are several examples of John W. Alexander. He too is continually experimenting with problems of color and sentiment, the two closely interwoven and always executed with an economy of method. The "Miss V." is beautiful in both respects; the "Mrs. B." more conscious and manneristic; the "James W. Alexander" at once alert, harmonious, and straightforwardly a portrait. Albert Herter is another painter who usually stimulates both the mind and the emotions. His "Mathilde—Baroness de R.," however, who stands sweetly pensive, with a glow from behind of soft golden light creeping round her form, comes near the danger-line of being a beautiful picture rather than a portrait. This is carried to the farthest extent in A. L. Zorn's "Mrs. Potter Palmer," a brilliant canvas, but lacking in repose, and relegating the lady to a subordinate part in a pageant of color.

It can be said with all deliberation that in respect of individuality, execution, and earnestness the best of our American portrait-painters to-day have few rivals and no superiors. CHARLES H. CAFFIN.

WASHINGTON.

NOTES ON OPENING OF THE THIRD SESSION OF THE FIFTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

WALKING east on Pennsylvania Avenue on the evening of the opening day of the present session of Congress, I saw an express wagon drawn by two horses coming west. It was loaded down with big set pieces. They had formed that day a part of the annual flower show of the Senate. A number of solemn Senators had sat at their desks in the Chamber that day half obscured by baskets of flowers, floral flags and ships, and other devices. They are a standing joke at both ends of the Capitol, these floral contributions, but few of the members of either House have the courage to order them sent to the cloak-room. So they decorate the desks on the first day of the session, until the Senate adjourns, and then the Sergeant-at-Arms carts them away.

Interest in Washington these days is divided among the Senate, the White House, and the State Department. The peace treaty is the most important matter to come before Congress, and when its 600 type-written pages reach Washington they will pass from the hands of Secretary Hay to the White House, and thence by the President's executive clerk with a message to the Senate. There the debate on the treaty will be held in secret session. But most of it will be threshed over in the open Senate. In fact, there has already been debate on the question of our constitutional right to "buy sovereignty," and Senator Vest has made a speech in opposition to the colonial policy to which the administration stands committed. It has not been possible yet to make a party division on the question, but the natural tendency of the Democrats is toward the anti-administration policy, and the Republicans, with a few exceptions, stand by the President, so when the vote is taken the division will follow party lines pretty closely.

The secret session of the Senate serves two purposes: it gives the Senators a chance to relax from the stiffness of the open session, and it protects them in the expression of opinions which they would rather did not go beyond their fellow-members. In the matter of expansion there is no desire for concealment. Every member of the Senate who has positive convictions wants to express them; so, while the treaty will undoubtedly be considered in executive session as a matter of decorum, all the important speeches about it will be made in open Senate. Among the interested listeners to these speeches will be the members of the Corps Diplomatique. They have even now begun to frequent the gallery.

The most interested spectators on the floor of the Senate at this session are the Canadian members of the Joint High Commission. Already they have lain down with the lion from New Hampshire, Senator Chandler, and studied at close range the eccentricities of South Carolina's pitchfork Senator. No doubt they find the proceedings lively compared with the solemn sessions of the Upper House at Ottawa.

At the other end of the Capitol Speaker Reed accepts the inevitable as gracefully as he can. He has had to go through the biennial grind of congratulations on his re-election. He is twice a subject for congratulation in that the election of a Republican House for the Fifty-sixth Congress insures him another term as Speaker. The House will have something to say about the treaty of peace when that $20,000,000 is appropriated for the purchase of the Philippine islands. No one expects the Speaker to get on the administration band-wagon as it goes by; nor is he likely to lie down and let it roll over him. He is more likely to keep a discreet silence on questions affecting the national policy, for there are times when the only language adequate to Mr. Reed's emotions would be impolitic.

GEORGE GRANTHAM BAIN.

"IN THE FORBIDDEN LAND."*

MR. LANDOR, "by caste, European; British subject; by occupation, artist and traveller"; his home at Empoli, near Florence, Italy, and his residence, London, was satiated with civilization. He desired, without drugs or other portable medical aid, to try the rarefied air of Tibet and the ozone of barbarism. This is not his first trial, either of huts and hovels or of the appalling simplicity of savage life. He has been in that country long called "a forbidden land"—Korea; which now, however, is suffering the pangs of transformation. Even before that, Mr. Landor had travelled and lived among the Ainos of Yezo, in northern Japan, the most primitive of gentle savages, where much patience and insect-powder are indispensable.

Look at this traveller and you will see a slender youth with no bulging brawn or corrugated muscles. Upon his spidery legs and arms and his almost effeminate face, every line of which bespeaks the artist and the man of keen susceptibilities, a heavy-weight pugilist or Japanese wrestler would look with contempt. Yet, as in the case of so many of those British heroes, we note on his face the lines of stern determination, a conquering nose, a resistless chin, and soft liquid eyes, piercing and determined. We have seen many such, wondering how such "baby faces," with rosy cheeks and mild visage, could in any way forecast the heroism which makes history.

Yet from February, 1897, there came a change, as we see in four front and side views of the same face, in four aspects. This apparently pampered son of a luxurious civilization becomes, in October, 1897, a prematurely aged man, with a sad and wrinkled face, bearing the stamp of pain. The features refuse to conceal some awful horror of experiences, that plunged the man from youth to middle life. How the aging and marring came is told in the books before us.

The appearance of this brace of volumes, whether we consider their superb mechanical outfit of paper, print, binding, maps, and illustrations in ink and color, taken by an artist on the spot, or reproduced from photographs, or the triumphs of German color-reproduction, or whether we revel in the delights of a fascinating literary style and rich vocabulary, or whether in the story itself, charming, thrilling, horrifying by turns, must be welcomed as a literary event of great significance.

We confess to an honest prejudice against Mr. Landor, for in his previous books on Korea and the Ainos he seemed to be careless in some of his statements. Indeed, to Englishmen in India, so daring seemed to be his route, and so horrifying his story, that it appeared impossible that he could have survived both fatigue and tortures. When the reports of his adventures reached London, some healthy gales of criticism began to blow in England. Hence Mr. Landor has taken the wise precaution of substantiating his main narrative by gathering into an appendix a sheaf of reports from government officers in India, who were sent to investigate the simple facts, and from the magistrate of the court of Almora District, with the oaths and depositions of his servants, and of the American missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Rev. Harkua Wilson, who dressed his wounds and tended him during his sickness, as well as of the nurse who took care of him, and of various other persons who saw him in his awful plight and during convalescence.

Early in 1897 having arranged with the Russian and Turkish legations in London, and sent on his cartridges and ammunition by water, expecting to reach Tibet by way of Russia, he learned that the steamer had stranded just before reaching her port of destination. Furthermore, the Turko-Greek war broke out. So determining to take no more preliminary risks, he abandoned the Russian route, and resolved to go by way of India. He reached Bombay in the midst of intense heat, when the city was devastated by the bubonic plague. From Bombay, by rail, wagon, and on horseback, he arrived at Naini Tal, where he announced to the British officers his purpose to journey into the sacred land of the Lamas. He was fortunate in finding two unconventional persons who proved endlessly faithful. Their names deserve to be known. One was Chanden Sing, and the other was Mansing. It seemed to promise a waste of months in negotiation before he could obtain a military escort of Gurkhas—the little fighting men of the Indian army. Realizing that the passes would then be closed and his enterprise be foredoomed, he "snapped his fingers at all the red tape the job required," and set forward. With condensed provisions prepared by the Bovril Company, and with all proper equipments for a scientific observer of things visible and invisible of earth, heaven, and air, this scientific man and artist, relying more on fresh air and exercise to keep him well than on a medicine-chest and its contents, started upward on his great climb with thirty bearers.

Landor is a keen student of man and nature. Glorious was the view of the Hamahlyas (as he spells the name), with their oceanic depths of color and shadow, and with pinnacles of ice and snow that seemed fitly to adorn this "Roof of the World." This inter-Alpine region of Asia is called Tibet, which is but a corruption, probably, of the local name Bhot, variably spelled Bod, Pote, and Tupot. One is mightily impressed with his descriptions of these high places of the earth with their dazzling altitudes, whose glaciers feed rivers and nourish the civilization below. In these regions prayer is done by wind and water power. The noble missionaries of the American Methodist Episcopal Church are working here to rout superstition and lift up the people. Our traveller found pleasant society, helpful suggestions, and, for some of his journeys in southwestern Tibet, a delightful companion in Dr. Wilson.

The picture of the Nerpani road gives one a vivid impression of the awful desolation of rock and sand, the terrors of gorges and steep paths over mighty altitudes, but they also reveal the splendors of color in which an artist revels. It was in the inhabited part of Tibet, but away from the beaten roads, that Mr. Landor travelled. Probably ten million people lived on this plateau. As one reads through the book he finds a vast variety of bases for human habitations—on the rock, on the drift, in colossal valleys, where a village seems but a dot, and on the sheer face of precipices that remind us of our Arizona cliff valleys. Yet only occasionally did one find a house which might suggest wealth or power. Very properly, a good space is devoted to the people called Shokas, with their curious customs, such as the dances in front of the house and around the lay figure of a deceased man, whose clothes are bound on a goat, which is driven out of the village or over a precipice, other tribes profiting by the simplicity and superstition of the Shokas.

Mr. Landor, with his passion for unbeaten tracks, pictures some perilous passageways. In one case, on the perpendicular face of a sheer rock, had been cut holes for hands and feet. With his face to the wall and his back to space, over a gap of forty or fifty feet, he made his way, though it suggests dizziness even to look at the feat. Moving on these elevations, of from thirteen to twenty-two thousand feet above sea-level, he once, from a comparatively low elevation, while standing on the point of the rock, saw a circular rainbow. He beheld himself reflected as a Brocken spectre. On some of the mountain passes were yards or areas of stone pillars, erected by devotees who each put a pebble on the structure. He passed forts on conical hills. He encountered fierce snowstorms, and fiercer men armed with matchlocks resting on long bifurcated frames. While sleeping at night he was sometimes nearly buried in snow. Besides adventures both amusing and dangerous, passing Tibetan guardsmen and thieving Dacoits, he visited the two great lakes of Rakastal and Mansarowar, and proved them to be separate and not united. In this land of Lamasaries and Lamas, "brick tea," broken up, is served as food, after being churned with butter and salt.

Tibetan Buddhism, though of an antique type, is a caricature of the original doctrines, ritual, and order. An amazing number of stones is to be seen in walls, foundations, the ruins of deserted cities, inscribed with Sanskrit writing, especially with the mystic words "Omne manu padme hun." Indeed, one is not long in noticing that here is the home-land of that "Northern Buddhism" which, from India, early took on its peculiar form in Tibet, and thence travelled to China, Korea, and Japan. Many of the popular superstitions farther East—for example, the explanation of earthquakes by a subterranean monster who is disquieted and flopping about—are also the same.

Mr. Landor's purpose had been to reach the inaccessible city of Lassa, the headquarters of his Mysteriousness the Dai Lama, who is about the last survivor of a once lively mob of divinity-hedged mortals who posed as incarnations of Deity, Sons of Heaven, etc., to whom the Chinese Emperor and the Japanese Mikado and Great Mogul were brothers, and the Czar and German Emperor are distant relations. He did not reach Lassa, but he did achieve notable geographical results, and his lively book will be valued both by general readers and special students. The treachery and cruelty of the Tibetans defeated our author's purpose. His Shoka bearers, having left him, informed the Lamas of his purpose (so sacrilegious in their eyes), and, being prepared, laid an ambuscade for him. In crossing the river Neo Tsambo, one of his yaks sunk with all its load of provisions, clothes, shoes, money, etc., so Mr. Landor reached Tuxem in a state of raggedness and starvation. Having little money left, he went out to buy provision and ponies. Walking among the villagers unarmed, supposing them to be friendly, he was suddenly seized, knocked down, and overcome, bound hand and foot. At the signal of a shrill whistle, four hundred armed soldiers appeared and hustled him before the Lamas. After brutal treatment he was handcuffed and made to ride on a saddle on the back of which four or five sharp iron spikes projected which pierced and lacerated his back. He was fired at, but the murderer missed his aim. In the torture-room his feet were stretched apart on a sharp-edged mass of wood, to which he was tied, his weight resting thus painfully upon it. A bar of red-hot iron was held close to his eyes until his nose was scorched and his eyeballs almost burst. Another twenty-four hours of horrible pain, in a cramped and suspended position, formed but the prelude to further intended torture.

How he escaped, and how, through the good offices of the missionary and the government officer, who were already anxious about the traveller, he finally got back, after many exciting adventures, to the Methodist hospital, where he recovered, and reached India and home, is told in the last half of the second volume. Mr. Landor is no mere tourist. He has solved the uncertainty regarding the division of the two great Tibetan lakes, ascended an altitude of 22,000 feet, pictured the great Hamahlyan glaciers, and visited and has fixed the position of the two principal sources of the Brahmaputra, never before reached by a European. WILLIAM ELLIOTT GRIFFIS.

* In the Forbidden Land. By A. Henry Savage Landor. Two vols., 8vo., illustrated. New York: Harper & Brothers.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

THE Yale and the Harvard have gone back to the paths of peace, which they follow again as the Paris and the New York, but the blockade-scarred Princeton is still in the navy, and expects to stay there. As every Princeton man and many other persons know, she is a composite gunboat, barkentine rigged, and carries thirteen guns. On December 10 about 300 Princeton men boarded her in the Brooklyn Navy-yard, to celebrate the addition to her equipment of one silver punch-bowl, mostly tiger, one ship's bell with a Princeton clapper, and a ship's library of about 600 volumes. The Princeton Club of Philadelphia gave the bowl, the Princeton Club of New York the bell and library. Commander Clifford H. West accepted them in behalf of the gunboat and her owners and crew with eloquent and appropriate remarks. He recalled the history of the former United States ship of the same name, and her associations with Commodore Stockton, to whom chiefly is due the abolition of flogging in the American navy. President Patton was there, and Admiral Bunce. It was the greatest Princeton day Long Island ever saw.

Another interesting presentation of recent occurrence was the gift of a loving-cup, by the Commercial Club of St. Paul, Minnesota, to Captain Sigsbee, late commander of the liner St. Paul during her term of service as an auxiliary cruiser of the United States navy. In his letter of acknowledgment Captain Sigsbee remarks that the loving-cup sent him is identical in design with that which went down on the Maine in Havana Harbor. It was a mere coincidence, but a fortunate one, that this should have been so. By way of a souvenir of the cruiser St. Paul's term in the navy, Captain Sigsbee sent the Commercial Club the ship's Bible, which had been inadvertently packed among his things when he left the ship, and later had been given to him by the president of the International Navigation Company.

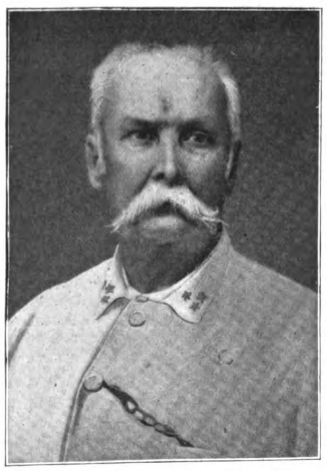
Boston is arranging for a show of pictures by John S. Sargent, to be held under the auspices of the Boston Art Students' Association, in Copley Hall on Clarendon Street, for three weeks, beginning February 20. The exhibition promises to be exceedingly interesting. The committee of fifteen which has it in charge includes Professor Norton, Mr. Wadsworth Longfellow, Mrs. Henry Whitman, and divers other well-known and accomplished persons. They have arranged to borrow many of the best paintings by Mr. Sargent that are in London, including everything in the artist's studio that is of interest. Among pictures already promised them are the portraits of Mr. Wertheimer, the English Jew, which is now in the Academy loan exhibition; of Mrs. Wertheimer; of Senator Calvin S. Brice; of Mrs. Carl Meyer, of London, and her two children; and others. The prospect is that the exhibition will be the best show of Mr. Sargent's work ever given. The artist himself is said to take a very lively interest in it, especially because his most important work is already in Boston, in the Public Library.

Mr. Brigham H. Roberts, Congressman-elect from Utah, has three wives, and a good many persons seem to think that he ought not to be sworn in as a member of Congress. Mr. Dingley of Maine is reported to be scandalized at the idea of sitting in the same House with a polygamist, and to believe that Mr. Roberts ought not to be admitted. The Woman's Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church is of the same opinion, and is getting ready to take action. The Episcopal clergymen of Trenton, New Jersey, have written to their Congressman about the case, and other bodies will doubtless be heard from. It would seem to be trouble enough for one man to have three living wives, without losing his seat in Congress, but these vigilant censors don't take that view of it.

Mr. Roberts's explanation of his predicament is that he married all his wives while polygamy was still fashionable in Utah, and that he has never felt at liberty to divest himself of his domestic responsibilities. One must sympathize with that sentiment, however inexpedient it may seem for a man ever to have got himself so much entangled.

It seems not as yet to have been suggested that an American citizen cannot now have more than one living wife, and that in the eyes of the law in Washington Mr. Roberts's second and third encumbrances are not wives at all. Nominally he may be a trigamist, but actually trigamy is not recognized by law as a feasible condition. If he attempts as a Congressman to have three wives in Washington, and to take more than one of them to a White House reception, his case will fall naturally and easily to the care of the District police force. If, however, he is content to leave his families in Utah, it seems as if Congress might get along with him.

We have had a new war, and have seen peace follow it, but no one has yet seen a soldiers' and sailors' monument in New York. There are plans for one, made by Messrs. C. W. & A. A. Stoughton, which have been duly accepted, after a competition. The site, too, has been agreed upon, in the Riverside Park at Eighty-third Street, but as yet the monument does not rise.



The Columbia University Committee of Employment for Students finds more students who need employment than employments which need students. Last year the committee put the young men with whom it concerned itself in the way of earning about $2500. It wants to do better this year. It has registered students for hire, who can spare a few hours daily, "for almost any line of work requiring special aptitude, intelligence, and reliability." If you want private tutors, translators who know the European and Asiatic languages, teachers for evening schools, stenographers, type-writers, draughtsmen, lecturers for schools, or ushers for entertainments, send to Columbia's Committee of Employment and have your order filled.

Another thing that is wanted for Columbia students is dormitories. The trustees have decided that they will have them, and plans have been drawn by McKim, Mead, & White for four five-story buildings to skirt the green at 120th Street, and form three sides of a quadrangle. Two of these buildings are to cost $164,000 each, and two about $210,000 each. As soon as the money is subscribed work on them will begin.

Destiny, as we all know, is a sarcastic creature, and it happens often that folks die just when it seems to observers that they have got ready to live. It was certainly so with General Calixto Garcia, who died of pneumonia, in Washington, on December 11. It is only a few weeks since he came from Cuba at the head of the special Cuban commission which was empowered to communicate the views of the Cuban leaders to our government.

General Garcia was fifty-eight years old, and for more than half his life his chief concern had been the overthrow of Spanish rule in Cuba. He was born in Holguin, Cuba, in 1840, and was one of the instigators of the Cuban rebellion of 1868. For five years he was active and successful in fights and forays against the Spaniards, but in September, 1873, he was surprised with twenty men by 500 Spaniards. Seeing that there was no chance to get away, and unwilling to be captured alive, he put the muzzle of his pistol in his mouth and pulled the trigger. The ball, instead of going through his brain, came out of his forehead between his eyes, and he recovered. He was sent to Spain and held a prisoner until the peace of Zanjon was signed, in 1877. Then he went to Paris, and thence to New York and back to Cuba, and presently took part with Maceo in what was called "the little war," which followed the peace of Zanjon. Captured again, his life was spared, and he was sent back to Spain, where he lived for seventeen years under police supervision at Madrid. There he supported his family, which grew to be large, by teaching.

When the last revolution broke out, in 1894, he grew restless again, and finally slipped away from Madrid and reached New York in November, 1895. He commanded

GENERAL CALIXTO GARCIA.
Born, 1840. Died, December 11, 1898.

the Hawkins filibustering expedition which came to grief, but after two more unsuccessful attempts reached Cuba in March, 1896. His record as a Cuban leader after that is matter of general knowledge. His co-operation with the American forces in the capture of Santiago fairly brought him in at the death of the Spanish rule that he had fought so long.

Of the three Cuban generals of greatest note in the last revolution only Gomez now survives.

The Independent, fifty years old, has issued (December 8) an anniversary number full of reminiscence and history. One feature of it is its poems by Longfellow, Whittier, Holmes, Mrs. Browning, Alice Cary, and others, gathered from its own files, as well as new ones by Mr. Stoddard and Mr. Bliss Carman. Dr. Storrs tells of the paper's early years, Dr. William Hayes Ward reviews its half-century of activity, and Dr. Theodore Cuyler tells of the thirty-eight years during which he has had personal relations with it as contributor.

The Independent has had a hand in the making of a vast deal of important history. It has been written and read by thinking people, and while its form has changed repeatedly, its quality seems to be continuous. So may it ever be, and its readers also.

There has been some sort of a hitch between Dr. E. Benjamin Andrews, Superintendent of Schools in Chicago, and the Chicago Board of Education. Precisely what the difference was has not been made clear, but the gist of the difficulty seems to have been that Dr. Andrews's authority was curtailed, appointments were made over his head, and he was unable to carry out what seemed to him his reasonable ideas and purposes. It was rumored that finally he sent in his resignation, and that that led to a thorough discussion of existing conditions and of the relations between the superintendent and the board, with the result of a better understanding and Dr. Andrews's continuance in office on terms agreeable to him.

Dr. Andrews has been quoted as saying that much of the trouble sprang from a belief prevalent in the board that he was the exponent of the educational ideas of President Harper of the Chicago University. Dr. Harper's ideas appear to be offensive to the board, and Dr. Andrews appears to have relieved the board's mind considerably by the assurance that while he and Dr. Harper were friends, their opinions were not in accord on all subjects.

The Supreme Court in Tennessee declares that the law passed by the Tennessee Legislature prohibiting the sale of cigarettes in that State is constitutional, because cigarettes are not legitimate articles of commerce. In Chicago the City Council voted, the other day, to increase the cost of licenses to sell cigarettes from $100 to $500. In these actions, however they may result, there is evidence of a deep-seated suspicion that cigarettes are unwholesome. Persons in whose minds this suspicion has grown to such troublesome proportions that they have come to believe that the cigarette habit threatens to undermine American manhood, may find some comfort in the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who has reasons for believing that during the last fiscal year the consumption of cigarettes diminished 382,587,200. The significance of this report is impaired, however, by the fact—which every one must recall—that the Rough Riders and others of our soldiery ran entirely out of cigarettes at Santiago, and with the best will in the world to bring the average consumption up to normal, were unable to procure the means to do it.

During the same fiscal year there was an apparent increase in the consumption of cigars of about 325,000,000, so it does not do to argue, from the slight relapse in cigarettes, that tobacco is going out of fashion.

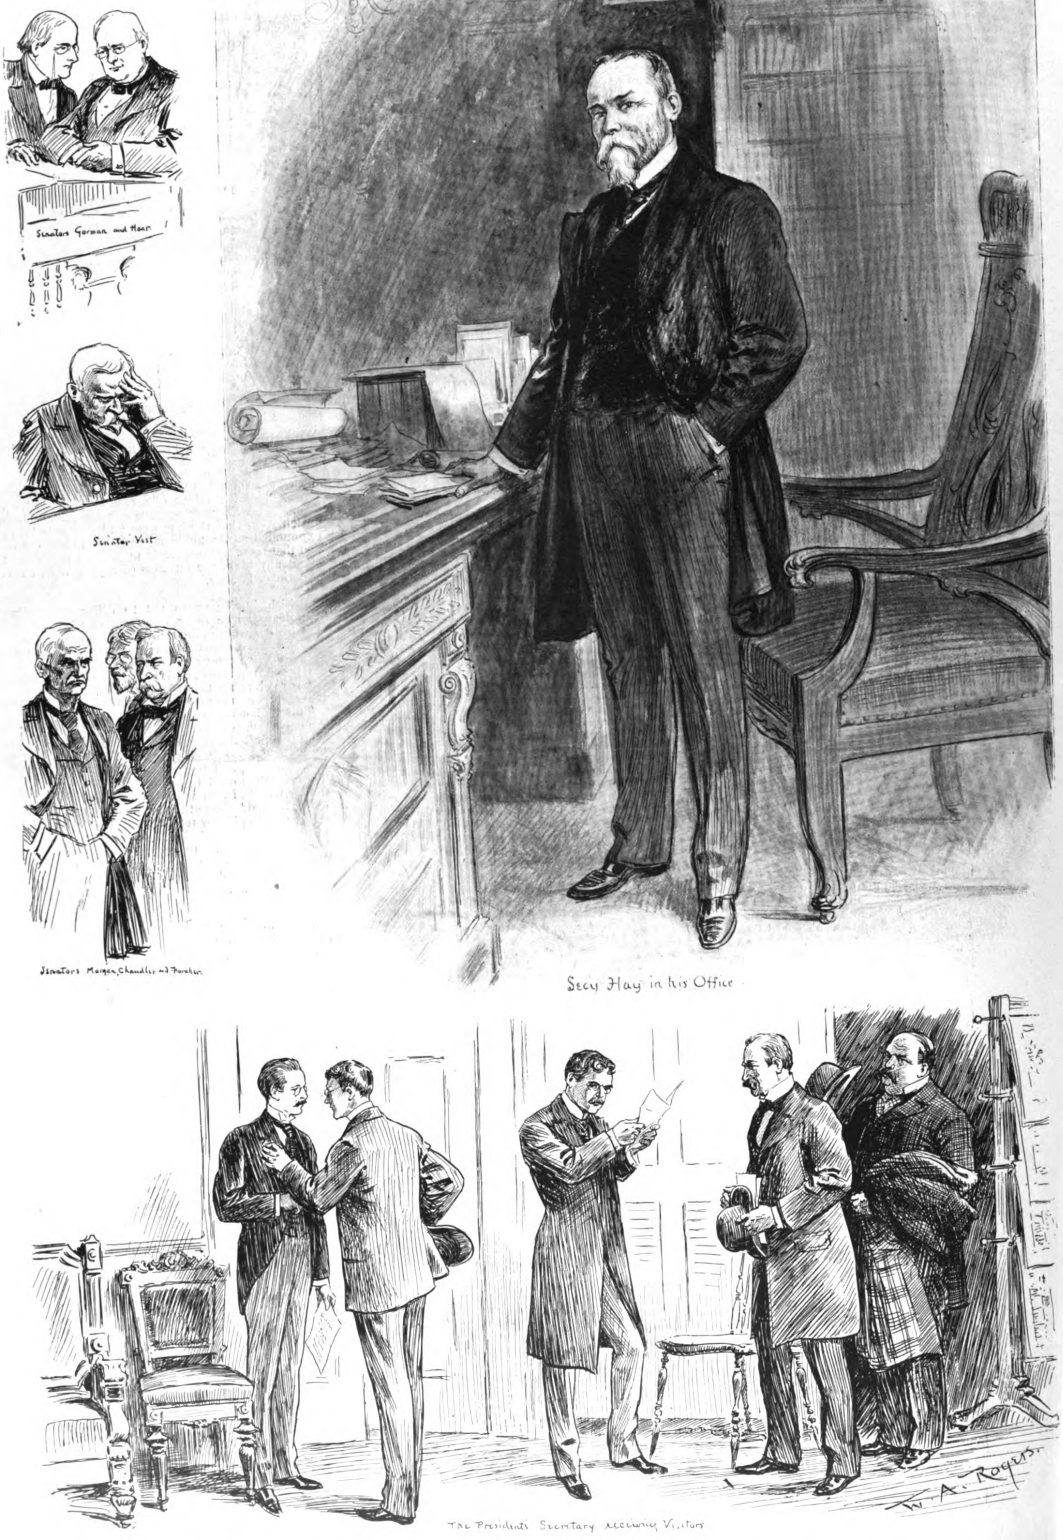
The most popular military man in the world among the hack writers, authors, newspaper men, and workers at literature and the affiliated trades is General Kitchener, of whom it is told, that being asked to write a book, he replied, "No, thank you; I shall remain a soldier." In old times making history and writing it were usually separate jobs. Nowadays it is different. The sword and the pen are mighty by turns in the same hand, and what soldiers lose by the discouragement of the good old practice of sack, they win by gleanings in the field of literature. Relief for the professional men of letters is not easily devised. A literary trust would have to be too hospitable to be of value for commercial purposes. A license system might be tried, as with ministers, but that too would fail for lack of a reasonable basis for exclusion. Hope is chiefly sustained in the literary bosom by anticipation that the late wars will presently be as fully expounded as the fickle mind of the public can endure, and that then, when there is nothing in particular to say about anything, the business of saying it will revert to experienced hands.

British justice seems not to differ materially from American justice in its treatment of Christian Science. The healers whose ministrations failed in the case of Harold Frederic have encountered British law, and nothing seems to have come of it. After having been examined, arraigned, remanded, and re-remanded, they have been discharged, subject, however, to further legal attentions if it should seem expedient.

This is about the usual course on this side of the water. An exception is the case of Harriet Evans, of Cincinnati, who is reported to have been convicted on December 8, by a jury, of practising medicine unlawfully. She was fined $100. The story, as the newspapers tell it, is that Thomas McDowell had typhoid fever, and called in a doctor, who had him in charge when Miss Evans came in and "treated" the patient. The doctor then gave up the case, and Miss Evans took it. McDowell's wife approved, but his daughter objected, and resented Miss Evans giving her father plums to eat. McDowell died. The usual difference of opinion obtains as to the cause of his decease, the rabble declaring that he had too much Christian Science, the Scientists protesting that he didn't have enough.

There appeared in the WEEKLY for December 10 a meritorious poem by Mr. John K. Bangs, wherein he had fun with "Sir J. D. Edgar, Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons," on the strength of the suggestion, attributed by a daily paper to that gentleman, that England should cede the island of Jamaica to Uncle Sam in exchange for one of the Eastern States.

Mr. Edgar (it would not be polite to call him "Sir J.," and he has not divulged his Christian name) writes to the WEEKLY to say that he does not object to Mr. Bangs's chaff, but that Mr. Bangs has trusted too implicitly to the daily paper. He explains that his suggestion to swap Jamaica for New Hampshire was not offered in entire seriousness, but was a counter-suggestion to the proposal of Senator Chandler, made in a current magazine, to swap the Philippines for Canada. One suggestion he thinks not more absurd than the other, since Great Britain could no more swap off Canada than the United States could swap off New Hampshire. He adds:



> If it strikes an American as absolutely incongruous and absurd for any one to suggest the swapping of one of the States for Jamaica, with its black population, it must be seen that it would be more conducive to good feeling all round if a statesman so prominent as Senator Chandler would realize that his suggestion about the Philippines and Canada might do harm all round if it were to be taken seriously.

That is very true, but, happily, Senator Chandler's suggestion is not likely to be taken seriously on either side of the border. It is part of a policy of pin pricks, which some American statesmen and American newspapers affect, to talk periodically of gobbling up Canada the first good chance. It is not a useful policy, though we are warranted in hoping that it is practically harmless.

Columns of discourse from many sources have been published of late about "the negro problem," but no one has spoken with more authority and wisdom about it than Booker T. Washington, of Tuskegee. He says that while in a few places there is trouble, in ten thousand places in the South white men and black are living together in peace and contentment. He does not tell the colored men to fight for their rights, but he bids them not to be discouraged. "A white man," he says, "respects a negro who owns a two-story house." He thinks material and industrial improvement must precede the other kinds of betterment among the colored people. It is hard, he says, to make a good Christian or a good citizen of a hungry man, but he believes that the Southern negroes need not go hungry if they can learn how to work; and to teach them that, among other things, is the business of his admirably useful life.

E. S. MARTIN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE FIFTY-FIFTH CONGRESS—SCENES IN WASHINGTON AT THE OPENING OF THE SESSION.
DRAWN BY W. A. ROGERS, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE FIFTY-FIFTH CONGRESS—SCENES IN WASHINGTON AT THE OPENING OF THE SESSION.
DRAWN BY W. A. ROGERS, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE AWKWARD AGE.*

A Novel.

BY HENRY JAMES,

AUTHOR OF "DAISY MILLER," "AN INTERNATIONAL EPISODE," ETC.

XXIX.

MR. LONGDON mechanically obeyed the Duchess, though it happened to lend him the air of taking Mrs. Brook's approach for a signal to resume his seat. She came over to them, Vanderbank followed, and it was without again moving, with a vague upward gape, in fact, from his place, that her old friend received, as she stood before him, a challenge that flashed a point into what the Duchess had just said.

"Why do you hate me so?"

Vanderbank, who, beside Mrs. Brook, looked at him with attention, might have suspected him of turning a trifle pale; though even Vanderbank, with reasons of his own for an observation of the sharpest, could scarce have read into the matter the particular dim vision that would have accounted for it—the flicker of fear of what Mrs. Brook, between the other parent and the other child, was at last so strangely and differently to show herself.

"I should warn you, sir," the young man threw off, "that we don't consider that—in Buckingham Crescent certainly—a fair question. It isn't playing the game—it's hitting below the belt. We hate and we love—the latter especially—but to tell each other why is to break that little tacit rule of finding out for ourselves which is the delight of our lives and the source of our triumphs. You can say, you know, if you like, but you're not obliged."

Mr. Longdon transferred to him something of the same colder apprehension, looking at him, manifestly, harder than ever before, and finding in his eyes also, no doubt, a consciousness more charged. He presently got up, but, without answering Vanderbank, fixed again Mrs. Brook, to whom he echoed without expression: "Hate you?"

The next moment, while he remained in presence with Vanderbank, Mrs. Brook was pointing out her meaning to him from the cushioned corner he had quitted. "Why, when you come back to town, you come straight, as it were, here."

"Ah, what's that," the Duchess asked in his interest, "but to follow Nanda as closely as possible, or at any rate to keep well with her?"

Mrs. Brook, however, had no ear for this plea. "And when I, coming here too, and thinking only of my chance to 'meet' you, do my very sweetest to catch your eye, you're entirely given up—"

"To trying of course," the Duchess broke in afresh, "to keep well with me."

Mrs. Brook now had a smile for her. "Ah, that takes precautions then that I shall perhaps fail of if I too much interrupt your conversation."

"Isn't she nice to me," the Duchess asked of Mr. Longdon, "when I was in the very act of praising her to the skies?"

Their interlocutor's reply was not too rapid to anticipate Mrs. Brook herself. "My dear Jane, that only proves that he had reached some extravagance in the other sense probably in the 'mean'—isn't that what they call it?—between you. Don't you now take him away," she went on to Vanderbank, who had glanced about for some better accommodation.

He immediately pushed forward the nearest chair, which happened to be by the Duchess's side of the sofa. "Will you sit here, sir?"

"If you'll stay here to protect me."

"That was really what I brought him over to you for," Mrs. Brook said while Mr. Longdon took his place and Vanderbank looked out for another seat. "But I didn't know," she observed with her sweet, free curiosity, "that he called you 'sir.'" She often made discoveries that were fairly childlike. "He has done it twice."

"Isn't that only your inevitable English surprise," the Duchess demanded, "at the civility quite the commonest in other societies?—so that one has to come here to find it regarded, in the way of ceremony, as the very end of the world!"

"Oh," Mr. Longdon remarked, "it's a word I rather like, myself, even to employ to others."

"I always ask here," the Duchess continued to him, "what word they've got instead. And do you know what they tell me?"

Mrs. Brook wondered, then again, before he was ready, charmingly suggested, "Our pretty manner?" Quickly too she appealed to Mr. Longdon. "Is that what you miss from me?"

He wondered, however, more than Mrs. Brook. "Your 'pretty manner'?"

"Well, these grand old forms that the Duchess is such a mistress of," Mrs. Brook had with this one of her eagerest visions. "Did mamma say 'sir' to you? Ought I? Do you really get it, in private, out of Nanda? She has such depths of discretion," she explained to the Duchess and to Vanderbank, who had come back with his chair, "that it's just the kind of illustrative anecdote she never in the world gives me."

Mr. Longdon looked across at Van, placed now, after a moment's talk with Tishy in sight of them all, by Mrs. Brook's arm of the sofa. "You haven't protected—you've only exposed me."

"Oh, there's no joy without danger—" Mrs. Brook took it up with spirit. "Perhaps one should even say there's no danger without joy."

Vanderbank's eyes had followed Mrs. Grendon after his brief passage with her, terminated by some need of her listless presence on the other side of the room. "What do you say then, on that theory, to the extraordinary gloom of our hostess? Her safety, by such a rule, must be deep."

The Duchess was this time the first to know what they said. "The expression of Tishy's face comes, precisely, from our comparing it so unfavorably with that of her poor sister Carrie, who, though she isn't here to-night with the Cashmores—amazing enough even as coming without that!—has so often shown us that an âme en peine, constantly tottering, but, as Nanda guarantees us, usually recovering, may look, after all, as beatific as a Dutch doll."

Mrs. Brook's eyes had, on Tishy's passing away, taken the same course as Vanderbank's, whom she had visibly not neglected, moreover, while the pair stood there. "I give you Carrie, as you know, and I throw Mr. Cashmore in; but I'm lost in admiration to-night, as I always have been, at the way Tishy makes her ugliness serve. I should call it, if the word weren't so for ladies'-maids, the most 'elegant' thing I know."

"My dear child," the Duchess objected, "what you describe as making her ugliness serve is what I should describe as concealing none of her beauty. There's nothing the matter surely with 'elegant,' as applied to Tishy, save that, as commonly used, it refers rather to a charm that's artificial than to a state of pure nature. There should be for elegance a basis of clothing. Nanda rather stints her."

Mrs. Brook, perhaps more than usually thoughtful, just discriminated. "There is, I think, one little place. I'll speak to her."

"To Tishy?" Vanderbank asked.

"Oh, that would do no good. To Nanda. All the same," she continued, "it's an awfully superficial thing of you not to see that her dreariness—on which, moreover, I've set you right before—is a mere facial accident, and doesn't correspond or, as they say, 'rhyme' to anything within her that might make it a little interesting. What I like it for is just that it's so funny in itself. Her low spirits are nothing more than her features. Her gloom, as you call it, is merely her broken nose."

"Has she a broken nose?" Mr. Longdon demanded with an accent that for some reason touched in the others the spring of laughter.

"Has Nanda never mentioned it?" Mrs. Brook inquired with this gayety.

"That's the discretion you just spoke of," said the Duchess. "Only I should have expected from the cause you refer to rather the comic effect."

"Mrs. Grendon's broken nose, sir," Vanderbank explained to Mr. Longdon, "is only the kinder way taken by these ladies to speak of Mrs. Grendon's broken heart. You must know all about that."

"Oh yes—all." Mr. Longdon spoke very simply, with the consequence this time, on the part of his companions, of a silence of some minutes, which he himself had at last to break. "Mr. Grendon doesn't like her." The addition of these words apparently made the difference—as if they constituted a fresh link with the irresistible comedy of things. That he was unexpectedly diverting was, however, no check to Mr. Longdon's delivering his full thought. "Very horrid of two sisters to be both, in their marriages, so wretched."

"Ah, but Tishy, I maintain," Mrs. Brook returned, "isn't wretched at all. If I were satisfied that she's really so I would never let Nanda come to her."

"That's the most extraordinary doctrine, love," the Duchess interposed. "When you're satisfied a woman's 'really' poor, you never give her a crust?"

"Do you call Nanda a crust, Duchess?" Vanderbank amusedly asked.

"She's all, at any rate, apparently, just now, that poor Tishy has to live on."

"You're severe then," the young man said, "on our dinner of to-night."

"Oh, Jane," Mrs. Brook declared, "is never severe: she's only uncontrollably witty. It's only Tishy, moreover, who gives out that her husband doesn't like her. He, poor man, doesn't say anything of the sort."

"Yes, but after all, you know"—Vanderbank just put it to her—"where the deuce, all the while, is he?"

"Heaven forbid," the Duchess remarked, "that we should too indiscreetly inquire."

"There it is—exactly," Mr. Longdon subjoined.

He had once more his success of hilarity, though not indeed to the injury of the Duchess's next word. "It's Nanda, you know, who speaks, and loud enough, for Harry Grendon's dislikes."

"That's easy for her," Mrs. Brook declared, "when she herself isn't one of them."

"She isn't surely one of anybody's," Mr. Longdon gravely observed.

Mrs. Brook gazed across at him. "You are too dear! But I've none the less a crow to pick with you."

Mr. Longdon returned her look, but returned it somehow to Van. "You frighten me, you know, out of my wits."

"I do?" said Vanderbank.

Mr. Longdon just hesitated. "Yes."

"It must be the sacred awe," Mrs. Brook suggested to Van, "that Mitchy so often speaks of. I'm not trying with you," she went on to Mr. Longdon, "for anything of that kind, but only for the short half-hour, in private, that I think you won't for the world grant me. Nothing will induce you to find yourself alone with me."

"Why, what on earth," Vanderbank asked, "do you suspect him of supposing you want to do?"

"Oh, it isn't that," Mrs. Brook sadly said.

"It isn't what?" laughed the Duchess.

"That he fears I may want in any way to—what do you call it?—make up to him." She spoke as if she only wished it had been. "He has a deeper thought."

"Well then, what in goodness is it?"

Mr. Longdon had said nothing more, but Mrs. Brook preferred none the less to treat the question as between themselves. She was, as the others said, wonderful. "You can't help thinking me"—she spoke to him straight—"rather tortuous." The pause she thus momentarily produced was so intense as to give a sharpness that was almost vulgar to the little "Oh!" by which it was presently broken and the source of which neither of her three companions could afterwards in the least have named. Neither would have endeavored to fix an indecency of which each, doubtless, had been but too capable. "It's only as a mother," she added, "that I want my chance."

But the Duchess, at this, was again in the breach. "Take it, for mercy's sake then, my dear, over Harold, who's an example to Nanda herself in the way that, behind the piano there, he's keeping it up with Lady Fanny."

If this had been a herring that, in the interest of peace, the Duchess had wished to draw across the scent, it could scarce have been more effective. Mrs. Brook, whose position had made just the difference that she lost the view of the other side of the piano, took a slight but immediate stretch. "Is Harold with Lady Fanny?"

"You ask it, my dear child," said the Duchess, "as if it were too grand to be believed. It's the note of eagerness," she went on for Mr. Longdon's benefit—"it's almost the note of hope: one of those that ces messieurs, that we all, in fact, delight in and find so matchless. She desires for Harold the highest advantages."

"Well then," declared Vanderbank, who had achieved a glimpse, "he's clearly having them. It brings home to one his success."

"His success is true," Mrs. Brook insisted. "How he does it I don't know."

"Oh don't you!" trumpeted the Duchess.

"He's amazing," Mrs. Brook pursued. "I watch—I hold my breath. But I'm bound to say also I rather admire. He somehow amuses them."

"She's as pleased as Punch," said the Duchess.

"Those great calm women—they like slighter creatures."

"The great calm whales," the Duchess laughed, "swallow the little fishes."

"Oh, my dear," Mrs. Brook returned, "Harold can be tasted, if you like—"

"If I like?" the Duchess parenthetically jeered.

"Thank you, love!"

"But he can't, I think, be eaten. It all works out," Mrs. Brook expounded, "to the highest end. If Lady Fanny's amused she'll be quiet."

"Bless me," cried the Duchess, "of all the immoral speeches—! I put it to you, Longdon. Does she mean"—she appealed to their friend—"that if she commits murder, she won't commit anything else?"

"Oh, it won't be murder," said Mrs. Brook. "I mean that if Harold, in one way and another, keeps her along, she won't get off."

"Off where?" Mr. Longdon inquired.

Vanderbank immediately informed him. "To one of the smaller Italian towns. Don't you know?"

"Oh yes. Like—who is it? I forget."

"Anna Karénine? You know about Anna?"

"Nanda," said the Duchess, "has told him. But I thought," she went on to Mrs. Brook, "that Lady Fanny, by this time, must have gone."

"Petherton, then," Mrs. Brook returned, "doesn't keep you au courant?"

The Duchess blandly wondered. "I seemed to remember he had positively said so. And that she had come back."

"Because this looks so like a fresh start? No. We know. You assume, besides," Mrs. Brook asked, "that Mr. Cashmore would have received her again?"

The Duchess fixed a little that gentleman and his actual companion. "What will you have? He mightn't have noticed."

"Oh, you're out of step, Duchess," Vanderbank said. "We used all to march abreast, but we're falling to pieces. It's all, saving your presence, Mitchy's marriage."

"Ah," Mrs. Brook concurred, "how thoroughly I feel that! Oh, I knew. The spell's broken; the harp has lost a string. We're not the same thing. He's not the same thing."

"Frankly, my dear," the Duchess answered, "I don't think that you personally are either."

"Oh, as for that—which is what matters least—we shall perhaps see." With which Mrs. Brook turned again to Mr. Longdon. "I haven't explained to you what I meant just now. We want Nanda."

Mr. Longdon stared. "At home again?"

"In her little old nook. You must give her back."

"Do you mean altogether?"

"Ah, that will be for you, in a manner, to arrange. But you've had her practically these five months, and, with no desire to be unreasonable, we yet have our natural feelings."

This interchange, to which circumstances somehow gave a high effect of suddenness and strangeness, was listened to by the others in a quick silence that was like the sense of a blast of cold air, though with the difference, between the spectators, that Vanderbank attached his eyes hard to Mrs. Brook and that the Duchess looked as straight at Mr. Longdon, to whom, clearly, she wished to convey that if he had wondered a short time before how Mrs. Brook would do it he must now be quite at his ease. He indulged in fact, after this lady's last words, in a pause that might have signified some of the fulness of a new light. He only said very quietly: "I thought you liked it."

At this his neighbor broke in. "The care you take of the child? They do!" The Duchess, as she spoke, became aware of the nearer presence of Edward Brookenham, who, within a minute, had come in from the other room; and the determination of her character leaped forth in her quick signal to him. "Do you, dear." He was already before their semicircle. "Do you, dear," she appealed, "want Nanda back from Mr. Longdon?"

Edward plainly could be trusted to feel in his quiet way that the oracle must be a match for the priestess. "'Want' her, Jane? We wouldn't take her." As if knowing quite what he was about, he looked at his wife only after he had spoken.

XXX.

Brookenham's reply had great success, to which there could scarce have afterwards been a positive denial that some sound of amusement even from Mr. Longdon him-

* Began in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2150.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Appealed to on the question of underlying desire, Mrs. Brook went through the decent form of appearing to try to give it the benefit of any doubt. "Don't I want, you mean, to find out before you go up what you want? Shall you be much disappointed," she asked, "if I say that, as I shall probably learn, as we used to be told as children, 'all in good time,' I can wait till the light comes out of itself?"

Vanderbank still lingered. "You are deep!"

"You've only to be deeper."

"That's easy to say. I'm afraid, at any rate, you won't think I am," he pursued after a pause, "if I ask you what in the world—since Harold does keep Lady Fanny so quiet—Cashmore still requires Nanda's direction for?"

"Ah, find out!" said Mrs. Brook.

"Isn't Carrie Donner quite shelved?"

"Find out," she repeated.

Vanderbank had reached the door and had his hand on the latch, but there was still something else. "You scarce suppose, I imagine, that she has come to like him for himself?"

"Find out!" And Mrs. Brook, who was now on her feet, turned away.

He watched her a moment more, then checked himself and left her.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

PUERTO RICO.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

THE WATER-WORKS OF SAN JUAN.

NINE miles from San Juan, by the military road, near the little town of Rio Piedras, there is a piece of engineering just approaching completion, which is to result in furnishing the capital of Puerto Rico with a much-needed water-supply. Aside, one is surprised that cities of the size of San Juan should have remained so many years in a primitive condition, without modern water-works, without gas, without electric light, without sewerage, and without street-cars.

The awakening to the needs of modern life and the possibilities in the direction of mechanical comforts has come only in the last few years, and then principally through the instrumentality of progressive Americans.

To-day San Juan has an ice-plant which is wholly inadequate; a gas-plant which furnishes only a mean yellow flame; a feeble incandescent electric-light-plant; a narrow-gauge steam tramway leading to suburban towns, and a single railroad running east to Carolina and west to Arecibo; but beyond this she has remained at a standstill in this century of wonderful advancement.

It is calculated that within four months San Juan will be able to dispense with the questionable supply of rain-water in cisterns—to which may be attributed a portion of the sickness developed—which will be replaced by well-filtered water drawn from an uncontaminated source far up in the mountain ravines.

This has been practically accomplished by damming a mountain stream, at normal periods some thirty feet in width, by a substantial wall of masonry twenty feet high. American engineers would pronounce this portion of the work defective, in that along the low flood-plains to the left of the stream there are no extension retaining-walls, and hence all flood waters rush around the unprotected end of the dam. The monetary loss, when the spring-waters cut a new stream-bed, as they will, over the alluvial plain, will be of small moment as compared to the distress which will be caused by the temporary cutting off of the water-supply of a city, whose people have become educated to the use of water from faucets.

Beyond this primary objection to the work as it stands, it may be said that the undertaking has been well and ably executed under the direction of Spanish engineers, including, as it does, settling-basins, sand-filters, pumping-basins, steam lifting-pumps, primary receiving reservoirs, and secondary distributing reservoirs.

It is estimated that this plant is capable of raising and distributing two million gallons of water in twelve hours, with one set of pumps in action.

All the great basins have been built by throwing up a massive surrounding wall of earth, and erecting against this a stone wall four feet in thickness, finished with a cement lining. The stone used in their construction is a fine-grained blue limestone, brought from the mountains within a mile and a half of Rio Piedras. As a building-stone it is said to be excellent. It is worked, however, with some difficulty, as the massive rock seems to have no general lines of cleavage. The entire eastern end of the island abounds in immense metamorphosed sand-stones, approaching quartzites, and in limestones ranging to argillites. Both make fine building-stone, and, with better roads and easier means of transportation, they will very likely come into extensive industrial use.

The water comes from the dam through a twenty-four-inch pipe to two settling-basins, which are used alternately, and it is here held for twenty-four hours until the major portion of the foreign matter has precipitated.

Provision is made at the lower end of these basins to flow off the water into the stream, so that the basins may be cleaned of the accumulation of mud.

From the settling-basins it is flowed into great duplicate filter-basins, which have a bed-covering of four feet of coarse sand. The water passes through these beds of sand into the final pumping-basin.

In the event of any trouble with the filter-beds, it is possible to flow the water, by side trenches with cemented walls, around the filter-basin direct into the pumping-pits. The pumps are direct coupled, and the engines are of the condensing type, manufactured by a Glasgow firm.

The primary reservoir is situated a hundred and sixty feet above the pumps, and is a work of beauty. The walls are of rough masonry, topped with a handsome stone fence. The centre of this great basin, holding 3,700,000 gallons, is divided by a median wall, and the valve-house is situated at one side of this division.

A twenty-inch main leads into the city, this piping having been furnished by a Belgian company.

The entire work has been planned and carried out under the supervision of Puerto-Rican engineers, though the story goes that the original plans for this plant, with estimates of cost, were presented by a Scotch engineer on the island, and, with his approval, were mailed to Madrid for final sanction. These plans, it is then stated, were stolen from the post-office, and copies made of them under the direction of the Governor-General, who forwarded them as an original scheme. They were approved by the government at Madrid, the Scotchman getting neither credit nor money.

The total cost of the completed plant with the water in the mains, it is said, will be somewhat over six hundred thousand pesos. This amount was raised by a bond issue of the municipality of San Juan, and carries a low rate of interest. It is the concensus of opinion among American experts who have examined the work that it is generally excellent, and that the money has been economically expended.

In four months it is hoped the pumps will be in position, and San Juan supplied with an abundance of clear, pure, filtered water, in place of the tainted, fever-breeding rain-water now gathered in several hundred small cisterns, and meagrely doled out for domestic purposes.

WILLIAM DINWIDDIE.

BLOODY FORD.

The Story of the Dressing-Station.

BY THE MEDICAL OFFICER IN CHARGE.

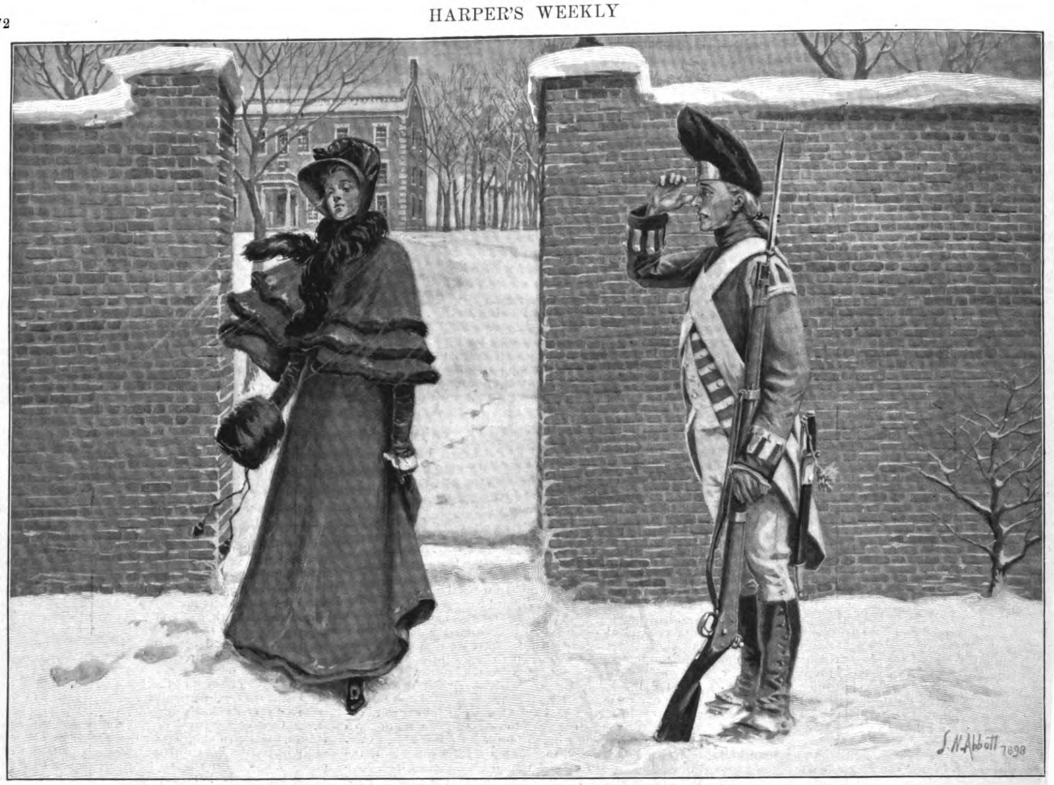
MANY things have been told us about the Santiago campaign. Descriptive articles and excellent illustrations by our ablest correspondents and artists have been forth-coming in plenty.

One feature, however, has been merely touched upon in these writings—a feature very important indeed for the poor sufferers involved at the time. I refer to the dressing-station, and in particular to the one designated as the "Bloody Ford" station. So many pathetic events occurred there—examples of heroic fortitude, entire lack of selfishness, true American courage in the very presence of death—that I think a few lines devoted to that alone will not be amiss. If all who were there feel as I do, there were many things that happened so deeply impressed on their memories that they will carry them to the grave.

To lead up to this dressing-station proper, I will ask you to go back with me to El Pozo. I was on duty as regimental surgeon with the Third United States Cavalry, a gallant body of men indeed. On the night of June 30 we bivouacked on El Pozo hill. Tired with our slow laborious night march to this point, we dropped quietly into the long grass and tried to get a little sleep, little imagining what was before us for the morrow. Just before the break of day, July 1, the cavalry division of which our regiment formed a part descended to the road at the foot of the hill and halted, awaiting our turn to advance. We were strung out in one long column of twos along that road, with dense jungle on either side. Captain Grimes's battery, in position on the summit of the hill right above us, opened fire on the Spanish lines. We were all intensely interested watching the firing. Shot after shot was sent into them without any reply. We began to think we were going to have an easy victory. Rash conclusion; for suddenly and without warning a shell comes screaming through the air, followed immediately by another, and still another. All eyes are strained upward at these terrible missiles, uncomfortably near to us, many of them bursting directly over our heads. Everybody unconsciously crouches as they come tearing and shrieking along. An instinctive feeling of trying to get into as small a compass as possible—"to crawl into one's self," as it were—comes over all. These shells were skilfully directed and properly timed to do the greatest amount of damage, and one old sergeant with a grim smile expressed aloud the thoughts of the command by the remark.

"Them Dagoes is got the range down fine."

The road was beginning to get pretty hot for us, and when the forward movement came it was hailed with silent relief; for it is certainly discouraging, and not conducive to good health and a happy frame of mind, to be pounded by an unseen enemy, without any opportunity to retaliate. The men were all eager to go ahead and get a chance at them. With grim determination they adjusted their packs, shouldered their pieces, and trudged along through the mud toward Santiago. Eventually we reached the San Juan Creek—a pretty little stream of clear water, hardly knee-deep where the road crosses it. On the farther side several strands of barbed wire obstructed progress, but it was only the work of a few moments to cut these and pull them aside. It was soon evident that the expected battle was about to begin at this point. The cavalry division crossed the stream, mounted the bank, and formed for fight. Men took their places quietly and silently, and there was a stillness about it all that was ominous, like the lull before the storm, and which boded ill for the Spanish in the trenches beyond on the hills of San Juan. It is at this stage that my tale begins.



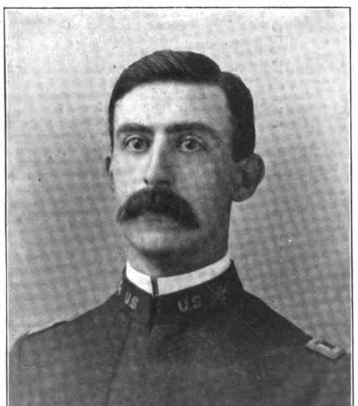
The thought now came to me that I had better be looking up a place for a dressing-station without delay, and this point of the creek seemed naturally created for the purpose. There was a cut bank, varying from a few inches to about three feet high, serving as partial protection for a man lying down behind it, and in some places for one even sitting. From this bank a shelf of gravel and sand about twenty feet long and perhaps eight or ten feet wide extended out into the shallow waters of the creek. After a rapid taking in of the situation, I determined to open a dressing-station right here, and together with Dr. Menocal, on duty with the Sixth United States Cavalry, set about making it comfortable as a joint station for our two regiments. The staff and field officers had left their horses on this gravel shelf, and proceeded from that point on foot. After having these horses moved down the creek about fifty feet, men were put at work with shovels to extend the shelf and increase its area. Other men at the same time gathered boughs and soft leaves, spreading them over the ground to make as comfortable a resting-place as possible for the unfortunates about to come in. These details were completed none too soon, for hardly was the place in readiness before the silence was broken suddenly by the sharp incessant rattle of rifle fire, and a perfect hail of bullets came whizzing right into the station and all around us. All day long this continued, with occasional short lulls, and at times the din was terrific, particularly when shrapnel would go cutting its way over us as well. It is a marvel that every living thing thereabouts was not either killed or wounded. Even the black dog with H Troop, Third Cavalry, the mascot of the troop, seemed to realize that it was an unhealthy locality about that time, for he crouched below the bank and shivered miserably, with occasional low whines, as though he understood it all, poor fellow. The fight was on; and hardly had one time to collect his thoughts before the wounded came pouring in from over the bank in a steady stream, some limping, some hopping, others holding their arms to their sides or abdomen, many using the rifle as a crutch or support, and a number carried in by their comrades—one, two, or four, as the case happened to be—themselves in a condition of utter exhaustion from fatigue and heat, but cheerful to be of use to their poor suffering companions. The capacity of the dressing-station was very soon strained to its utmost.

The first thing that impressed me was the curious expression of the faces of the wounded. None were without it, except those mortally hurt. As nearly as I can interpret it into words, the look was one of "dazed anxious surprise." The men carried as part of their equipment an emergency or first-aid packet. This consisted of two gauze compresses, a roller bandage, a handkerchief sling, and two safety-pins—all enclosed in macintosh or rubber sheeting, and the whole packet so prepared as to be absolutely free from germs of any kind. Before the battle opened, many of these had been thrown away by the thoughtless as being so much unnecessary encumbrance; but later, so high did they rise in the estimation of the men, that I several times overheard them trying to buy of one another, but without success. They evidently realized the value of the packet then. It was very gratifying to note the disappearance of the set expression, the dazed look mentioned before, from the faces of the injured after the dressing was applied by means of this packet; and with the completion of the dressing, one of intense relief, and one might almost say content, takes its place. No matter how great the suffering then or even after, it was the case with all. Small and almost insignificant as this first-aid packet appeared before the fight, it was really one of the most important parts of the equipment next to the actual munitions of war and commissary supplies. We owe to it directly and its prompt use the low mortality from wounds and the small number of amputations necessary. All hail to the first-aid packet, say I, in time of war. Many injuries which were not disturbed for some days after the first dressing was applied were found completely healed, and required no more care when the dressing was removed, presumably to put on a fresh one.

The freaks of some of the bullets were strange, to say the least. Several particular wounds made by them I remember very distinctly on account of their peculiar nature. One young cavalry officer was shot through the mouth, the bullet entering on the right side of the face, sadly battered a beautiful set of teeth, splintering eleven of them, was deflected and turned downward by one of the molars on the left side, and lodged in the muscles on the left side of the neck, where it now is and can easily be felt. I have since met this officer again, in excellent health. He is now in the toils of a dentist getting the damage repaired. The only mark he bears is a pretty little dimple at the right corner of the mouth, simply intensifying his former pleasant expression. Another was shot through both thighs, and I found the bullet in his trousers pocket. When told of the fact he simply remarked: "That's a mighty smart bullet, to stop in my pocket after plugging me. I wouldn't lose it for a farm." Another lad—he was merely a boy, in fact—was carried in by two comrades, and evidently did not know how badly he was hurt. While dressing his wounds—there were three of them, any one of which would render him helpless for some time to come—he said to me: "Fix me quick, doctor. I want to go up and have another crack at them." Of course that was out of the question, but it goes to demonstrate the spirit of the men, the kind of material they were made of. One poor lad, mortally wounded, was lying on the sand, staining it with his life-blood, and struggling so hard with death that it made me heart-sick to feel my utter helplessness when face to face with the inevitable. He wanted so much to live, and his look of mute appeal, and the oft-repeated question, "Will I pull through, doctor?" will haunt me for a long time to come. I am comforted by the knowledge that his death was quiet and painless, just like falling into a deep sleep. Most of the injuries to bone caused by these bullets were clean perforations only, instead of the terrible splintering fractures of previous wars, produced by soft bullets of larger calibre and less velocity. One, instead of penetrating the abdomen, after entering apparently straight, passed around from one side to the other between the muscles, and escaped from the opposite side to that on which it entered, making only a simple flesh-wound. A number of men were shot right through the lung, and yet all those of this class whom I dressed seemed to suffer very little, and have ultimately recovered. The strange pranks of these bullets were so many that to mention more would tire you.

As the wounded lay under the low, sheltering bank, the bullets came singing incessantly by, with a sound something like the quick momentary hum of a large mosquito, clipping the leaves from the trees in their flight, and allowing them slowly to flutter down in the faces of the men; then splashing into the creek, would bury themselves in its bed. At times they fell there so thickly for short intervals that it appeared as though it were raining. To vary the excitement, an occasional shrapnel would come tearing through the trees above us, smashing limbs, and dropping splinters and branches all about us. Men coming up the road from the rear to join the firing-line were frequently wounded right in the creek while crossing it, and it was often necessary to wade out and get them before they drowned, as many of them surely would have done otherwise. Now and then a wounded horse would plunge through the station; and one poor animal, bleeding profusely from his side, dropped half-way across the creek, and drowned and bled to death simultaneously. His struggles to gain a footing and keep his head above water were pitiful to see. A number of the staff and field horses were killed close by the station. Some dropped dead in their tracks; others, frantic, plunged and broke their halters and disappeared in the brush to die. To add to the feeling of insecurity about this place, it was but a very short time before shots very close at hand were heard from time to time, and bullets fell among us, apparently from above and behind us. There was no natural protection from that side, and the only solution of this problem that we could arrive at was that we were

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



AMERICA AND ENGLAND IN THE LAST CENTURY—A COLD CHRISTMAS GREETING.—Drawn by S. N. Abbott.

being shot at from the trees. There were several very large ones with dense foliage close by. Such, we found afterwards, was really the case. We were being made targets of by the Spanish sharp-shooters. It was quite a task to reassure the wounded that they were in no danger where they were if they would only lie quietly. After the first shock of this discovery, many of the injured passed the time watching the trees to determine if there were any signs of life in them, and occasionally pointed out to one another what they thought were living beings hidden in the foliage.

A little later in the day several other surgeons stopped at the station on their way to the front, and it was an intense satisfaction to me to see them, as we had more than we could handle—the place having developed into a general station by reason of its locality, nearest the firing-line and on the only road to and fro. Not only the wounded of the two regiments for which it was originally intended, but those from infantry and cavalry, regular and volunteer, kept coming in steadily. Major Robinson and Captain McCaw, two of the surgeons who came up, worked indefatigably and unceasingly. By afternoon we managed to secure the pack-wagons on their return trip from carrying ammunition to the men, and load them with the wounded able to be transported in that manner. Here again the heroism of the men showed itself universally. Throughout the day hardly a groan was heard, and never a complaint of any kind; and now, when the opportunity was present to get back to the division hospital in comparative safety and out of the zone of fire, men severely wounded volunteered, without request, to wait for another wagon, in order that some one else whom they fancied in worse plight than themselves might get back first. With such material, why shouldn't we win battles? Every time a man came back from the front, the one question put to him by all, the wounded included, was, "How is it going—have we got 'em licked yet?" There was never a thought of defeat. I recollect one lieutenant being carried into the station by four of his men. They handled him so tenderly and with such care on the rude litter they had hastily improvised of boughs and shelter-tent canvas that I concluded he had better go all the way back in that manner, after having his wound dressed. Upon asking the men whether they were equal to the task, the reply from one of them was, "If the captain thinks the lieutenant can stand it, we'll get him there all right." Never a thought about themselves; and yet they were all of them ready to drop from exhaustion right there in their tracks. This is the kind of stuff our men were made of, and their grim determination to win and surmount all obstacles has never been equalled in history. Many of the volunteers who had brought wounded comrades back, seeing a heap of Krag-Jörgensen rifles, originally belonging to wounded regulars, begged me to let them exchange their Springfields for them. Upon telling them that I had no authority to dispose of the guns, and was entirely too busy to watch them, it was not long before every one had disappeared and Springfields were lying there instead. The others had all gone to the front again.

At one time in the afternoon there was quite a commotion at one end of the long line of wounded, a restlessness on their part that was quite noticeable. Asking one of them if anything was wrong, he said, "I don't know whether my wound has made me flighty or not, but I'm pretty sure I just saw a big snake crawl around the roots of that tree there." It really proved to be the case. I soon impaled it with a sword that had been abandoned there earlier in the day. It was quite a large snake, about six feet long, and formidable-looking, but perfectly harmless. I don't wonder the men were restless, not knowing its nature, yet unable to move out of harm's way. At different times large hideous land-crabs would rustle out of the brush into the open, stop for a few moments and stare around, then scamper off sidewise into cover again. These creatures would come and go so suddenly that it seemed almost a nightmare. To make the surroundings more dismal and oppressive, great numbers of buzzards kept circling about overhead. Such happenings were sufficient to try the nerves even of the well and sound, yet never a murmur was heard anywhere along the line of the wounded. They all seemed resigned to their fate.

Some of the slightest wounds were the most fearful to look upon. During the early morning a gallant captain of cavalry was brought in by four men of his troop, perfectly limp, and evidently unconscious, or nearly so, with blood pouring down his face in perfect streams. At first glance it appeared to be all over with him. After examination it proved to be merely a glancing wound of the scalp, about two inches long.

CAPTAIN GEORGE J. NEWGARDEN, U.S.A.,
Regimental Surgeon 3d U. S. Cavalry, who established the Dressing-Station at "Bloody Ford," Santiago.

After washing the mask of blood from his face, I recognized Captain Dodd of the very regiment I was on duty with. It was a very close call indeed. After dressing his wound and seating him under the bank, I had occasion to notice him several times. He was conscious, but quite dazed by the shock, and it was painful to see him from time to time try to get upon his feet in order to rejoin his troop, only to find he could not even stand steadily, then drop down again, with a look of thorough disgust with himself for his ill luck. As I told him later, he was a fortunate man not to be killed outright.

Men coming up from the rear would stop long enough to fill their canteens in the creek, and a number who were fortunate enough to possess smoking-tobacco voluntarily left it at the station for the comfort of the smokers among the wounded. Others left their pipes, perhaps their most valued possessions, and gave them up cheerfully. Very thoughtful were these acts indeed, and much appreciated by all. We were lucky enough to secure an abandoned camp-kettle and some coffee and sugar that had been left behind, and soon had good strong coffee boiling for the wounded and exhausted.

One wounded Cuban, an officer—who, by-the-way, was the only wounded one I saw—was carried in by four insurgents, and while I dressed his wound his four bearers were put to work building a shelter out of boughs and palm leaves, which they know so well how to construct, to protect the badly wounded from the sun and rain. Over this we placed shelter-tent canvas. This shady little spot was very soothing to them, for the heat was almost unbearable. Great numbers, after having their wounds dressed here, being able to walk, continued toward the hospital on foot. Later in the day the ambulances reached us, and we managed to keep them, as well as the wagons, full all the time. After dark, when the firing ceased for the day and no more men were being hit, was the first time that there was any empty space whatever in the station. Several who were mortally hit and could not be moved were made as comfortable as possible right where they were for the few short hours still remaining to them. On the 2d the firing recommenced, but the casualties were not so many, and our capacity was not strained. It was then we began to feel the fatigue resultant upon such a hard day's labor. We needed no rocking to sleep that night, though all we had was the wet ground and a rubber poncho. Hardly had we closed our eyes, however, when heavy firing began again. We were in a quandary, and could not imagine the meaning of it. It was not until daylight that we were enlightened, when we heard that the enemy had attempted a surprise by night, but met with heavy disaster. There was more firing on the morning of the 3d, but as our men were by that time in fairly good shelter on the firing-line, the casualties were very few, and we managed that day to clear the station completely. There were constant rumors of the fight starting again at any moment for the next two days, but on the 5th I received orders to rejoin my regiment, after abandoning the "Bloody Ford" station for good, and Dr. McCaw and myself, who were now alone with our few men, packed our traps and supplies, and were nothing loath to move on and up to the safe protection of the San Juan hills, where our regiments were encamped. Bloody Ford station had outlived its usefulness, and was henceforth a thing of the past. The waters of the creek glide on as smoothly as before the conflict, and—so peaceful look the surroundings—it is almost impossible to believe that such terrible scenes could have occurred there during those few short but eventful days.

George J. Newgarden.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE case of "The Head of the Family," which Mr. Clyde Fitch and Mr. Leo Ditrichstein have "freely adapted from the German of L'Arronge," may be conveniently summed up in the case of the wig in which Mr. Crane plays the part of the Head. It is what a Tenth Avenue Mick would call a brick-top, and it is combed back from the forehead so sleekly that the path of every tooth of the comb is plain to be seen. In short, it is the wig of a German professor, and it is about as characteristic of the Columbia professor Mr. Crane impersonates as are the traits that go to make up his somewhat farcical character. The professor has a passion for travel, and knows by heart the times and tides of all vehicles of locomotion; but he has never ventured off the island of Manhattan, where he was born. The day of course arrives when he is obliged to make no less a journey than from the Grand Central Station to Utica. He gets up at the crack of dawn to make ready for the afternoon train, packs all his belongings, envelops himself in all the traveller's garments he has ever read about, and arrives at the station before the gate is opened. Overcome by fatigue and the heat of many garments, he falls asleep in the waiting-room, and of course is left. It is all very genial and amusing, but it belongs to the common or garden bourgeois German of farce as surely as the brick-top wig. In a simon-pure American play, such as Mr. Crane pretends to give, it simply won't wash. No doubt Mr. Fitch would argue that Columbia professors are all more or less freely adapted from the German. And as for expecting the brick-top of a German professor to wash— But we need not pursue the subject.

The Wig of the Head.

To the main idea of "The Head of the Family," however, the wig and the time-table are incidental; at bottom the professor and his family are American enough. The local color in the play is in strong contrast to that in Mr. Crane's previous venture at the Knickerbocker. In "Worth a Million" Mr. Presbrey showed us some such matter as the roof garden of the Astoria as seen from the shores of Hoboken. Mr. Fitch has taken us to the West Side of New York, where one may perhaps find more concentrated Americanism than in any other similar area, and has suggested certain social conditions with great subtlety and intimacy. His good professor, like so many fathers in this new and distracted life we lead, has had little or nothing to say about the bringing up of his children; and his wife, who, like so many newly rich American mothers, has become the head of the family, is more bent on the vanities of life than on its realities. She allows her youngest daughter's affections to be rather openly and shamelessly trifled with by a young man whose only recommendation is social smartness; and, piqued at her failure, she lets her humiliated daughter be persuaded to marry a worthy friend of the father's. Though the daughter does not at first love her husband, she soon learns to do so; but presently the old lover turns up, and her husband, convinced that he has been wronged, threatens such trouble that before things can be straightened out the good professor is obliged to assert himself, for the first time in his life, as the head of the family. The play is a study in the chaotic conditions of American family life. If the working out of this plot were as able as the conception, we should have a really great American play, wig or no wig. There is a good deal of superficial cleverness in the lines and considerable intelligence in the drawing of character, but I did not feel that the authors struck bottom anywhere, except in a passage at the end of the second of the three acts. Here the professor defends his daughter against her husband's false charges in a very stirring fashion, and brings the act to a close in a manner as true as it is dramatic. Though the play is not, as a whole, as well conceived as Mr. Augustus Thomas's "The Meddler," it is as bright in dialogue, and is much better handled technically. It is therefore one of the two noteworthy American plays of the season.

A Social Study of the West Side of New York.

As for the people who stage and act the play, many complimentary adjectives could be sprinkled among them. I find, however, that, with two exceptions, I am able to resist the temptation. Mr. Walter Hale has the part of a somewhat underbred fellow, who talks in his cups, and manages to get into what he says an air of cumulative abandon that appeals to one strongly as true to the nature of whiskey and carbonic. Of Mr. Crane it is to be said that his part is admirably adapted to his manner. If one objects that the Adolph L'Arronge business is not handled with sufficient lubrication, Mr. Fitch would no doubt answer that the lubrication has been omitted also from the wig. For the rest, Mr. Crane is himself at his best, and most theatre-goers, no doubt with justice, prefer to have Mr. Crane at his best rather than anybody else they are not so well acquainted with—a sure-enough Columbia professor, for instance. And he is all very American—dry, shrewd, grotesque, amiably henpecked, for the most part, and wholesomely assertive when he has to be.

Miss Ada Rehan's impersonation of Portia has improved in repetition. The personal quality of her interpretation, I must say—though I scarcely hope to be pardoned for saying it—still does not seem to me particularly happy. The characters that in the past have marked the limits of her powers, Peggy Thrift and Katherine, different as they are in effect, have this in common, that they do not stand for any rare type of womanhood; and in "The Merchant" there are moments in which one regrets a certain lightness of comic effect. One misses, let us say, Miss Ellen Terry and the sweet personal dignity with which everything she does is imbued. It is all the more a triumph of histrionic power, however, that Miss Rehan rises above her personal equation as she does; and in these days when we have so much of mere personality on the stage, and so little intelligent art, the fact is especially to be commended. Almost any scene might serve as an example, and a few passages are especially to be noted. In the scene where Bassanio apostrophizes the caskets of gold, silver, and lead, Miss Rehan follows every change of thought with an unspeaking sympathy that runs the range of dramatic expression. Fear, suspense, hope, amusement, mirth, and finally the joy and triumph of love, are all shown with unmistakable power and with a transparency of impulse that is essentially Shaksperean. Then Bassanio chooses, and turns to her:

Again Miss Rehan as Portia.

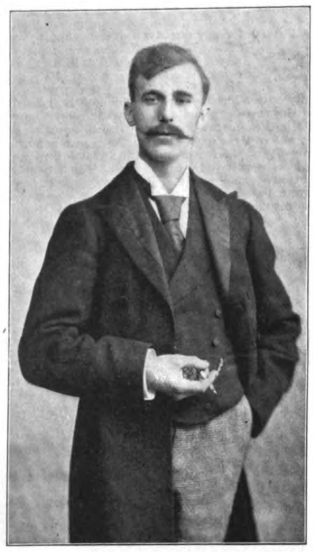
"And here choose I, joy be the consequence." In the instant, with an effect at once comic and fine, Portia controls herself and answers with a dignity and modulation of feeling no less essentially Shaksperean than her previous impulses,

"How all the other passions fleet to air. . . .

"O love, be moderate, allay thy ecstasy." Such elaborations of scene, so minute in calculation, and yet so spontaneous in seeming, can only be the result of long and scholarly study, of patient training in expression. They give the play a variety of light and shade and a dramatic intensity that belong to the highest impersonative art. In the end, whatever personal disqualification may have been felt is forgotten. Every line teems with the dramatic suggestion and effects that belong to it. As a result, one comes face to face with as much or more that is truly Shaksperean than in the case of a less accomplished actress, however sympathetic her personal medium.

In the trial scene the effect of Miss Rehan's expression reaches its culmination. Many actresses, and among them the best, have been accustomed to enter the court-room with an air of conscious power, like a Daniel come to judgment, or like that painted Saint Michael, attributed perhaps wrongfully to Raphael, who slays the mediæval dragon of evil without ruffling a plume. This interpretation is simple, and is not without a sympathetic quality. Miss Rehan's conception is quite different. It has been said of her that she expresses doubt of the outcome of the suit, and anxiety for her friends. To my mind this statement is not exact, and I do not think the lines admit of such an interpretation. What she expresses is an effect of imagination—an awed sense of the magnitude of the issue, a womanly sympathy for Antonio's suffering, and a no less womanly horror of Shylock. This feeling subtly pervades every line. At the sudden sight of the knife, with which the Jew points to the wording of the bond she is holding, it rises to an acute agony of feminine dread, the effect of which is instantly transmitted to the audience. Such emotions are perfectly reconcilable with Portia's intellectual self-command and with her certainty of the final outcome. They give the scene an intensity of emotion more dramatic than any previous actress, to my knowledge, has given it. Because of this intelligence in conceiving dramatic effects and in expressing them, Miss Rehan's Portia not only marks the highest point yet attained in the development of her powers, but is absolutely the most original and interesting interpretation of the part of recent years.



A new reading of the Trial Scene.

Mr. Herbert's Shylock still lacks force, both of imagination and of magnetism. It fails to express the primal malignity that seemed to prompt every thought of Booth's Shylock, and the lust of blood that filled every vein. Yet his excess in acting, due doubtless to a young

ADA REHAN AS PORTIA IN THE TRIAL SCENE OF "THE MERCHANT OF VENICE," Now playing at Daly's Theatre, New York.
Photograph by Zaida Ben-Yusuf.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

WILLY BURMESTER, Violinist.

actor's pardonable nervousness, has been subdued, and as an inevitable result he has gained in force. One is permitted to fix his attention on Shylock's face; and the play of emotion there gives a just and an adequate impression of the part. Mr. Herbert shows the same careful and intelligent training that has made Miss Rehan. Few managers could be as little desirous of praise as Mr. Daly, but we owe it to ourselves to recognize the hand that has given us these and so many others of the actors that have enriched the American stage. JOHN CORBIN.

Mr. Herbert and Mr. Daly.

LONDON.

THERE has been, during the past few days, a considerable amount of energy spent in the denial of reports, said to have been confined to your side of the Atlantic, as to the unsuccess of "The Musketeers"—those of Mr. Beerbohm Tree. The truth of the matter is that "The Musketeers," although a possible artistic mistake, is, for the time being, an equally undoubted box-office success. This is due to no virtue that there may be in "The Musketeers" as a play. "The Musketeers" never was nor ever will be a play. The best criticism of it as yet offered is that "one leaves it with a sense of something wanting. What that something is, maybe one cannot tell. Perhaps it is the harlequinade." There are two causes for this succès d'ennui, as Mr. William Archer would call it. It is, chiefly, a tribute to the power of the previous paragraph (a power wielded with particular vehemence on this occasion) and to the stimulus afforded by the far better, if humbler, rival musketeer-melodrama at the Globe Theatre. It is, or rather was, also a tribute to the beauty of Mrs. Brown Potter. "The Musketeers" could depend for a considerable run on the presentation of Mrs. Brown Potter against so gorgeous a background, and in a part so completely suited to her serene lack of nature, her old-world dignity, and her agreeable glance. Strangely enough, perhaps on that very account, some jest of fortune has ordained that Mrs. Brown Potter should contract a chill, and that Mrs. Tree should take her place. Nobody could, of course, be less fitted for such a part than Mrs. Tree. Mrs. Tree can portray very admirably, in many fashions, the pathos of pained womanhood, but for a broad, daring, flamboyant effect, such as Miladi must achieve, her very talents unfit her. Her Miladi is a mere "artful hussy," a sort of court edition of Becky Sharp. Miss L. ƒ Hanbury, who has taken Mrs. Tree's part of the Queen with an astonishing amount of command, even she, over-honeyed as her art is, would have been the better choice.

"Topsy-Turvy Hotel," for all it appears to have charmed New York, has quite failed to make its attractions felt in the circle of musical comedies now shouting one another down in London, and has been withdrawn from the Comedy Theatre. After all, with so many in the ring, a musical comedy, to be a success, needs now a far more substantial endowment of melody and personality than "Topsy-Turvy Hotel" possessed. It boasted Mr. John Le Hay (an amusing decorative comedian, but no central figure for a piece); one thoroughly spirited song, "The Boulevard de Paris"; an excellent and delicately gifted drawing-room singer, Mr. Maurice Farkoa; and one lady with a fresh charm, Miss Florence Collinghume. This was all very well, but it was not enough; that is all one can say. Another lesson taught by the comparative failure of this piece was the ill effect of noise and fury when they signify nothing. In "Topsy-Turvy Hotel," whenever the fun flagged, they shouted. And that sent people away with a headache.

The only new production of any importance during this week has been that of "Two Little Maids from School," at the pioneer suburban theatre in Camberwell. This is an adaptation by Mr. Robert Buchanan and "Charles Marlowe" (Miss Harriet Jay) of that bright comedy by Dumas père, "Les Demoiselles de St.-Cyr." The piece was a local success, but does not much honor Mr. Buchanan and profanes Dumas. Where the adapters have not slavishly translated the French they have vulgarized it. Miss Annie Hughes, the original "Sweet Nancy," played very prettily in the chief part. Mr. Buchanan made a speech after the first performance, regretting that there was no telegraph office in Elysium, and that so he could not communicate the news of the play's success to Alexander the Great.

There seems increasing prospect of London reversing the verdict of some American cities regarding "The Adventure of Lady Ursula." Mr. Anthony Hope's neat jewel of all too few facts. The third act tells to perfection as played here. Perhaps it may be that Miss Evelyn Millard's charm and discretion have gradually conjured us into self-deception. The other play by Anthony Hope, "When a Man's in Love," in which Mr. Edward Rose assisted him, has proved, at the Court Theatre, an immediate failure. It was very brilliant and quite insincere. ARNOLD WHITE.

"The first century of the Christian era was a period of great musical activity; it witnessed the transplanting of the highest accomplishments of the Neo-Hellenic art to Rome. From all the nooks and crannies of European and Asiatic Greece the virtuosi, cheered by the certainty of success and profit, hastened to a city whose whole occupation seemed to be pleasure and festivities."—GEVAERT.

Is there not something strikingly contemporary in that picture of music in the Neronian Rome? Can we not fit every detail, save for changed proper names, to our own city and hour? Once or twice in the course of a season the kind of concert or of operatic representation which we hear so surpasses any of routine complexion that we realize it as a fragment of musical history wider than that of any pent-up Utica. Twice, or mayhap thrice, in a lifetime, a whole succession of months may possess the same vitality. New York is fast making such a chapter of musical history at this moment. For many years to come those "placid souls unstirred by envy's whip," those who know us best and love our professional garrulity most, are likely to be plagued and bored by our endless comparisons and our limitless vauntings of the golden glories of opera and concert—in nearly even balance—radiating during 1898–9. Moreover, the newest generation of critics, striplings whom we sometimes rebuke and oftener smile at, because of that happy-go-lucky way in which they have clapped on their hats and walked so jauntily into criticism—these confident professional recruits can no longer get quite the settings-down from us that they have had, and now and then need. To go through such a winter's music intelligently is to be armed with supreme comparisons as with mail. Let us change Steele's charming declaration and say that to hear well and to think well this winter should be "a check to loose criticism," and to love such a term is "a liberal education." Horace Walpole cynically cries out, "Anything but history; for history must be false." Much musical history is false enthusiasm. We cannot exaggerate enthusiasm for the best contents of the current weeks.

A Season to be Historic.

There are three great Wagnerian bores. I do not mean those auditors of private station or of journalistic extravagance who have injured Wagner's nobility and beauty as a musician and a poet by telling us that Mozart and Rossini and Verdi are dust and ashes just because "Lohengrin" or "Parsifal" is so marvellously beautiful. There are not merely three, there are three thousand such citizens. No, I refer to a trio of worthies of Wagner's own creation and exploiting—Wotan the War-Father, Fafner the Dragon, and King Mark, who has quite another label. They are all solemn bores, in spite of the fact that Wotan's utterances when in the "Rheingold" and as the Wanderer in "Siegfried" are richly scored, and admitting that Fafner when alive and kicking amuses for five minutes—though he is insupportable in his dying. As for King Mark, that abused spouse preaches and maunders away on friendship for half an hour, and asks deep questions at four o'clock in the morning, amid sullen orchestration, till we wonder at nothing in Isolde's ill-considered behavior. I strongly incline to add to this dismal trio Erda and her music! Now this winter Mr. Grau purposes to give to all the faithful their Wagner without cuts. It is an injudicious practice, deprecated by Wagner himself, proved a mistake except in Baireuth conditions. Much good may it do those who do not care for bed when is in question a chance to hear one or two really strong episodes of the Ring, and some of the least enjoyable. In particular, the rich flow of Wotan's reminiscences is to be wholly unstayed, even if the clock hath stricken three. Now on Wednesday night of last week "Die Walküre" was presented, under conditions to enhance that loveliest drama of the Ring when the Cyclus comes. The production was one to remember. Mr. Schalk, the new conductor, proved himself a trustworthy and authoritative Wagnerian leader—one who should be able to save the effect of Mr. Grau's Wagner season from the alla mancina ways of Mancinelli. The Siegmund of Andreas Dippel showed how a pleasing German tenor can develop into a "heroic" one in his voice and art. Madame Nordica sang Brünnhilde with a breadth of feeling for the dramatic stature of the rôle that she did not exhibit two years ago. Madame Eames was so lovely "Die Walküre" and Anton Van Rooy as Wotan.

W. H. CRANE IN "THE HEAD OF THE FAMILY,"
Now playing at the Knickerbocker Theatre, New York.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google long cut in the opening of the Beethoven Violin Concerto; who introduces a lesser one in Beethoven's "Ah, Perfido" air; who consummates a real editorial condensation of Schubert's C major symphony; and who (last but not least) judiciously compresses to limits of truer art Wagner's tiresome trick of saying great things over and over. We need not regulate music by a stop-watch. A symphony concert is not to be given as one boils eggs. But much great music is like the beard of Polonius.

Interesting Incidents Abroad.

The musical winter abroad is one of somewhat more than normal brilliancy of incident. In Italy have been produced within a few weeks several new operas by Italy's bright young men of distinction, including the "Stella" of Camillo de Nardis and the "Fedora" of Giordano (composer of "Andrea Chenier"), each having its première at Milan, as also the "Arlesiana" of Cilea. At Rome has been sung Mascagni's "Iris," so long promised. The last seems to be the least excellent. In Paris there has been no new operatic or concert work to mark the new season, though important novelties and valuable revivals are in preparing. The great incident, however, is the opening of the new Théâtre de l'Opéra Comique, at last, with "La Dame Blanche" as a suitable choice from the repertory, and a most august audience.

The Paris Opera Comique proves in its rich completeness quite as elegant a structure as could be wished. It has cost a pretty penny, and in erection it has dragged interminably. It ought to be good. But when I saw its interior, by special permission, last year, I was struck by its promise of overdecoration, its cramped auditorium and fatiguing seats, its dubious chance of possessing a properly lighted stage (that rarest boon in France, where few stages have any decent system of illumination), and its Parisian fussery. The placing of the building, to begin with, is undignified and huddled. Of course it is a handsome theatre, and M. Carré will give it a fine musical policy. But what a pity that it is not more perfect! It is curious that the old Opéra Comique ended existence in a hideous tragedy of fire, and the new one's ghostly façade looked down on a political riot on the first night, when a Dreyfus-Picquart mob attacked their rulers and threw mud at the new municipal edifice.

E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

A MERRY CHRISTMAS TO ALL.

A MERRY Christmas, Dewey! Here's looking at you, man.
You've shown yourself a hero on the good old-fashioned plan.
May Santa Claus find time, sir, to take his pack and go
Out there, and smiling crown you with a wreath of mistletoe.

A Merry Christmas, Sampson! You are another chap
That stands before his people with a feather in his cap;
And Santa won't forget you; he has written down your name,
And soon will fill your stocking with an everlasting fame.

A Merry Christmas, Teddy! you and all your Riders Rough;
You seem to be the steady and the proper sort of stuff.
Keep on your roughish riding, do not let your spirits sag,
And Santa Claus will see that you're provided with a nag.

A Merry Christmas, you-uns that stood behind the guns!
The world is full of grateful love for him who never runs.
A merry Christmas to you too, ye chaps with hearts of gold,
Who never flagged an instant while stoking in the hold!

God bless you all, ye heroes, on the land or on the sea.
Your people's hearts are with you wherever you may be,
And in this time of peace on earth, ye fellows tried and true,
The happiest kind of Christmas every one is wishing you.

JOHN KENDRICK BANGS.

JEANNE D'ARC.

IN advance of the actual canonization of Jeanne d'Arc as a saint of the Roman calendar, the feeling that a secular festival and holiday should be accorded the memory of France's greatest heroine gains ground everywhere. A law came before the Senate to decree May 8 as the formal annual anniversary. It has been decided, however, that there will be no celebrations till the May of 1899 or 1900, in order that the first occurrence may "find the country less disturbed by elections, citizens forgetful of small differences, and a suitably imposing programme adjusted." The burning of Jeanne occurred in 1431.

To-day, after nearly five centuries of neglect and obscurity, few figures of past French history and glory are growing more definite in the minds of the rising generation. The statues to Jeanne are going up by the dozens, all over France. The mere item of pilgrimages to the peaceful little hamlet of Domrémy (not a specially accessible place even from such relatively near centres as Nancy, Troyes, or Langres — all on the western France railway circuit) is significant of the devotion of the people to the mystic Pucelle.

THE WEST INDIES.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

WEST-INDIAN FRUIT AND BRITISH MARKETS.

WHY should not England enjoy West-Indian fruit? Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and Tasmania have already successfully commenced to ruin English orchards by cheapening the fruit of temperate climates, and as yet we are only in "the days of small things." Blackmore, the novelist, has been growing fruit in England for market for some twenty years, but not long ago he presented the result of his lengthened experiments, and the conclusion of it all was that he had lost money by his fruit, but had gained a great deal of instructive amusement out of the cultivation. The colonial fruit-producer does not care much about instructive amusement as interest on his capital, and so he sends to "the old country" the harvests of his orchards, selected with the utmost judgment, picked with the greatest care, and packed with the utmost skill, and receives as his reward high prices for them in sordid pounds, shillings, and pence. "Colonel" North, the once notorious "Nitrate King," gave at his country place, in one of the great fruit-producing counties of England, a luncheon to some acquaintances with whom he wished to stand well, and was much surprised to find himself ridiculed afterwards for having at luncheon given his guests a dessert collected from Canada and the Antipodes, and after the meal, taking them for a stroll round his own fruit-gardens and hot-houses, to show them to what perfection the same dessert can be grown in England. But, after all, it is for the middle class and the lower in Great Britain that the cheap-fruit question is of greatest importance, and the colonies have long ago been assured that they cannot send home too much. Meanwhile, the British

(Continued on page 1276.)

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

SANITARY PRECAUTIONS.

THE inspectors of the factories where the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is produced have access at all times to the dairymen's premises, with authority to exact every sanitary precaution. Such care results in a perfect infant food.—[Adv.]

"A CLEVER CHOICE."

FROM the fashionable Game of Questions: "Which is your preferred perfume? Acknowledge your preference." The lovely Miss Maud reflected an instant, and suddenly her large blue eyes brightened, her slender white hand traced without hesitation on the page: "First, it is the Funkia du Japon, flower of dreams and poetry; second, because it furnishes to ORIZA-LEGRAND a most subtle and penetrating perfume, to which he has left the attractive name of the flower," and the practical little miss looked altogether satisfied at her reply.—[Adv.]

GOOD alike for old and young; good alike for all seasons—ABBOTT'S—the Original Angostura Bitters. —[Adv.]

No Christmas Table is complete without Dr. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS, the finest appetizer. —[Adv.]

USE BROWN'S Camphorated Saponaceous DENTIFRICE for the TEETH. 25 cents a jar.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

For Xmas Presents

Large Assortment of Fancy Boxes and Baskets.
By mail or express.
863 Broadway, New York.

SEND 1, 2, 3, or 5 Dollars and Candies will be packed and shipped any desired date.

Arnold Constable & Co.

Oriental Rugs.

Exclusive designs in rich and soft Colorings for Drawing Rooms, Reception and Dining Rooms, Libraries, Halls, etc.

Carpets.

Axminster, Wilton and Brussels Carpets of the finest qualities manufactured.

Broadway & 19th st.
NEW YORK.

B. Altman & Co.

NEW YORK

Bronzes, Marbles, Limoges Enamels, Dutch Silver, Carved Ivories, Cut Glass, Clock and Mantel Sets, and Art Furniture.

Representing the latest productions from Paris, Vienna, and Florence.

Doulton, Royal Worcester and Minton Ware at reduced prices.

Appropriate for Holiday Gifts.

PIANOS

Recent improvements in the construction of our upright and grand pianos render them absolutely unequalled. Send for new descriptive catalogue with prices and terms.

ORGANS

For fifty years the Standard of the World. New styles of parlor and church organs just introduced. Also large assortment of slightly used pianos and organs.
SOLD ON INSTALMENTS. Rented and Exchanged.

Mason & Hamlin Co.

146 BOYLSTON ST., BOSTON.
8 AND 5 WEST 18th STREET, NEW YORK.

BOKER'S BITTERS

The oldest and best Specific against dyspepsia; an appetizer and a promoter of digestion.
Ask your Grocer, Liquor Dealer, or Druggist.

THE CELEBRATED

PIANOS Are the favorite of the Artist.

SOHMER

PIANOS and the refined musical public

New York Warerooms, SOHMER BUILDING, 170 5th Ave. Cor. 22d Street.

CAUTION— The buying public will please not confound the genuine Piano with one of a similar sounding name of a cheap grade. S-O-H-M-E-R

THE "SOHMER" HEADS THE LIST OF THE HIGHEST GRADE PIANOS

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

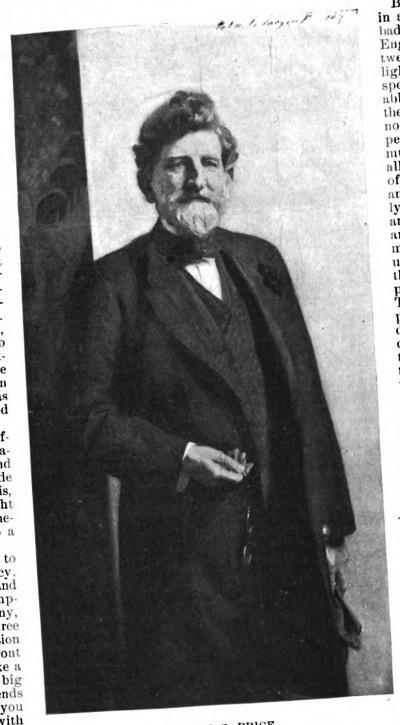
(Continued from page 1275.)

public has been acquiring a taste not only for its own familiar fruits out of season, but for exotic products.

The first notable conquest was made by the tomato. I quite remember the time when tomatoes were a luxury. But within the last few years London has been so abundantly supplied with them that they sell for a penny a pound, or, if you buy a case of a few dozen, for less. They are grown on the Continent, and reach England most symmetrically packed, all of a size, in tissue-paper, but of a pallid, unwholesome color (without a touch of the true bright tomato scarlet), that is due, I am told, to their being ripened in their boxes by artificial means, and with scarcely any tomato flavor. But the artisan class took to them wonderfully; and not only may men be seen standing eating them by the side of the vendors' stalls, but trucks laden with boxes of tomatoes ply regularly in the cheapest streets.

The next alteration in the street fruit trade was the appearance of the banana, or plantain, from the Canary Islands. Messrs. Elder, Dempster, & Co., the firm that controls this trade, is of opinion, so I see from the papers, that in England only the better classes have as yet to be educated up to the banana; but I know that at one point, at any rate, in London—round the Liverpool railway station—the banana-truck is very much in evidence, and the purchasers are certainly not of "the upper classes." The fruit is small and poor in flavor, and (perhaps because he never sees them fresh) the artisan has come to suppose that bananas should be eaten over-ripe. The coster-monger himself seems to be of the same opinion, for he ostentatiously peels portions of selected fruit to prove to intending purchasers that his wares are honestly half rotten. But there need be no doubt about the fruit being popular, and, as with the tomato, the country cannot have too many of them fresh; and the more the banana trade expands, the better for the working-classes. When they once become familiar with this excellently wholesome fruit in a proper eatable condition, it will, I predict, be just as great a favorite in Great Britain as it is in the United States.

After the banana came the pineapple, and, at a half-penny a slice, it is in many parts of London a formidable rival of ice-cream in the fancies of office-boys and juvenile workers in general. But I do not think the trade is worth any serious attempt to popularize it. As it is, pineapples are sufficiently cheap. I have often bought one for a shilling quite good enough for making pine-apple ices, for flavoring cups, or adding a grace to a macedoine.*



But, after all, such occasional uses will hardly suffice to make that fruit a "popular" one. That phrase, I fancy, must be reserved for the present for bananas, oranges, and cocoanuts. Oh, 'Arry, spending your 'oliday on 'Ampstead 'Eath, think of an island where you get for a penny, not "three shies" with a stick at a cocoanut, but three cocoanuts! What an eternity of Aunt Sally the vision opens up to your cockney mind! This morning, in front of my window, a black urchin ran up a palm-tree like a spider-monkey and threw down half a dozen nuts to his big friend below, who with his machete chopped off the ends and bored holes almost as quickly as a barman opens you an oyster, and there the two blackamoors stood, with their faces flat up to the sky, guzzling the sweet milk. When each had emptied a couple they drew their hands across their mouths, picked up another nut apiece, and strolled away. Stealing them? I suppose so. But what kind of theft is it when everybody sees you stealing and nobody seems to mind? It was only cocoanuts, after all. There were ten millions exported from Jamaica alone last year, and if there had been ships to carry them, there might have been fifty millions. The bulk of them, as indeed of all West Indian fruit, went to the United States, but there are indications that the coming changes in what were "the Spanish West Indies" are already beginning to affect the course of trade, and the West Indian fruit-grower, apprehensive of the approaching danger, seems to be turning in anxiety from the markets of America to those of England. The next few months will see trial shipments from several of the islands, and probably before the New-Year arrangements will have been made for commencing in 1902 or 1903 a regular fruit trade with "the mother-country." Naturally enough, the British West Indies are looking forward with great concern to the day when Cuba and Puerto Rico may shut them off from the American consumers, who hitherto have been their best customers. But whether the new trade that is to be opened up with England is to be in British or American hands is still a question to be decided. In some quarters it is taken for granted that the enterprise will be exclusively British, or indirectly encouraged, if not actually subsidized, at first, by the British government. But this I venture to think is a gratuitous assumption. The allied American fruit companies and other American West Indian syndicates are not at all likely to allow a vast trade to develop under their eyes without sharing in it. Nor is Captain Baker, for example, the kind of man to let the Jamaican fruit trade pass out of his hands simply because, in the natural course of events, the market is shifted from the United States to England. Indeed, I shall be very much surprised if the West Indies, Jamaica especially, do not in the future find that, as in the past, their best friends are Americans. That England should advantage by the products of her colonies in having a constant, abundant, and cheap fruit-supply is what no one can grudge her, but, all the same, it looks to me as if the control of the trade that is to be will remain in the hands that control the trade that now is.

PHIL ROBINSON.

* And here just a word as to a macedoine. Never mind what cookery books tell you. All their mixtures are abominations. Do this, and if your disposition is naturally grateful, thank me. Take a pine-apple and a basket of strawberries; cut the former into dice, the latter into halves, and put them with a couple of glasses of noyau into the ice-chest for half an hour. Take out the dish, sift sugar over it, pour half a pint of whipped cream upon it, and eat it.

CALVIN S. BRICE.

THE sudden death in New York, on December 14, of Calvin Stewart Brice, brought to an end the life of a typically successful American—a life distinctive in ambition and achievement. The son of the poor clergyman of an Ohio village, Mr. Brice earned his education at Miami University, fought through our civil war, and at its close commenced the practice of law in Lima. He became at once identified, first as legal adviser and afterwards as financial director, with many growing railroad properties, notably the old Lake Erie and Louisville road, and his executive skill in the manipulation of such interests made him a striking and important figure in the world of finance. The field of his commercial operations extended far beyond the boundaries of the United States, and he

CALVIN S. BRICE.
Born, September 17, 1845. Died, December 14, 1898.
From the Painting by John S. Sargent.

leaves behind him a fortune estimated in the millions, representing the reward of resistless energy and wonderfully sagacious alertness.

In politics Mr. Brice was a Democrat of national prominence. He served for a time as chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and in 1891 was elected to the United States Senate from his native State.

In 1870 he married Miss Catherine Olivia Meily, who survives him, as do also five children, the eldest of whom, Stewart Meily Brice, served as a captain in the Spanish war, and is at present a member of the municipal council of this city.

A CHRISTMAS SNOWFLAKE.

THE snowflake is the ghost of summer's bee—
It drifts unto Her cheek and there reposes
And sighs with joy: "The winter's May to me
When winter boasts such dainty Christmas roses."

R. K. MUNKITTRICK.

MANILA.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

THE CLIMATE AND THE PEOPLE.

THOSE of us who have spent weeks in the swamps and bamboo thickets, and, since the capitulation, have been confined to the limits of the military occupation, have about as much idea of the country, of the people, and of the general condition of life in these islands as an immigrant has of the State of New York when, after a sojourn on Ellis Island, he lands in the great metropolis, and finds language, dress, architecture, habits of life, entirely different from what he is accustomed to. With the exception of a single work on these islands, there has been no recent publication, either in book form or in newspaper or magazine articles, which gives the reader an adequate idea of the subject. The unanimous testimony of the authors whose descriptions were so scarefully studied by every one during the long voyage across the Pacific is against the climate. Their writings are full of accounts of the discomforts of life here, of the noxious reptiles and insects, and of the dangers of fever and other illnesses. One must believe, after reading half a score of articles, that the Philippines are a region to be avoided, that the traveller takes his life in his hands when he lands on these shores. The literature on the Micronesia is absolutely misleading, with the exception of the book above referred to, written by John Foreman; and the experience of thousands of Americans who have landed here this year, most of them living under conditions little calculated to endear one to the place, will undoubtedly show that a false impression has been given of the Philippines, which it will take some time to correct.

First as to the climate. The temperature from July to September did not vary more than 10°, day or night. My own thermometer registered once or twice as high as 88°, but never lower than 78°, except possibly in camp during one of the severe rain-storms at night, when I was unable to see the mercury. For two or three weeks before the assault the weather was indescribably bad, with frequent violent rain-storms and a long and heavy monsoon.

But it must be remembered that we were under canvas, in a swampy tract of land, and suffered more from the bad weather than we would have done elsewhere. The Englishmen in business, many of whom have spent from twenty to thirty years here, agree that it is the most delightful climate imaginable; that there is an endurable hot spell in the spring, but that the rest of the year is agreeable, particularly during the autumn and winter, when the average temperature is a few degrees lower than it is now, and the air seems more invigorating. As for the pests of insect life and the noxious reptiles we heard so much about, I have been away up country, have slept in all sorts of places, and have mingled with various classes of people, but have never suffered any inconvenience more annoying than that of mosquitoes, which are not particularly active or aggressive. The natives are exceedingly clean, and their huts are generally marvels of neatness. They are intelligent, bright, ready to learn, quick to acquire mechanical skill, and capable of intellectual development up to a certain point. The standard of education among them is, I am assured, very high, no less than eighty-six per cent. of the people knowing how to read and write. This figure seems exaggerated, but in my brief but comparatively varied experience here I have not yet had dealings with any native who could not write. They are diligent, frugal, and apparently contented; the women are treated with great consideration; they take great care of their children, and have a certain dignity and self-respect, particularly observable in the provinces, which are rather impressive. Exceedingly hospitable by instinct and tradition, it is a delight to travel among them, and if they are treated with justice I am convinced they are loyal and reliable servants. It is not difficult to see, however, that their amiable manners cover a disposition capable of any treachery or cruelty, and that if you scratch a native you will find a pure Malay. The revolutionists and all their leaders are from the lower classes of the population, not one among the active chiefs of the insurrection being of that stratum of Philippine society which calls itself, and with reason, cultivated. There are two or three hundred men prominent in business and in the professions who have received university educations, and who have travelled and know the world. Not one of these men has given any important aid to the revolution, although they all sympathize with the cause, which has for its chief purpose freedom from Spanish misrule. Now that it is comparatively certain that Spain will no longer have a foothold here, these men are coming fast to the front, and declare, as openly as they dare, that they are in favor of an American protectorate, because they are positive their people are incapable of self-government. The mass of the insurgents are bent on having the revolutionary government recognized, and this burning question will continue to agitate the country until the decision of the Paris Commission.

It is seldom that a landscape so beautiful to the eye suggests in such a stimulating degree possibilities of development, fairly enchanting the commercial and speculative mind. The great fertility of the soil and the extraordinary luxuriousness of the vegetation give the landscape a wealth of varied color which I have never before seen equalled. The general aspect of the country is by no means tropical. If one looks closely enough he will discover among the trees the little brown native huts, and here and there will be seen a feathery bamboo or a broad-leaved plantain; but for many miles around Manila the landscape resembles that of a fine valley somewhere on the continent of Europe, among mountains which do not rise above the line of vegetation.

Immense rice-fields on the broad plain north of the town stretch away to grand mountain ranges on either side like immense wheat-fields in the Northwest. A little further north the sugar-cane is cultivated, and then the cocoanut palm appears. A hundred miles or so north of Manila the country is quite different and much more tropical in appearance, on account of the groves of palm-trees and the great plantations of bananas. Still further north is the wonderful tobacco country, now almost inaccessible from the south on account of the high mountain ranges. The product is brought to Manila by steamers, but if the railway is extended over a low pass into the great tobacco valley in the northeastern province of Cagayan the shipment of this and other produce will be much facilitated. Not far from Manila, only two hours' trip in a steamer launch up the river Pasig, is the large lake, Laguna de Bay—one of the most beautiful sheets of water imaginable. It is surrounded for two-thirds of its extent with high mountains, some of them of the conventional volcanic shape, but other peaks as grand in line as any in the world.

There is a highly fertile region all around, with large and active population, and there are various summer resorts, hot springs, marvellous canyons and waterfalls, and several large country houses on immense estates close to the lake. From the eastern shore of the great sheet of water, which is perhaps twenty miles across in its widest part, it is but a dozen miles or so to the ocean, and from the summit of the ridge which divides the two waters from the salt the great expanse of the Pacific is overlooked, and the bold summits of the coast range mountains vanishing north and south in the distance. Under a proper government these islands would be a most charming region of the tropics. Of the commercial development of the archipelago I need not speak, beyond it has been often discussed. Without any doubt there are great possibilities here, and plenty of openings for investment of capital and the exercise of energy and enterprise. More encouraging opportunities certainly not now exist in the world, for the Spanish system of government has completely isolated this portion of its possessions from the influences which have so transformed the colonies of other nations, and the ground so fallow is ready, even eager, for the seed.

F. D. MILLET

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AMATEUR SPORT

THE FOOTBALL SCHEDULE FOR 1899 will probably not include a Harvard-Princeton game, and it probably will include one between Harvard and Univ. of Penn. It seems to me that, in the light of some of the experiences and revelations of this year, the arrangement for next year is eminently fair. Univ. of Penn. played a sportsmanlike game from first to last, through a season replete with trials of more than usual vexatiousness. The attitude of her coach, her graduate advisers, and her players in the face of a defeat, which she suspected might bear significantly on her future football relationship, was incomparable and manly.

On the other hand, the conduct, during the Yale-Princeton game at Princeton, of some of Princeton's coaches and old players, who swarmed unbidden and forbidden upon the side-lines, jarred most unpleasantly upon the nerves of the assembled sportsmen, among whom many were Harvard men. It is true the offenders were only a few, but they were adequate in numbers and sufficient in misbehavior to create prejudice. The sportsmanship of Princeton's alumni advisers is patent and unquestioned, but some means of controlling over-zealous coaches and hot-headed "old-player" spectators must be devised, not only at football but at baseball games, else Princeton will lose her rank in the estimation of sportsmen.

I have no doubt whatever that had Princeton equalled at Princeton the sportsmanly bearing exhibited by Univ. of Penn. at Cambridge, a Harvard-Princeton game would be on the '99 list of fixtures. All sportsmen, irrespective of university affiliations, will endorse Harvard's reasons for her choice, and commend the healthful spirit of sport for sport's sake which her action suggests. ". . . . if you win or if you lose . . . . be each, pray God, a gentleman."

INTER-COLLEGIATE POLITICIANS are waxing mysterious, and, according to the prophets, the boating season of '99 promises a literal labyrinth of agreements and stipulations and racing. Recently the sporting columns of the daily newspapers have quite bristled with alleged "ultimatums" from Cornell, and threats of all manner of dire happenings in the event of somebody not doing something upon which somebody else insists. The undergraduate correspondents must have their fling—sometimes abetted by heavier-witted though less courageous elders—and no doubt it all lends the interest of controversial excitement to a season largely given over to holiday feeding and mental lassitude.

Sportsmen need not despair. There is at least occasion for encouragement in the confident, not to say prescient, assurance of the politicians that Harvard, Yale, Cornell, Univ. of Penn., and Columbia will probably put crews on the water next year, as usual. Even at this moment, indeed, preparations for the boating season are going forward, with obvious indifference to the mental anguish and unwonted activity the politicians are enduring in the collaboration of ultimatums and schedules pleasing to their friends.

WHILE THE POLITICIANS ARE CHATTERING and scribbling, meantime, let us have a look at the situation from a more disinterested and perhaps less violent view-point. Harvard and Yale will have their eight-oared 'varsity boat-race—that is a surety, and will be always. If her ill-advised and over-enthusiastic friends do not wreck her chances, Harvard and Yale would not be adverse to admitting Cornell to their race. Not that a championship is involved, but a three-cornered race is not too cumbersome to handle nicely, and Cornell is assuredly a worthy boating rival. Probably, however, neither Harvard nor Yale will consent to entering a 'varsity race for which the entries exceed three; what they might do with their Freshman is another matter.

It is also more than likely, I think, and certainly so I hope, that Harvard and Yale will decide to row upon our classic course—the Thames. It would be too bad indeed were the college year deprived of the inspiriting scenes and the happy reunions annually witnessed at New London. It is the only boating event we have approaching the charm of Henley—let us preserve it.

APART FROM SENTIMENT, the Thames is more satisfactory than the Hudson to practise and to race on, despite its single bend, which really amounts to nothing, and the climate of New London and environs is better to train on than that obtaining at Poughkeepsie in June. The Hudson course is undoubtedly better for the spectators, but not for university men or the crews. All the reminiscent and classic university atmosphere is dissolved at Poughkeepsie, as it is at Saratoga, and instead we have simply an important boating event, which attracts special trains and countless hundreds of spectators, that overflow all vantage-points during the race and immediately after melt away—crews, coaches, old oars, college men, and spectators generally—leaving naught of their personality and interests stamped upon the surroundings.

THE DISPOSITION OF CORNELL in the boat-racing of next year depends, in my judgment, to a very considerable extent on her conception of her real interest and purpose, and, in recognition of the existing situation, a conservative expression of her desires. Cornell may elect to row Univ. of Penn. and Columbia at Poughkeepsie, or even at Saratoga, and utter no wish to enter the Harvard-Yale race at New London; or she may put one crew on the Hudson and another on the Thames; or she may take Univ. of Penn. and Columbia over to the Thames, and thus in two three-cornered races give the New London week additional air of inter-collegiate racing.

Cornell will very properly not again attempt two races in the one season with the same crew. In refusing to entertain such an idea all fair-minded men will uphold her. If she looks well into her future position in American boating, she will also not lower her standard of effort and endurance by reducing the 'varsity race from four to three miles. Nor is she likely, as her talkative friends insist she will, to issue demands on Harvard and Yale with relation to five-cornered boat-races, or to make rowing arrangements dependent upon agreements in other sports. The only questions open to discussion are two: first, whether Cornell believes she can, out of her abundant material, maintain two 'varsity crews; second, if not, whether her interests and desires will be best served by entering the one crew against Harvard and Yale, or against Univ. of Penn. and Columbia.

Those are the only questions undecided, and their settlement rests entirely with Cornell.

---

Discussion of All-America eleven, continued from last week.

IT IS PRETTY HARD LINES on Corwin and Dudley and Durston that the combination of desperately hard luck, hurts that healed slowly, and uncertain management should have so completely shut them out of prominence in the season's summary. The football possibilities of these three are as brilliant as those of any half-backs in the country.

The handling of the Yale team this year was entirely in keeping with the semi-professional spirit that brought the men together for a considerable preliminary training season. The continuous work knocked the men to pieces, just as it used to do Univ. of Penn.'s, and the spirit of sport for its own sake fell before the urgent demands of a management that cared so little for the splendid traditions of Yale as to lower the tone of her sport and of her men by paying them board for an extra training season.

The spirit of the preliminary training season is contemptible; it is an attempt to get the better of your opponent by taking unusual practice—by practising in vacation-time for contests that are to come during term-time.

It is not the mode of sportsmen. That Yale fell a victim this year to its blandishments is indication of how far the new régime at New Haven has departed from the old and commendable and sportsmanly traditions of Yale. Let us hope for a return of the old order next year.

OF FULL-BACKS ELIGIBLE to the All-America team, Romeyn and Reid unquestionably excel all the others in the requirements of the position, although there are several good ones West in O'Dea, Caley, and Slaker; and East, great possibilities, I should say, in Outland. Reid is a stronger line-bucker than Romeyn, and it is said he is also a punter of distinct ability; but because of the West-Pointer's unquestioned strength in punting, his occasional scoring on goals, and also his strong running game, I consider him to be the man required.

Neither is there slightest hesitancy in picking Dibblee for the captain of the All-America team and for one of its backs. His quality of play since first he went to Harvard has been always of high class. He is one of the strongest men carrying a ball through a broken field that the game has developed, and, as a captain, ends his football career as one of the most competent and painstaking Harvard ever had. For the other half-back no man, in my judgment, is so fitted to stand alongside Dibblee as McBride. This is my deliberate judgment in the face of a majority probably disagreeing with me. McBride's standard of play is established too firmly to permit of him being overlooked because of a physical hurt that would have laid most men off altogether. And a man who can play, with a ruptured knee ligament, as hard and as well as did McBride is the man I want on my national team when he is fit and well. He has been really incapacitated all season, playing when he should have been on the side-lines, and his work, therefore, was far below his form. A short rest would speedily put him in shape. His great strength on the defensive, his fierce line-bucking, and his punting make him (despite his usual position being at full), next to Dibblee, the strongest half-back in college football.

THERE ARE SEVERAL STRONG HALF-BACKS, and the West puts forth three candidates for honors in Widman and McLean of Michigan, and Henry of Chicago. In the East, those whose work was most noticeable were, besides the men already named, Warren (Harvard), Waldron and Humphreys (West Point), Richardson (Brown), Cayou and Metoxen (Carlisle), Beardsley (Princeton), C. Young (Cornell). Of these Warren is quite the first, with Richardson second, and the West Point pair following; Widman comes next. Outland of Univ. of Penn., whom I should play at half rather than full back, is a stronger and more certain ground-gainer than any of these save Warren, and there is not much to choose between them on that score. On end-running Outland is the most brilliant of the lot. I prefer a more certain man on handling kicks, and therefore choose Warren as substitute back. Reid I should put in the other substitute half-back place, instead of at full-back, where O'Dea appears to be the strongest substitute available. Not only because of that goal from mid-field, for a single great play amounts to little in sizing up a candidate for national honors, else might Outland have a place for his clever running against Cornell, and Burnett for his long goal against Univ. of Penn—but on general play during the season. Kafer (Princeton) showed possibilities; with proper time for practice, he would, I fancy, be one of Princeton's best backs; he is a hard player, and safe.

THERE CAN BE NO QUESTION of Daly's right to the quarter-back position on the All-America eleven; his generalship, tackling, catching, running back kicks, and punting raise him above any other possible candidate. Kromer is second choice, and a stronger player in the position is rarely seen; he passes the ball quickly and safely, handles kicks well, runs strongly, and tackles hard. There would be no need of alarm were he to replace Daly in a hypothetical game in which the All-America team was engaged.

De Saulles was another of Yale's unfortunates whom injury kept from playing even within hailing distance of his established form, but even at the best this clever quarter has shown he must, unless revealing further development, have taken third place on the season's ranking. Daly quite surpassed him in punting, catching, and in the possibilities of his position, and Kromer, though perhaps not so clever in handling the ball, was equally so in running in on punts, more so in kicking, and a stronger, harder runner to stop.

CERTAINLY ELY, THE PLUCKY CHAP, deserves high credit for his work, not only under the circumstances, but because of its real excellence. To a lesser degree he had the Yale tendency to fumble; but his handling of the ball was very good, his defensive work clever and strong, and his two runs with the ball as brilliant as any seen this year. That one of them was done with a splintered rib indicates, in a measure, the spirit and nerve of this young man. Had Ely been put in at the very beginning of the Princeton game, it is my belief Yale would have won. A great deal of the fumbling was due to the unsteadiness which De Saulles's poor work, incident to a crippled condition,

B. H. DIBBLEE,
Harvard, Captain and Half-back.

C. D. DALY,
Harvard, Quarter-back.

C. A. ROMEYN,
West Point, Full-back.

M. L. McBRIDE,
Yale, Half-back.

T. T. HARE,
Univ. of Penn., Guard.

THE STAR GUARD AND THE BACK FIELD OF THE '98 ALL-AMERICA TEAM.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google imparted to the team. There was a marked improvement instantly Ely went into the place. But the mischief had already been done.

Duncan for Princeton did excellent all-round work in his position, being serviceable rather than brilliant; apparently he is a good dependable quarter. Hudson of the Carlisle team is a thoroughly good man, additionally valuable because of his kicking, but in the finer points of the game, and especially on the defensive, he is somewhat behind the others. There were no other quarters East or West up to the All-America standard.

Thus with the line-bucking and kicking of McBride and Romeyn (the one a left-foot and the other a right-foot kicker), the gains of Dibblee through broken fields, the generalship and running back of punted balls by Daly, and the well-known aggressive attack and determined defence of all four, I feel that the back field of this year's national team is the strongest, from an all-round point of view, I have yet had the privilege of choosing.

MORE THOROUGHLY GOOD MATERIAL, better drilled, more perfectly master of the details of the position, was in evidence at centre this season than is usual. Yet the year ends without giving us any one name so illustrious as to class with those great centres of the past—Corbin (Yale) and Lewis (Harvard). There was not a weak centre on the larger '98 'varsity teams, and but little to choose among Cunningham (Michigan), Overfield (Univ. of Penn.), Jaffray (Harvard), Burnett (Harvard), Cutten (Yale), were Dorner (Cornell), Burnett (Harvard), Cutten (Yale), and Booth (Princeton). Had Jaffray played through the second half of either the Univ. of Penn. or the Yale games, and his work maintained the level of the first half, his place on the national team would have been secured.

As it is, his play has been somewhat a feature of the season; his activity, immense strength, and height (6 ft. 4 in.) make him one of the most formidable opponents that ever lined up. The fact that Overfield, so outweighed and so outmuscled by this giant vis à-vis, yet kept his point of the line from becoming a "weak spot," conveys some idea of the capabilities of Overfield as a centre rusher. Overfield, in fact, is more learned in the finesse of centre play than any one of the candidates, and at all times is an active, tireless player.

But in the game of to-day, other things being fairly equal, weight of centre counts heavily, and for that reason centre position on the All-America team goes to Cunningham, who knows the game about as well as Overfield, and is heavier and stronger.

GOOD GUARDS HAVE BEEN PLENTIFUL this year, and one, Hare (Univ. of Penn), attained the right to be ranked with Heffelfinger (Yale), that first mighty exponent of the possibilities of a powerful, active, and heady guard. And neither Heffelfinger nor any other man ever gave such an exhibition of physical strength and magnificent line-bucking as did Hare in the Harvard game. He was practically the only man that could make any impression on Harvard's great defence, and time after time he was sent into the line and even around the ends. Indeed, Hare seemed always to be the man with the ball. He was also called on to do all the punting, and though he did it poorly, that he did it at all acceptably, in addition to line-bucking and interfering and end-running, emphasizes this man's wonderful endurance and all-round ability. I heartily congratulate Univ. of Penn. on having a player so skilled and a sportsman so keen to captain the team of '99.

In a class below Hare are Boal (Harvard), Brown (Yale), Burden (Harvard), McCracken (Univ. of Penn.); and in another may be included Marshall (Yale), B. Pierce (Carlisle), Crowdis (Princeton), Reed and Lueder (Cornell). There is very little difference one way or the other among the first three of this class; rarely do we see four as splendid specimens as Hare, Brown, Burden, Boal, of that type of college athlete and sportsman whom we all love;—three honored and beloved names of the same type stand out on my paper like lamps in the night as I write—Frank Hallowell, Herbert Alward, Marshall Newell—all three sons of Harvard, and the last two gone to their final resting-place.

Because of his physical strength, his gains with the ball, and his play in his position, Boal, I think, is clearly entitled to the other guard position on the national team, and Brown and Burden appear to be equally entitled to the vacancies on the substitute team. Reed has done better work than his college-mate Lueder, who all the season appears to have been satisfied with his own game, and though doing fairly well in big events, nevertheless f[illegible] considerably short of his capabilities.

FILLING TACKLE POSITIONS has given a severe wrench to my sentiments, which persistently demanded that Haughton be given one of the places. But Chamberlin and Hillebrand are so pre-eminent that even the marvellously well directed punting of Haughton is no warrant for displacing either of them. Moreover, the All-America team cannot afford to bring back a tackle to do the punting, and with Romeyn, McBride, and Daly in the back field, the '98 national team seems to need kicking ability least of all things.

Haughton is a first-class man in the position of tackle, though not so good as either of those chosen; but in running with the ball Haughton is of little value, while both Chamberlin and Hillebrand are strong ground-gainers.

In the actual playing of his position Haughton is no better than Donald (Harvard) or Foy (West Point). In fact, nothing but superior coaching has put any one of these tackles, in my opinion, ahead of Foy this year. So far as natural ability is concerned, the West-Pointer has no superiors playing the game to-day. Coaching is all he needs to make him one of the stars of American football.

And speaking of West Point suggests comment on the skill and patience and sportsmanship which Lieutenant Palmer Pierce, U.S.A., revealed in the fulfilment of the somewhat trying and intricate functions that obtain in the management of the Military Academy elevens. They have boards and red-tape and things at West Point which no manager elsewhere has to encounter, and that Mr. Pierce steered through them all without a clash, and with no civilian suspecting their existence, is evidence of executive and diplomatic ability.

Carnett (Univ. of Penn.) stands next to those already named, and in ground-gaining perhaps leads them all, though that happens because of Univ. of Penn.'s weak back field, and the consequent more frequent employment of line men in advancing the ball. Both Foy and Chamberlin are stronger ground-gainers than Carnett, and all are stronger on the defensive. Sweetland (Cornell), Geer (Princeton), Stillman (Yale), are about of a class in order of merit named. I am satisfied now, in the light of fuller observation, that my earlier comment this season on Sweetland did him injustice; certainly in the Univ. of Penn. game, which is Cornell's one of most importance, Sweetland's work shone above that of any other individual on the team. He seemed always to be with the ball, and he decidedly outplayed his vis-à-vis; what team-work Cornell revealed Sweetland fitted to his place harmoniously.

There were no guards or tackles in the West up to the All-America class.

THE BEST END OF THE YEAR was unquestionably Hallowell (a good old name for Harvard), who approached very near to the standard of that famous namesake of '94. He played a hard heady game throughout the season without injury and without serious fault; on the defensive he went into the play with rare precision and tackled unerringly; on kicks he got under the ball with speed and accuracy. There is not much to influence choice among Palmer and Poe (Princeton), Folwell (Univ. of Penn.), and Cochrane (Harvard). Palmer is the fastest, and in the style of game shown this year that appears to be one of the most important attributes of the end. He and Poe are also the lightest, and in the manner of game played a few years ago, I should displace them in favor of either Folwell or Cochrane. But the ends are not used, as formerly, on the defensive, and weight counts for less nowadays than speed and activity. Folwell was very strong on the defensive—perhaps the strongest of the lot. Poe was lucky in having the opportunity, and active enough to seize upon it, for making, on a fumble in the Yale game, a ninety-five-yard run which gave Princeton her only touch-down, and has tended to a popular overestimate of Poe's ability as an end rusher. Cochrane's work was very good indeed; were he a little more dependable always, he would have made the national team this year. When at his best, none is better save Hallowell.

Farley (Harvard), Hedges (Univ. of Penn.), Smith (West Point), Snow and Bennett (Michigan), are five other ends who have shown possibilities of high class; Farley looks like an especially promising end; Snow is the "find" of the Middle West.

Meretricious sporting columns of several members of the "yellow" class have attempted to sensationalize in the direction of football accidents in '98; as a matter of fact, the reports that come to me from California to Maine, and from Michigan to Mississippi emphasize a general increase in playing numbers and skill, and a decrease in accidents.

Before closing my review of the Eastern season I wish to single out for commendation Brown's adoption this year of the graduate coaching system; it is one that has done much for others, and will do a great deal for Brown. Besides it is after all the only manner of developing a genuine spirit of sport for its own sake.

COMPARATIVE SCORES OF THE MIDDLE-WESTERN FOOTBALL SEASON OF 1898.

| | Michigan. | Chicago. | Wisconsin. | Illinois. | Minnesota. | Northwestern. | Oberlin. | Purdue. | Notre Dame. | Beloit. | Chicago P. & S. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Michigan | | 12–11, Nov. 24. | | 12–5, Nov. 12. | | 6–5, Nov. 5. | | | 23–0, Oct. 22. | 22–0, Nov. 19. | |
| | | | | | | 34–5, Oct. 22. | | 17–0, Nov. 5. | | 21–0, Oct. 15. | 22–0, Oct. 8. |
| Chicago | 11–12, Nov. 24. | | 6–0, Nov. 12. | | 29–0, Oct. 29. | 47–0, Nov. 24. | | | | 17–0, Oct. 22. | |
| Wisconsin | | 0–6, Nov. 12. | | | 11–10, Nov. 24. | | | | 0–5, Oct. 8. | | 6–11, Oct. 1. |
| Illinois | 5–12, Nov. 12. | | | | | 17–6, Nov. 12. | | | | 17–11, Oct. 8. | 11–8, Oct. 15. |
| Minnesota | | | 0–29, Oct. 29. | 10–11, Nov. 24. | 6–17, Nov. 12. | | | | | | |
| Northwestern | 5–6, Nov. 5. | 5–34, Oct. 22. | 0–47, Nov. 24. | | | | | 10–0, Nov. 24. | | | |
| Oberlin | | | | | | | 0–10, Nov. 24. | | | | |
| Purdue | | 0–17, Nov. 5. | | | | | | | | | |
| Notre Dame | 0–23, Oct. 22. | | | 5–0, Oct. 8. | | 11–17, Oct. 8. | | | | | |
| Beloit | 0–22, Nov. 19. | 0–21, Oct. 15. | 0–17, Oct. 22. | | | 2–11, Oct. 15. | | | | | |
| Chicago P. & S. | | 0–22, Oct. 5. | | 11–6, Oct. 1. | | | 0–5, Oct. 22. | | | | |
| Univ. of Cincinnati | | | | | | | | | | | |

Generally speaking, the West believed the odds overwhelmingly favored Chicago. Chicago had crushed Northwestern. A fortnight later Northwestern had all but beaten Michigan, 5–6. Man for man, Chicago was more experienced, and, save at the ends, had shown far better form than Michigan. And then there was the heretofore irresistible advantage of Herschberger. Until they met Chicago the Michigan team of '98 had had no crucial test. It was a pretty green team, all things considered, and the question was how it would hold together on defence. Practically half were Freshmen.

Chicago, on the other hand, had gone through a long schedule, mostly of victories by big scores, and had the prestige and experience acquired by her 11–28 game against Univ. of Penn.

Michigan's previous games had shown lack of team-work. Chicago had insensibly eased her practice in the last week, for the men, despite themselves, were confident of victory. But all that does not detract from Michigan's showing, or alter the fact that the eleven made remarkable improvement—in a word, secured team-play—in the last days of its practice.

If the first ten minutes of the game were inauspicious for Michigan's green team, there was no telling by how much she would lose. Chicago realized this, and, taking the ball from the kick-off, played her fastest game, reaching Michigan's thirty-five-yard mark under five minutes. Here Herschberger failed in his first attempt at kicking a goal from the field.

IT WAS ONE OF THE MOST SPECTACULAR CONTESTS, in many respects, the West has developed. The first half did not bring out the best football of which either team was capable. Fumbling by Chicago more than offset the start she had secured by cleverly executed trick plays, and the same fumbles, aided by Herschberger's poor punting at critical moments, led to Michigan's first touch-down. Herschberger tried twice for fairly easy goals from the field, one by drop-kick, and the other by placement-kick, and each time he failed. Then toward the end of the half, on his most difficult try for a goal, he scored from the forty-three-yard line in masterly style.

Toward the middle of the first half Chicago was forced to punt from her forty-yard line. Cavanaugh passed the ball several feet over Herschberger's head, and the full-back had but an instant to recover it when both Michigan ends were upon him. Herschberger made a mess of his next punt, and Michigan took the ball twenty yards for a touch-down. From this point Michigan's green men had no lack of self-confidence, and Chicago saw the possibility of defeat. Herschberger's handsome goal near the end of the first half gave Chicago new confidence, but this was more than offset by Widman's sixty-five-yard run in the second half for Michigan's second touch-down, and for which Herschberger and Chicago's left end must be held accountable. Both were inexcusably drawn into the centre.

WIDMAN'S RUN WAS STIRRING. He wriggled loose from two tacklers at the line, and outran three others before reaching Chicago's goal, with two Chicago men almost on him and another left under his feet five yards back. Clever work by the Michigan ends, Snow and Captain Bennett, overcame the advantage Chicago had in Herschberger's punting. Chicago's ends were never down in line, and McLean ran the ball back for Michigan a good distance every time.

Chicago's only touch-down, made with five minutes of the game left, was earned by the only lasting display the team made of its best offensive work. In fact, Chicago's exhibition in gathering herself together so close to the end of the game, and hammering through Michigan's left side for a touch-down, was, in a way, the feature of the day. Her full-back, Slaker, carried the ball in four out of five plays, that gained twenty-seven yards in all. That brace left her only one point behind.

The game was played on a dry field, in perfect weather, and before the most enthusiastic and best-informed crowd (10,000) a Western game has yet attracted. Not in the Coliseum this time, for that is gone, thankfully, but on Marshall Field, the grounds of Chicago University. The Chicago-Wisconsin game, twelve days earlier, drew an equal number of spectators.

ALL-WESTERN ELEVEN FOR '98.

O'Dea (Wisconsin), full-back.
Caley (Michigan) and Slaker (Chicago), half-backs.
Kennedy (Chicago), quarter-back.
Cunningham (Michigan), centre.
Rogers (Chicago) and Bunge (Beloit), guards.
Steckle (Michigan) and Bothne (Northwestern), tackles.
Snow (Michigan) and Bennett (Michigan), ends.

SUBSTITUTES.

IN THE LINE.

McLain (Illinois), Webb (Chicago), Anderson (Wisconsin).

BACK OF THE LINE.

Ryan (Northwestern), McLean (Michigan), Widman (Michigan).

Western readers will remember that in choosing this eleven the same standard of eligibility, ethics, sportsmanship, etc., is required as obtains in the choice of the All-America team.

THE 1898 SCHEDULE OF FOOTBALL GAMES among the universities of the Middle West happened to be so arranged that those with mind ever turning to "championships" will this year have satisfying evidence to their liking. By winning from Chicago on Thanksgiving day, Michigan's unbeaten eleven earned the title to first honors in that section, though the score (12–11) indicates the margin for speculation among the unprejudiced.

Further discussion of Middle-Western and Missouri Valley football continued next week.

CASPAR WHITNEY.

"ON SNOW-SHOES TO THE BARREN GROUNDS."—By Caspar Whitney.—Profusely Illustrated.—8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, Uncut Edges and Gilt Top, $3 50.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Well-informed travelers going to ALIFORNIA
who appreciate the best of everything, always travel by
THE OVERLAND LIMITED
Because the equipment, consisting of modern double Drawing-Room Sleeping Cars, Buffet-Smoking and Library Cars with Barber, Dining Cars in which meals are served a la carte, and Tourist Sleeping Cars, provides every comfort for all classes of passengers. Train leaves Chicago at 6.30 p. m.
VERY DAY IN THE YEAR
ALL AGENTS SELL TICKETS VIA THE
hicago & North-Western Ry.
PRINCIPAL AGENCIES:
461 BROADWAY.....NEW YORK.
368 WASHINGTON ST.....BOSTON.
212 CLARK ST.....CHICAGO.

It is the Intensity
OF Activity,

TRADE MARK
the concentration of mind and body to a given purpose in American business life that brings about the wear, the tear, and waste of nervous force. Such business men prosper, and in leisure moments need a pure, tonical stimulant, which physicians recommend. Such men, while needing it, need only what is good, pure, and healthful. They will have it, and that only. This demand opened a wide field for the production of the best, and the product is HUNTER BALTIMORE RYE,
Known as
The American Gentleman's Whiskey.
It is pure, ten years old, of rich, mellow flavor.

The Club Cocktails

MANHATTAN, MARTINI, WHISKEY, HOLLAND GIN, TOM GIN, VERMOUTH, AND YORK.
A COCKTAIL MUST BE COLD TO BE GOOD; TO SERVE IN PERFECT CONDITION, POUR OVER CRACKED ICE, (NOT SHAVEN) STIR AND STRAIN OFF.
G. F. HEUBLEIN & BRO., SOLE PROPRIETORS
39 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, HARTFORD, CONN. AND 29 PICCADILLY, W., LONDON, ENGLAND.

Financial
Letters of Credit.
Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.
Brown Brothers & Co.,
BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

WASHINGTON.

Holiday Tour via Pennsylvania Railroad.

December 27 is the date selected for the Personally Conducted Holiday Tour of the Pennsylvania Railroad to Washington. This tour will cover a period of three days, affording ample time to visit all the principal points of interest at the National Capital, including the Congressional Library and the new Corcoran Art Gallery. Round-trip rate, covering all necessary expenses for the entire time absent, transportation, hotel accommodations, guides, etc., $14.50 from New York, $13.50 from Trenton, and $11.50 from Philadelphia. Proportionate rates from other points.

SPECIAL TEACHERS' TOUR.

A special teachers' tour, identical with the above, will be run on the same date. Tickets for this tour, covering all necessary expenses, including accommodations at the National Hotel, Willard's Hotel, or the Hotel Regent, $2.00 less than rates quoted above. Side trip to Mount Vernon and admission to the grounds, fifty cents additional. Side trip to Old Point Comfort, returning via the Cape Charles Route until January 1, $4.00 additional.

For itineraries and full information apply to Ticket Agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

OLD POINT COMFORT.

Six-Day Tour via Pennsylvania Railroad.

The first of the present series of personally conducted tours to Old Point Comfort via the Pennsylvania Railroad will leave New York and Philadelphia on Tuesday, December 27.

Tickets, including luncheon on going trip and one and three-fourths days' board at Old Point Comfort, and good to return direct by regular trains within six days, will be sold at rate of $15.00 from New York; $13.50 from Trenton; $12.50 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points.

For itineraries and full information apply to Ticket Agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

No Fire, Smoke, Heat. Absolutely Safe. Send 5 stamps for Catalog.
TRUSCOTT BOAT MFG. CO., ST. JOSEPH, MICH.

Blakemore Whiskey 7 years Old.

NOTHING BETTER MADE OR SOLD.
Matured in wood and bottled in bond under Governmental Supervision.
If your dealer hasn't it, send us TWELVE DOLLARS, and we will have sent to your address by express prepaid a sample case containing TWELVE BOTTLES.
Freiberg & Workum, Cincinnati, O.

No. 4711 WHITE ROSE GLYCERINE SOAP.

Transparent as crystal. The perfect cleansing properties and absolute purity, as well as the refined and delicate perfume of this toilet soap, have placed it at the apex of all.
SOLD UNIVERSALLY. SAMPLE CAKE 15 CENTS.
MÜLHENS & KROPFF, U. S. AGENTS, NEW YORK

SO SIMPLE A CHILD CAN USE THEM.

SUNART CAMERAS
28 Styles from $5.00 to $100.00
All Cameras Sold under a Positive Guarantee
Send 2c. stamp for Catalogue. SUNART PHOTO CO. 92 Aqueduct St., Rochester, N.Y.

The Ideal Sight Restorer.

A MOST VALUABLE AND SUITABLE PRESENT. THE INESTIMABLE BLESSING OF SIGHT. AVOID SPECTACLES, HEADACHE AND SURGICAL OPERATION. READ ILLUSTRATED TREATISE ON THE EYE. PAMPHLET MAILED FREE.
THE IDEAL COMPANY, 239 BROADWAY, N. Y.

The Scientific American
is a journal of entertainment and instruction to old and young alike. It is an acknowledged source of reliable information, and is universally recognized as the Standard Authority
on scientific subjects. It is splendidly illustrated, and contains more solid and reliable information than can be found in any other publication.
The SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN covers a wide field, embracing among other subjects:
Mechanics, Electricity, Engineering, The Navy, Physics, Astronomy, Magic Arts, Natural History and Miscellaneous Scientific Subjects
Subscriptions, $3 a year: $1 for four months' trial.
Sample copy free to readers of Harper's Weekly.
MUNN & CO., Publishers,
361 Broadway, New York.

THE HAIR 27th Ed., 25c. (or stamps.) Why It Falls Off, Turns Grey, and the Remedy. By Prof. HARLEY PARKER. A. N. LONG & CO., 1013 Arch St., Phila., Pa. "Every one should read this little book."—Athenæum.

MAGIC LANTERNS WANTED AND FOR SALE OR EXCHANGE. HARBACH & CO. 809 Filbert St. Phila. Pa.

OURS TO COMMAND!
ITH & ESSON
volvers are ays ready, calibers. Either long or short barrel.

Write for descriptive catalogue.
SMITH & WESSON,
15 Stockbridge St., Springfield, Mass.

THE WORKS OF WILLIAM BLACK

THE death of William Black, the novelist, has caused a renewed revival of interest in the life and work of this author of such unique genius and power. He saw Scottish life from an entirely new point of view, and was the first to attract decided attention to the great natural beauty of the Highland landscape, and for beauty and power in description of Scottish scenes he is without an equal.

HIS LATEST BOOK

WILD EELIN; Her Escapades, Adventures, and Bitter Sorrows. A Novel. Illustrated by T. DE THULSTRUP. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 75.

ILLUSTRATED LIBRARY EDITION. 27 vols., 12mo, Cloth, where not otherwise specified, $1 25 per volume. Complete set, $31 50; Half Calf, $60 00.

BRISEIS. Illustrated. $1 75.
HIGHLAND COUSINS. Illustrated. $1 75.
THE HANDSOME HUMES. Illustrated. $1 50.
WOLFENBERG. Illustrated. $1 50.
THE MAGIC INK. A HALLOWE'EN WRAITH.
NANCIEBEL: A Tale of Stratford.
A DAUGHTER OF HETH.
A PRINCESS OF THULE.
GREEN PASTURES AND PICCADILLY.
IN SILK ATTIRE.
JUDITH SHAKESPEARE. Illustrated.
KILMENY.
MACLEOD OF DARE. Illustrated.
SABINA ZEMBRA.
MADCAP VIOLET.
THE STRANGE ADVENTURES OF A PHAETON.
SHANDON BELLS. Illustrated.
SUNRISE. A Story of These Times.
THAT BEAUTIFUL WRETCH. Illustrated.
THREE FEATHERS.
WHITE HEATHER.
WHITE WINGS. Illustrated.
YOLANDE. Illustrated.
STAND FAST, CRAIG-ROYSTON! Illustrated.
IN FAR LOCHABER.
PRINCE FORTUNATUS. Illustrated.
THE STRANGE ADVENTURES OF A HOUSE-BOAT. Illustrated.
DONALD ROSS OF HEIMRA.

NEW EDITION. REVISED BY THE AUTHOR. Post 8vo, Cloth, 80 cents each.

DONALD ROSS OF HEIMRA.
THE NEW PRINCE FORTUNATUS.
THE PENANCE OF JOHN LOGAN. ROMEO AND JULIET: A TALE OF TWO YOUNG FOOLS. A SNOW IDYLL.
THE STRANGE ADVENTURES OF A HOUSE-BOAT.
IN FAR LOCHABER.
SABINA ZEMBRA.
WHITE HEATHER.
YOLANDE.
THE WISE WOMEN OF INVERNESS. RHYMES BY A DEERSTALKER. PATSY CONG. AN APRIL DAY ON THE OYKEL. A DAY'S STALKING.
JUDITH SHAKESPEARE.
ADVENTURES IN THULE.
SHANDON BELLS.
SUNRISE.
WHITE WINGS.
THAT BEAUTIFUL WRETCH.
THE MAID OF KILLEENA. THE MARRIAGE OF MOIRA.
THREE FEATHERS.
MADCAP VIOLET.
KILMENY.
IN SILK ATTIRE.
A PRINCESS OF THULE.
THE STRANGE ADVENTURES OF A PHAETON.
A DAUGHTER OF HETH.
LADY SILVERDALE'S SWEETHEART.
MACLEOD OF DARE.
GREEN PASTURES AND PICCADILLY.
STAND FAST, CRAIG-ROYSTON!

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York, N. Y.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

COOL!

"You'd better get out and push, Maria; I've got all I can do seein' that this horse don't shy."

ARMOUR'S
ARMY AND NAVY
ART CALENDAR
FREE

Send us your name and address with the metal cap from a 4 ounce bottle of VIGORAL (retail price 50c) and the calendar will be mailed promptly. If it cannot be had at your Druggist or Grocers, the Calendar and VIGORAL will be sent postpaid on receipt of retail price.

VIGORAL
—Concentrated Beef,
Makes Weak People Strong.

Is not a medicine but a FOOD that is both Meat and Drink.
Builds up the Invalid,
Strengthens the Convalescent,
An invigorating beverage for all.
Vigoral makes an excellent Sauce and Relish for Salads, Etc. Our Chafing Dish Recipe Book sent free to any address tells how to use it.
Served at all Fountains.

ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak.

Holidays are Kodak Days

The long evenings of Christmas-tide are made doubly delightful by taking flash-light pictures of one's friends.

Picture taking by daylight or flash-light is easy with a Kodak.

Kodaks $5.00 to $35.00.

Catalogues free of dealers or by mail.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

Pepsalt...

is the best of table salt, into every grain of which is incorporated digestive substances natural to the stomach. Fill your salt-cellar with Pepsalt and use it in place of salt at your meals. If you have indigestion your stomach does not supply the necessary amount of the dissolving or digestive juices. Pepsalt taken in place of salt at your meals makes good this deficiency, as you take with every mouthful of your food a similar substance to that which is required and at the right time, and your indigestion is a thing of the past. Send for sample in salt-shaker bottle and try it.

Price 25 cents, postpaid.

THE VAUPEL SAMARITAN CO.,
45 Sheriff St., Cleveland, Ohio.

Indigestion Has No Terrors For Him
That salt-shaker is filled with Pepsalt

PEPSALT CURES AND PREVENTS INDIGESTION

"A PERFECT FOOD—as Wholesome as it is Delicious."

Walter Baker & Co.'s
Breakfast
Cocoa

The Standard for Purity and Excellence....

Trade-Mark.

Costs less than one cent a cup.

Our Trade-Mark on Every Package.

Walter Baker & Co. Ltd.
DORCHESTER, MASS.
ESTABLISHED 1780.

MAMMOTH CAVE BOURBON
AUG. COLDEWEY & CO.
LOUISVILLE, KY.
EST. 1848.

A 16 YEAR OLD WHISKEY.
BOTTLED IN BOND BY SPECIAL PERMISSION OF THE U.S. TREASURY.
PRICE $3.00 PER CASE OF 12 BOTTLES

OR SAMPLE CASE OF 4 BOTTLES, $5.00.
Blank cases, without marks indicating contents, when desired. All orders delivered, expressage paid.

HISTORY.—This Whisky was made in 1882 and 1883, exported in bond to Europe, and after twelve years returned to Louisville Customs Warehouse, where it was found necessary to repack it in glass, owing to the ancient and unsafe condition of the barrels, and which was done by special permit of the United States Treasury and under Government supervision.

AUG. COLDEWEY & CO., LOUISVILLE, KY.
Established 1848. Reference: Any Local Bank.

CHEW
Beeman's
The Original
Pepsin Gum

Cures Indigestion and Sea-sickness.

All Others Are Imitations.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,
BANKERS.
ESTABLISHED 1873.
2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.
Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.
Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.
A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.
Correspondence solicited.

EUROPE OR ORIENT
A series of attractive and comprehensive tours under personal escort, arranged to leave New York during Dec., Jan., and Feb., visiting Gibraltar, Italy, Southern France (the Riviera), Switzerland, Paris, London, etc. Also Italy, Egypt, The Nile, Palestine, Greece, etc. All expenses, $180 up, according to tour. Programs and Gazette, 100 pp., sent free. Apply to H. GAZE & SONS (Est. 1841), 113 Broadway, New York. R. H. CRUNDEN, General Agent, Boston Agency, 201 Washington St.; Chicago Agency, 220 South Clark St.

Joseph Gillott's
STEEL PENS.
GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.
THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

TRADE E & W MARK
EARL & WILSON'S
LINEN
COLLARS & CUFFS
BEST IN THE WORLD.

Harper's Holiday Books

THE LIFE OF CHARLES STEWART PARNELL. By R. BARRY O'BRIEN. With One Photogravure Portrait, a Facsimile of Parnell's Handwriting, and a Picture of Avondale. About 750 pages. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

A FLORAL FANTASY. In an Old English Garden. Verses by WALTER CRANE. With Facsimile Reproductions of Forty-eight Full-page Water-color Drawings, End Paper, Cover Designs, etc., by the Author. 4to, Cloth, Ornamental, $2 00.

DIET IN ILLNESS AND CONVALESCENCE. By ALICE WORTHINGTON WINTHROP. Illustrated. Post 8vo, Cloth, $1 50.

RODEN'S CORNER. A Novel. By HENRY SETON MERRIMAN. Illustrated by T. DE THULSTRUP. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 75.

THE ASSOCIATE HERMITS. By FRANK R. STOCKTON. Illustrated by A. B. FROST. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 50.

OLD CHESTER TALES. By MARGARET DELAND. Illustrated by HOWARD PYLE. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 50.

THE BIOGRAPHICAL EDITION OF W. M. THACKERAY'S COMPLETE WORKS. This new and revised edition comprises additional material and hitherto unpublished letters, sketches, and drawings, derived from the author's original manuscripts and note-books. Edited by Mrs. ANNE THACKERAY RITCHIE. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Uncut Edges and Gilt Tops, 13 volumes, $1 75 per Volume.

THE NEW GOD. A Tale of the Early Christians. By RICHARD VOSS. Translated from the German by MARY A. ROBINSON. 16mo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 25.

DUMB FOXGLOVE, and Other Stories. By ANNIE TRUMBULL SLOSSON. With One Illustration. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 25.

THE ADVENTURERS. A Novel. By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON. Illustrated. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 50.

THE COPPER PRINCESS. A Story. By KIRK MUNROE. Illustrated. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 25.

AN ANGEL IN A WEB. A Novel. By JULIAN RALPH. Illustrated by W. T. SMEDLEY. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 50.

THE RED AXE. A Novel. By S. R. CROCKETT. Illustrated. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 50.

WESSEX POEMS, and Other Verses. By THOMAS HARDY. With Thirty Illustrations by the Author. Crown 8vo, Cloth Extra, Gilt Top, $1 75.

CROOKED TRAILS. Written and Illustrated by FREDERIC REMINGTON. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $2 00.

PEEPS AT PEOPLE. Passages from the writings of Anne Warrington Witherup, Journalist. By JOHN KENDRICK BANGS. Illustrated by EDWARD PENFIELD. 16mo, Cloth, Ornamental, Uncut Edges, Gilt Top, $1 25.

FABLES FOR THE FRIVOLOUS. (With Apologies to La Fontaine.) By GUY WETMORE CARRYL. With Illustrations by PETER NEWELL. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, Deckel Edges and Gilt Top, $1 50.

SOCIALLIFE IN THE BRITISH ARMY. By "A British Officer." Illustrated by R. CATON WOODVILLE. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 00.

A STUDY OF A CHILD. By LOUISE E. HOGAN. With a Colored Frontispiece and Many Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $2 50.

CHINA IN TRANSFORMATION. By ARCHIBALD R. COLQUHOUN. With Frontispiece, Maps, and Diagrams. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York and Londo

Best Line to Chicago and the West—THE NEW YORK CENTRA

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—NO. 2193. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1898. TEN CENTS A COPY. FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All Rights Reserved.

ON HIS HANDS.

UNCLE SAM: "GLAD TO SEE YOU, MY BOY; BUT I'LL HAVE TO CONJURE A LITTLE TO KNOW HOW TO DISPOSE OF YOUR FRIEND."

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, DECEMBER 31, 1898

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4 00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, and Mexico

Subscriptions may begin with any Number

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

London: 45 Albemarle Street, W.

Also for sale at Brentano's, 37 Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris

"WHEN THE SLEEPER WAKES,"

A new Serial Story, by H. G. WELLS, author of "The War of the Worlds," will begin next week. "The Awkward Age," by HENRY JAMES, will be concluded in the same number, which will be sent free of charge to all whose subscriptions expire with the present volume.

MR. BRYAN talks like the orator that he is when he advises that the treaty of peace be ratified, and that then Congress talk about the evil after the evil has been accomplished. We are more inclined to agree with what is said to be the attitude of Speaker REED, which is to fight the whole proposition while it is before the Senate. After the treaty is ratified, there is only one duty for patriotic citizens. We may intend to keep the Philippines for good and all, and in the end to obtain Cuba. Whether this is to be the end of our efforts or not, the first duty of the United States is to provide good government for our new possessions, whether the new governments are to be temporary or permanent, and this task will require all the political energy and intelligence of the country. Time devoted to discussion as to whether we had better hand back the islands after they have been taken by this treaty will be time wasted. Then they will be ours, to be governed by us permanently, or to be returned to the native populations when we are satisfied that these are prepared for self-government. It will be the duty of patriots, after the ratification of the treaty, to accept the task imposed upon the United States, as it was their duty to sustain the government after the war was declared.

ON another page of this issue of the WEEKLY will be found a picture of the Common Council of the city of Chicago. It was supposed for some time that this Council was controlled by a majority of its members, who constituted what was known as the "gang," and who were in turn controlled by the street railway companies, who were seeking a fifty-year franchise in the streets of the city. Mayor HARRISON has made a vigorous and successful war upon the combination, and the other day defeated the project of the railway companies by having it referred to the City Hall Committee, which never reports. Mayor HARRISON has always appeared to us to be a good deal of a demagogue, but he is certainly winning golden opinions from the best people of Chicago and Illinois generally, and seems to be the only man upon whom good citizens can unite with any hope of success in the war against ALTGELD and TANNER, whose control in the two parties, and whose kind of politics, have long disgraced the State of Illinois. We are in constant receipt of letters from Illinois from citizens of the best character, indicating that Mayor HARRISON, demagogue though he may have been and still may be, is so much superior to the present Governor and his predecessor that he may eventually become the reform candidate for the nomination against ALTGELD, and for election against TANNER. It is due to him to say that his successful struggle against the corrupt element of Chicago's Common Council is vastly to his credit for ability and fearlessness.

WE note that one of the leading reasons which have pushed this country towards the taking of the Philippines is the desire to share in the commercial partition of China. There are evidently two forces at work, one of which must triumph and the other fail, directed to the opening of China to European commerce. One of these is embodied in Russia, which, probably with France, is looking toward the physical dismemberment of the empire. The other is British, which is seeking to preserve the integrity of the empire, but to open it to commerce with all the nations of the world. Lord CHARLES BERESFORD is the principal agent of England in this task, for he is moving among the merchants and treating with the political powers simply as the representative of Great Britain's commerce. We have information which leads us to believe that Lord BERESFORD is meeting with a good deal of difficulty, but on the whole is succeeding, and that he would be greatly aided if the political and diplomatic powers of his government would adopt a fixed policy toward China. Politically Russia has now a great advantage over England and all the other countries operating upon China; but if there should be a commercial alliance between the United States, Great Britain, Germany, and Japan, which would guarantee the integrity of China and keep the door open to all, Russian designs would be defeated, and the cause of commerce and civilization would be enormously advanced. There is no way in which Mr. HAY may so distinguish his administration of the State Department as in bringing about such a commercial alliance, and we are sure that he would have the assistance and sympathy of Great Britain in his efforts, and the active aid of Lord CHARLES BERESFORD.

IT is perhaps well for Admiral SCHLEY that his report of the operations of his squadron was not made public until the sharp edge has been worn off the public's memory as to the actual facts in the case. This report is dated May 30, and makes no explanation of Admiral SCHLEY'S failure to leave Cienfuegos and go to Santiago beyond what is known through the official despatches already published. One paragraph alone is worthy of special mention. It seems to have been written to meet the criticism that was sure to be visited upon his signalled intention to leave CERVERA'S squadron unblockaded and to proceed to Key West for coal. Admiral SCHLEY repeats the story of his fears as to his inability to coal at sea—fears that turned out to be entirely unjustified—but adds that his intention in standing westward was "to bar any effort of the enemy to reach Havana by a dash through the Yucatan Passage." This only adds to the mystery surrounding the movements of SCHLEY'S squadron, which still seem to indicate that the admiral was more intent upon avoiding the enemy than finding him; nor does it meet the fatal fact that, contrary to his orders, Admiral SCHLEY signalled to his squadron to proceed to Key West, and telegraphed to the department as follows:

> Much to be regretted cannot obey order of department. Have striven earnestly. Forces to proceed for coal to Key West by way of Yucatan Passage. Cannot ascertain anything respecting enemy positively.

In view of the fact that the information sent him that the enemy was at Santiago was correct; that his denial of the information was not based upon any counter-information nor upon any serious investigation; that his own despatch to the department shows that he was not proceeding to the Yucatan Passage to establish a defence against the enemy, of whose location he professed not to be aware, but that he was on his way to Key West—Admiral SCHLEY'S report leaves him in even a worse position than the reports already published. This case is one to be greatly regretted, for, so far as we understand it, SCHLEY'S conduct is the one blot upon the otherwise magnificent record which the navy made in the war. His troubled conscience and his remorse are probably sufficient punishment for him; but it is for the interest of the country and of the navy, if SCHLEY has not a better defence than that which he has offered in his report, that no honors be visited upon him in obedience to the dictates of popular clamor. Discipline and enthusiasm in any military service are best stimulated by just rewards for honors fairly won, and are most easily destroyed and injured by unjust rewards, given either at the dictation of politicians or in obedience to noisy demands of people who do not fully understand the facts or comprehend their significance.

MEN who have been prominent in maintaining protective tariffs are now urging the necessity of keeping the Asiatic markets open to American commerce. If the Philippines are to be kept as closed markets to the rest of the world under a tariff framed in Washington for the purpose of securing the Philippine market to our manufacturers, such a policy is certain to fail. England has not obtained a supremacy in Asiatic markets through her free port of Hong-kong, and had it been a closed port, protected by a tariff that discouraged the commerce of other countries, that island would never have become of importance. Even as it is, open to the shipping and produce of the world, it is Asiatic merchandise and commerce that make it one of the greatest of ports. Where England has accomplished more has been in developing the trade and industry of her Indian Empire. It is no longer Manchester yarn and cloth that find favor on the continent of Asia, with its apparently little known and illimitable possibilities of consumption, but it is the yarn and cloth of India. The kindred tastes of Indian and Chinese have proved a far more potent instrument for gaining entrance to the interior markets than any temptations offered or concessions secured by London or Manchester. So Japan is in a position to secure a larger share of the continental market than the English could ever gain vid Hong-kong, or the French by way of Tongking. Possessed of the Philippines, our manufacturers would not be in the same position as the Indian or the Japanese with respect to the greatest market of Asia. The English mills have been beaten because they could not import their raw cotton from the United States or India, manufacture it into cloth or yarn, and export it to Bombay in the hope of being able to undersell the native manufacturer having his raw material at his door, and an abundance of low-priced labor. Even with Tagals in our mills the question of the cost of the raw material and transportation would be important; and if Indian cotton and Filipinos were used, where is the benefit to the American working-man? Cotton goods are only a type of all products designed for those Eastern markets. It has been shown again and again that American cottons cannot be sold in foreign markets in competition with the cottons of England or of Germany. Nor would a protected colony like the Philippines enable them to be sold in Asia without employing the cheapest materials and the cheapest labor, neither of which would be American. To open Asia other methods must be used. Germany has experienced no difficulty in building up an enormous export trade in directions where English goods were thought to enjoy a monopoly. Even in Asia the German merchant sells his wares in ever-increasing quantities. He has done this not by colonial settlements, but by an intelligent study of markets and their needs. This is the true way of obtaining "open markets."

IMPERIALISM AND THE PEOPLE.

THE WEEKLY has been asked to explain why it has expressed the opinion that the annexation of the Philippines is "as honest an expression of humane sentiment on the part of the American people as the war itself." We had already stated that the fact that this sentiment was the expression of the majority of the people had been assumed by the President. Whether this assumption is correct we did not and do not know, but we still have confidence in our frequently stated opinion that even if the majority is now in favor of expansion discussion would probably change public opinion as it has frequently in the past turned back the spreading tide of error and led the people to a right and sane view, for there are no people in the world with whom reason is more potent than the native citizens of the United States, as it is a true that no people are sooner possessed of n and visionary notions, especially if there is a ton of romance in them, than some Americans who family roots have been longest in the soil.

From the beginning of the clamor for war until now that the treaty of peace has been sign HARPER'S WEEKLY has continually professed faith in the virtues of the people whose aro passions made the war possible, and whose ho able feelings have now induced the Presiden take the Philippines. It was opposed to the because it believed that the cause of it was inve by foolish men and grasping politicians and n papers, the last two for their own gain, the because they were easily deceived. It has against extension because it believes that th tempt to govern distant possessions and barb and alien people under our present system o ernment will bring harm to the republic, an discredit the cause of democracy throughou world. We are so confident in this belief th are ready to say that no man who believes mocracy intelligently—no man who knows tues, which ought to be perpetuated for th fare of humanity, and its limitations, that m good as well as for evil—can be an expan No movement that has ever yet been imag sordid politicians or grasping speculators, a has been fanned into flames by the public i in our view, so un-American as this reach after colonies. We believe that it is n Europe instead of moving along the line traditions and our history, and we deny dignation the paltry invention that our tions have made us morbid and small. WEEKLY regards the United States, as it

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

it was before the war, as the finest political and social organization that man has ever invented.

While all this is true, it does not follow that the American people who are in favor of keeping the Philippines are greedy promise-breakers. There are thousands of them who believe that while expansion will do us great harm, and will tax our institutions and our system of government severely, there is no way of escape from the responsibilities that have been thrust upon us. They hold that we cannot give back to Spain that of which the natives have already taken an important part, and the whole of which they are likely to take if the United States troops and ships are withdrawn. They believe, too, that the rule of Spain there, as in Cuba, has been barbarous, and that the natives are not fit to govern themselves. There are Christian people, also, who believe that the rule of the United States will aid in the civilization and Christianization of the idolatrous savages of the islands. These people refuse to discuss the danger to our own institutions and civilization from expansion. They think, whatever that danger may be, American genius and perseverance and American character will overcome it. The President has heard these people, and he believes that they form the majority, and that their opinion stands for the opinion of the whole country. It is a dangerous assumption for him to make, because those who make the most uproar in this country are likely not to be the wisest, and are often really in the minority. If, for instance, the decision between Mr. McKINLEY and Mr. BRYAN, in 1896, had been made upon the basis of the noise that followed after railroad trains, Mr. BRYAN would now be in the White House. However that may be, most of the people who are expressing themselves in favor of expansion—we naturally bar the politicians, who are talking for their own advantage—are honest, patriotic, and generous, and chief among them are men and women of the purest American blood, from that old New England stock which supplied the incentive and the excitement for the abolition movement, and for all the chivalric causes which rank among the "fads" of a time, to develop occasionally into a noble forward impulse, by reason of which humanity is blessed. It is now as it was at the breaking out of the war. Notwithstanding the ignoble means by which the passions of the people were then aroused, those passions were righteous, and the people who were swayed by them conscientiously and firmly believed that they were engaged in the holy cause of humanity. And now the people who have called out to Mr. McKINLEY to take the Philippines, until he hears no other voice in the land, believe most sincerely that it is the duty of the country to take the islands in order to save the savages from the brutality of Spain and from their own barbarism. Let us repeat, we are not now speaking of the politicians and of those who see money for themselves in the Philippines, or of those who are looking forward to the building up in this country of a military empire, and who wish us to take our place side by side with the backward-trending governments of Continental Europe, and, with them, to participate in the partition of China and the looting of all the tropics, but we are speaking of the plain American citizen who believes in his country and his government, who thinks sincerely that we can undertake any task, and come out of it in the end to our own advantage and to the profit of all with whom we come in contact; who has faith in the efficacy of foreign missions, and who considers himself fully able to protect himself and his fellows from any evil that may come to him or his country. This man we respect most profoundly, and feel a warm attachment for, even when we differ from him radically, as we do on this subject of expansion. He is the man who is entitled to the credit of American progress, for he has developed himself to his best estate, and has flourished under institutions which have left him free to do so. He is the man who wears our uniform in both the regular and the volunteer services, and does his duty by his country, as he is willing to do it now by distant savages, whose very presence as parts of the United States will, we fear, greatly endanger his well-being. But that, in the end, the republic will accommodate itself to its changed conditions, will overcome the difficulties that will beset it at the outset, and will govern its distant colonies without surrendering any of its own democratic principles that are essential, we do not doubt, and have never doubted. The experiment will be costly, and the return may be nothing. We will probably go through much suffering from the militarism that must be established and from the wars that are likely to fall to our lot, but in the end we shall find again the pathway on which we were moving forward, and we shall resume the old route at the point at which we departed from it when expansion and imperialism were thrust upon us. Democracy is not to die out, nor its great exemplar to fall to pieces, because of the unfruitful experiment which we are about to make in Asiatic waters.

LIKE THE COLONIES OF AUSTRALASIA.

WE have taken the Philippines from Spain; the question now is what are we going to do with them? In one form or another this question is being asked everywhere, and it must be admitted that none could be more timely or important; it may be added that none could be more significant. A few months ago we went to war that we might secure freedom and independence for the people of Cuba from the foreign control of Spain; we have ended it by taking upon our own shoulders the burden of something greater than Cuba, six thousand miles from our shores, without one clear idea of what we are going to do with it. Day by day, indeed, the public is regaled with the latest opinions of Senators and the most authentic intelligence as to the views of the Executive of the country on the subject, but so far the principal interest of these is to be found in their vagueness.

Nothing could illustrate this peculiarity better than one of the suggestions which have reappeared on several occasions as representing the mind of the President on the question how to deal with the Philippines. Let us give them a government—so the proposal runs—like that which England has given her Australian colonies, and let this country exercise no more control over the Filipinos in their exercise of self-government than Great Britain does over the people of Australia. At the first glance the proposal is an attractive one. The success of England's great colonizing experiments in the South Pacific is admitted. She has no anxieties about their present management or future prosperity, nor has she any reason to doubt their strong and loyal attachment to herself, which results, among other things, in securing her the lion's share of all they have to give in the way of trade and commerce. If such a state of things could only be brought about in the Philippines it is evident that a heavy blow would have been struck at all criticism of the policy of expansion, while many troublesome questions would die a natural death. Nothing could be more desirable; it is the more vexatious that nothing could be imagined more utterly impracticable and visionary.

To control the Philippines as England controls her Australasian colonies means to leave them uncontrolled. This is done safely by Great Britain because the people of Australasia are as thoroughly English as the people of England, and, in fact, represent the best and most capable type of the self-governing Briton. To-day England exercises no control over the taxation, the fiscal policy, or the internal affairs and legislation of Australia any more than the colonists of Australia do over what is done in England in those respects. She defends the commerce of Australia with her fleets, but she does not land a company of British soldiers in its territories, nor has she even nominally the smallest control over the local forces embodied in each of the colonies for local protection. The secret of the success of the English method in Australia is that she has been dealing with her own people, men who inherited her language, laws, and ideas.

It may be said emphatically that there is not one point of resemblance between the position of the Australian colonists and the mixed population of the Philippines. For the most part the Filipinos are simply savages, with a tincture of superstition. Possibly half a million out of seven millions and a half of the inhabitants have more or less idea of civilization as we understand the word, but that is the highest praise that can be fairly given them. They know nothing of liberty by experience, and, if possible, less than nothing of self-government; their leaders are generally half-castes, with a very full share of all the defects that so commonly cling to the race; they have not an idea of enlightened rule either for themselves or others, and, as a matter of course, they have neither regard nor affection for ourselves, except in so far as we are represented by the strong arm and the mailed fist. To talk of setting up any such relations between America and a people like this as exist between England and her colonies, inhabited by her most enterprising and energetic sons, is to talk something worse than nonsense. Only free men can use free institutions; only men with the unconscious training of generations of orderly, law-abiding citizens are capable of any such political relationships as exist between England and her Australian colonies. Not years, but centuries would be needed to bring the Filipinos to any such standard as this, and they must be centuries of just and enlightened and strong-handed guardianship. Not England in Australia, but England in India and Ceylon, must necessarily be the model of any effective dealing with the millions of the thousand islands, the control of which we have so light-heartedly made ourselves responsible for. There is nothing to be gained by shutting our eyes to facts, and less than nothing to be accomplished by blundering forward ignorantly. If we are finally to be committed to Oriental imperialism, the part of common-sense will be to set ourselves to the task of drilling a savage people into civilization.

THE EDUCATIONAL CAREER.

THE presidency of Yale University recently became vacant through the resignation of Dr. DWIGHT. The question of the succession is attracting general attention, not only among the great number of alumni and friends of the institution, but also with the general public. It is widely felt to be a matter of far more than local concern, and there is national interest in the discussion now in progress.

This incident illustrates at once the changed position of the educator in the estimation of the public, and the possibilities of the educational career. Two or three generations ago a vacancy in the presidency of either Harvard or Yale meant simply the choice of a new man from a small class. The college president must be, first of all, a clergyman. Nobody who was not a clergyman was eligible to the position. Colleges had been established primarily for the training of youth to become ministers, and clergymen were considered the best persons to supervise such training. Young men often start out in life with an ambition to fill some particular position. The youth who aspired to a college presidency in the early part of this century knew that he must be ordained to the ministry before he could reach it.

The old tradition no longer rules. Harvard and Columbia and Cornell, not to go beyond universities in the East, have presidents who never acquired the right to prefix the title of "Reverend" to their names. Although clergymen constitute a majority of the Yale corporation, nobody supposes that they will insist upon having a clergyman as Dr. DWIGHT'S successor. The range of choice has been widened, until one finds lawyers and judges mentioned as possible candidates.

It is obvious therefore that the youth who has a taste for the educator's life may now look forward to the highest place in this field without the necessity of becoming a clergyman on the way. Nor is it reckoned essential that a college president shall be a profound student or a recognized authority in some department, as in the last century he had to be well versed in theology. CHARLES W. ELIOT has been the most successful college president of his generation, but although an excellent instructor, he was not a great light in chemistry when he was promoted from a professorship in that science to the charge of Harvard's wide interests, thirty years ago.

It is an infinitely wider and more attractive field which the modern university offers than that of the primitive college. This was at best little more than a training-school for the ministry, and the training which it gave was along pretty narrow lines. Our larger institutions are now coming to furnish really good instruction in a variety of subjects. Not only has the academical department been greatly broadened, but scientific, law, theological, and medical schools have sprung up or grown far beyond their old proportions, and the time is approaching when one may hope to pursue any branch of study in our chief universities.

As the institution becomes more dignified and effective, the place of the professor becomes more inviting, and what is perhaps most encouraging of all, the public is coming to regard the educator more highly. The remarkable increase in the custom of making large gifts to educational institutions in recent years, coming as such gifts often do from those who regret the lack of a college training themselves, is a proof that "practical men" are more and more realizing the necessity to the nation of intellectual training. The professor may still be dubbed by some "a mere doctrinaire," but the member of a college faculty who has something to say worth a hearing can command an audience.

In the new era upon which the nation is entering, the universities must have a wider scope and a wider influence if we are not to make shipwreck. "What will the university do for the community?" asked President ELIOT in his inaugural address at Cambridge nearly thirty years ago, and he thus answered his question: "First, it will make a rich return of learning, poetry, and piety. Secondly, it will foster the sense of public duty—that great virtue which makes republics possible." To become a leader in work which makes for such ends as these is a career that should satisfy a lofty ambition.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Governor Johnston. President McKinley. Principal Booker T. Washington.

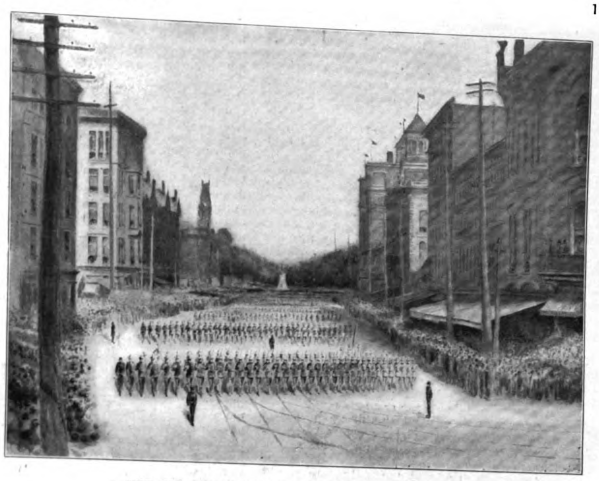
PRESIDENT McKINLEY REVIEWING THE PROCESSION—TUSKEGEE.

SOME OF THE TUSKEGEE INSTITUTE FLOATS IN THE PARADE—TUSKEGEE.

PRIZE-WINNING DECORATED CARRIAGE—ATLANTA.

GIRLS MARCHING IN REVIEW—TUSKEGEE.

PRESIDENT McKINLEY'S SOUTHERN TRIP—SCENES DURING HIS VISITS TO TUSKEGEE AND ATLANTA.—[SEE PAGE 1299.]



Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PRESIDENT McKINLEY REVIEWING THE FLORAL PARADE.

THE PROCESSION COMING DOWN MARIETTA STREET.

ATLANTA FIRE DEPARTMENT FLOAT.

THE HEAD OF THE PROCESSION.

PRESIDENT McKINLEY'S SOUTHERN TRIP—THE CELEBRATION AT ATLANTA.—[See Page 1299.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE MONEY OF PUERTO RICO.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

Puerto Rico has been the financial plaything of Spain in the past. Many different monetary schemes have been foisted on the unresisting island, which—unlike its sister province, Cuba—has never had the courage to revolt against the outrages and impositions of political machinations.

The financial system has always been on a silver basis, though it is said that thirty years ago an exceedingly small amount of gold coin was in circulation.

Prior to 1874 the silver coin of the United States was the standard and current medium of exchange, but in that year a trick was played on poor Puerto Rico by a French banking firm, headed by a man named Hermua. The slaves of the island were freed by a governmental edict, and indemnity bonds were issued by Spain to the former slaveholders, payable upon presentation, at a definite amount per black head. Then, as now, the landholders —very few in proportion to the total population—held the major portion of the money in the island, the slave getting nothing for his labor, and the poor man practically living from hand to mouth.

To meet this bond issue the Spanish government resorted to a cash-raising scheme, by which an arrangement with the French banker Hermua and a few of his banking friends was effected, this firm agreeing to pay off the slave indemnity in silver coin. What nation's silver currency was to be the medium was not stated in the contract, and consequently Mexico's silver dollars were used, which possessed actually more weight in silver than the United States dollars, though worth only some sixty-two cents. The result was the flooding of Puerto Rico with depreciated Mexican silver, through which an immense profit was secured by the French firm, and possibly by the official circles of the law-makers of Spain.

The steps which naturally followed were the paying for all labor in cheap Mexican silver by the limited number of large money-holders on the island, the hoarding of American silver, and its ultimate exchange for Mexican silver, which to all intents and purposes expanded, for the time being, the currency of the island, and made it possible for land-owners to pay all their debts in Mexican silver, at an apparent profit to themselves.

Little thought seems to have been given to the complications which would arise in foreign exchange; but, for that matter, it is hardly probable that the tide of cheaper money could have been stemmed, as the natural law is for dearer money to disappear by hoarding or in exchange with foreign countries. It is said that many United States silver pieces were punctured to prevent their leaving the island, but it is difficult to see what beneficial result could arise from recourse to such a scheme. In two years' time the silver of Puerto Rico had changed from the United States to a Mexican silver basis.

For ten years the Mexican silver reigned supreme. There was a subsidiary copper currency, which was Spanish, but aside from this, all money was Mexican silver. By 1884 the Spanish government had evolved a new financial intrigue, which was to produce results advantageous to the official machine. All Mexican silver was called in by the home government, and a temporary paper exchange-note was issued, payable in a new silver currency, to be called the Puerto Rico peso. It was claimed to be distinctly honorable and patriotic for the Treasury Department of Spain to desire a silver piece for her colonies which should bear the stamp of the ruling country.

In round numbers, six million Mexican dollars were called in, and six million pesos were issued from the re-minting. The outrage lay in the fact that instead of each coin weighing as much as the original piece turned in, the new peso was almost a sixth lighter in weight, making a rake-off for the Spanish government of over a million, not counting the few odd hundred thousand dollars which were never paid. The uncomplaining islanders meekly accepted the new coin, without even a formal protest.

It was then made a penal offence to import the Mexican dollar to Puerto Rico, and the few remaining pieces had to be carefully examined as to date before being accepted in commercial exchange.

For fourteen years the peso has been the sole money of the island, but a new crisis has been reached to-day by the advent of the American army in the island and by the change of government. The new problem has perturbed the native population from end to end of the island, and a condition of unrest exists never before apparent during the many money jugglings which have hitherto been perpetrated.

A few days after General Miles had landed his troops on the southern coast of Puerto Rico, he issued a mandatory order, as military commander, that the prevailing rate of exchange should be two to one—that is, two Puerto-Rican pesos for one American silver dollar—on the assumption that a peso was worth in bullion value less than half of one dollar backed by a gold reserve in our Treasury. This was an apparently easy solution of the currency problem of Puerto Rico, unbacked as she was and is now by a superior money, but the righteousness and wisdom of such short-cuts in intricate financial tangles remain to be proved.

The six million silver pesos on the island have never, to any extent, found their way into foreign exchange, but have been confined solely to the island, representing for many commodities a definite purchasing power, quite on a par with American silver. This unique condition of affairs is largely due to the lack of a banking system approved by the Spanish government, and to a system of differential duties which favored Spain in every transaction, causing the people of Puerto Rico to import from Spain practically all the necessities of life, while the export trade from the island to other countries was paid in bills of exchange on the Spanish bank. It was a wheel within a wheel; taxation from the home government was quite sufficient to balance the profitable export trade with the imports from Spain in such a way that silver pesos never got further away than the Bank of Spain, from which they were placed in circulation again by the payment of the army and officials on the island, and by road, harbor, and fortification improvements carried on for the benefit of military and naval operations. Within the last few months the Puerto-Rican peso has been honored for the first time by Spain—from necessity, as the returning Spanish army has carried home, in wages and plunder, an unknown but large quantity of this silver, and, further, the Bank of San Juan, which was a repository of private funds and island municipal and school reserves, has been milked by Spain's officials. Ponce alone has lost, it is said, some sixty thousand pesos which were withdrawn and carried to Spain without due warrant.

The amount of actual money was so weighty in character and so limited in Puerto Rico that the banks of San Juan and Ponce, by permission of the respective municipal authorities of these towns, issued paper notes, negotiable and redeemable upon demand, with which the local business might be transacted. Neither of these paper issues had any protection from the government, and they were accepted hesitatingly, or not at all, by people residing outside of these cities. A false inflation of the paper currency of either bank was presumably prevented by a municipal law, which demanded a monthly statement of the assets, liabilities, and outstanding paper money. As any suspicion that these banks were using all their available funds and not holding sufficient reserve in silver to meet the outstanding paper would have resulted in a disastrous run upon them, it is difficult to understand what advantage the issue of paper obligations possessed, above the convenience of supplying a portable certificate in place of the weighty silver piece. One, five, and ten pesos were the usual issues, though at Ponce larger paper certificates, in the nature of a bond issue, transferable, but drawing an annual interest of one-half of one per cent., were held by the larger depositors.

I am told by native financial authorities that when, for specific purposes, the peso came from time to time to be exchanged for gold, the accepted rate was 150 in favor of gold, though at times it has been as low as 112. Again, it is said that to-day, since the honoring of the peso in Spain, it is possible, by shipping the silver peso to the United States, to arrange a draft exchange for Spanish gold at 150, with an added five per cent. commission, creating thus an exchange rate of 155. If this is strictly true, then the rate arbitrarily set by General Miles would seem to be unfair, and likely to prove a dire hardship to a million of helpless people, to whom we are holding out the promise of future prosperity and the happiness of a broad-gauge government, such as they have never before known.

In spite of the edict, and the fact that all the custom-houses on the island in the hands of military collectors of customs, as well as the new post-office, hold that a peso paid in duties and postage is only half the value of an American dollar, the business men of the island have been able to run this rate down as low as 150, and refuse to give in return for an American dollar more than one peso and a half Puerto-Rican.

Many interesting complications have arisen due to this varying exchange. For example: Ponce, which is perhaps the most Americanized city on the island in ways and means, led the crusade against two to one, and has set 150 as the prevailing rate. San Juan, the capital on the northern side, was slower in scaling down, and paid, for a week after the evacuation, 180 for American gold, 175 for all kinds of our paper certificates, and 165 for our silver. Why they should discriminate against one form of our currency more than another in San Juan remains to be explained. The rate there to-day has been reduced to a uniform 160; or ten centavos more is paid at the capital than at Ponce for the American dollar.

At Caguas the military commander demanded 175, notifying the alcalde that all stores would be closed unless this rate was allowed, and so it was paid under protest, until about November 1. The merchants all rightly insisted that they were injured by being forced to buy their supplies and to exchange their American money in San Juan at a rate of 160, while their selling price had been unjustly lowered some ten per cent. by their having to accept American silver at 175 upon demand. Colonel Eddy of the Forty-seventh New York ordered the Alcalde of Caguas to see that the same form of exchange is maintained, based on the precedent set by the Fourth Ohio and the First Kentucky, but the order was not enforced, and the prevailing rate has become 160.

At the island of Vieques the exchange has been kept at two to one by the order of volunteer captains in charge of single companies, though the natives of this island are obliged to purchase in cities like Ponce and San Juan at a high rate, and sell at home to Americans at a loss of twenty-five per cent.

These varying exchanges, pulled down by commercial natives and forced up by military orders, have caused a deep and pervading condition of unrest in the native's mind, as he has no stable medium of exchange, and cannot have one until the Congress of the United States shall have settled this problem.

The money-holder of the island desires that his silver shall remain as near as possible at a par with American silver; the few natives with large debts to pay wish that two to one might be the prevailing rate until the liquidation of their liabilities. Every American soldier is glad to get two pesos for a single dollar, and the postmaster grumbles because American silver is paid in for postage-stamps with greater frequency than hitherto, and in consequence he is no longer able to pay his board bills in Spanish money at a decided saving to himself.

It is possible that criticism and scandal may arise from the present monetary condition on the island, and unfortunately the most upright of men in public places are in a position to be questioned as to their disinterestedness and integrity. As an example it may be said that some 15,000 pesos were placed in the hands of a well-known firm of brokers doing business in Puerto Rico, who were selected by the President as Treasury agents and as a repository of customs collections. This firm agreed to favor all army officers, upon demand, with an exchange of two to one. This they did for several days, and then posted a notice that hereafter 160 would be the rate, explaining to military men that the original amount of Puerto-Rican silver deposited with them had become exhausted. It is quite likely that this was true; but if it was not, then this firm, which is only under obligation to return either the sums deposited with them in the original coin or their equivalent—half the amount in United States currency—has made by the transaction forty centavos on every dollar deposited.

The collectors of customs have kept long lists of names of military officers who desired to take advantage of the two-to-one valuation, and have personally disbursed their funds in exchange for American notes. Much complaint is heard in the ranks that a favored few are receiving this exchange, while the majority are forced to accept the rate set by the native tradespeople. Every customs official and every postmaster is open to the ugly imputation that he is conducting a brokerage business on his own behalf. There is nothing to prevent his doing so.

The prices of many commodities have risen in Puerto Rico, probably owing to the fact that the shopkeepers feel the need of protecting themselves against the new exchange in some way; it may be because of their ability to get more money out of the free-handed Americans. Both reasons are given by the soldiers who have lived on the island all summer, and it is further said that two prices exist—a higher one for the American and a lower one for the native; but the storekeepers deny both suggestions.

While it is probably true that the natives desire to reap as great a harvest of money as possible from the American curio-hunter, the matter of supply and demand is naturally controlling the situation. Never before has the demand for almost everything produced in Puerto Rico been so great. The Spanish soldier got eight pesos a month, when he was paid, while the ordinary private in our army gets a little over fifteen dollars, or, at the prevailing rate of exchange, three times the salary of the Spaniard, and it is paid regularly and spent freely. The Spanish officers received smaller salaries than our officers, and, besides, had the habit—most disastrous to their tradesmen—of ordering on credit and never paying; on the other hand, our officers are better livers, demand larger meals, and buy everything they see which is new and unique, paying promptly as they go.

The solution of this difficult money problem lies with Congress, and by quick and decisive action our legislators may relieve a condition which is fast making the people of our new province dissatisfied.

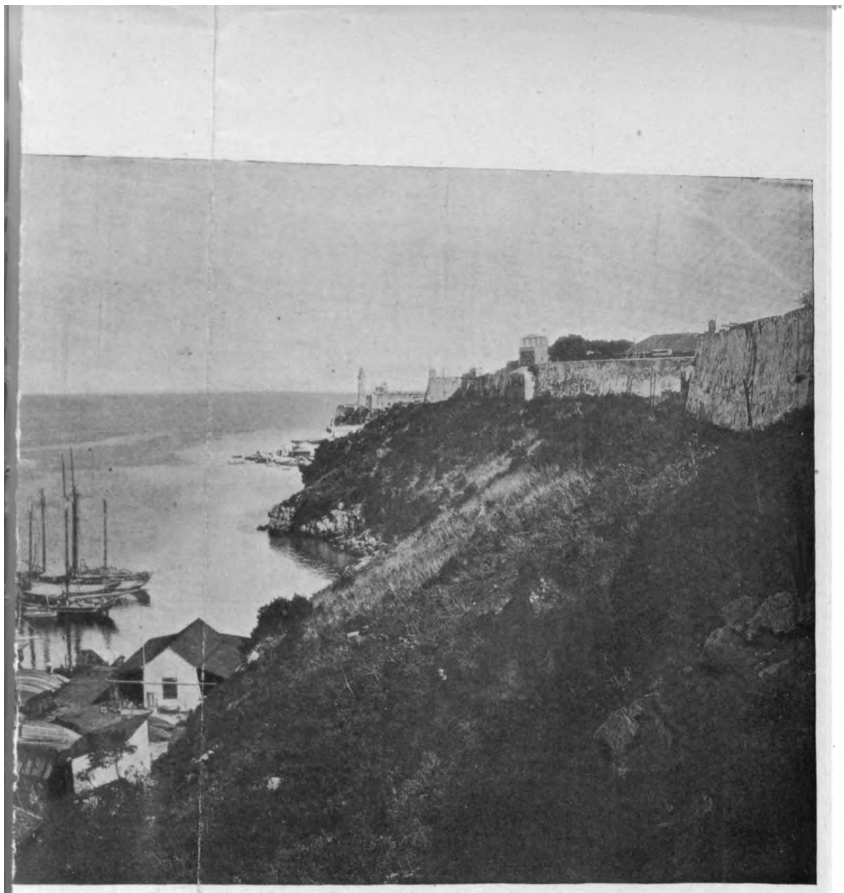
It may be pointed out that a serious injury would be done the Puerto-Ricans if Congress were to legislate upon the financial situation from a stand-point of bullion value. The peso is a little lighter than our dollar, and it is said that it is of less fineness, while its actual bullion value is said to be about forty-six cents at the present time. It differs from our dollar, however, weight for weight, fineness for fineness, only something like ten per cent.

If the bullion value alone were to be allowed, the money of Puerto Rico would be suddenly contracted by one-half; that is, a people to-day possessing six million silver pieces, with which they purchase their comforts and pay the laborer his daily wage, would to-morrow be reduced to three million dollars. Men who now are fairly well off would then be poor, with but one-half their accumulated savings.

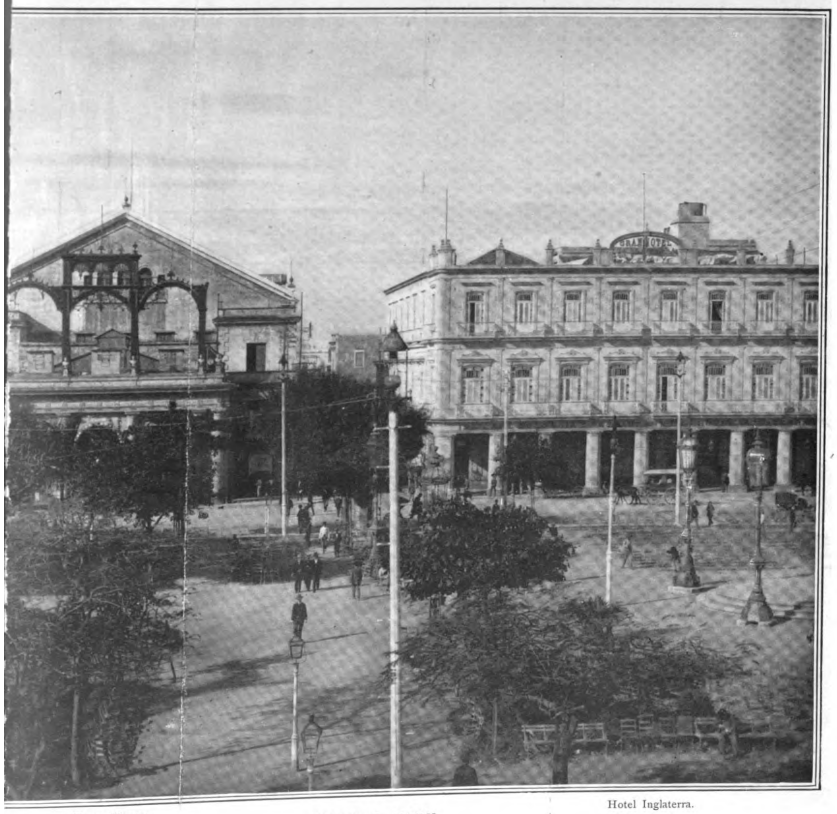
It may be argued that a financial readjustment must be passed through in Puerto Rico, and that prevailing prices increase or decline to meet changes in money values, but the fact that Puerto Rico has had but six million pesos to carry on the commercial transactions of a population of a million souls, of which amount one-half is held by two banks, should not be lost sight of. The dearth of money has been the curse of the island, and among a large proportion of the poorer element the primitive method of exchanging commodity for commodity has been resorted to, whereby the poor man suffered, as usual, being forced to take, in return for his agricultural products, whatever might be offered him in manufactured articles by his more opulent neighbor, the tradesman.

Under such circumstances any policy which tends still further to decrease the purchasing power of their silver or contract their circulating medium must do a serious injustice to the natives of this island, to whom we offer the protection of a liberal government. It also means the crushing out of commercial activity among the indigenous population, and the aggrandizement of every moneyed American who may desire to invest his capital in this rich and fertile region.

As financiers, are we willing to further oppress a people who have suffered much already at the hands of rapacious rulers? Rather, as generous Americans, we should seek to so legislate as to supply the needs and insure the commercial success of these new wards of our nation.



An equable solution of the problem, and one which may be reached with no particular generosity on the part of our nation, lies in the reminting, as soon as possible, of the Puerto-Rican pesos into silver dollars bearing the American eagle. Allowing 386 grains of silver for the Puerto-Rican peso and 412½ grains for the American dollar, there is a difference of some eight per cent. A fair mintage charge could hardly bring the difference between the two pieces up to more than fifteen per cent. If such a proposition were to be considered and such a law enacted, Puerto Rico would suffer a fifteen-per-cent. depreciation of her currency in remintage, securing in exchange a stable financial system endorsed by the government of the United States.



Unless we repudiate Puerto Rico's silver, any plan which is adopted must necessarily result in the ultimate absorption of the present currency of the island by the United States Treasury. This money will be returned to our Treasury through the custom-houses and post-offices at the present high rate of profit to our government—which now receives, through an arbitrary ruling, two pieces of their silver in exchange for each one of its own, though, value for value in bullion, their respective values differ but a few cents—or it will be returned at a margin of gain.

Spain has been held to be a robber because, in 1884, she recoined the Mexican silver dollar in current circulation into a lighter piece bearing her stamp, appropriating the margin for her own enrichment. What argument can be advanced to defend our government against the severest criticism for having, through military power, set an arbitrary rate of exchange, whereby every peso collected at fifty cents by our Treasury may be reminted, after the addition of five cents' worth of silver, into one of our own silver dollars?

William Dinwiddie

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Tacon Theatre. CENTRAL PARK. Hotel Inglaterra.

COPYRIGHT, 1899, BY HARPER & BROTHERS.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

As anonym
cord to the ar

You seem to portant a par

It may be symptom of science whi cause of ex this page of hopefully e
the most i
States, and include Ne way, half a

There a [ns] whic and anoth no city, n people in possibly million t majority ing that in Bosto world.
abounds ceived t interest such a time o iants.

Wh
the s ges dinar di-co sear in it as a have bee hav ing
the a l pa pr se ex
th y
a

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

AN anonymous Boston correspondent writes on a postal-card to the artificer of this department:

You seem to have very correct instincts. I cannot but notice how important a part of "this busy world" Boston is to you.

It may be "correct instincts" or it may possibly be a symptom of the poverty of an ill-furnished mind. A conscience which sometimes suffers from self-reproach because of excessive attention paid to Boston concerns in this page of the WEEKLY excuses itself with the assurance hopefully entertained that, after all, Boston is by all odds the most interesting city of its species in the United States, and perhaps in the world. The species does not include New York or Chicago, but it does include, in a way, half a dozen very lively and important towns.

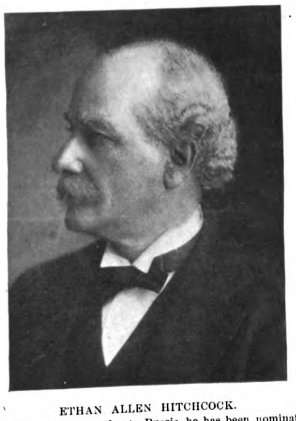
There are five cities in the country (including Brooklyn) which have more people in them than Boston has, and another (Baltimore) has almost as many, but there is no city, not even New York, which has so many Boston people in it. It must be that which makes Boston so irrepressibly important. Out of her population of half a million there must be nearly 400,000 Boston people, the majority of whom sing praises to Heaven night and morning that they are not as other folks are, and that they live in Boston, conveniently grouped to set an example to the world. Quality counts for a great deal, and Boston abounds in quality. It is a handsome, lively, self-conceited town which takes itself seriously. Life is not so interesting in America that Americans can afford to ignore such a place, or fail to inform themselves from time to time of what agitates the minds of its respected inhabitants.

What saved Mr. Savage Landor's life in Tibet was the seemingly unimportant circumstance that his fingers were webbed somewhat higher than those of ordinary men. The Tibetans, who are incorrigible cranks, discovered this peculiarity in him after they had mauled, seared, and tortured him very nearly to death, and found in it a sudden and conclusive reason for letting him live, as a person under special divine protection. It seems to have been a mistake in policy, for the stories Mr. Landor brought back to England with him are understood to have impressed his countrymen with the need of carrying the blessing of British civilization to the Lamas and their misguided parishioners. It will have to be carried a long distance up hill; but if the British make the campaign, which is said to be part of their next summer's programme, it will be the making of a great deal of interesting reading. Mr. Landor did not get to Lhassa, the capital of Tibet, but if British soldiers undertake to reach that city, there is little doubt that they will succeed. Meanwhile Mr. Landor's book, In the Forbidden Land (Harper's), gives pretty much all the modern information about Tibet that is available

For an effete and tired-out continent Asia is doing pretty well by literature in these days. Besides this literary crop which Mr. Landor has gathered, with such terrible toil in its inhospitable highlands, there is the other notable book of travels of the season, Mr. Sven Hedin's Through Asia (Harper's). Last year Asia gave us Lord Roberts's Thirty Years in India. Most important of all, from the purely literary stand-point, Asia has given us Kipling. For so old a country it has done well

On December 1 the undergraduates of Princeton stigmatized hazing in formal resolutions as a demoralizing practice prejudicial to the interests and reputation of the university, and abolished it. By the same process they declared that Freshmen and other undergraduates would be expected to observe the customs of the university, and provided for a committee to see that they did. This committee is to consist of the vice-presidents of the two upper classes, the chief editor of the Princetonian, and the manager and assistant manager of the baseball team. It will have authority to summon and try all Freshmen accused of violating customs, and all Sophomores accused of hazing, and may summon any witnesses desired. When guilt is proven it will devise due punishment. A number of customs which have affected Princeton Freshmen were thus recorded in a recent issue of the New York Sun:

In the past a Freshman was not permitted to wear golf trousers, nor sport the colors, to carry a cane, to wear duck trousers until the first Harvard game, to smoke a pipe, to enter the grand stand at the baseball grounds, to be seen on the streets after nine o'clock at night, to enter any saloon or pool-room, to play ball or loaf on the campus, and, finally, he was expected to yield the sidewalk to everybody but the townspeople.



The prevalence of such customs, if they do prevail, indicates that Princeton, for an old college, is remarkably successful in keeping her youth.

A favorite anecdote about the late Calvin S. Brice represented that he was one of the enthusiasts who pulled on the rope which brought down the Vendôme Column in Paris. The story runs that, being at that time at a time of life when purposes are still unsettled, he had thoughts of becoming a socialist or communist or something for the general good, but that his experience in Paris convinced him that the individual good was better worth pursuit, so he bought a steerage ticket, came back to Ohio, and applied himself with great assiduity and success to the problem of getting ahead.

None of the obituary notices of Mr. Brice which the newspapers have published take note of this picturesque incident or admit that he went abroad in early life. Indeed, his time is so well accounted for that it is hard to find a vacancy into which this bit of biography may be inserted. He was born in Denmark, Ohio, in 1845, began his collegiate course at Miami University when he was fourteen, enlisted in the Union army at fifteen, graduated from Miami at seventeen (June, 1863), served a year or two in the war, came out a lieutenant-colonel, and took his degree in the Law School of Michigan University in 1866. Then he was admitted to the bar in Cincinnati, and practised law for ten years, in the course of which it is possible that he found time to slip over to Paris, view the results of the Franco-Prussian war, lend a hand incidentally on that Vendôme Column rope, and so on back the cheapest way to Ohio.

Mr. Brice had no prejudice in favor of the beaten track, and seems never to have refrained for conventional reasons from taking a hand in any enterprise that seemed to him likely to be interesting or profitable. He was an unusually striking man to look at, and it is said that in appearance he was very like St.-Gaudens, the sculptor. Certainly there was a remarkable appearance of mental vigor about him, and of shrewdness and resourcefulness. When sporting blood is allied to a powerful imagination and the gift of making accurate calculations, the combination is strong. One of Mr. Brice's obituarians has said that he got rich in violation of all the rules—that he borrowed all he could at the start, never saved his pennies or bothered himself with economies, but spent all he could when he was poor and all he wanted to when he got rich, never fretting his mind about small sums, but concentrating it on the acquisition of big ones. No doubt it is safer to take this information with some salt, but Mr. Brice undoubtedly had a gift for boring with the large auger, and when one has that it is unintelligent of him to put in his time with gimlets. The only small thing which he seems to have neglected to his hurt was the cold he took a week before his death.

Macaulay's forecast of the time when the New-Zealander should moralize on the broken arch of London Bridge predisposed the contemporary mind to the idea that the New-Zealander was slow to ripen, and would not come to his maturity for a long, long time to come. London Bridge is still in use and good repair, but the New-Zealander is already moralizing on the imperfection of things British, and shows no hesitation about showing his grandmother how the details of civilization ought to be worked out. The idea of an old-age pension is familiar in England, where both parties have discussed its advantages, and where Mr. Chamberlain, in particular, has shown a strong disposition to bring it to actual experiment. In England, however, it is still only a dream, and one that does not offer much promise of early fulfilment. It is in New Zealand that it is really to be tried. New Zealand nowadays has all the most modern ideas, and a fine audacity in putting them to the test. Her Legislature has passed a bill providing that all persons of good character who have lived in the colony twenty-five years and are over sixty-five years old shall be paid one shilling a day, provided their income does not exceed thirteen shillings a week, and that they are not Chinese. The idea is that if the aged poor must be provided for any way, it is more satisfactory and little more expensive to pension them than to maintain them in poor-houses. The New-Zealanders exclude the Chinese from the benefits of their new law because they don't want the Chinese to come to them; they insist upon a residence of twenty-five years because, while they are willing to support their own poor, they don't want to make their island a resort for poor persons from other parts of the British Empire. Great interest is felt everywhere in their experiment, and all Europe will watch the working of it. The objections in England to old-age pensions have been that they might discourage thrift and promote imposture, teach people to rely on the government for support, and put a heavier burden on the state than it could carry. There seems to be a sentiment in England that the repulsiveness of poor-houses and the extreme unwillingness of decent indigents to go to them have a wholesome effect. Perhaps they do discourage the self-respecting poor from holding hog-gishly to the vital spark, but one would like to see the other method tried.

ETHAN ALLEN HITCHCOCK.

At present our Ambassador to Russia, he has been nominated by the President to be Secretary of the Interior to succeed Cornelius N. Bliss, resigned.

Mr. Julian Ralph is more kinds of a literary person than the ordinary mind can readily keep track of. We know him as an eminent reporter, as a lively correspondent, as a writer of magazine articles, and lately as a story-writer. But how many of us have been used to think of him as a traveller? Traveller he is, though, for the Royal Geographical Society of London has elected him a fellow, this distinction being allotted to him on the strength of two books. He is the author of Alone in China, which the Spectator has said is a necessary aid to an understanding of the Celestial Kingdom, and of On Canada's Frontier, in which the chapter on Canada's El Dorado still ranks as the soundest and shrewdest study of British Columbia. He can add F. R. G. S. to his name now whenever he likes. The letters are inconvenient for every day use, but they look well on the title-pages of stories of travel and studies of foreign lands. It isn't so much where a man goes that affects the Royal Geographers as what he sees there and what he has to say about it when he gets back. Wherever Mr. Ralph goes he sees all there is in sight, and all that he sees he makes visible to his readers.

One wishes Mr. Ralph might have been spared to go with Captain Borchgrevink's expedition, which started on December 19 from Hobart, Tasmania, for the south pole, for no one has succeeded as yet in making any particularly lively reading about the antarctic continent. Borchgrevink's expedition is the one which sailed last August from London at the cost of Sir George Newnes. A Belgian expedition, which passed the Strait of Magellan a year ago on the way to the antarctic should have come back to Melbourne last spring, but has not been heard of. If it has wintered safely on the antarctic continent, it is the first to do so.

In 1900 a strong German expedition will start for the antarctic, and the Royal Geographical Society greatly wishes to send a British expedition the same year. The society has raised £5000 towards the cost of it.

Warszawiak, the converted Jew, seems to be the Dreyfus of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church. He still clamors for more trials, and one of the reasons given for the delay in calling a successor to Dr. Hall is the need of first disposing of his case. The Presbyterian Synod has ordered the session of the Fifth Avenue Church to try him again, but on appeal to the General Assembly a stay was granted, which, in the opinion of the New York Presbytery, vacated the Synod's order. Meanwhile Warszawiak has gone into bankruptcy. He will probably have a new trial, which will be a sore one to the session, if only on account of the labor of it. One could almost believe the rumor that there are members of the session who privately feel that Warszawiak's conversion was an exceptionally inscrutable and perplexing providence, and are ready to doubt if it would not have been just as well for all hands if he had continued impenitent. A good many Jews have been successfully Christianized, as the late Lord Beaconsfield, and, presumably, the potent American family of Leiters, but the conversion of Jews as a missionary enterprise seems, so far as vulgar knowledge of it goes, not to be a particularly hopeful form of religious endeavor.

However, as the Warszawiak case now stands, there is doubt in the public mind whether the accused has not suffered injustice, and it would seem as if the synods and presbyteries and sessions involved were bound to clear the matter up, at whatever cost of time and trouble.

Last Thursday Colonel Thomas Wentworth Higginson received at his home in Cambridge the friends who came to congratulate him on the occasion of his seventy-fifth birthday. Colonel Higginson might hope to be the dean of the active men of letters in America if it were not that Dr. Edward Everett Hale and Dr. Henry M. Field were born the year before him. Our Mr. Richard Henry Stoddard is his junior by a year or two.

The engrossing topic of interest in New York is the grip. Assurance is given that it has not been so prevalent for nine years as now, and the newspapers estimate (loosely) that there are 100,000 cases of it in town. Every one who has not got it watches his symptoms and wonders how long he will escape. In spite of it, the streets are full of people and the shops of buyers. New York seems somewhat more given over to the plague than other places, but it has by no means a monopoly of it. Vassar College has had it very extensively, and Yale College has reported four or five hundred cases. Washington complains too, and, indeed, the outcry is so widespread as to disturb the underpinning of the theory that it is a special judgment on Gotham for having such filthy streets. In quality it is light and comparatively harmless.

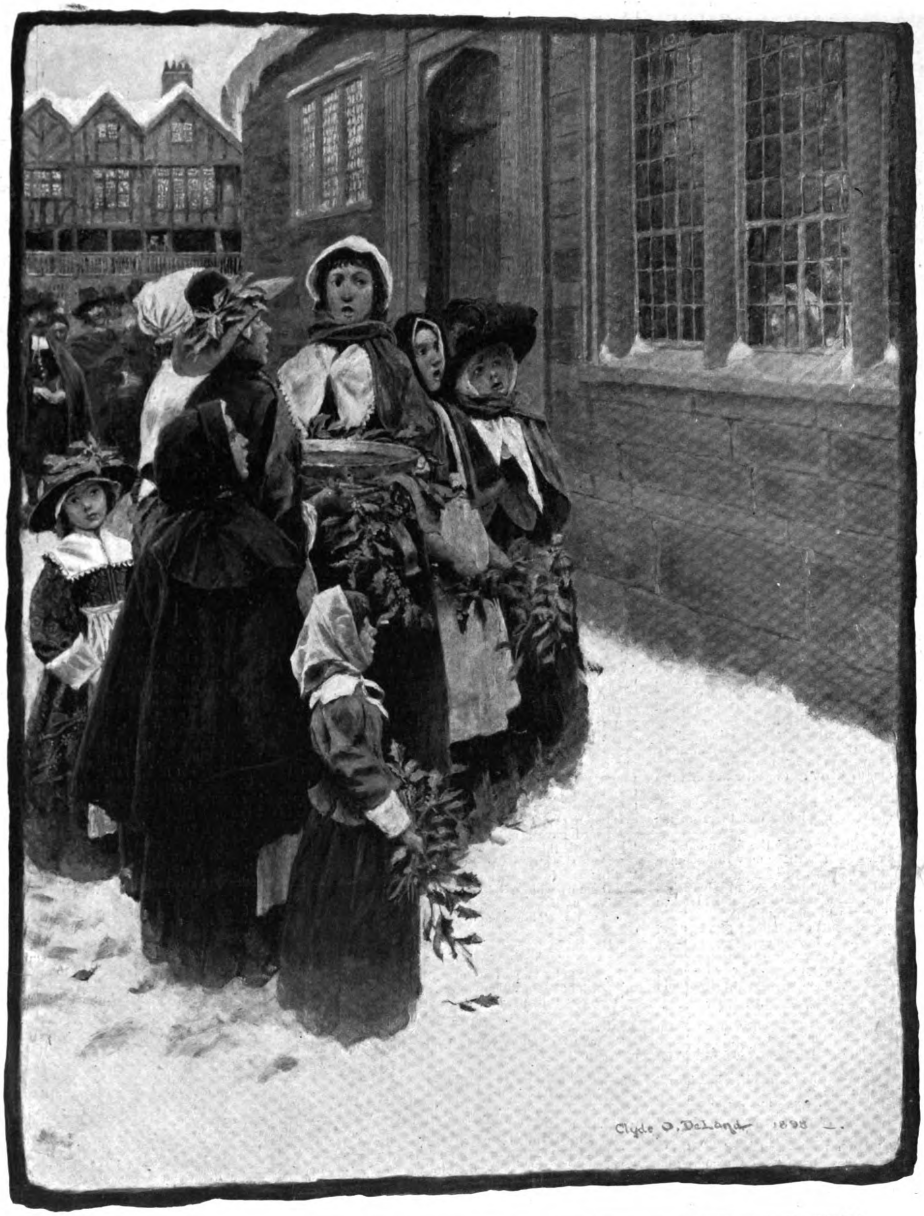
It is true, as has been reported, that a book on India by Lord Curzon, which was to have been issued by the Messrs. Harper, has been withdrawn by the author. It had been arranged that Harper & Brothers should publish the work, both in London and in New York. The withdrawal was sudden and unexpected, and is understood to have been due to the opinion of some one of the highest authority in matters of state that it would be inexpedient for the new Viceroy of India to publish a book on India on the eve of his departure to govern that dependency. The book, delayed for these reasons, will doubtless eventually see the light.

What are we to think of the recent newspaper stories about Lieutenant Hobson and the armies of women he has kissed in the West? Hobson has been ordered to Manila. He was with the President at the Atlanta Peace Jubilee on December 15. From there he went to Chicago, where he lectured on December 18. The newspapers aver that at the reception which he held after his lecture he kissed about one hundred and sixty young women. Thence he went west to San Francisco, and various despatches declare that he kissed his way across the continent, favoring some four or five hundred girls at Kansas City, hundreds more at Topeka, and so on, until his record when he reached the other shore must have run high up into the thousands.

Sometimes the stories that come East from the Mississippi and the district beyond are colored by the imagination. A year or two ago, for example, there were all those stories about the air-ships which were seen in flocks and coveys from Oregon to Texas, yet never materialized. Maybe these tales about Hobson are fables too, or are so greatly exaggerated as to be almost fabulous. We must hope so. Promiscuous kissing by the square rod is dreadfully unsanitary, for one thing; nor is the motive for it obvious, unless, to be sure, one is in politics, which Hobson is not, so far as is known.

For half a year Hobson has been the most petted and belauded young man of his age in the United States. Everything conceivable has been done to turn his head and make him foolish. If he has been spoiled it is not surprising, but it is a great pity, for when he started in the Merrimac to block the channel at Santiago he was a fine young fellow and a good officer. Here's hoping that at Manila he may have a sufficiently protracted rest from ovations and all manner of disconcerting nonsense.

E. S. MARTIN.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE COMMON COUNCIL OF CHICAGO—THE STORM CENTRE OF THE RECENT FIGHT AGAINST THE SURFACE-RAILROAD RING.
From a Photograph by George R. Lawrence.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

A NEW YEAR'S WASSAIL.

Wassal, wassal, to our Town;
The Cup is white and the Ale is brown;
The Cup is made of the ashen Tree,
And so is the Ale of the good Barley.
Little Maid, little Maid, turn the Pin,
Open the Door and let Us in;
God be here, God be there,
I wish You all A Happy New Year.

[See Page 1296.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE AWKWARD AGE.*

A Novel.

BY HENRY JAMES,

AUTHOR OF "DAISY MILLER," "AN INTERNATIONAL EPISODE," ETC.

XXXII.

MRS. BROOK remained alone for ten minutes, at the end of which her reflections—they would have been seen to be deep—were interrupted by the entrance of her husband. The interruption was indeed not so great as if the couple had not met, as they almost invariably met, in silence: she took, at all events, to begin with, no more account of his presence than to hand him a cup of tea accompanied with nothing but cream and sugar. Her having no word for him, however, committed her no more to implying that he had come in only for his refreshment than it would have committed her to say: "Here it is, Edward dear—just as you like it; so take it and sit down and be quiet." No spectator worth his salt could have seen them more than a little together without feeling how everything that, under his eyes or not, she either did or omitted rested on a profound acquaintance with his ways. They formed, Edward's ways, a chapter by themselves, of which Mrs. Brook was completely mistress, and in respect to which the only drawback was that a part of her credit was, by the nature of the case, predestined to remain obscure. So many of them were so queer that no one but she could know them, and know thereby into what crannies her reckoning had to penetrate. It was one of them, for instance, that if he was often most silent when most primed with matter, so when he had nothing to say he was always silent too—a peculiarity misleading, until mastered, for a lady who could have allowed in the latter case for almost any variety of remark. "What do you think," he said at last, "of his turning up to-day?"

"Of old Van's?"

"Oh, has he turned up?"

"Half an hour ago, and asking almost in his first breath for Nanda. I sent him up to her and he's with her now." If Edward had his ways she had also some of her own; one of which, in talk with him, if talk it could be called, was never to produce anything till the need was marked. She had thus a card or two always in reserve, for it was her theory that she never knew what might happen. It nevertheless did occur that he sometimes went, as she would have called it, one better.

"He's not with her now. I've just been with her."

"Then he didn't go up?" Mrs. Brook was immensely interested. "He left me, you know, to do so."

"Know?—how should I know? I left her five minutes ago."

"Then he went out without seeing her." Mrs. Brook took it in. "He changed his mind out there on the stairs."

"Well," said Edward, "it won't be the first mind that has been changed there. It's about the only thing a man can change."

"Do you refer particularly to my stairs?" she asked with her whimsical woe. But meanwhile she had taken it in. "Then whom were you speaking of?"

"Mr. Longdon's coming to tea with her. She has had a note."

"But when did he come to town?"

"Last night, I believe. The note, an hour or two ago, announced him—brought by hand and hoping she would be at home."

Mrs. Brook thought again. "I'm glad she is. He's too sweet. By hand!—it must have been so he sent them to mamma. He wouldn't for the world wire."

"Oh, Nanda has often wired to him," her father returned.

"Then she ought to be ashamed of herself. But how," said Mrs. Brook, "do you know?"

"Oh, I know when we're in a thing like this."

"Yet you complain of her want of intimacy with you! It turns out that you're as thick as thieves."

Edward looked at this charge as he looked at all old friends, without a sign—to call a sign—of recognition. "I don't know of whose want of intimacy with me I've ever complained. There isn't much more of it, that I can see, that any of them could put on. What do you suppose I'd have them do? If I, on my side, don't get very far, I may have alluded to that."

"Oh, but you do," Mrs. Brook declared. "You think you don't, but you get very far indeed. You're always, as I said just now bringing out something that you've got somewhere."

"Yes, and seeing you flare up at it. What I bring out is only what they tell me."

This limitation offered, however, for Mrs. Brook, no difficulty. "Ah, but it seems to me that with the things people nowadays tell one—! What more do you want?"

"Well"—and Edward, from his chair, fixed the fire a while—"the difference must be in what they tell you."

"Things that are better?"

"Yes—worse. I dare say," he went on, "what I give them—"

"Isn't as bad as what I do? Oh, we must each do our best. But when I hear from you," Mrs. Brook pursued, "that Nanda has ever permitted herself anything so dreadful as to wire to him, it comes over me afresh that I would have been the perfect one to deal with him if his detestation of me hadn't prevented." She was by this time also—but on her feet—before the fire, into which, like her husband, she gazed. "I would never have wired. I would have gone in for little delicacies and odd things she has never thought of."

"Oh, she doesn't go in for what you do," Edward assented.

"She's as bleak as a chimney-top when the fire's out, and if it hadn't been, after all, for mamma—" And she lost herself again in the reasons of things.

Her husband's silence seemed to mark for an instant a deference to her allusion, but there was a limit even to this combination. "You make your mother, I think, keep it up pretty well. But if she hadn't, as you say, done so—"

"Why, we shouldn't have been anywhere."

"Well, where are we now? That's what I want to know."

Following her own train, she had at first no heed for his inquiry. "Without his hatred he would have liked me." But she came back, with a sigh, to the actual. "No matter. We must deal with what we've got."

"What have we got?" Edward continued.

Again with no err for his question, his wife turned away, only, however, after taking a few vague steps, to approach him with new decision. "If Mr. Longdon is due, will you do me a favor? Will you go back to Nanda—before he arrives—and let her know, though not, of course, as from me, that Van has been here half an hour, has had it put well before him that she's up there and at liberty, and has left the house without seeing her?"

Edward Brookenham made no motion. "You don't like better to do it yourself?"

"If I liked better," said Mrs. Brook, "I would have already done it. The way to make it not come from me is surely not for me to give it to her. Besides, I want to be here to receive him first."

"Then can't she know it afterwards?"

"After Mr. Longdon has gone? The whole point is that she should know it in time to let him know it."

Edward still communed with the fire. "And what's the point of that?" Her impatience, which visibly increased, carried her away again, and by the time she reached the window he had launched another question. "Are you in such a hurry she should know that Van doesn't want her?"

"What do you call a hurry, when I've waited nearly a year? Nanda may know or not as she likes—may know whenever: if she doesn't know pretty well by this time she's too stupid for it to matter. My only pressure's for Mr. Longdon. She'll have it there for him when he arrives."

"You mean she'll make haste to tell him?"

Mrs. Brook, for a moment, raised her eyes to some upper immensity. "She'll mention it."

Her husband, on the other hand, with his legs outstretched, looked straight at the toes of his boots. "Are you very sure?" Then as he remained without an answer: "Why should she if he hasn't told her—"

"Of the way I so long ago let you know that he had put the matter to Van? It's not out between them in words, no doubt; but I fancy that, for things to pass, they've not to dot their i's quite so much, my dear, as we two. Without a syllable said to her, she's yet aware in every fibre of her little being of what has taken place."

Edward gave a still longer space to taking this in. "Poor little thing!"

"Does she strike you as so poor," Mrs. Brook asked, "with so awfully much done for her?"

"Done by whom?"

It was as if she had not heard the question that she spoke again. "She has got what every woman, young or old, wants."

"Really?"

Edward's tone was of wonder, but she simply went on. "She has got a man of her own."

"Well, but if he's the wrong one?"

"Do you call Mr. Longdon so very wrong? I wish," she declared with a strange sigh, "that I had had a Mr. Longdon!"

"I wish very much you had. I wouldn't have taken it like Van."

"Oh, it took Van," Mrs. Brook replied, "to put them where they are."

"But where are they? That's exactly it. In these three months, for instance," Edward demanded, "how has their connection profited?"

Mrs. Brook turned it over. "Profited which?"

"Well, one cares most for one's child."

"Then she has become for him what we've most hoped her to be—an object of compassion still more marked."

"Is that what you've hoped her to be?"

Mrs. Brook was obviously, for herself, so lucid that her renewed expression of impatience had plenty of point. "How can you ask after seeing what I did—"

"That night at Mrs. Grendon's? Well, it's the first time I have asked it."

Mrs. Brook had a silence more pregnant. "It's for being with us that he pities her."

Edward thought. "With me too?"

"Not so much—but still you help."

"I thought you thought I didn't—that night."

"At Tishy's? Oh, you didn't matter," said Mrs. Brook. "Everything, every one helps. Harold distinctly"—she seemed to figure it all out—"and even the poor children, I dare say, a little. Oh, but every one"—she warmed to the vision—"it's perfect. Jane immensely, par exemple. Almost the others who come to the house. Cashmore, Carrie, Tishy, Fanny—bless their hearts all!—each in their degree."

Edward Brookenham, under the influence of this demonstration, had gradually risen from his seat, and as his wife approached that part of her process which might be expected to furnish the proof he placed himself before her with his back to the fire. "And Mitchy, I suppose?"

But he was out. "No. Mitchy's different."

He wondered. "Different?"

"Not a help. Quite a drawback." Then as his face told how these were involutions, "you needn't understand, but you can believe me," she added. "The one who does most is of course Van himself." It was a statement by which his failure to apprehend was not diminished, and she completed her operation. "By not liking her."

Edward's gloom, on this, was not quite blankness, yet it was dense. "Do you like his not liking her?"

"Dear no. No better than he does."

"And he doesn't—?"

"Oh, he hates it."

"Of course I haven't asked him," Edward appeared to say more to himself than to his wife."

"And of course I haven't," she returned—not at all in this case, plainly, for herself. "But I know it. He'd like her if he could, but he can't. That," Mrs. Brook wound up, "is what makes it sure."

There was at last in Edward's gravity a positive pathos. "Sure he won't propose?"

"Sure Mr. Longdon won't now throw her over."

"Of course if it is sure—"

"Well?"

"Why, it is. But of course if it isn't—"

"Well?"

"Why, she won't have anything. Anything but us," he continued to reflect. "Unless, you know, you're working it on a certainty—"

"That's just what I am working it on. I did nothing till I knew I was safe."

"'Safe'?" he ambiguously echoed, while, on this, their eyes met longer.

"Safe. I knew he would stick."

"But how did you know Van wouldn't?"

"No matter 'how'—but better still. He hasn't stuck." She said it very simply, but she turned away from him. His eyes, for a little, followed her. "We don't know, after all, the old chap's means."

"I don't know what you mean by 'we' don't. Nanda does."

"But where's the support if she doesn't tell us?"

Mrs. Brook, who had faced about, again turned from him. "I hope you don't forget," she remarked with superiority, "that we don't ask her."

"You don't?" Edward gloomed.

"Never. But I trust her."

"Yes," he mused afresh, "one must trust one's child. Does Van?" he then inquired.

"Does he trust her?"

"Does he know anything of the general figure?"

She hesitated. "Everything. It's high."

"He has told you so?"

Mrs. Brook, supremely impatient now, seemed to demur even to the question. "We ask him even less."

"Then how do we know?"

She was weary of explaining. "Because that's just why he hates it."

There was no end, however, apparently, to what Edward could take. "But hates what?"

"Why, not liking her."

Edward kept his back to the fire and his dead eyes on the cornice and the ceiling. "I shouldn't think it would be so difficult."

"Well, you see it isn't. Mr. Longdon can manage it."

"I don't see what the devil's the matter with her," he coldly continued.

"Ah, that may not prevent—! It's fortunately the source, at any rate, of half Mr. Longdon's interest."

"But what the hell is it?" he drearily demanded.

She faltered a little, but she brought it out. "It's me."

"And what's the matter with 'you'?"

She made, at this, a movement that drew his eyes to her own, and for a moment she dimly smiled at him. "That's the nicest thing you ever said to me. But ever, ever, you know."

"Is it?" She had her hand on his sleeve, and he looked almost awkward.

"Quite the very nicest. Consider that fact well, and, even if you only said it by accident, don't be funny—as you know you sometimes can be—and take it back. It's all right. It's charming, isn't it? when our troubles bring us more together. Now go up to her."

Edward kept a queer face, into which this succession of remarks introduced no light; but he finally moved, and it was only when he had almost reached the door that he stopped again. "Of course you know he has sent her no end of books."

"Mr. Longdon—of late? Oh yes, a deluge, so that her room looks like a bookseller's back shop; and all, in the loveliest bindings, the most standard English works. I not only know it, naturally, but I know—what you don't—why."

"Why'?" Edward echoed. "Why but that—unless he should send her money—it's about the only kindness he can show her at a distance?"

Mrs. Brook hesitated; then, with a little suppressed sigh: "That's it."

But it still held him. "And perhaps he does send her money."

"No. Not now."

Edward lingered. "Then is he taking it out—"

"In books only?" It was wonderful—with its effect on him now visible—how she possessed her subject. "Yes, that's his delicacy—for the present."

"And you're not afraid for the future—?"

"Of his considering that the books will have worked it off? No. They're thrown in."

Just perceptibly cheered, he reached the door, where, however, he had another pause. "You don't think I had better see Van?"

She stared. "What for?"

"Why, to ask what the devil he means."

"If you should do anything so hideously vulgar," she instantly replied, "I would leave your house the next hour. Do you expect," she asked, "to be able to force your child down his throat?"

He was clearly not prepared with an account of his expectations, but he had a general memory that imposed itself. "Then why in the world did he make up to us?"

"He didn't. We made up to him."

"But why in the world—?"

"Well," said Mrs. Brook, really to finish, "we were in love with him."

"Oh!" Edward jerked. He had by this time opened the door, and the sound was partly the effect of the disclosure of a servant preceding a visitor. His greeting of the visitor before edging past and away was, however, of the briefest and might have implied that they had met but yesterday. "How d'ye do, Mitchy?—At home? Oh, rather!"

* Began in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2180.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

XXXIII.

Very different was Mrs. Brook's welcome of the restored wanderer, to whom, in a brief space, she addressed every expression of surprise and delight, though marking indeed at last, as a qualification of these things, her regret that he declined to partake of her tea or to allow her to make him what she called "snug for a talk" in his customary corner of her sofa. He pleaded frankly agitation and embarrassment, reminded her even that he was awfully shy and that after separations, complications, whatever might at any time happen, he was conscious of the dust that had settled on intercourse and that he couldn't blow away in a single breath. She was only, according to her nature, to indulge him if, while he walked about and changed his place, he came to the surface but in patches and pieces. There was so much he wanted to know that—well, as they had arrived only the night before, she could judge. There was knowledge, it became clear, that Mrs. Brook almost equally craved, so that it even looked at first, as if, on either side, confidence might be choked by curiosity. This disaster was finally barred by the fact that the spirit of inquiry found for Mitchy material that was comparatively plastic. That was after all apparent enough when, at the end of a few vain passes, he brought out sociably: "Well, has he done it?"

Still indeed there was something in Mrs. Brook's face that seemed to reply "Oh come—don't rush it, you know!" and something in the movement with which she turned away that described the state of their question as by no means so simple as that. On his refusal of tea she had rung for the removal of the table, and the bell was at this moment answered by the two men. Little ensued then, for some minutes, while the servants were present; she spoke only as the butler was about to close the door. "If Mr. Longdon presently comes show him into Mr. Brookenham's room if Mr. Brookenham isn't there. If he is, show him into the dining-room, and in either case let me immediately know."

The man waited, expressionless. "And in case of his asking for Miss Brookenham—?"

"He won't!" she replied with a sharpness before which her interlocutor retired. "He will!" she then added in quite another tone to Mitchy. "That is, you know, he perfectly may. But oh the subtlety of servants!" she sighed.

Mitchy was now all there. "Mr. Longdon's in town then?"

"For the first time since you went away. He's to call this afternoon."

"And you want to see him alone?"

Mrs. Brook thought. "I don't think I want to see him at all."

"Then your keeping him below—?"

"Is so that he shan't burst in till I know. It's you, my dear, I want to see."

Mitchy glared about. "Well, don't take it ill if, in return for that, I say that I myself want to see every one. I could have done even, just now, with a little more of Edward."

Mrs. Brook, in her own manner and with a slow head-shake, looked lovely. "I couldn't." Then she puzzled it out with a pause: "It even does come over me that if you don't mind—"

"What, my dear woman," said Mitchy, encouragingly, "did I ever mind? I assure you," he laughed, "I haven't come back to begin!"

At this suddenly, dropping everything else, she laid her hand on him. "Mitchy love, are you happy?"

So for a moment they stood confronted. "Not perhaps as you would have tried to make me."

"Well, you've still got me, you know."

"Oh," said Mitchy, "I've got a great deal. How, if I really look at it, can a man of my peculiar nature—it is, you know, awfully peculiar—not be happy? Think, if one is driven to it, for instance, of the breadth of my sympathies."

Mrs. Brook, as a result of thinking, appeared for a little to demur. "Yes—but one mustn't be too much driven to it. It's by one's sympathies that one suffers. If you should do that, I couldn't bear it."

She clearly evoked for Mitchy a definite image. "It would be funny, wouldn't it? But you wouldn't have to. I'd go off and do it alone somewhere—in a dark room, I think, or on a desert island; at any rate where nobody should see. Where's the harm, moreover," he went on, "of any suffering that doesn't bore one, as I'm sure, however much its outer aspect might amuse some others, mine wouldn't bore me? What I should do in my desert island or my dark room, I feel, would be just to dance about with the thrill of it—which is exactly the exhibition of ludicrous gambols that I would fain have arranged to spare you. I assure you, dear Mrs. Brook," he wound up, "that I'm not in the least bored now. Everything is so interesting."

"You're beautiful!" she vaguely interposed.

But he pursued without heeding: "Was it perhaps what you had in your head that I should see him—?"

She came back but slowly, however, to the moment. "Mr. Longdon? Well, yes. You know he can't bear me—"

"Yes, yes"—Mitchy was almost eager.

It had already sent her off again. "You're too lovely. You have come back the same. It seemed to me," she after an instant explained, "that I wanted him to be seen—"

"Without inconvenience, as it were, either to himself or to you? Then," said Mitchy, who visibly felt that he had taken her up successfully, "it strikes me that I'm absolutely your man. It's delicious to come back to a use."

But she was much more dim about it. "Oh, what you've come back to!"

"It's just what I'm trying to get at. Van is still then where I left him?"

She was just silent. "Did you really believe he would move?"

Mitchy took a few turns, speaking almost with his back presented. "Well, with all the reasons—!" After which, while she watched him, he was before her again with a question. "Is it utterly off?"

"When was it ever really on?"

"Oh, I know your view, and that. I think," said Mitchy, "is the most extraordinary part of it. I can tell you it would have put me on."

"My view?" Mrs. Brook thought. "Have you forgotten that I had for you too a view that didn't?"

"Ah, but we didn't differ, you and I. It wasn't a defiance and a prophecy. You wanted me."

"I did indeed!" Mrs. Brook said simply.

"And you didn't want him. For her, I mean. So you risked showing it."

She looked surprised. "Did I?"

Again they were face to face. "Your candor's divine!"

She wondered. "Do you mean it was even then?"

Mitchy smiled at her till he was red. "It's exquisite now."

"Well," she presently returned, "I knew my Van!"

"I thought I knew 'yours' too," Mitchy said. Their eyes met a minute, and he added: "But I didn't." Then he exclaimed: "How you've worked it!"

She looked barely conscious. "'Worked it?'" After which, with a slightly sharper note: "How do you know—while you've been amusing yourself in places that I'd give my head to see again, but never shall—what I've been doing?"

"Well, I saw, you know, that night at Tishy's, just before we left England, your wonderful start. I got a look at your attitude, as it were, and your system."

Her eyes were now far away, and she spoke, after an instant, without moving them. "And didn't I, by the same token, get a look at yours?"

"Mine?" Mitchy thought, but seemed to doubt. "My dear child, I hadn't any then."

"You mean that it has formed itself—your system—since?"

He shook his head with decision. "I assure you I'm quite at sea. I've never had, and I have as little as ever now, anything but my general philosophy, which I won't attempt at present to go into and of which, moreover, I think you've had, first and last, your glimpses. What I made out in you that night was a perfect policy."

Mrs. Brook had another of her infantine stares. "Every one, that night, seems to have made out something! All I can say is, at any rate," she went on, "that in that case you were all far deeper than I was."

"It was just a blind instinct, without a programme or a scheme? Perhaps then, since it has so perfectly succeeded, the name doesn't matter. I'm lost, as I tell you," Mitchy declared, "in admiration of its success."

She looked, as before, so young, yet so grave. "What do you call its success?"

"Let me ask you rather—may'n't I?—what you call its failure."

Mrs. Brook, who had been standing for some minutes, seated herself, at this, as if to respond to his call. But the next moment she had fallen back into thought. "Have you often heard from him?"

"Never once."

"And have you written?"

"Not a word either. I left it, you see." Mitchy smiled, "all to you." After which he continued: "Has he been with you much?"

She just hesitated. "As little as possible. But, as it happens, he was here just now."

Her visitor fairly flushed. "And I've only missed him?"

Her pause again was of the briefest. "You wouldn't if he had gone up."

"'Gone up?'"

"To Nanda, who has now her own sitting-room, as you know, for whom he immediately asked, and for whose benefit, whatever you may think, I was, at the end of a quarter of an hour I assure you, perfectly ready to release him. He changed his mind, however, and went away without seeing her."

Mitchy showed the deepest interest. "And what made him change his mind?"

"Well, I'm thinking it out."

He appeared to watch this labor. "But with no light yet?"

"When it comes I'll tell you."

He hung fire, once more, but an instant. "You didn't, yourself, work the thing again?"

She rose, at this, in strange sincerity. "I think, you know, you go very far."

"Why, didn't we just now settle," he promptly replied, "that it's all instinctive and unconscious? If it was so that night at Tishy's—"

"Ah, voyons, voyons," she broke in, "what did I do even then?"

He laughed out at something in her tone. "You'd like it again all pictured—?"

"I'm not afraid."

"Why, you just simply—publicly—took her back."

"And where was the monstrosity of that?"

"In the one little right place. In your removal of every doubt—"

"Well, of what?" He had appeared not quite to know how to put it.

But he saw at last. "Why, of what we may still hope to do for her. Thanks to your care, there were specimens." Then as she had the look of trying vainly to focus a few, "I can't recover them one by one," he pursued, "but the whole thing was quite lurid enough to do us all credit."

She met him after a little, but at such an odd point. "Excuse me if I scarcely see how much of the credit was yours. For the first time since I've known you, you went in for decency."

Mitchy's surprise showed as real. "It struck you as decency—?"

Since he wished she thought it over. "Oh, your behavior—"

"My behavior was—my condition. Do you call that decent? No, you're quite out." He spoke, in his good-nature, with an approach to reproof. "How can I ever—"

But it had already brought her quite round, and to a firmer earth that she clearly preferred to tread. "Are things really bad with you, Mitch?"

"Well, I'll tell you how they are. But not now."

"Some other time?—on your honor?"

"You shall have them all. Don't be afraid."

She dimly smiled. "It will be like old times."

He rather demurred. "For you perhaps. But not for me."

In spite of what he said it did hold her, and her hand again almost caressed him. "But—till you do tell me—is it very, very dreadful?"

"That's just, perhaps, what I may have to get you to decide."

"Then shall I help you?" she eagerly asked.

"I think it will be quite in your line."

At the thought of her line—it sounded somehow so general—she released him a little with a sigh, yet still looking round, as it were, for possibilities. "Jane, you know, is in a state."

"Yes, Jane's in a state. That's a comfort!"

She continued in a manner to cling to him. "But is it your only one?"

He was very kind and patient. "Not perhaps quite."

"I'm a little of one?"

"My dear child, as you see."

Yes, she saw, but was still launched. "And shall you have recourse—?"

"To what?" he asked as she appeared to falter.

"I don't mean to anything violent. But shall you tell Nanda?"

Mitchy wondered. "Tell her—?"

"Well, everything. I think, you know," Mrs. Brook musingly observed, "that it would really serve her right."

Mitchy's silence, which lasted a minute, seemed to take the idea, but not perhaps quite to know what to do with it. "Ah, I'm afraid I shall never really serve her right!"

Just as he spoke the butler reappeared; at the sight of whom Mrs. Brook immediately guessed. "Mr. Longdon?"

"In Mr. Brookenham's room, ma'am. Mr. Brookenham has gone out."

"And where has he gone?"

"I think, ma'am, only for some evening papers."

She had an intense look for Mitchy; then she said to the man: "Ask him to wait three minutes—I'll ring;" turning again to her visitor as soon as they were alone. "You don't know how I'm trusting you!"

"Trusting me?"

"Why, if he comes up to you."

Mitchy thought. "Hadn't I better go down?"

"No—you may have Edward back. If you see him, you must see him here. If I don't myself, it's for a reason."

Mitchy again just sounded her. "His not, as you awhile ago hinted—"

"Yes, caring for what I say." She had a pause, but she brought it out. "He doesn't believe a word—"

"Of what you tell him?" Mitchy was splendid. "I see. And you want something said to him."

"Yes, that he'll take from you. Only it's for you," Mrs. Brook went on, "really and honestly, and as I trust you, to give it. But the comfort of you is that you'll do so if you promise."

Mitchy was infinitely struck. "But I haven't promised, eh? Of course I can't till I know what it is."

"It's to put before him—"

"Oh, I see: the situation."

"What has happened here to-day. Van's marked retreat, and how, with the time that has passed, it makes us at last know where we are. You of course, for yourself," Mrs. Brook wound up, "see that."

"Where we are?" Mitchy took a turn and came back. "But what then did Van come for? If you speak of a retreat, there must have been an advance."

"Oh," said Mrs. Brook, "he simply wanted not to look too brutal. After so much absence he could come."

"Well, if he established that he wasn't brutal, where was the retreat?"

"In his not going up to Nanda. He came—frankly—to do that, but made up his mind on second thoughts that he couldn't risk even being civil to her."

Mitchy had visibly warmed to his work. "Well, and what made the difference?"

She wondered. "What difference?"

"Why, of the effect, as you say, of his second thoughts. Thoughts of what?"

"Oh," said Mrs. Brook suddenly and as if it were quite simple—"I know that! Suspicions."

"And of whom?"

"Why, of you, you goose. Of your not having done—"

"Well, what?" he persisted as she paused.

"How shall I say it? The best thing for yourself. And of Nanda's feeling that. Don't you see?"

In the effort of seeing, or perhaps indeed in the full act of it, poor Mitchy glared as never before. "Do you mean Van's jealous of me?"

Pressed as she was, there was something in his face that momentarily hushed her. "There it is!" she achieved, however, at last.

"Of me?" Mitchy went on.

What was in his face so suddenly and strangely was the look of rising tears—at sight of which, as from a compunction as prompt, she showed a lovely flush. "There it is, there it is," she repeated. "You ask me for a reason, and it's the only one I see. Of course if you don't care," she added, "he needn't come up. He can go straight to Nanda."

Mitchy had turned away again as with the impulse of hiding the tears that had risen and that had not wholly disappeared even by the time he faced about. "Did Nanda know he was to come?"

"Mr. Longdon?"

"No, no. Was she expecting Van—?"

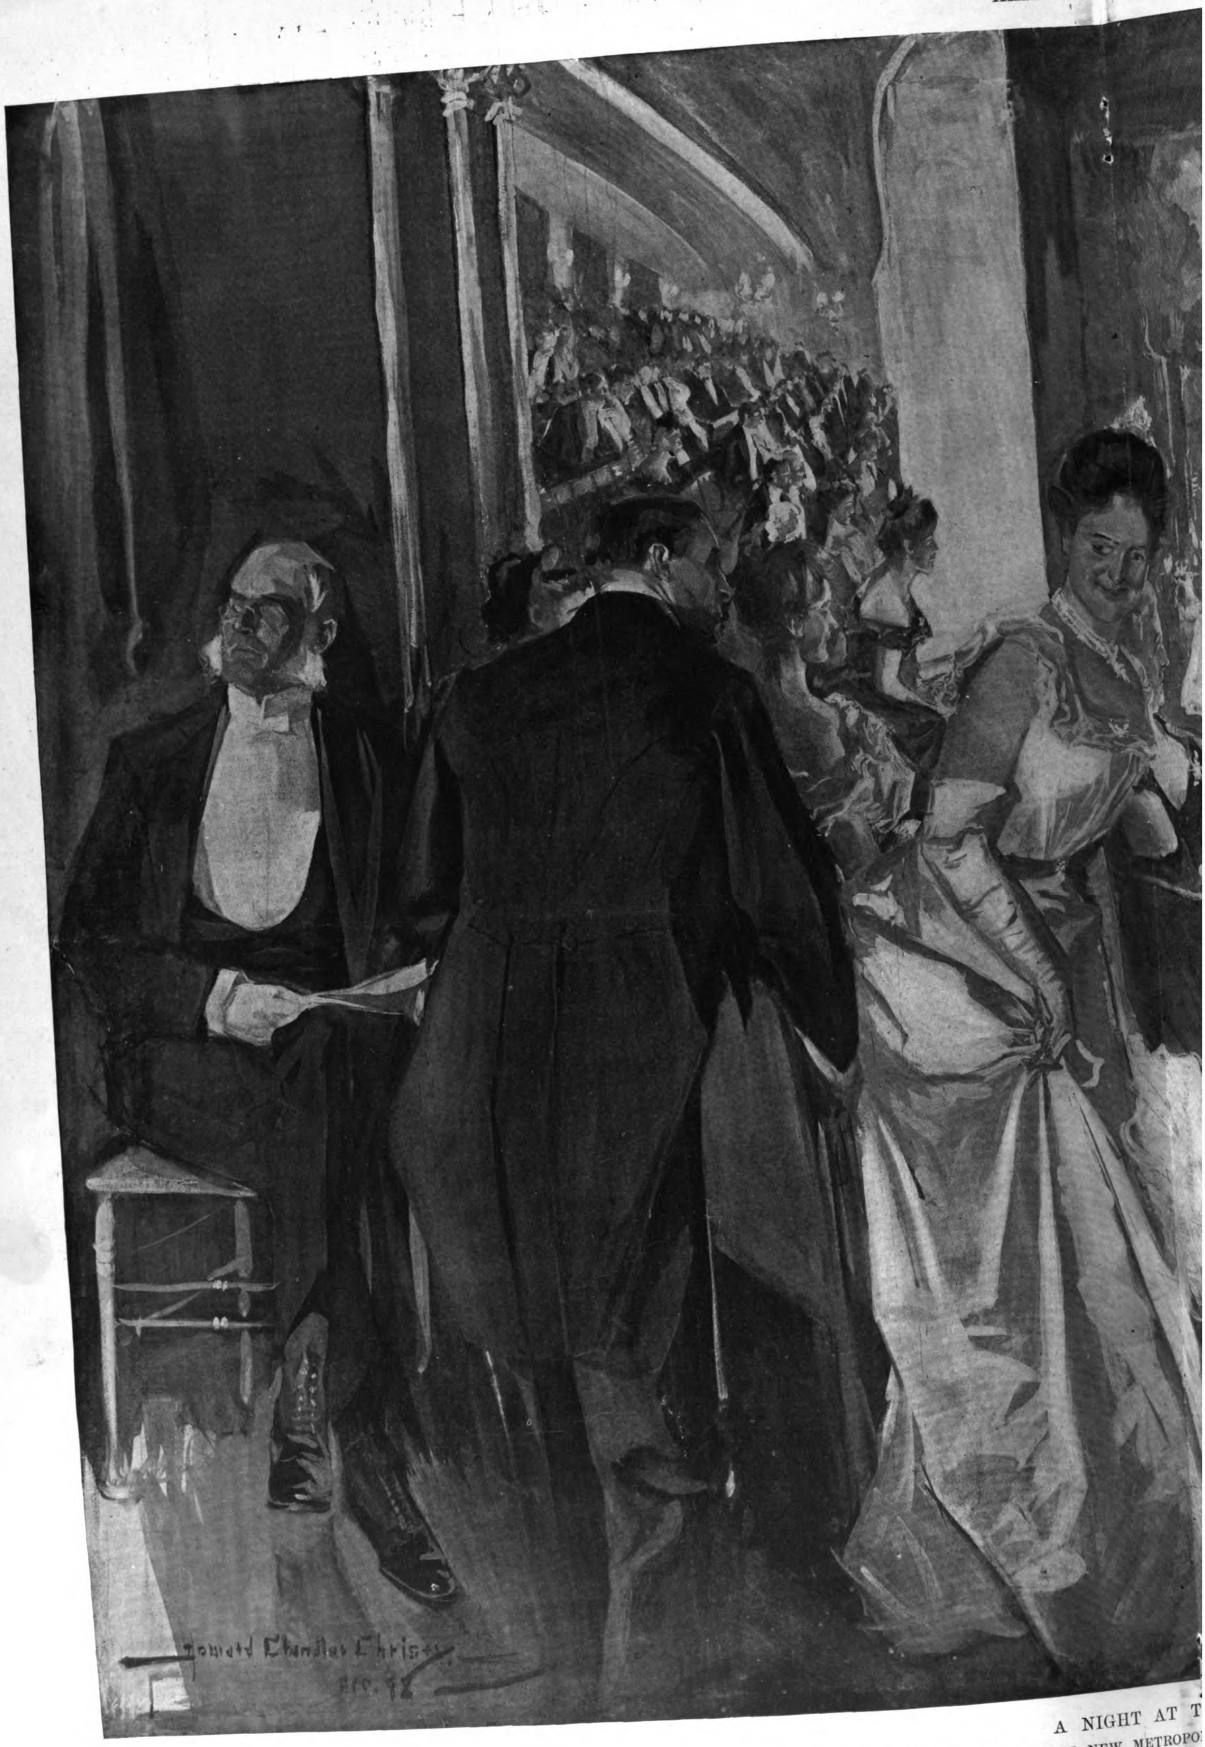
"My dear man," Mrs. Brook mildly wailed, "when can she have not been?"

Mitchy looked hard for an instant at the floor. "I mean does she know he has been and gone?"

Mrs. Brook, from where she stood and through the window, looked rather at the sky. "Her father will have told her."

"Her father?" Mitchy frankly wondered. "Is he in it?"

Mrs. Brook, at this, had a longer pause. "You assume, I suppose, Mitchy dear," she then quavered, that I put him up—"



"Put Edward up?" he broke in.

"No—that of course. Put Van up to ideas—"

He caught it again. "About me—what you call his suspicions?" He seemed to weigh the charge, but it ended, while he passed his hand hard over his eyes, in weariness and in the nearest approach to coldness he had ever shown Mrs. Brook. "It doesn't matter. It's every one's fate to be, in one way or another, the subject of ideas. Do then," he continued, "let Mr. Longdon come up."

She instantly rang the bell. "Then I'll go to Nanda. But don't look frightened," she added as she came back,

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A NIGHT AT T

A PRESENTATION OF "LOHENGRIN" AT THE NEW METROPO

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A NIGHT AT THE OPERA.

N" AT THE NEW METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.—Drawn by Howard Chandler Christy.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

o what we may—Edward or I—do next. It's only l her that he'll be with her."

Good. I'll tell Tatton," Mitchy replied.

ll, however, she lingered. "Shall you ever care for nore?"

e had almost the air, as he waited for her to go, of master of the house, for she had made herself before , as he stood with his back to the fire, as humble as a gated visitor. "Oh, just as much. Where's the dif- nce? Aren't our ties in fact rather multiplied?"

That's the way I want to feel it. And from the mo- t you recognize with me—"

Yes?"

Well, that he never, you know, really would—"

He took her mercifully up. "There's no harm done?" chy thought of it. "Nanda will be rich. Toward t made her still hover. "Nanda will be rich. Toward at you can help, and it's really, I may now tell you, at it came into my head you should see our friend re for."

He maintained his waiting attitude. "Thanks, thanks." "You're our guardian angel!" she exclaimed.

At this he laughed out. "Wait till you see what Mr. ongdon does!"

But she took no notice. "I want you to see before I o that I've done nothing for myself. Van, after all—" he mused.

"Well?"

"Only hates me. It isn't as with you," she said. "I've eally lost him."

Mitchy, for an instant, with the eyes that had shown his ears, glared away into space. "He can't, very positive- y, you know, now like any of us. He misses a fortune."

"There it is!" Mrs. Brook once more observed. Then she had a comparative brightness. "I'm so glad you don't!" He gave another laugh, but she was already facing Mr. Tatton, who had again answered the bell. "Show Mr. Longdon up."

"I'm to tell him, then, it's at your request?" Mitchy asked when the butler had gone.

"That you receive him? Oh yes. He'll be the last to quarrel with that. But there's one more thing."

It was something over which, of a sudden, she had one of her returns of anxiety. "I've been trying for months and months to remember to find out from you—"

"Well, what?" he inquired, as she looked odd.

"Why, if Harold ever gave back to you, as he swore to me on his honor he would, that five-pound note—"

"But which, dear lady?" The sense of other incon- gruities than those they had been dealing with seemed to arrive now for Mitchy's said.

"The one that, ages ago, one day when you and Van were here, we had the joke about. You produced it, in sport, as a 'fine' for something, and put it on that table; after which, before I knew what you were about, before I could run after you, you had gone off and ridiculously left it. Of course, the next minute—and again before I could turn round—Harold had pounced on it, and I tried in vain to recover it from him. But all I could get him to do—"

"Was to promise to restore it straight to its owner?" Mitchy had listened so much less in surprise than in amusement that he had apparently, after a moment, re- established the scene. "Oh, I recollect—he did settle with me. That's all right."

She fixed him from the door of the next room. "You got every penny?"

"Every penny. But fancy your bringing it up!"

"Ah, I always do, you know, some day."

"Yes, you're of a rigor—! But be at peace. Harold's en regle," he went on, "and I quite meant to have asked you about him."

Mrs. Brook, promptly, was all for this. "Oh, it's all right."

Mitchy came nearer. "Lady Fanny—?"

"Yes—has staid for him."

"Ah," said Mitchy, "I knew you'd do it! But hush—they re coming!" On which, while she whisked away, he went back to the fire.

XXXIV.

Ten minutes of talk with Mr. Longdon by Mrs. Brook- enham's hearth elapsed, for Mitchy, without his arriving at the right moment to take up the business so richly put before him in his previous interview. No less time in- deed could have sufficed to bring him into closer relation with this affair, and nothing, at first, could have been more marked than the earnestness of his care not to show impatience of inquiries that were, for a person of his old friend's general style, simple recognitions and decencies. There was a limit to the mere allusiveness with which, in Mr. Longdon's school of manners, a foreign tour might be treated, and Mitchy, no doubt, plentifully showed that none of his frequent returns had encountered a curiosity at once so explicit and so discreet. To belong to a circle in which most of the members might be at any moment on the other side of the globe was inevitably to fall into the habit of few questions, as well as into that of making up for their fewness by their freedom. This interlocu- tor, in short, while Mrs. Brook's representative privately thought over all he had in hand, went at some length and very charmingly—since it was but a tribute to common courtesy—into the Virgilian associations of the Bay of Naples. Finally, however, he started, his eye on the clock. "I'm afraid that, though our hostess doesn't ap- pear, I mustn't forget myself. I too came back but yes- terday and I've an engagement—for which I'm already late—with Miss Brookenham, who has been so good as to ask me to tea."

The divided mind, the express civility, the decent "Miss Brookenham," the escape from their hostess— these were all things Mitchy could quickly take in, and they gave him in a moment his light for not missing his occasion. "I see, I see—I shall make you keep Nanda waiting. But there's something I shall ask you to take from me as quite a sufficient basis for that: which is sim- ply that after all, you know—for I think you do know, don't you?—I'm nearly as much attached to her as you are."

Mr. Longdon had looked suddenly apprehensive and even a trifle embarrassed, but he spoke with due presence of mind. "Of course I understand that perfectly. If you hadn't liked her so much—"

"Well?" said Mitchy, as he checked himself.

"I would never, last year, have gone to stay with you."

"Thank you!" Mitchy laughed.

"Though I like you also—and extremely," Mr. Long- don gravely pursued, "for yourself."

Mitchy made a sign of acknowledgment. "You like me better for her than you do for anybody else but myself."

"You put it, I think, correctly. Of course I've not seen so much of Nanda—if between my age and hers, that is, any real contact is possible—without knowing that she now regards you as one of the very best of her friends, treating you, I almost fancy, with a degree of confidence—"

Mitchy gave a laugh of interruption. "That she doesn't show even to you?"

Mr. Longdon's poised glasses faced him. "Even! I don't mind," the old man went on, "as the opportunity has come up, telling you frankly—and as from my time of life to your own—all the comfort I take in the sense that in any case of need or trouble she might look to you for whatever advice or support the affair might demand."

"She has told you she feels I'd be there?" Mitchy after an instant asked.

"I'm not sure," his friend replied, "that I ought quite to mention anything she has 'told' me. I speak of what I've made out for myself."

"Then I thank you more than I can say for your pen- etration. Her mother, I should let you know," Mitchy continued, "is with her just now."

Mr. Longdon, with a jerk, took off his glasses. "Has anything happened to her?"

"To account for the fact I refer to?" Mitchy said in amusement at his start. "She's not ill, that I know of, thank goodness, and she has not broken her leg. But something, none the less, has happened to her—that, I think, I may say. To tell you all, in a word, it's the rea- son, such as it is, of my being here to meet you. Mrs. Brook asked me to wait. She'll see you herself some other time."

Mr. Longdon wondered. "And Nanda too?"

"Oh, that must be between yourselves. Only, while I keep you here—"

"She understands my delay?"

Mitchy thought. "Mrs. Brook must have explained." Then as his companion took this in silence, "But you don't like it?" he inquired.

"It only comes to me that Mrs. Brook's explanations—"

"Are often odd? Oh yes. But Nanda, you know, allows for that oddity. And Mrs. Brook, by the same token," Mitchy developed, "knows herself—no one better —what may frequently be thought of it. That's precisely the reason of her desire that you should have, on this oc- casion, explanations from a source that she's so good as to pronounce, for the immediate purpose, superior. As for Nanda," he wound up, "to be aware that we're here to- gether won't strike her as so bad a sign."

"No," Mr. Longdon attentively assented; "she'll hard- ly fear we're plotting her ruin. But what has happened to her?" he more sharply demanded.

"Well," said Mitchy, "it's you, I think, who will have to give it a name. I know you know what I've known."

Mr. Longdon, with his nippers again placed, hesitated. "Yes, I know."

"And you've accepted it."

"How could I help it? To reckon with such clever- ness—"

"Was beyond you? Ah, it wasn't my cleverness," Mitchy said. "There's a greater than mine. There's a greater even than Van's. That's the whole point," he went on while his friend looked at him hard. "You don't even like it just a little?"

Mr. Longdon wondered. "The existence of such an element—?"

"No; the existence, simply, of my knowledge of your idea."

"I suppose I'm bound to keep in mind in fairness the existence of my own knowledge of yours."

But Mitchy gave that the go-by. "Oh, I've so many 'ideas'! I'm always getting hold of some new one and, for the most part, trying it—generally to let it go as a failure. Yes, I had one six months ago. I tried that. I'm trying it still."

"Then I hope," said Mr. Longdon, with a gayety slightly strained, "that, contrary to your usual rule, it's a success."

It was a gayety, for that matter, that Mitchy's could match. "It does promise well! But I've another idea even now, and it's just what I'm again trying."

"On me?" Mr. Longdon still somewhat extravagantly smiled.

Mitchy thought. "Well, on two or three persons, of whom you are the first for me to tackle. But what I must begin with is having from you that you recognize she trusts us."

"Nanda?"

Mitchy's idea, after an instant, had visibly gone further. "Both of them—the two women, up there, at present so strangely together. Mrs. Brook must too, immensely. But for that you won't care."

Mr. Longdon had relapsed into an anxiety more natural than his expression of a moment before. "It's about time! But if Nanda didn't trust us," he went on, "her case would indeed be a sorry one. She has nobody else."

"Yes." Mitchy's concurrence was grave. "Only you and me."

"Only you and me."

The eyes of the two men met over it in a pause ter- minated at last by Mitchy's saying: "We must make it all up to her."

"Is that your idea?"

"Ah," said Mitchy gently, "don't laugh at it."

His friend's gray gloom again covered him. "But what can—?" Then as Mitchy showed a face that seemed to wince with a silent "What could?" the old man com- pleted his objection. "Think of the magnitude of the loss."

"Oh, I don't for a moment suggest," Mitchy hastened to reply, "that it isn't immense."

"She does care for him, you know," said Mr. Longdon.

Mitchy, at this, gave a long, wide glare. "Know—?"

he ever so delicately murmured.

His irony had quite touched. "But of course you know! You know everything—Nanda and you."

There was a tone in it that moved a spring, and Mitchy laughed out. "I like your putting me with her! But we're all together. With Nanda," he next added, "it is deep."

His companion took it from him. "Deep."

"And yet somehow it isn't abject."

The old man wondered. "'Abject'?"

"I mean it isn't, pitiful. In its way," Mitchy devel- oped, "it's happy."

This too, though rather ruefully, Mr. Longdon could take from him. "Yes—in its way."

"Any passion so great, so complete," Mitchy went on, "is—satisfied or unsatisfied—a life." Mr. Longdon looked so interested that his fellow-visitor, evidently touched by what was now an appeal and a dependence, grew still more bland, or at least more assured, for affirmation. "She's not too sorry for herself."

"Ah, she's so proud!"

"Yes, but that's a help."

"Oh—not for us!"

It arrested Mitchy, but his ingenuity could only re- bound. "In one way: that of reducing us to feel that the desire to 'make up' to her is—well, mainly for our relief. If she 'trusts' us, as I said just now, it isn't for that she does so." As his friend appeared to wait then to hear, it was presently with positive joy that he showed he could meet the last difficulty. "What she trusts us to do"—oh, Mitchy had worked it out!—"is to let him off."

"Let him off?" It still left Mr. Longdon dim.

"Easily. That's all."

"But what would letting him off hard be? It seems to me he's—on any terms—already beyond us. He is off."

Mr. Longdon had given it a sound that suddenly made Mitchy appear to collapse under a sharper sense of the matter. "He is off," he moodily echoed.

His companion, again a little bewildered, watched him; then with impatience: "Do, please, tell me what has happened."

He quickly pulled himself round. "Well, he was, after a long absence, here a while since, as if expressly to see her. But after spending half an hour, he went away with- out it."

Mr. Longdon's watch continued. "He spent the half- hour with her mother instead?"

"Oh, 'instead'—it was hardly that. He at all events dropped his iden."

"And what had it been, his idea?"

"You speak as if he had as many as I!" Mitchy re- plied. "In a manner indeed he has," he continued as if for himself. "But they're of a different kind," he said to Mr. Longdon.

"What had it been, his idea?" the old man, however, simply repeated.

Mitchy's confession, at this, seemed to explain his pre- vious evasion. "We shall never know."

Mr. Longdon hesitated. "He won't tell you?"

"Me?" Mitchy had a pause. "Less than any one."

Many things they had not spoken had already passed between them, and something, evidently, to the sense of each, passed during the moment that followed this. "While you were abroad," Mr. Longdon presently asked, "did you hear from him?"

"Never. And I wrote nothing."

"Like me," said Mr. Longdon. "I've neither written nor heard."

"Ah, but with you it will be different." Mr. Long- don, as if with the outbreak of an agitation hitherto con- trolled, had turned abruptly away and, with the usual swing of his glass, begun almost wildly to wander. "You will hear."

"I shall be curious."

"Oh, but what Nanda wants, you know, is that you shouldn't be too much so."

Mr. Longdon thoughtfully rambled. "Too much—?"

"To let him off, as we were saying, easily."

The elder man, for a while, said nothing more, but he at last came back. "She'd like me actually to give him something?"

"I dare say!"

"Money?"

Mitchy smiled. "A handsome present." They were face to face again, with more mute interchange. "She doesn't want him to have lost—!" Mr. Longdon, how- ever, on this, once more broke off while Mitchy's eyes fol- lowed him. "Doesn't it give a sort of measure of what she may feel—?"

He had paused, working it out again, with the effect of his friend's returning afresh to be fed with his light. "Doesn't what give it?"

"Why, the fact that we still like him."

Mr. Longdon stared. "Do you still like him?"

"If I didn't how should I mind—?" But on the utter- ance of it Mitchy fairly pulled up.

His companion, after another look, laid a mild hand on his shoulder. "What is it you mind?"

"From him? Oh, nothing!" He could trust himself again. "There are people like that—great cases of priv- ilege."

"He is one!" Mr. Longdon mused.

"There it is. They go through life, somehow, guaran- teed. They can't help pleasing."

"Ah," Mr. Longdon murmured, "if it hadn't been for that—!"

"They hold, they keep every one," Mitchy went on. "It's the sacred awe."

The companions, for a little, seemed to stand together in this element; after which the elder turned once more away and appeared to continue to walk in it. "Poor Nanda!" then, in a far-off sigh, came across from him to Mitchy. Mitchy, on this, turned vaguely around to the fire, into which he remained gazing till he heard again Mr. Longdon's voice. "I knew it, of course, after all. It was what I came up for. That night, before you went, at Mrs. Grendon's—"

"Yes?"—Mitchy was with him again.

"Well, it made me see the future. It was then already too late."

Mitchy assented with emphasis. "Too late. She was spoiled for him."

If Mr. Longdon had to take it, he took it at least quiet- ly, only saying after a time: "And her mother isn't?"

"Oh yes. Quite."

"And does she know it?"

"Yes, but doesn't mind. She resembles you and me. She 'still likes' him."

"But what good will that do her?"

Mitchy sketched a shrug. "What good does it do us?" Mr. Longdon thought. "We can at least respect our- selves."

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Can we?" Mitchy smiled.

"And he can respect us," his friend, as if not hearing him, went on.

Mitchy seemed almost to demur. "He must think us queer."

"Well, Mrs. Brook's worse than 'queer.' He can't respect her."

"Oh, that will be perhaps," Mitchy laughed, "what she'll get just most out of!" It was the first time, however, of Mr. Longdon's showing that, even after a minute, he had not understood him; so that, as quickly as possible, he passed to another point. "If you do anything, may I be in it?"

"But what can I do? If it's over it's over."

"For him, yes. But not for her or for you or for me."

"Oh, I'm not for long!" the old man wearily said, turning the next moment to the door, at which one of the footmen had appeared.

"Mrs. Brookenham's compliments, please sir," this messenger articulated, "and Miss Brookenham is now alone."

"Thanks—I'll come up."

The servant withdrew, and the eyes of the two visitors again met for a minute, after which Mitchy looked about for his hat. "Good-by. I'll go."

Mr. Longdon watched him while, having found his hat, he looked about for his stick. "You want to be in everything?"

Mitchy, without answering, smoothed his hat down; then he replied: "You say you're not for long, but you won't abandon her."

"Oh, I mean I shan't last forever."

"Well, since you so expressed it yourself, that's what I mean too. I assure you I shan't desert her. And if I can help you—"

"Help me?" Mr. Longdon interrupted, looking at him hard.

It made him a little awkward. "Help you to help her, you know—!"

"You're very wonderful," Mr. Longdon presently returned. "A year and a half ago you wanted to help me to help Mr. Vanderbank."

"Well," said Mitchy, "you can't quite say I haven't."

"But your ideas of help are of a splendor!"

"Oh, I've told you about my ideas." Mitchy was almost apologetic.

Mr. Longdon hesitated. "I suppose I'm not indiscreet then in recognizing your marriage as one of them. And that, with a responsibility so great already assumed, you appear fairly eager for another—"

"Makes me out a kind of monster of benevolence?" Mitchy looked at it with a flushed face. "The two responsibilities are very much one and the same. My marriage has brought me, as it were, only nearer to Nanda. My wife and she, don't you see? are particular friends."

Mr. Longdon, on his side, turned a trifle pale; he looked rather hard at the floor. "I see—I see." Then he raised his eyes. "But—to an old fellow like me—it's all so strange."

"It is strange." Mitchy spoke very kindly. "But it's all right."

Mr. Longdon gave a head-shake that was both sad and sharp. "It's all wrong. But you're all right!" he added in a different tone as he walked hastily away.

XXXV.

Nanda Brookenham, for a fortnight after Mr. Longdon's return, had found much to think of; but the bustle of business became, visibly for us, particularly great with her on a certain Friday afternoon in June. She was in unusual possession of that chamber of comfort in which so much of her life had lately been passed, the redecorated and redelicated room, upstairs, in which she had enjoyed a due measure both of solitude and society. Passing the objects about her in review, she gave especial attention to her rather marked wealth of books; changed repeatedly, for five minutes, the position of various volumes, transferred to tables those that were on shelves and rearranged shelves with an eye to the effect of backs. She was flagrantly engaged throughout indeed in the study of effect, which moreover, had the law of an extreme freshness not inveterately prevailed there, might have been observed to be traceable in the very detail of her own appearance. "Company," in short, was in the air and expectation in the picture. The flowers on the little tables bloomed with a consciousness sharply taken up by the glitter of knickknacks and reproduced, in turn, in the light exuberance of cushions on sofas, and the measured drop of blinds in windows. The friends in the photographs in particular were highly prepared, with small intense faces, each, that happened in every case to be turned to the door. The pair of eyes most dilated perhaps was that of old Van, present under a polished glass and in a frame of gilt-edged morocco that spoke out, across the room, of Piccadilly and Christmas, and visibly widening his gaze at the opening of the door, the announcement of a name by a footman and the entrance of a gentleman remarkably like him save as the resemblance was, on the gentleman's part, flattered. Vanderbank had not been in the room ten seconds before he showed that he had arrived to be kind. Kindness therefore becomes for us, by a quick turn of the glass that reflects the whole scene, the high pitch of the concert—a kindness that almost immediately filled the place, to the exclusion of everything else, with a familiar, friendly voice, a brightness of good looks and good intentions, a constant, though perhaps sometimes misapplied, laugh, a superabundance, almost, of interest, inattention and movement.

The first thing the young man said was that he was tremendously glad she had written. "I think it was most particularly nice of you." And this thought, precisely, seemed, as he spoke, a flower of the general bloom—as if the niceness he had brought in was so great that it straightway converted everything to its image. "The only thing that upset me a little," he went on, "was your saying that, before writing it, you had so hesitated and waited. I hope very much, you know, that you'll never do anything of that kind again. If you've ever the slightest desire to see me—for no matter what reason; if there's ever the smallest thing of any sort that I can do for you, I promise you I shan't easily forgive you if you stand on ceremony. It seems to me that when people have known each other as long as you and I, there's one comfort at least they may treat themselves to. I mean of course," Van developed, "that of being easy and frank and natural. There are such a lot of relations in which one isn't, in which it doesn't pay, in which 'ease,' in fact, would be the greatest of troubles and 'nature' the greatest of falsities. However," he continued, while he suddenly got up to change the place in which he had put his hat, "I don't really know why I'm preaching at such a rate, for I've a perfect consciousness of not myself requiring it. One does, half the time, preach more or less for one's self, eh? I'm not mistaken, at all events, I think, about the right thing with you. And a hint's enough for you, I'm sure, on the right thing with me." He had been looking all round while he talked, and had twice shifted his seat; so that it was quite in consonance with his general admiring notice that the next impression he broke out with should have achieved some air of relevance. "What extraordinarily lovely flowers you have and how charming you've made everything! You're always doing something—women are always changing the position of their furniture. If you happen to come in in the dark—no matter how well you know the place—you sit down on a teacup or a puppy-dog. But of course, you'll say, one doesn't come in in the dark, or at least, if one does, deserves what one gets. Only you know the way some women keep their rooms. I'm bound to say you don't, do you?—you don't go in for flower-pots in the windows and curtains on curtains. Why should you? You have got a lot to show!" He rose, with this, for the third time, as the better to command the scene. "What I mean is that sofa—which, by-the-way, is awfully good: you do, my dear Nanda, go it! It certainly was here, the last time, wasn't it? and this thing was there. The last time—I mean the last time I was up here—was fearfully long ago: when, by-the-way, was it? But you see I have been and that I remember it. And you've a lot more things now. You're laying up treasure. Really, the increase of luxury—! What an awfully jolly lot of books—have you read them all? Where did you learn so much about bindings?"

He continued to talk; he took things up and put them down; Nanda sat in her place, where her stillness, fixed and colorless, contrasted with his rather flushed freedom, and appeared only to wait, half in surprise, half in surrender, for the flow of his suggestiveness to run its course, so that, having herself provoked the occasion, she might do a little more to meet it. It was by no means, however, that his presence, in any degree, ceased to prevail; for there were minutes during which her face, the only thing in her that moved, turning with his turns and following his glances, actually had a look inconsistent with anything but submission to almost any accident. It might have expressed a desire for his talk to last and last, an acceptance of any treatment of the hour or any version, or want of version, of her act that would best suit his ease, even in fact a resigned prevision of the occurrence of something that would leave her, quenched and blank, with the appearance of having made him come simply that she might look at him. She might indeed well have been aware of an inability to look at him little enough to make it flagrant that she had appealed to him for something quite different. Keeping the situation meanwhile thus in his hands, he recognized, over the chimney, a new alteration. "There used to be a big print—wasn't there? a thing of the fifties—we had lots of them at home; some place or other 'in the olden time,' and virtue? It isn't Esmeralda—Esmeralda had a poodle, hadn't she?—or have I got my heroines mixed? You're up here yourself like a heroine; you're perched in your tower or what do you call it?—your bower. You quite hang over the place, you know—the great wicked city, the wonderful London sky and the monuments looming through: or am I again only muddling up my Zola? You must have the sunsets—haven't you? No—what am I talking about? Of course you look north. Well, they strike me as about the only thing you haven't. At the same time, it's not only because I envy you that I feel humiliated. I ought to have sent you some flowers." He smote himself with horror, throwing back his head with a sudden thought. "Why in goodness, when I got your note, didn't I for once in my life do something really graceful? I simply liked it and answered it. Here I am. But I've brought nothing. I haven't even brought a box of sweets. I'm not a man of the world."

"Most of the flowers here," Nanda at last said, "come from Mr. Longdon. Don't you remember his garden?"

Vanderbank, in quick response, called it up. "Dear yes—wasn't it charming? And that morning you and I spent there"—he was so careful to be easy about it—"talking under the trees."

"You had gone out to be quiet and read—"

"And you came out to look after me. Well, I remember," Van went on, "that we had some good talk."

The talk, Nanda's face implied, had become dim to her; but there were other things. "You know he's a great gardener—I mean really one of the greatest. His garden is like a dinner in a house where the person—the person of the house—thoroughly knows and cares."

"I see. And he sends you dishes from the table."

"Often—every week. That is, now that he's in town, his gardener does it."

"Charming of them both!" Vanderbank exclaimed. "But his gardener—that extraordinarily tall fellow with the long red beard—was almost as nice as himself. I had talks with him too, and I remember every word he said. I remember he told me you asked questions that showed a deal of study.' But I thought I had never seen, all round, such a charming lot of people—I mean as those, down there, that our friend has got about him. It's an awfully good note for a man, pleasant servants, I always think, don't you? Mr. Longdon's—and quite without their saying anything; just from the sort of type and manner they had—struck me as a kind of chorus of praise. The same with Mitchy's, at Merle, I remember," Van rambled on. "Mitchy's the sort of chap who might have awful ones, but I recollect telling him that one quite felt as if it were with them one had come to stay. Good note, good note," he cheerfully repeated. "I'm bound to say, you know," he continued in this key, "that you've a jolly sense for getting in with people who make you comfortable. Then, by-the-way, he's still in town?"

Nanda hesitated. "Do you mean Mr. Mitchy?"

"Oh, he is, I know—I met them two nights ago; and by-the-way again—don't let me forget—I want to speak to you about his wife. But I've not seen, do you know? Mr. Longdon—which is really too awful. Twice, thrice I think, have I at moments like this one snatched myself from pressure; but there's no finding the old demon at any earthly hour. When do you go—or does he only come here? Of course I see you've got the place arranged for him. When I asked at his hotel at what hour he ever was in, blest if the fellow didn't say 'Very often, sir, about ten!' And when I said 'Ten P.M.?' he quite laughed at my innocence over a person of such habits. What are his habits then now, and what are you putting him up to? Seriously," Vanderbank pursued, "I am awfully sorry, and I wonder if, the first time you've a chance, you'd kindly tell him you've heard me say so and that I mean yet to run him to earth. The same, really, with the Mitchys. I didn't, somehow, the other night, in such a lot of people, get at them. But I sat opposite to Aggie all through dinner, and that puts me in mind. I should like volumes from you about Aggie, please. It's too revolting of me not to go to see her. But every one knows I'm busy. We're up to our necks!"

"I can't tell you," said Nanda, "how kind I think it of you to have found, with all you have to do, a moment for this. But please, without delay, let me tell you—"

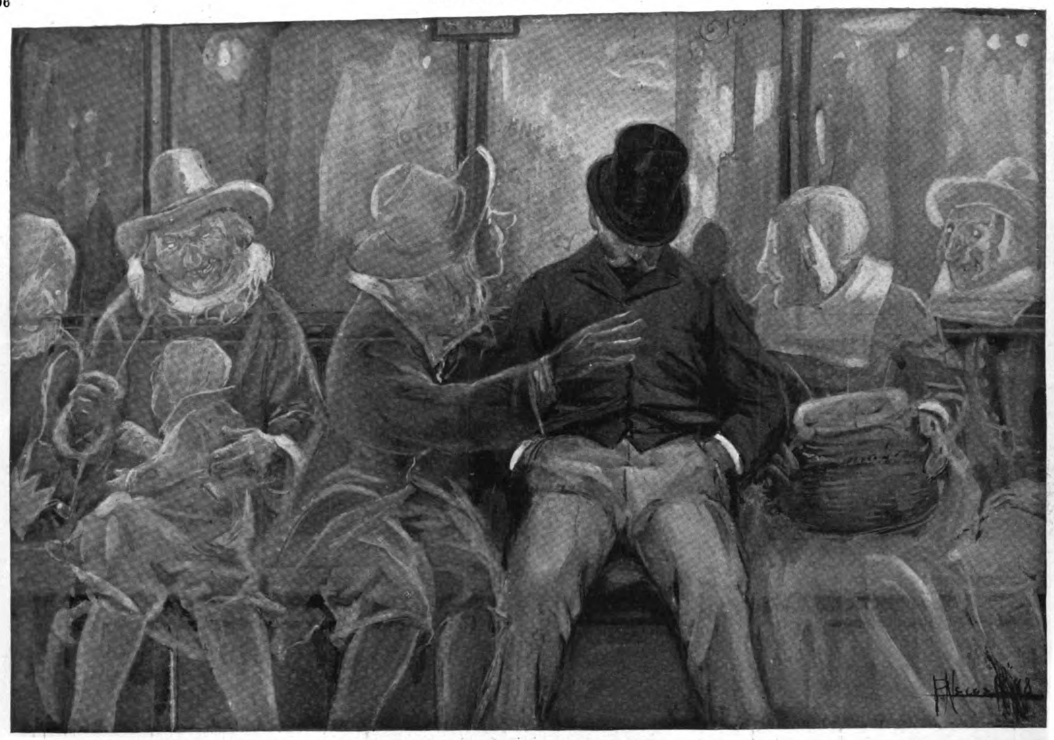
Practically, however, he would let her tell him nothing; his almost aggressive friendly optimism clung so to references of short range. "Don't mention it, please. It's too charming of you to squeeze me in. To see you, moreover, does me good. Quite distinct good. And your writing me touched me—oh, but really. There were all sorts of old things in it." Then he broke out, once more, on her books, one of which, for some minutes past, he had held in his hand. "I see you go in for sets—and, my dear child, upon my word, I see, big sets. What's this?—'Vol. 23: The British Poets.' Vol. 23 is delightful—do tell me about Vol. 23. Are you doing much in the British Poets? But when the deuce, you wonderful being, do you find time to read? I don't find any—it's too hideous. One relapses, in London, into illiteracy and barbarism. I have to keep up a false glitter to hide, in conversation, my rapidly increasing ignorance: I should be so ashamed, after all, to see other people not shocked by it. But teach me, teach me!" he gayly went on.

"The British Poets," Nanda immediately answered, "were given me by Mr. Longdon, who has given me all the good books I have except a few—those in that top row—that have been given me at different times by Mr. Mitchy. Mr. Mitchy has sent me flowers too, as well as Mr. Longdon. And they're both—since we've spoken of my seeing them—coming, by appointment, this afternoon: not together, but Mr. Mitchy at 5.30 and Mr. Longdon at 6.30."

She had spoken as with conscious promptitude, making up for what she had not yet succeeded in saying by a quick, complete statement of her case. She was evidently also going on with more, but her actual visitor, with a laugh, had already taken her up. "You are making a day of it, and you run us like railway trains!" He looked at his watch. "Have I then time?"

"It seems to me I should say 'Have I?' But it's not half past four," Nanda went on, "and though I've something very particular, of course, to say to you, it won't take long. They don't bring tea till five, and you must surely stay till that. I had already written to you when they each, for the same reason, proposed this afternoon. They go out of town to-morrow for Sunday."

"Oh, I see—and they have to see you first. What an influence you exert, you know, on people's behavior!"



She continued as literal as her friend was facetious: "Well, it just happened so, and it didn't matter, since, on my asking you, don't you know? to choose your time, you had taken, as suiting you best, this comparatively early hour."

"Oh, perfectly." But he again had his watch out. "I've a job, perversely—that was my reason—on the other side of the world; which, by-the-way, I'm afraid, won't permit me to wait for tea. My tea doesn't matter." The watch went back to his pocket. "I'm sorry to say I must be off before five. It has been delightful at all events to see you again."

He was on his feet as he spoke, and though he had been half the time on his feet his last words gave the effect of his moving almost immediately to the door. It appeared to come out with them rather clearer than before that he was embarrassed enough really to need help, and it was doubtless the measure she after an instant took of this that enabled Nanda, with a quietness all her own, to draw to herself a little more of the situation. The quietness was plainly determined for her by a quick vision of its being the best assistance she could show. Had he an inward terror that explained his superficial nervousness, the incoherence of a loquacity designed, it would seem, to check, in each direction, her advance? He only fed it, in that case, by allowing his precautionary benevolence to put him in so much deeper. Where indeed could he have supposed that she wanted to come out, and what that she could ever do for him would really be so beautiful as this present chance to smooth his confusion and add as much as possible to that refined satisfaction with himself which would proceed from his having dealt with a difficult hour in a gallant and delicate way? To force upon him an awkwardness was like forcing a disfigurement or a hurt, so that at the end of a minute during which the expression of her face became a kind of uplifted view of her opportunity, she arrived at the appearance of having changed places with him and of their being together precisely in order that he—not she—should be let down easily. Some such quick passage of things is at any rate no more than a fair translation of the expression just mentioned.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

NEW YEAR'S EVE.

THE LAST CAR—DEADHEAD PASSENGERS.

DRAWN BY PETER NEWELL.

WASSAILING.

IN England the customs surrounding the birth of a new year have for many ages been observed with singularly festive demonstrations, and many interesting ceremonies and superstitions connected with it are preserved from ancient times to the present day.

Hence wassailing, an ancient Anglo-Saxon ceremony, and one of the most universal and picturesque of New-Year's customs, is still practised in many parts of England. The name is derived from wes hâl, meaning "be of good health"—literally, "be hale"—and was used as a salutation of good-will in drinking and toasting on festive occasions, the usual form of reply being drinc hâl, meaning broadly, "drink, and good luck be with you."

One of the earliest mentions of this custom is found in the well-known interview between Hengist's daughter Rowena and his guest, King Vortigern. Rowena presented a cup of wine to Vortigern, with the expression, "Louerd King, waes heal!" and Vortigern, who knew no English, was told to reply, "Drinc heal!"

The Antiquarian Repertory (ed. 1775) contains a woodcut representing the support of an old chimney-piece which belonged to an ancient mansion built by a family, by name Hawks, in the County of Kent. The engraving represents a large oak beam upon which is carved a double-handled bowl placed between the words "Wass heil" and "Drinc heile." On the bowl are carved two hawks, and running in a conventional design around the whole is the branch of an apple-tree—alluding, presumedly, to the component parts of the bowl's contents.

The ceremony of wassailing, as it was performed at the court of Henry VII., is very interestingly described in the Collection of Ordinances for the Government of the Royal Household. We find that each person is provided with a separate cup with which to pledge the others, and that "When the steward came in at the doore he was to crie three tymes, Wassel, Wassel, Wassel; and then the chappell (chaplain) was to answer with a songe."

In the homes of the middle and better classes of people in England the family were used to assemble around a bowl of wassail, from which each in succession would drink the health of the circle, and then give expression to the words "Wass heil."

It was at this period that maidens of the poorer class were wont to go from door to door bearing a bowl decorated with holly and parti-colored ribbons and filled with a mixture of spiced and sweetened ale, together with a goodly number of roasted apples. This beverage was sometimes called "lambs' wool," on account of its mildness and softness. At each house a carol, such as that quoted beneath the picture on page 1289, would be sung, intended to persuade the householder visited into giving some small pecuniary return for a sip of their sloppy libation, supposed to bring good luck during the new year. In case the invitation and music proved ineffectual in procuring the desired recognition, the song was very quickly changed to malicious anathemas.

Wassailing was also practised in monasteries, as we learn from Archæologia (xi., 420) that the "Poculum Charitatis," or wassail bowl was placed on the abbot's table at the upper end of the refectory, to be circulated amongst the community at his discretion. The ceremony of the "Loving-Cup," which is still kept up at the corporation feasts of London, resembles the wassailing of the monasteries in its general form. First the master drinks, standing, to the general health from a flagon full of sweetened and spiced wine, and then passes it to the warden on his left, who drinks in a like manner to the man on his left, and so on around the table—each one, when pledging, standing up while his neighbor drinks to him.

The observance of New-Year's day in Scotland was formerly celebrated with much hilarity and revelry. Promptly at midnight the family would engage in a general health-drinking and hand-shaking around a bowl of wassail, during which the following song was often sung:

> Weel may we a' be,
> Ill may we never see;
> Here's to the King
> And the gude companie! etc.

When the singing was concluded, certain of the family would proceed into the street, loaded down with a supply of such provisions as buns, bread, cheese, etc., and a kettle of hot wassail, known also as the hot pint, their purpose being to visit the house of a neighbor, and there to exchange greetings and sips from the convivial kettle. If they happened to be the first to enter the house since the New-Year, additional significance was attached to their visit as an omen of good luck.

In the year 1812 a gang of young ruffians in Edinburgh dealt a lasting blow to this popular custom by forming themselves into squads to rob the people who might be abroad on New-Year's eve. Several gentlemen were robbed and severely beaten. The affair caused great indignation, three of the rascals were executed, and from that time the old custom began rapidly to decline, until it practically died out.

C. O. DELAND.

THE LAST SHOT OF THE BLOCKADE.

EVENING colors was sounding on the vessels of the fleet in Guantanamo Bay, and the anchor lights were being sent aloft, when the ever-restless Scorpion weighed anchor and started on duty for Santiago.

Down through the long line of battle-ships and cruisers, tugs and yachts, colliers and schooners, she steamed, and rounding the shoals of Sotarenta Point, stood west-southwest along the coast.

The last tints of a glorious Cuban sunset were gradually deepening into shade when the white sides of a strange vessel were discerned far away on the port bow. Standing rapidly to the eastward, she was about ten miles off shore. What was she?

In a moment the Scorpion changed course and headed for her.

Darkness came on, and the stranger's lights alone were visible. On our quarter, miles away, Guantanamo Bay twinkled faintly as the flag-ship signalled to the fleet at anchor.

"We are not gaining," said the commanding officer.

"She must be a swift one," thought we, "to show her heels to the Scorpion."

"Put on the blowers," was the order, and faster still we sped under the forced air impetus.

Oh, the language that was coming up the ventilators from the fire-room below!

"Now we're catching her!" sang out the oracle to the men at the furnaces.

"Fire the blank charge!" came from the bridge. One was always ready with us.

Bang! went the 6-pounder, and at once the stranger stopped her engines a few hundred yards ahead.

Half-speed, on our engine telegraphs, and just abreast of her the Scorpion was dead in the water.

"What vessel is that?" megaphoned our captain.

And back across the dark space came the answer in clear tones, "His Imperial Majesty's cruiser Geier."

"All right," said the Scorpion. "Good-night!" and we headed away for the westward.

So the last shot was a blank shot. The next morning, in Santiago Harbor, the news of peace reached us. On August 13 it was.

Now the Geier was a modern 1800-ton cruiser, with plenty of speed, and a main battery of eight 4.1 guns rapid-fire, and no end of machine-guns, and a protective deck to boot.

Of course, while the Scorpion's battery is perfect in its way and in its own sphere, perhaps it was better, after all, that the stranger proved a friend.

But the philosopher down forward is not yet appeased, for, says he, "she had no darned right to hang around our waters and our shipping at night-time, nohow!"

W. T. CLUVERIUS,
Ensign, U.S.N.

"NOT INTO TEMPTATION!"

THOU great, unchanged, eternal One!
Thou God of Nations, filled with awe,
We thank Thee for the course we run
'Neath Thy unalterable law.

We feel that so far on our way
Thy guiding care had but to bless
A life which ever forward lay
And ever looked to righteousness.

We give Thee songs of praise that Thou
Hath so disposed us for our weal,
And all thanksgiving even now
For our unconquerable zeal.

But from this zeal has grown such might,
With no grave errors to retrieve,
That time may come, may be in sight,
When we the old-time way would leave,

And reaching out our cleanly hands
Across the seas, across the zones,
Follow the lead of other lands
To spoil the weak, outwit the drones,

And strong, resourceful, fearing naught,
From shore to shore our sway extend,
Till o'ergrown empire, weak, distraught,
Has but disunion for an end.

Show Thou the fathers' path and lead
Where no world-circling ills beset!
Stay us in every outward greed!
Stay us, great God, ere we regret!

CHALMERS ROBERTS.

THE recent pe of New York is o manner marks a its
A si
w

The Triumph of the Amateur Comedy Club of New York.

amateur plays, a not noticeably a theatricals. In itself most of th
the young peop things of the sta
istence its prod
and more perfec such comedies a atres—old Daly even a minor p
notably the pres
near to the prof easily be persua
and women born

This same old the professiona more concrete

The Paradox of the Accomplished Amateur.

few people cam
Yet it is the pr world of the sta almost inconce stage types, an that any manun
you. It is bey
ple of the stag have so little i skilfully to vit has known fro ven some one g in the manner
we say he has the reverse.
Cavendish Sq
is his gleaning
ideal is to act amateur comp imitations of t tive actors imi who come to English mann anything real imitate Sothern ern, if one did redeems Soth learn that the ing to imitate to his ideal, th admit to be a are times wh makes me sig tomfooleries

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE recent performance of the Amateur Comedy Club of New York is of extraordinary merit of its kind, and in a manner marks an era in the development of the club. At its inception in the season of 1884–5 the Amateur Comedy Club was one of a considerable number in the metropolis that were devoted to the giving of so-called amateur plays, and the standard of all of these clubs was not noticeably above that of common or garden private theatricals. In the course of time the club gathered to itself most of the fashion and most of the talent among the young people in New York who are interested in things of the stage; and as rival clubs dropped out of existence its productions became at once more fashionable and more perfect. Of late years the club has given only such comedies as have succeeded in the downtown theatres—old Daly adaptations, Mr. Sothern's old plays, and even a minor piece by Pinero. In several seasons, and notably the present, the performances have approached so near to the professional standard that at times one could easily be persuaded that he was seeing the work of men and women born to the stage.

The Triumph of the Amateur Comedy Club of New York.

This same old paradox with regard to the amateur and the professional actor has seldom been presented in a more concrete form. Of the world the people of the theatre live in Rose Trelawny says: "It isn't the world we live in, merely a world —such a queer little one. I was less than a month in Cavendish Square, and very few people came there; but they were real people—real." Yet it is the profession of the people of this queer little world of the stage to embody the manners of that remote, almost inconceivable real world. That is why there are stage types, and why there are so few of them, almost, that any manual of the theatre will glibly name them for you. It is beyond the range of possibility that the people of the stage should present truly the manners they have so little inkling of. The art of the stock actor is skilfully to vitalize and diversify the traditional types he has known from the cradle. When by the grace of Heaven some one gives us a touch of real feeling expressed in the manner of the real world, we are so grateful that we say he has genius. The case of the amateur is quite the reverse. He knows only Cavendish Square; he is Cavendish Square; and all he imagines of dramatic art is his gleanings from this theatre and from that. His ideal is to act like an actor. In almost every first-rate amateur company you will find several highly developed imitations of that species of English accent that our native actors imitate from the poor devils of English actors who come to us because they have failed at portraying English manners at home. How many removes from anything real does that make? I have seen an amateur imitate Sothern so glibly that one would say he was Sothern, if one did not miss the frequent touch of truth that redeems Sothern's manner; and I was not surprised to learn that the actor frankly owned up that he was intending to imitate Sothern. So the nearer the amateur comes to his ideal, the further he is from anything that we can admit to be art. I don't wish to be whimsical, but there are times when the most accomplished amateur company makes me sigh for the good old days of undergraduate tomfooleries and of sure-enough amateur plays. One could not applaud his friends in those days, but one could laugh at them with all his heart, and nothing could have been better fun short of the work of those real actors that express real passions in something that approximates the manner of real life.

The Paradox of the Accomplished Amateur.

A recent squabble among the leading dramatic critics of the metropolis has been the means of affording very interesting data as to the manners and the scholarship of the censors of the stage. The squabble began with an error as to the text of Shakspere in the Commercial Advertiser, the dramatic department of which has been of late conducted on rather independent lines by Mr. Norman Hapgood, a young writer, who has made his mark by contributing dramatic and political articles to the leading English reviews. The Commercial Advertiser criticised Miss Mary Shaw for not knowing her part of Rosalind, because to Celia's question, "Is all this for your father?" she replied, "Some of it is for my child's father"—that is, for Orlando, whom she thus thinks her future husband—instead of the familiar emendation, "for my father's child"—that is, herself. The Advertiser acknowledged its error by printing a letter from Mr. Ticknor of Boston, who pointed out that Miss Shaw's reading is the Folio reading, and is supported by the best editors. The paper also made due acknowledgments to Miss Shaw as "one of the most correct actresses in this country." On the Sunday following an article in the Times signed Edward A. Dithmar rehearsed these facts, called Mr. Hapgood a "critic (Heaven save the mark!)," and charged him with having "assailed for ignorance and carelessness" an actor who "adheres to the purest and most respected text." All this would have been much better if it had appeared before Mr. Hapgood's acknowledgments. The etiquette of schoolboys requires that when a fellow has cried peccavi you let him up, and few rules are better among comrades in any stage of life.

Comradeship and Criticism.

EDITH CRANE AS MILADI IN "THE KING'S MUSKETEER,"
As performed by E. A. Sothern's Company.

The climax of this incident involved the dean of American critics. When Miss Julia Arthur played Rosalind she had apparently profited by Miss Shaw's triumph over her censor. When Mr. William Winter reviewed her performance in the Tribune, he did not profit by the younger critic's fall. This is what he wrote: "The young actress, furthermore, was so oppressed with agitation that she had but slight control of herself. In the colloquy with Celia, after the wrestling, she made Rosalind say, 'Some of it is for my child's father,' and the excitement which could cause a break like that would mar anything." Mr. Winter was duly rebuked by a correspondent of the Baltimore News. He excused himself as follows: "Surely it was more gracious and more kind, in reviewing Miss Arthur's performance of Rosalind, to ascribe a foolish and vulgar misreading rather to nervous prostration than to deliberate design. An accidental error is of no importance, but an error indicative of a coarse taste and a dull mind may carry with it a deep significance, and may be attended with lasting consequences. . . . It is no defence to cite the Folio text, because the blunder in the Folio text is palpable." The final word in the controversy, thus far, comes from Professor G. L. Kittredge, of Harvard, who, since the death of Professor Child, is acknowledged to be the soundest and most learned of our scholars in English. As to Miss Arthur's alleged vulgarity, he remarks: "But, some one says 'child's father' is indelicate. I think not. At all events, the most fastidious of Elizabethan ladies would not have objected to it. It means no more than 'the man I hope to marry.' Celia and Rosalind are alone, and they are bosom-friends. Have we got so far from honest plain-speaking nowadays that a heroine may not tell her adopted sister that she hopes to marry and have children? But grant a slight indelicacy (which I do not, in fact, grant for a moment), what then? Elsewhere Rosalind does not shrink from such things. The speaker of v. ii., 12–15, was not likely to hesitate at 'child's father.'" His verdict as to the alleged folly and dulness of Miss Arthur's reading "child's father" is as follows: "There is no ground whatever for suspecting that 'child's father' is not what Shakspere wrote. On the contrary, the context is altogether in favor of its correctness." Of the two most prominent critics in New York, it seems one has thrashed a younger comrade for a fault already owned up to; the other has sought to screen himself from the consequences of his own error by insinuating that a young woman who is an earnest artist has a coarse, vulgar taste and a dull mind.

Gallantry and Criticism.

This attack upon Miss Arthur as a Shakesperean actress has the appearance of being made in behalf of Miss Ada Rehan. If it is, nothing could be more prejudicial to Miss Rehan. Miss Arthur has youth, good looks, an abundant fortune, and a vigorous ambition to excel in the highest forms of the drama. In her New York season, which is now drawing to a close, she has presented "Ingomar," "As You Like It," "Pygmalion and Galatea," and "Mercedes,"

Miss Rehan and Miss Arthur.

THE TRIAL SCENE IN "THE MERCHANT OF VENICE" AS PERFORMED AT DALY'S THEATRE, NEW YORK.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

GRACE ROMAINE,
Contralto, of the Castle Square Opera Company.

and an intended performance of "Infidele" was prevented only by ill-health. In all these performances she has acted creditably; in none of them has she shown more than a touch of native talent or a flash of dramatic fire. With Miss Rehan's advantages of hard and thorough training, there is no saying what she may not do; but to attack her as a present rival is as inapt as it is otherwise objectionable. JOHN CORBIN.

1898: A REVIEW.

—Makes a swanlike end, fading in music.—The Merchant of Venice.

It is the final musical witness for the year on the part of these weekly columns of record and comment. As is usual—indeed inevitable, so long as our American climate and our American routines of life are as they are—my editorial retrospect over music's course for the twelve-month must be begun at just about the middle of one local "season," and closed as another closes. This at first sight rather detracts from the completeness of even a sketch. On the other hand, the old informal break in summer-time, coming between "season" and "season," of recent years has become reduced to almost its least term. Only for a few hot weeks, at most, comes the check to concerts and operas and new artists to be heard, and to interests immediate in music's movement here. A large fraction of this same period happens to be one not at all idle abroad. The spring and earlier summer in England, France, and Germany have many things to say to American musical people, just when we are blessed with a bit of something like leisure to read of them or to betake ourselves towards them. There is really no untimeliness in a year-end retrospect as compared with one at the waning of a season.

Orchestral and Choral Interests in 1898.

The opening of 1898 found one of the most brilliant of our concert seasons in full course. That course was sustained to the end, and it has been even more effectively carried out this winter. The Astoria concerts, under the late Anton Seidl, were potent social and musical attractions, with at least a show of novelty. These concerts, however, have not been resumed this winter, owing to the failure of the impresario in charge of them. As to other serial concerts, choral or orchestral, early in 1898, the long succession from the Philharmonic Society's fifty-sixth season, the Symphony Society of New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Orchestra, the Chickering Hall group, the Paur Orchestra, the Kneisel Quartet, and the exceptionally fine choral evenings of the Musical Art Society may be particularized. A significant loss came in the withdrawal this autumn from the concert-field of the Symphony Society of New York, after twenty years of work. The matinée concerts of the new Paur Orchestra and those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra enlarged on this deficiency. A bustling effort toward that much-mooted thing, an endowed local symphony band, was active in the year's start—as so often before then. The lamentable death of Mr. Anton Seidl set aside the plan for a time. It will probably be developed (with more wisdom) before another year passes. The death of Mr. Seidl was, for a time, a grave disturbance to other plans for the present winter. Mr. Emil Paur's residence in town has originated a new concert series of high merit, and given to the Philharmonic Society a conductor of sterling value to it in its present status. Mr. William Gericke's return to the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since October affords great pleasure, far and wide, along that great musical factor's lines of work; and, Mr. Gericke's recent severe illness having proved brief, there is likely to be no interruption to his services. The Opera House receives a new leader in Franz Schalk, a fairly trustworthy and firm one. The Oratorio Society has formally received Mr. Frank Damrosch as its leader. Mr. Walter Damrosch has resigned all his New York charges, at least pro tempore, and is now to be identified with Philadelphia's opera and concert affairs rather than with those special to this city. The marked advance in performance on the part of a small orchestra newly made a part of the "National" Conservatory of Music in this city is to be recorded and praised.

Opera in New York in 1898.

The Metropolitan Opera House was closed as this year began. The acting impresario for that house, Mr. Maurice Grau, decided early in the year 1897 to give no season until the time for one of 1898–9. Mr. Walter Damrosch and Mr. Charles A. Ellis, however, were on hand as lessees under Mr. Grau. Their company, made up for the most part of singers well known to this country, gave representations in Italian, French, and German for five weeks, including a familiar Wagnerian repertory. No new scores were sung. Later in the spring an interesting but exasperatingly unequal troupe of Italian singers—called now the "Boggetto," now the "Royal Grand," now by some other name—came to Wallack's Theatre by way of the far West. It gave New York a first hearing of two of Puccini's works. This organization returned in October, sang at the Casino, and was dissolved into bankruptcy. In November, Mr. Grau returned to the Metropolitan with a magnificent company, unquestionably the finest and largest ever grouped for a season at any one house; and with many fine artists new to New York, over and above the dazzling circle of those already heard here under the same conditions and manager. This season at the Metropolitan is now in its fifth week. It has an ensemble effect of extraordinary richness, though thus far it is lacking in all novelty of repertory. A fuller summary of it may be deferred. As to other opera, the best of the performances (in English only) of the Castle Square Opera Company, singing at the American Theatre, have reached a plane of art and of worth as an element of musical education in the community to call for high praise. In light opera in English decidedly good things have come in the way of "The Charlatan," "The Jolly Musketeer," "The Fortune-Teller," "The Little Corporal," and two musical plays "A Dangerous Maid" and "A Runaway Girl."

New Music in 1898.

The register of large concert works that have been heard in this city for the first time in 1898 cannot be presented even approximately, so long is it. Those of the greater interest and highest form have not been necessarily of the first import. Chiefly in concert-music have such been found. Mr. Horatio Parker's sacred oratorio "Saint Christopher"; Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite "Sherzad"; Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"; a fine piano-forte concerto by Stenhammer; Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" Symphony; the opera by Puccini "La Bohême"; and "Manon Lescaut"—are some notable matters of last spring. Mr. Paur and Mr. Theodore Thomas have presented several concert-scores by Franck, Dubois, Bourgoult-Ducoudray, and their elegant, if not always eloquent, school. I may direct attention here to the fact that the year has elicited in Europe a small outputting of noteworthy music. The activity of Europe in 1898 has proved itself chiefly Italian and French; operatic in accent; and either transitional or downright decadent—as your prejudices or convictions may decide it. Perhaps the aspect of 1898 will be more favorable to the world's musical vitality.

Singers and Players New to Us in 1898.

Either at the beginning or at the end, this year has been so rich in its artistic guest-roll that I hesitate to cite it at all. There is, however, less injustice to the many than justice to the few to mention the first visits to America of the admirable operatic singers Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink (though her actual début has been postponed by an illness), and of Henri Albers, Albert Saléza, Ernest van Dyck, Albert Alvarez, and Anton von Rooy. Andreas Dippel, the Viennese tenor whose emphatic success as Siegfried has just been an incident, comes to us practically a new and finer personality in Wagner's music. Madame Marcella Sembrich is again a singer at the Metropolitan, with a dazzling endowment of gifts that have been so particularly recognized this winter as to make her appearance exceptionally distinctive in the season. In concert, have taken place since January last the first American appearances of the pianists Pugno and Siloti (Emil Saur is yet to be heard), the reentrées of Josef Hofmann, of Rosenthal, of Adele aus der Ohe, and of Madame Madeline Schiller; and the début of the violinist Burmester.

LOUISE MEISSLINGER,
Mezzo-soprano, of the Maurice Grau Opera Company.

Musical Necrology of 1898.

The regretted and sudden death of Mr. Seidl has already been noted. The deaths of Eduard Remenyi, the Hungarian violinist, and of Max Alvary, the admired German tenor, removed an old musician and a youthful one, of wide fame. It is worth while to notice that in 1898 have occurred no deaths in the general world-list of composers that mean a great musical loss; possibly because there are now no more just such men alive.

Two Mozart Nights.

The foregoing notes have exacted all my space for a review. The course of the season that takes in part of the new year is now strong. It could not be continued more graciously than in two Mozartian incidents which must be added to my record, whatever others lapse—that memorable and exquisite performance of "The Wedding of Figaro" recent at the Metropolitan, and the latest concert of the Kneisel Quartet, at which the composer's Quartet in F for an oboe and strings (one violin omitted) was given. The latter work had probably never been given in this country until the other evening, and it is little known in Europe. It is perfect Mozart—serene, masterful, the soul of harmony in every measure—and a delicate thing divine. The month's concerts of the Philharmonic Society presented Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and an orchestral novelty by Charpentier, "Impressions d'Italie." This is a descriptive matter, written with a boisterous mastery of instrumentation rather than refinement in its five pictures, and an excellent illustration of the mannerism of one of the more distinguished among the new French music-makers. Madame Josephine Jacoby was the soloist, a contralto of superior merit among our American concert artists.

E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

ANDREAS DIPPEL,
Tenor, of the Maurice Grau Opera Company.
Copyright, 1898, by A. Dupont.

MARCELLA SEMBRICH,
Soprano, of the Maurice Grau Opera Company.
Copyright, 1898, by A. Dupont.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE PRESIDENT AT ATLANTA AND TUSKEGEE.

BY THOMAS J. CALLOWAY, VICE-PRINCIPAL OF TUSKEGEE INSTITUTE.

PRESIDENT MCKINLEY'S faith and interest in the elevation of the negroes were very firmly registered when, on the 16th of this month, he spent the greater part of a day in visiting and addressing the teachers and students of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute in Alabama. His visit South was primarily to participate in the Peace Jubilee at Atlanta, Georgia, and a journey of eighteen hours along the eastern slope of the lower Alleghanies brought the Southern Railway's special train of the President and party to Atlanta early Wednesday morning, December 14. In the accompanying party were Mrs. McKinley, Secretary and Mrs. Gage, Secretary and Mrs. Alger, Secretary and Miss Long, Postmaster-General and Mrs. Smith, Secretary and Miss Wilson, Secretary and Mrs. Porter, Assistant-Secretary Cortelyou, General and Miss Wheeler, General Shafter, General and Mrs. Lawton, and Captain Scherer, press correspondents, messengers, and maids. Wednesday and Thursday, 14th and 15th, were given over to the programme of the civic and military parades, addresses, and demonstrations in Atlanta, closing Thursday night with a banquet, in which veterans of the gray wove laurels of good cheer for a reunited blue, in response to President McKinley's magnanimous utterance that "we should share with you in the care of the graves of the Confederate soldiers." After which the party passed from Atlanta into the "Black Belt," en route to Tuskegee.

The distance of a hundred and forty miles into this "Black Belt" furnishes an ample study and evidences of the seriousness of the negro problem in this country. Near one station a negro owns a plantation of eleven hundred acres, well stocked and managed. Half a dozen others own small farms of less value. On the other hand, hundreds in this community and thousands in the section are tenants living in one-room cabins, with families as high as thirteen to fifteen in number. In one settlement there are nearly thirty of these cabins, made of logs, with large apertures between the logs, permitting draughts that mean consumption and pneumonia. There is scarcely a picture on the wall, save an occasional advertising chromo, and patent-medicine almanacs seem the only excuses for books to furnish mental food to families, whose kitchen, dining, bed, and sitting room, for all ages and sexes, is a single four-wall enclosure. On the other hand, there are clocks worth five dollars which have cost fourteen dollars from smooth-tongued agents, who collected the money by instalments. Likewise there are sewing-machines with no evidence of their need from the scanty clothing to be seen. With no mule or horse to draw them, some of these people own buggies. The fact is everywhere apparent that the first principle of "getting on in the world" has not been learned. These people, who as slaves were fed and clothed by a master, find it a hard lesson to learn the white man's economy for future wants and the necessity of owning land. Their crops even are mortgaged before planting, in order to draw from the merchant rations and clothing, which the merchant sells to them at a profit of from 12 to 180 per cent. over usual retail prices. Mules are rented to cultivate crops: an old man told me that he has paid $14 a year rent for a mule for seven years, when the mule might have been bought in the first place for $50. The moral status is as unsatisfactory as the industrial. The camp-meetings prove attractions for lewdness, drunkenness, and gambling, the preachers often winking at these evils if financial returns are increased. Men who have gone to coal-mines, public works, and large commercial centres to get better wages have learned the games of dice and cards, and returning, have taught them to their fellows, who revel by night amidst the fumes of cheap whiskey and tobacco, while women and children are half clothed and half fed.

It is significant, however, that everywhere the people are at work, practically all the unskilled labor and much of the mechanical work done in the South being performed by negroes. But the difficulty seems to be that the people do not know how to utilize the results of their labor. They are anxious to learn, and will always seek the school-house. Last year 27,435 negro teachers enrolled 2,816,340 negro children in the public schools of the South, and 1795 teachers instructed 45,402 negro boys and girls in 169 normal, industrial, and collegiate schools. Of these the Tuskegee Institute is one of the best known. Founded by Booker T. Washington, July 4, 1881, in a frame church and cabin, with one teacher and thirty pupils, and no property, the school has grown during the seventeen years to the large proportions of 90 teachers, 1000 students, 2267 acres of land, 37 buildings, 26 industries, the equipment, with land and buildings, teaching the value of $300,000. The students, of both sexes, are from 21 States, Cuba, and Puerto Rico, and receive an education in English, with religious and industrial training.

The visit to this institution of the President and most of the cabinet was an event of tremendous interest to teachers, students, and citizens, white and black, in the community. After the party had breakfasted on the train a start was made at half past eight o'clock for the institute through the streets of Tuskegee, whose score of large columned mansions bespeak the magnificence of ante bellum living in this "Heart of the South." As the carriages approached the school campus, a mile away, the thirty-seven buildings, erected by students in carpentry and brick masonry in their self-help education, were a welcome sight in happy contrast to the fields of waste and decay surrounding the town. Upon entering the gate the grounds were observed to be beautifully arranged, and ornamented by students in horticulture. The buildings, plans for most of which, including the largest, were drawn in the architectural and mechanical-drawing department of the institute, were well arranged and strikingly commodious. Bricks, of which students in the brick-yard have made this year a million, were being put into the Armstrong Slater Memorial Industrial Building. Logs, cut by students, were being sawed in the saw-mill into lumber by other students. The wheelwright, blacksmith, and harness shops exhibited beautiful and substantial buggies and wagons constructed by these black boys. Still other students exhibited well-fitting suits of clothes made by them in the tailor shop; circulars, books, etc., printed by them in the printing-office; shoes produced by them in the shoe-shop; steam-engines, etc., manufactured in machine, foundry, and plumbing shops; while all tin vessels used are made by students in the tinning department, and the painting and plastering are done by students in those trades. Handsome dresses and fancy articles were seen representing the work of girls who are students in plain sewing, dress-making, and millinery shops, while other girls are being taught nurse-training, housekeeping, cooking, and laundry-work, the last being carried on in a three-story brick building devoted wholly to hand laundry-work. A farm of 700 acres is cultivated by students in agriculture, whose instructor is a graduate of Iowa Agricultural College, and crops of corn, oats, pumpkins, etc., have been harvested for food. Fifty acres are planted in grape-vines and fruit trees, partly from which three thousand

(Continued on page 1300.)

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

DON'T BE CARELESS.

In these days of nurse-maids the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is a great safeguard to the health of the little ones. It will not easily spoil, being perfectly sterilized in its manufacture.—[Adv.]

"THE IMMORTALITY OF CERTAIN FLOWERS."

To where does the soul of the flowers take their flight? What poet but could consecrate harmonious strophes to so subtle a problem? The flowers, fragile Sisters of Fair Women, do they all die? Console yourselves, oh, poets of youthful and tender hearts, the flowers do not all die, for ORIZA-LEGRAND captures piously their souls. 'Tis thus that he caught the souls of the last carnations, the last violets, and the last roses, and enclosed them with care in the FLEURS SACHETS, which he offers to his distinguished clients. —[Adv.]

A hop-skip-and-jump feeling, the sort that always follows a course of treatment where ABBOTT'S—The ORIGINAL ANGOSTURA BITTERS—is the prescription. —[Adv.]

NEW-YEAR'S tables are incomplete without Dr. Siegert's Angostura Bitters, the exquisitely flavored tonic. —[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pears'

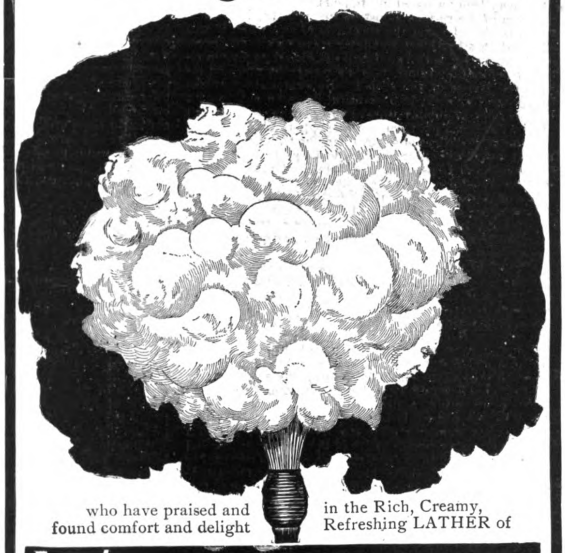
It is a wonderful soap that takes hold quick and does no harm.



No harm! It leaves the skin soft like a baby's; no alkali in it, nothing but soap. The harm is done by alkali. Still more harm is done by not washing. So, bad soap is better than none.

What is bad soap? Imperfectly made; the fat and alkali not well balanced or not combined.

What is good soap? Pears'.

All sorts of stores sell it, especially druggists; all sorts of people use it.

Distinguished Men who have praised and found comfort and delight in the Rich, Creamy, Refreshing LATHER of

WILLIAMS' SHAVING SOAPS.

Send us the names of any 2 of these men, with a 2c.-stamp to cover postage, and by return mail we will send you a sample cake of Williams' Shaving Soap.

Williams' Shaving Soaps are sold everywhere, but sent by mail if your dealer does not supply you.

Williams' Shaving Stick, 25 cents. Luxury Shaving Tablet, 25 cents.
Genuine Yankee Shaving Soap, 10 cents. Swiss Violet Shaving Cream, 50 cents.
Williams' Shaving Soap (Barber's), 6 round cakes, 1 lb., 40 cts. Exquisite also for toilet.

THE J. B. WILLIAMS CO., Glastonbury, Conn.
LONDON, 64 Great Russell St., W. C. SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA, 161 Clarence St.

A TRIP TO JAMAICA

The Queen of the West India Islands.

Avoid the severity of our American Winters and take your vacation at this garden spot of the earth. About $5 00 a day pays all expenses.

Send for our beautifully illustrated pamphlet K for full particulars.

PIM, FORWOOD & KELLOCK,
STATE ST., NEW YORK CITY.

The Prudential

HAS THE STRENGTH OF GIBRALTAR.

LIFE INSURANCE POLICIES
$15 to $50,000
Furnish absolute Protection to the Whole Family
Write for Information
THE PRUDENTIAL INSURANCE CO.
...OF AMERICA...
John F. Dryden, Pres. Home Office: Newark, N. J.

Eau de Cologne No. 4711.

The most pungent, exhilarating and refreshing Perfume. Used by persons of refinement. Imported into America for three-quarters of a Century. Be sure to get "No. 4711," which is the standard in all civilized countries.

MÜLHENS & KROPFF, N. Y., U. S. AGENTS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(Continued from page 1299.)

gallons of fruit have been canned during the past summer and are stored in the cellar of the boarding department. Sixty Jersey cows furnish milk, butter, and cheese, the creamery being handled by students.

Each of the various industries has as its head a teacher who is skilled along the special line, and when it was learned that President McKinley was to visit Tuskegee, the faculty decided to prepare floats which, passing in review before the visitors, would show the literary and industrial phases of the school. Hence for three weeks plans were wrought into beautiful floats, consisting of a frame-work of lumber dressed in cedar, moss, pine, and ivy. The broad platform gave the opportunity to exhibit innumerable devices of student handicraft. A reviewing-stand was arranged for the President's party, and for the Governor and Legislature of Alabama, who attended in a body. When President McKinley, with Governor Johnston of Alabama on his right, stood in the front row to view Washington on his left, stood in the front row to view the parade, the appearance was an evidence of the present achievement in the solution of the racial problem and a prophecy of hope and ultimate success.

Promptly at nine o'clock seven hundred young men in double file, bearing each a sugar-cane surmounted with a palm leaf, began to pass in review, keeping step to the students' brass band, and following were four hundred girls, each with a sugar-cane, on top of which was a boll of cotton. Every face in this long procession was a ray of hope, in every eye was the sparkle of purpose, and both in form and feature did the lessons of life's seriousness show their imprint. Then began the magnificent pageant of forty-five floats drawn by horses, mules, and oxen, each float representing a different phase of the institute. While a pen picture is impossible, it is safe to say that no tableaux were ever more effective in conveying to a vast audience a concrete vision of the aims, methods, and results of an institution's work. From floats contrasting old and new methods of butter-making to the artistic floats of physics, electricity, and architecture, every feature of the institute was exhibited in an entertaining style. But to those who have watched and aided the transition from the rude cabin homes and ignorant and crude farming to the skill and training displayed, the tableaux were an inadequate exhibition of the manhood and womanhood awakened in those young men and women.

At ten-thirty o'clock the large brick chapel was filled with the full Senate and House of Representatives of the Legislature of Alabama, white and black citizens of the community, teachers and students. There were about two hundred white ladies in attendance, who, with their escorts or alone, had mingled on the grounds freely and promiscuously during the parades, and now struggled good-naturedly for seats. There was no repulsiveness anywhere apparent, and any one who may have thought the races are living here in perpetual enmity was amply convinced otherwise. The troubles which recently occurred in the Carolinas are not possible in such an atmosphere of tolerant disposition as at Tuskegee. A few of these white people are contributors to Tuskegee Institute, and others, as trustees of the school and officers of the State, are contributing their influence to its success.

In the audience was one man who, as an owner of 400 slaves, was reared in all the convictions of his section. A few years ago a negro boy left his plantation, came to Tuskegee, completed the course there, and returning, exhibited such a marked improvement as to convince the planter of the value of negro education, and to turn his life into one of perfect sympathy and co-operation, so that he now gives annually his money and still more largely gives his influence.

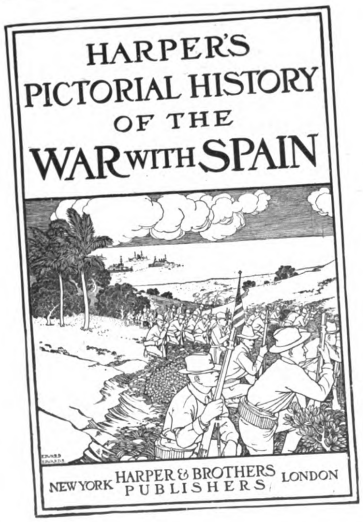
Of such remarkable composition was the audience to which President McKinley spoke, and no audience ever welcomed him more warmly. While his speech was mainly of a congratulatory nature upon the aims and methods of the institute, in which he remarked that it "is ideal in conception," he thus touched the negro problem, already overshadowing the South, and destined to more largely tax the American people:

"One thing I like about this institution is that its policy has been generous and progressive; it is not so self-centred or interested in its own pursuits and ambitions as to ignore what is going on in the rest of the country or make it difficult for outsiders to share the local advantages. I allude especially to the spirit in which the annual conferences have been here held by leading colored citizens and educators, with the intention of improving the condition of their less fortunate brothers and sisters. Here, we can see, is an immense field, and one which cannot too soon or too carefully be utilized. The conferences have grown in popularity, and are well calculated not only to encourage colored men and colored women in their individual efforts, but to cultivate and promote an amicable relationship between the two races—a problem whose solution was never more needed than at the present time. Patience, moderation, self-control, knowledge, character, will surely win you victories and realize the best aspirations of your people. An evidence of the soundness of the purposes of this institution is that those in charge of its management evidently do not believe in attempting the unattainable, and their instruction in self-reliance and practical industry is most valuable."

The general awakening of the negro masses referred to by the President as being made through the Tuskegee Institute, and which the visit of himself and cabinet will immensely stimulate, is a special work of national value. The last week in each February a farmers' conference is held, and the people are urged to improve their homes, buy land, cease mortgaging their crops, lengthen their school terms, demand good moral character and fitness in their teachers and preachers, etc. This agitation has spread from this centre to all the South, and the results are already to be seen.

Principal Booker T. Washington has received many words of praise and endorsement, more than any other living man of his race, but it is doubtful if any man has ever received a higher testimonial from the Executive of the nation, speaking as its representative, and fully aware of the significance of his utterance, than when he said in his address:

"To speak of Tuskegee without paying special tribute to Booker T. Washington's genius and perseverance would be impossible. The inception of this noble enterprise was his, and he deserves high credit for it. His was the enthusiasm and enterprise which made its steady progress possible and established in the institution its present high standard of accomplishment. He has won a worthy reputation as one of the great leaders of his race, widely known, and much respected at home and abroad as an accomplished educator, a great orator, and a true philanthropist."



ADVERTISEMENTS.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE WAR WITH SPAIN

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY

THIS History will contain an Introduction by Nelson A. Miles, Major-General Commanding the United States Army; also numerous Double-page Drawings, several hundred Full-page and Half-page Drawings and Engravings, Photographs, Wood-Engravings and Reproductions of Rare Old Paintings, and many Lithographic Plates in Beautiful Colors. Other attractive features of this History will be Colored Maps of the West Indies and the Philippines, and Charts and Plans of Cities, Harbors, and Battles.

Address
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York, N. Y.

SEND FOR DESCRIPTIVE CIRCULAR

IT will contain 512 pages, Large 4to, and will be issued Serially in Thirty-two Parts of Sixteen Pages each. This work is designed to be a Full, Accurate, and Authoritative History of the War, as well as a Handsome Souvenir. It will also include Spain's colonial history. It will be beautifully printed on heavy coated paper, and bound in a handsome cover designed by a special artist. It will be sold only by subscription, at a price so moderate, for a work of such surpassing interest and value, that no one should be without it.

Address
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York, N. Y.

AN UNSURPASSED OPPORTUNITY FOR CANVASSERS

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AMATEUR SPORT

A CONFERENCE OF FACULTY ADVISERS and other friends of amateur sport is soon to gather for final consideration of suggestions, earlier made, looking to the maintenance of sport in a reasonable and healthful position in Eastern university life. There are many minor questions of eligibility, conflicting rules, and the like, that will assert themselves, and in due course receive attention, but the imperilling need to wholesome life in college sport is unflinching and impartial revision of the regulations that permit of the following abuses:

(1) Misappropriation for athletic purposes of the scholarships for "indigent students."
(2) Illegitimate recruiting of athletes
(3) Practice with professional teams—in baseball, for example.
(4) Preliminary training or practice.
(5) Indifference to scholarship standard for athletes.
(6) Undergraduate speculation in football tickets.

How much of real benefit could be accomplished if the members of this university committee would address themselves to these matters with a mind utterly free from prejudice, and with the single purpose in view of giving college sport the high tone it must carry or else retrograde!

I SHOULD NOT LIKE TO SAY how often my mail brings me letters from the Middle West (by which term, for my present purpose, I include the Missouri Valley section), calling attention to Western athletes who, by agents, sometimes unofficial, at other times avowedly official, have been lured to Eastern institutions by promises, moving though mysterious, and variously outraging the ethics of amateur sport.

A clever quarter-back, earning the price of his course in a Western college by selling papers, is reported by the local Western press as "called" and "cared for," and sure enough we see him captaining the college team of an Eastern university (barred from the 'varsity by the one-year-residence rule), and observe no Eastern repetition of the Western struggle for tuition

Another, the mainstay of his Western college team, and who, by-the-way, had played professional baseball, journeys East to unusual football honor and a simon-pure athletic reputation. Yet others are transported East to attain distinction and creature comforts they did not enjoy in the West.

THE QUESTION OF THIS CLASS OF MAN being paid money is not at all raised in this argument. Neither I nor any one familiar with college sport would even suggest it. But it is a fact beyond dispute that illegitimate means of recruiting are employed, and that under the guise of "indigent students" men have been permitted to enter, and, indeed, on occasions have been maintained because of their ability in football, in baseball, or in track athletics.

There is, in honest truth, very little of this sort of thing being done nowadays, and it is confined to only a very few institutions; but for every real case there are a hundred suspected ones. The departure of a Western athlete for the East sets the entire West ringing with charges of professionalism against the East. Only occasionally have the charges been well founded, but the remembrance of those lingers.

There is no worthier fund in university life than that devoted to helping needy fellows through college; and undoubtedly many an honest, deserving student has been also an athlete. But when, term after term, a majority of the 'varsity team are supported in college through aid from that fund, there seems good ground for the assumption that either poverty and exceptional athletic ability travel hand in hand or else the fund is misappropriated.

PRELIMINARY FOOTBALL TRAINING has been so frequently discussed in this department that its readers must be familiar with all I could say against the pernicious practice. In a word, it is contemptible in spirit—neither sportsmanly nor honest—for its sole purpose is getting advantage of your opponent by extra work which you hope he may not secure. It is, besides, totally against the idea and purpose of college sport, which suggests competition and practice during the regular terms of the college year. If all agree to abandon the practice, none will have any of the advantages it is alleged to bestow. Thus far the advantages appear to be proverbial rather than actual.

Generally speaking, the Eastern and a majority of the Middle-Western (east of the Mississippi) universities insist upon their athletes living up to the requirements of a scholarship standard. But I have observed this year a tendency in some quarters, East and West, to unusual and harmful lenience, not only in the first instance, but in the last, when the delinquent should have been kept from the team, instead of being railroaded on to it by superficial class-room work and an indulgent professor.

KROMER.
Quarter and Capt., West Point.

FOY,
Right Tackle, West Point.

THE DEAF-MUTE ELEVEN OF GALLAUDET COLLEGE.
Photographed by Buckmyer.

Speculation in football tickets has become really a scandal. It is difficult to conceive of undergraduates entering into traffic with speculators, but they do it.

Perhaps numbering tickets and registering their disposition may correct this spreading evil.

Univ. of Penn. has already forbidden play with professional teams to her baseball nines; and I commend the same course to Harvard, Yale, and Princeton, not to mention all the others.

NEIL SNOW,
Right End, Univ. of Mich., 1898.

DANA T. SMITH,
Captain, Sewanee.

Review of Middle-Western Football, continued from Last Week.

APART FROM MICHIGAN AND CHICAGO, Wisconsin was the only team to show a record worthy of consideration among the leaders. It has only its 0-6 defeat by Chicago, whereas it wound up the season brilliantly by beating Northwestern, 47-0. Wisconsin, like Michigan, was obliged to work up new material, and was coming on rapidly at the close of the season. Her captain, Patrick O'Dea, was put forth as a rival of Herschberger in the kicking department, and it is probable he can take the Chicago man into a back lot and beat him out at the punting or drop-kicking game. In a game, however, his superiority over the back upon whom Chicago has relied so completely is not so noticeable. Against Northwestern, when O'Dea drop-kicked a goal, with sixty-two yards to cover and the ball cleared the bar by four feet, a Northwestern man had broken through and was all but successful in blocking. O'Dea had to swing far to one side to avoid him. No one suspected more than a punt at that distance. It was the most notable drop-kick goal of this season, and one of the most remarkable performances of its kind in football annals. In 1891 J. E. Duffy made the first score Michigan ever had secured from Cornell up to that time by drop-kicking a goal from the field just at the centre a few minutes before the call of time. This took place at Detroit, and stood as the record feat of the West until O'Dea's performance this year.

CHICAGO BEAT WISCONSIN, 6-0. The greatest of kicking games had been expected; but the field was very soft, and neither Herschberger nor O'Dea came near his best form. The only touch-down was made early in the first half, Chicago playing straight football through Wisconsin's line. Wisconsin's lighter team was the more heavily handicapped by the wet field, but its defence was at times brilliant. A fortnight before the game with Chicago there had been serious talk at Madison of disbanding the team. While Chicago was playing Univ. of Penn., Wisconsin was having difficulty with Whitewater Normal School. More energy was being put into the chase for evidence against Chicago players than into all the practice. Though the score greatly flatters Wisconsin, it represents a remarkable brace on her part, and she took defeat far more handsomely than did Chicago in the previous year.

ILLINOIS STARTED POORLY, due to arranging several hard games at the beginning against veteran teams, such as that of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Chicago, and the Notre Dame University, both of which defeated Illinois. Later the green material at Champaign began to round to, and a stubborn defence in the mud at Detroit enabled Illinois to hold Michigan to two touch-downs, and to score one touch-down on a fumble and fifty-yard run. Illinois did her best playing of the season, perhaps, when she held the Carlisle Indians down to one touch-down in each half at Chicago, November 19. Neither team played well in the first half, but Illinois should have done all the scoring but for a case of stage-fright, the Indians making their first touch-down easily on a blocked kick. Carlisle did her only good playing of the day during the latter part of the second half, and then showed line-bucking somewhere near her reputation. The team was not well generalled, had poor interference, handled punts badly, and in general revealed nothing with which to win out but brute strength and better condition, though three men were removed from the game.

NORTHWESTERN HAD A "FLUKY" TEAM. It put up a stubborn defence against Michigan, and was aided by the latter's poor generalship and lack of team-work. Its collapse came at Minneapolis, before the Minnesota University team, which had been playing raggedly all the season. The next week Wisconsin finished it up.

Minnesota and Illinois proved to be closely matched on Thanksgiving day, when the one point gained by the only goal kicked on four touch-downs gave Illinois the game, 11-10. Minnesota seemed to come along slowly with the

ORMOND SIMKINS,
Full-back, Sewanee.

P. J. O'DEA,
Full-back and Captain, Univ. of Wis., 1898.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Univ. of Penn. methods. The injury that put captain and quarter-back Cole out of it early in the season was a serious handicap.

Purdue is the only other one of the Middle-Western universities that is represented in the faculty agreement as to eligibility. Purdue has rather dropped out of it the past season. She played only Chicago, being beaten, 17–0, the week after Chicago had played Univ. of Penn., and when the Chicago team was admittedly out in the best of shape.

It is a great pleasure to be able to comment on an awakening by the faculty at Notre Dame to some sense of its responsibility in the athletics of that institution. A faculty committee has been appointed, and the beginning of a more healthful spirit seems visible in the student body.

It remains to be seen how sincere is the promise, or how substantial the resulting evidence of conversion.

Oberlin became noticeable by holding down Cornell to six points, and by beating Purdue, 10–0, Thanksgiving day. The team was coached in Univ. of Penn. tactics, and used the Princeton close formation as well as the guards back system.

Considering its students (male) number less than 500, its showing for the season was highly creditable, and its schedule worthy of publication:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| October | 1.—Oberlin..... 29 | Baldwin University ..... | 0 |
| October | 8.—Oberlin..... 6 | Marietta College ..... | 0 |
| October | 15.—Oberlin..... 48 | Ohio Wesleyan University ..... | 0 |
| October | 22.—Oberlin..... 5 | University of Cincinnati ..... | 0 |
| October | 29.—Oberlin..... 0 | Cornell University ..... | 6 |
| November | 5.—Oberlin..... 11 | Western Reserve University.... | 0 |
| November | 12.—Oberlin..... 33 | Case School of Science..... | 0 |
| November | 24.—Oberlin..... 10 | Purdue University ..... | 0 |
| | Oberlin.....142 | Opponents..... | 6 |

In the section where Oberlin is located—the Ohio, that is so thickly strewn with colleges—there are many football teams, with some few of merit—Western Reserve University (or Adelbert College) of Cleveland, and Case School of Applied Science, of the same city. Michigan beat Adelbert 18–0, and Case 32–5, while Oberlin beat Adelbert 11–0, and Case 33–0. Adelbert in turn beat Case by a score of 29–0.

Carlisle, I hear, is next year to lose five of her strongest players; Hudson, Rodgers, and Cayou have entered Dickinson College, and Bemus Pierce and Metoxen will return to their homes. We trust Carlisle School will sustain its interest in football, and seek to develop the game more generally among the members of the academy. It is not well to place all reliance on stars.

Indiana University defeated De Pauw, a former team of prominence, by 32–0. Earlier in the season De Pauw was beaten by Illinois, 16–0.

The Rush Medical College team is another one deserving mention for the good games of its veteran team early in the season.

Knox College, of Galesburg, Illinois, surprised Beloit's eleven by beating it, 18–0, on Thanksgiving day. There were some substitutes in the Beloit line-up, however, and they were not in as good shape after the 22–0 beating they had been given five days before by Michigan. But that does not detract from Knox's good work, which was so excellent that had full time obtained Beloit would have been defeated by even a larger score, as she was being completely outplayed.

Football has had considerable attention the past two seasons at Cincinnati, due to the fostering of the game by the University of Cincinnati, the teams of which were coached by Fennell, formerly of Cornell. The progress they have made was shown by beating Dartmouth, 17–12, at Cincinnati on Thanksgiving day. Oberlin made a score of 5–0 on Cincinnati on October 22, in a game over which there was some dispute. On Thanksgiving day, too, Cincinnati was held to 11–11 by Indiana University, another eleven that became prominent this autumn.

Chicago has been greatly stronger, until this season, back of the line than in it. Nowhere has faster or more related work been developed among the backs. For two years, at least, Michigan has worked for the specific end of meeting Chicago's game, and has developed more rapidly in the way of defensive work in the line and at the ends. This year her line, except the tackles, outclassed Chicago at stopping plays. That there has been no characteristic method of line attack developed is not remarkable. Stagg stands for a high development of the mass-on-tackle play, though he used it not much this season. In this work Eastern precedents have been closely followed, especially at Wisconsin. Illinois last year made the Princeton revolving wedge her strong card of offence. Knipe at Iowa is the only coach who has taught Univ. of Penn.'s guards-back play in any thorough fashion. With it he humbled Northwestern last year, but by others it has been used only in desultory fashion. Purdue had a predilection for tandem plays, having had Balliett and Church for coaches, but the preference to develop a fast interference for the backs without bringing any men out of the line seems universal. Chicago used her ends on offence more than any other team. On the whole there was less use of trick plays. Wisconsin alone used the quarter-back kick to advantage.

One feature of the season's play in the Middle West was the increased amount of kicking, and the better quality of performances in that line. It is no longer uncommon for university elevens in that section to employ the kicking game with good judgment. Even preparatory-school elevens show good work in this direction nowadays. The number of young teams that have sprung up like mushrooms in small towns and big cities, more especially Chicago and Detroit, is altogether a feature of the past two years.

Herschberger has been so prominent a figure in the kicking department of Western football the past three seasons that his feats have naturally bestirred emulation. He himself did some great work this year, though he was more successful earlier than toward the end of the season. One of his best performances was 15 out of 21 points Chicago scored on Beloit made by three place-kick goals. His drop-kick goal on Michigan was even a better performance, however. The first score of the season on

COMPARATIVE SCORES OF THE MISSOURI VALLEY FOOTBALL SEASON OF 1898

| | Univ. of Nebraska. | Univ. of Kansas. | Univ. of Missouri. | Univ. of Iowa. | Univ. of Medics. | Ames. | Drake Univ. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Univ. of Nebraska | | 18–6, Nov. 5. | 47–6, Oct. 24. | 5–6, Nov. 24. | 0–24, Nov. 7. | 23–11, Oct. 15. | 5–6, Nov. 12. |
| Univ. of Kansas | 6–18, Nov. 5. | | 12–0, Nov. 24. | | 6–0, Oct. 5. 6–0, Nov. 12. | 11–6, Oct. 15. | |
| Univ. of Missouri | 6–47, Oct. 24. | 0–12, Nov. 24. | | | 0–16, Oct. 8. 15–5, Oct. 18. | | |
| Univ. of Iowa | 6–5, Nov. 24. | | | | | | 5–18, Oct. 15. |
| Univ. of Medics | 24–0, Nov. 7. | 0–6, Oct. 5. 0–6, Nov. 12. | 16–0, Oct. 8. 5–15, Oct. 18. | | | | |
| Ames | 11–23, Oct. 15. | 6–11, Oct. 15. | | | | | 17–6, Oct. 29 |
| Drake Univ. | 6–5, Nov. 12 | | | 18–5, Oct. 15. | | 6–17, Oct. 29. | |

Michigan was made by a drop-kick from the forty-yard line that Quarrie of the Case School team made at Ann Arbor. In the game which Notre Dame won from Illinois University the second week of the season the only score at all was a place-kick goal by Notre Dame.

Graduate coaching has come also to be a feature in the Middle West, but there is far from being at any of the universities such bands of skilled coachers as congregate at the Eastern institutions. Two to four or five men is about the limit during an entire season. In some respects this is a drawback, and in others an advantage. It certainly permits of uniformity in policy, and is all right if the coaches are able.

The Middle-Western teams do not entirely rely upon the East for their plays, as they once did. A. A. Stagg is of course resourceful and independent, so that Chicago University has not, at any time since he was engaged, merely copied the East. The same is true to some slight extent with the other leading teams of the Middle West.

One of the tricks Stagg sprung in the Michigan-Chicago game this year was novel and successful. It was a "fake" kick followed by a double pass. The kicker drew back at the signal, but started to run when he got the ball, as in the old-fashioned bluff of this sort. He was no sooner under headway in one direction, however, with the opponents, ends and all, steering across the field after him, than one of the other backs received the ball from a pass behind him and started around the end on a wide run in the opposite direction. This trick worked for thirty-two yards straight off in the game with Michigan. Later Michigan's ends got it down, but it was Chicago's most conspicuous ground-gainer, for all that. It was nearly worked once by a triple pass, three men being downed in turn before the play was stopped. All this raised the query in the West, if Stagg had not the idea of developing plays to include passing the ball on the run, somewhat after the manner of English Rugby?

Comment has already been made on the Middle-Western individual players in choosing the All-America and All-Western teams. In fact, barring five—Herschberger, Burnett, Holmes, Clarke, and Cavanaugh, who were ineligible to the national or Western team — there are none in the West worthy of especial mention who are not considered in the All-Western eleven.

O'Dea has no rival with Herschberger ineligible, and should even have a place in the back field were the clever Chicago punter in the field. So also would Caley, a powerful running back and the strongest line-bucker in the West this year, and the strongest the West has produced since Van Doozer of Northwestern. There is little difference among Slaker, McLean, and Widman—McLean is the best of the three on defensive work. Perry (Northwestern) is a full-back of promise. With Clarke out, there was no really first-class quarter-back; but Kennedy and Wilmarth were quite the best of those remaining.

So, too, in ends; Snow and Bennett quite outclassed the field. Hamill at one time seemed a likely candidate, being fast and excellent on offence, but he developed a marvellous unreliability, though it is only fair to say that a lame shoulder lessened some of his keenness for hard tackling. Anderson (Wisconsin) earned a right to second choice; he has played four years, and maintained an excellent uniform standard of work. Snow's speed, judgment, and reliability in the Chicago game appear to have made him the star end of the West, though Bennett has the greater experience and is a steady, most serviceable player.

Cunningham well deserves the centre place, both because of his work in the position, and for his sportsmanship; McLain of Illinois would be a serviceable substitute, though not in the same class with Cunningham. Little of Northwestern and Eggeman of Notre Dame are remaining, of about even merit for third choice.

There were no really first-class guards, though Caley would make one if he continued in that position. Bunge is a promising man. Beloit played him at tackle, but he would be better at guard, where his weight and strength and speed would be most serviceable. Rogers is not entitled to consideration, and is withdrawn from the candidates for the All-Western eleven. France of Michigan is a coming guard.

Eligible tackles are scarce, but Steckle is entitled to first choice on the year's performance. He is both aggressive and an excellent ground-gainer. Of the remaining available ones, Bothne is the best.

Making up an All-Western team prompts the thought that although several of the elevens did excellent work—yet the number of first-class eligible candidates for the composite team—is surprisingly small.

The Missouri Valley football season ended in the triumph of Iowa over Nebraska, which for the second year had won the pennant of the Western Inter-collegiate Football Association, composed of Kansas, Missouri, and Nebraska State universities. After defeating with ease (47–6), the raw Missouri team, Nebraska moved on Lawrence, Kansas, where the great battle of the West was fought with Kansas University, November 5. A fine back field and good generalship enabled the well-balanced Nebraska eleven to win decisively, 18–6, against the superior line of Kansas, in a contest that was particularly exhausting and crippling to the Nebraskans. Hitherto unbeaten, they were routed, 0–24, two days later by the University Medical College of Kansas City, and subsequently beaten in turn by Drake University, of Des Moines, and Iowa State University, before their very busy season closed. Even Captain Melford, Nebraska's accurate goal-kicker, fell off in form, and failed to tie Iowa Thanksgiving day at Omaha on his try-at-goal.

Kansas suffered the fewest defeats, losing only to Nebraska; Missouri lost to the University Medics, to Nebraska, to Washington University (or St. Louis), and to Kansas; Iowa lost to Chicago University, 0–33, to Drake, 5–18, and was tied by Grinnell 5–5. Drake defeated Grinnell, 18–12. Both Ames and Grinnell beat Minnesota, the former, 6–0, October 22, and the latter, 16–6, a week previous.

The standard of play showed no advance. All the elevens revealed better developed systems of attack than resistance, and in most games, even one-sided ones, both teams scored. Nebraska, under the coaching of F. H. Yost (Lafayette), and the University Medics, after the coming of Coach C. S. Morris, the ex-Yale quarter, played clean, hard football. David L. Fultz, Brown's ex-captain, did much with Missouri's eleven in bringing it to creditable form for Thanksgiving, after a disheartening season. Behind the line and in defensive play Kansas did not equal former elevens, though possessing an effective offence and exceptional weight, 178 to 180 pounds to the man. But in kicking Kansas showed pronounced superiority over previous teams, through the clever work of Captain Moses, who defeated Ames by a field goal. Pennsylvania tactics continued at Kansas University, which Dr. Wylie G. Woodruff had in hand for the second season, as they did under Dr. Knipe at Iowa, where they had been installed the year previous by Wagenhurst.

The game was played generally throughout the Missouri Valley by hundreds of minor colleges, academies, high-schools, athletic clubs, and "town" teams. Haskell Indian Institute, of Lawrence, Kansas, put a light eleven in the field, under William Walker's coaching, that played the game persistently, and over an extensive area, travelling from Indianapolis to Denver on its tours. They lost to Kansas, 0–30, October 8, and 5–12, October 13; to Purdue, 0–5, October 18, and 0–13, October 22; to Indianapolis Athletic Club, 0–12, October 20; to University Medical College, 0–46, October 31; and defeated Denver Athletic Club, 12–5, November 5.

Strict amateur rules did not obtain, but none protested, nor was the amateur status improved over last season. The University Medical College, though constantly receiving seasoned recruits from universities, played at least two who were students in name only in Lewis, half-back, and Ryus, quarter. In Pendleton guard, and Captain Heller, half, the Medics again had two men who have coached professionally. Hamill, the greatest of Missouri Valley forwards, played his fifth year a guard for Kansas University, of which he became a member in 1892. He also, according to common repute, has played professionally. In a minor match Kansas put in Walker, an alumnus and professional coach, at centre, under protest, and the Athletic Association of the university disconcurred in the act. Coach Fultz played at half for Missouri in the ante-association contests, and Kramer, who has played on various minor Eastern teams, went into one game under an assumed name before he had enrolled. Pendleton, Heller, Hamill, and Fultz showed the best game in their positions in this field. At Nebraska University, whose greater enrolment gives an advantage over all contestants, the rules of amateur sport seemed most closely observed, the faculty several times keeping men out of important games for failing to reach the requisite scholarship standard.

Further discussion of Missouri Valley ethics and a review of the Southern football season continued next week. Also comment on Gallaudet. Caspar Whitney

"HOW TO GET STRONG, AND HOW TO STAY SO."—By William Blaikie.—New and Enlarged Edition.—Illustrated.—$1 75.—Harper & Brothers, Publishers

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Aids digestion.

Londonderry Lithia Water

Absolutely pure and delightful to the taste.

Gold Seal Champagne

is a natural sparkling wine produced in America under the supervision of expert foreign wine-makers.

It is equal in flavor to many brands of imported wines with inflated reputations, and for purity is unexcelled.

The difference is only in the price, the foreign article costing two and one half times as much as Gold Seal.

Why pay the difference?

A trial case will convince you of the excellence of this genuine American product. For sale by all wine-dealers and grocers. Send for illustrated booklet on wine-making.

URBANA WINE CO., Urbana, N.Y.

Europe offers nothing finer, no more desirable contents or handsomer bottle, than is found in

EAGLE LIQUEURS

An American product that excels all foreign makes in true excellence, purity and healthfulness. Connoisseurs admit its superiority. Has no equal in perfect distillation, fruity flavor, deliciousness.

Digestive, Nutritive, Sedative.

The EAGLE BRAND is to be found at the best cafes, clubs and private sideboards, everywhere.

A case of twelve assorted bottles of EAGLE LIQUEURS makes an elegant Holiday Gift. If your dealer cannot supply you write to us for Illustrated Booklet and Prices.

Eagle Liqueur Distilleries,

Rheinstrom Bros., Distillers and Exporters, 933-955 Martin St. and 934-954 E. Front St., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Highest Awards. Established 1876.

Wool Soap Free

Drop us a postal, with your name and address and that of a dealer who doesn't sell Wool Soap, and we'll send you a cake free.

Swift and Company, Chicago

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,

BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

The Scientific American

is a journal of entertainment and instruction to old and young alike. It is an acknowledged source of reliable information, and is universally recognized as the

Standard Authority

on scientific subjects. It is splendidly illustrated, and contains more solid and reliable information than can be found in any other publication. The SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN covers a wide field, embracing among other subjects:

Mechanics, Electricity, Engineering, The Navy, Physics, Astronomy, Magic Arts, Natural History and Miscellaneous Scientific Subjects

Subscriptions, $3 a year; $1 for four months' trial.

Sample copy free to readers of Harper's Weekly.

MUNN & CO., Publishers, 361 Broadway, New York.

Blakemore Whiskey 7 years Old.

NOTHING BETTER MADE OR SOLD.

Matured in wood and bottled in bond under Governmental Supervision.

If your dealer hasn't it, send us TWELVE DOLLARS, and we will have sent to your address by express prepaid a sample case containing TWELVE BOTTLES.

Freiberg & Workum, Cincinnati, O.

7,000 Guns in Stock

WE SELL GUNS of every reputable American and foreign make, and give wholesale prices to everybody. We carry in stock

Fishing Tackle and Sporting Goods amounting to a quarter of a million dollars. We can please the fancy of millionaires, or meet the demands of the poorest sportsman and angler. Write for prices, or ask us to send you our Sporting Goods Catalogue. We load and sell over

1,000,000 Hand Loaded Shells a Year

Ask us to send you our price card of hand and machine loaded shells. We have

The largest Gun Repair Shop in America

We make guns, re-bore, re-stock, repair—in fact, alter a gun to suit the owner, and guarantee satisfaction. Write for prices.

MONTGOMERY WARD & CO.

Originators of the Catalogue Business 111 to 120 Michigan Ave. cor. Madison St., Chicago

MENTION THIS PUBLICATION WHEN WRITING

Spencerian Pens

New Series No. 37.

See That Hole?

That is for inserting a pointed instrument to eject the pen from the holder, and to prevent the ink from flowing back on the pen and soiling the fingers.

Samples on receipt of return postage. Ask for Vertical No. 37.

Spencerian Pen Company

450 Broome Street, New York.

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak.

Holidays are Kodak Days

Catalogues free at the dealers or by mail.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.

Rochester, N. Y.

PURE WATER

is distilled water. Nothing but distillation will eliminate both organic and inorganic impurities. An ordinary cook-stove is all you need with

THE SANITARY STILL

to give you plenty of pure, sparkling water, aerated with sterilized air. Free Booklet. Our $10 STILL has twice the capacity of others. Write at once for particulars.

CUPRIGRAPH CO., 125 North Green St., CHICAGO

THE DECKER

Established 50 Years. Catalogue Free.

Decker's Lightning Cushion. Billiard, Pool, Bagatelle Tables. All Supplies—Repairing.

105 East 9th Street, New York City.

The School-Bag

of every boy and girl who knows the best pencil, contains

Dixon's AMERICAN GRAPHITE Pencils.

Joseph Dixon Crucible Co., Jersey City, N. J.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE, a descriptive list of over 3000 volumes, will be sent to any address on receipt of Ten Cents in stamps.

PATENT secured or money all returned. Search free. Collamer & Co., 1036 F St., Wash., D. C.

THE HAIR 27th Ed., 25c. (or stamps.) Why it Falls Off, Turns Grey, and the Remedy. By Prof. HARLEY PARKER. A. N. LONG & CO., 1013 Arch St., Phila., Pa. "Every one should read this little book."—Athenæum.

THE BOOK OF THE CENTURY

BISMARCK'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY

SATURDAY REVIEW, London: A mine of information on international politics.

LEDGER, Philadelphia: Eloquent in thought, perfect in style.

DAILY CHRONICLE, London: Remarkably full as regards internal affairs.

ATHENAEUM, London: Full of dignity and of value.

INDEPENDENT, N. Y.: A work gloriously full of great lights.

BISMARCK, the Man and the Statesman. Written and Dictated by Himself. Two Volumes, $7 50.

HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Armour's Extract of Beef

"has that rich, beefy flavor."

For preparing soups, sauces, gravies, etc. "Culinary Wrinkles" gives many ways of using Extract. It's mailed free for the asking.

"ARMOUR'S CONCENTRATED TABLETS of BEEF EXTRACT and VEGETABLES—condensed food—for home use or travelers—Sample Box containing sufficient for three meals, free, for a two cent stamp and your dealer's name.

Actual size of Tablet.

Address ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

THE ARRIVAL OF THE CHRISTMAS DINNER.

Hon. John D. Long,

Secretary of the Navy,

whose article on the development of the torpedo, entitled "LITTLE DEMONS OF WAR," will be a prominent feature of the New Year's Number of THE YOUTH'S COMPANION, is but one of 200 famous contributors to the 1899 volume. The New Subscriber for 1899 who sends $1.75 at once, and mentions this paper, will receive free the beautiful Companion Calendar for 1899 —the most beautiful gift ever given to Companion readers.

The Youth's Companion, Boston, Mass.

The "Ivory" is a favorite shaving soap because it makes a profuse rich lather, which softens the beard to be removed and leaves the skin unharmed.

It costs about one-fifth as much as the so called shaving soaps and many who have used it for this purpose for years, will not have any other.

The vegetable oils of which Ivory Soap is made, fit it for many special uses for which other soaps are unsafe or unsatisfactory.

Copyright, 1898, by The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati.

EDUCATION BY MAIL

Thousands have been helped to better pay & positions through our system of instruction. Buildings erected expressly for this purpose at a cost of $225,000

Courses of Steam, Electrical, Mechanical or Civil Engineering; Chemistry; Mining; Mechanical and Architectural Drawing; Surveying; Plumbing; Architecture; Metal Pattern Drafting; Prospecting; Bookkeeping; Shorthand; English Branches.

$2 A MONTH pays for a College Education at Home. 40,000 Students and Graduates.

Circular FREE. State subject you wish to study.

THE INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
Box 1159, Scranton, Pa., U. S. A.

The Life of Charles Stewart Parnell

By

R. BARRY O'BRIEN

With One Photogravure Portrait, a Facsimile of Parnell's Handwriting, and a Picture of Avondale. About 750 pages. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Uncut Edges and Gilt Top, $2 50.

Mr. O'Brien's work is admirably written, and is as fascinating as a good novel. Indeed it has all the elements of a tragedy, and we feel while reading it that we are being led up to the inevitable denouement. It is a singularly impartial account of the life and work of the great Irish leader.—Literary World, London.

NEW YORK AND LONDON
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers

"PERFECTION" AIR MATTRESS

Takes the place of springs and mattress combined; a perfect sanitary mattress; the most comfortable in the world for Home use, Hospitals, Ships, Yachts, Boats, etc. Absolute rest and perfect health. The cheapest and best made. Send for catalogue and prices.

MECHANICAL FABRIC CO., Providence, R.I., U.S.A.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

MAGAZINE, $4 00 a year
WEEKLY, $4 00 a year
BAZAR, $4 00 a year
LITERATURE, $4 00 a year
ROUND TABLE, $1 00 a year

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,

BANKERS.

ESTABLISHED 1873.

2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.

Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.

Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.

A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.

Correspondence solicited.

BRASS BAND

Instruments, Drums, Uniforms, Equipments for Bands and Drum Corps. Lowest prices ever quoted. Fine Catalog, 400 illustrations, mailed free; it gives Band Music & Instructions for Amateur Bands.

LYON & HEALY, 17 Adams St., Chicago.

TRADE MARK. EARL & WILSON'S LINEN COLLARS & CUFFS BEST IN THE WORLD.

A Daylight Trip, New York to Buffalo, via New York Central—Finest One-Day Railroad Ride in the World

8042

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

Aaron Bldg

A000020241148

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

A0000202411 48
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google